The thought of the knife flashed across his mind, and without a moment's further thought—without the least reflection—he darted forward.

Jonathan Wild himself was, for once in his life, completely taken at unawares.

An attack of this character from Blueskin was about the last thing Wild expected.

All had been done so quickly from first to last, that the spectators of it could scarcely bring themselves to believe in the reality of the occurrence.

Some very dismal groans, however, came from Wild's lips, and when the men raised him a little, he looked very ghastly and bad indeed.

He rolled his hideous eyes slowly and painfully around until they rested upon Blueskin's countenance.

Then his features became convulsed with rage, as he gasped faintly:

"Hold him—hold him! Do not let him escape!"

"Run for a doctor in a moment!" cried Mr. Neakes.

A turnkey departed upon this errand.

Those who held Blueskin cried:

"Don't be afraid, Mr. Wild! We have got him safe."

Jonathan's face expanded into a grim sort of smile.

"I have paid you at last," said Blueskin, in a voice that rung and echoed through the stone chamber—"I have paid you at last, and now I am content. You will bear false witness against me, will you? I shall like to hear you."

Jonathan Wild strove to speak.

But the effort was an unsuccessful one.

The blood continued to gush from his throat, and each moment he grew perceptibly weaker.

His head fell back, as the muscles in his neck refused to support its weight.

His eyes glared, and he showed every symptom of approaching death.

Blueskin smiled, and was satisfied.

About his own fate he had grown quite careless, and the thought that he had destroyed his bitter foe in the very hour of his triumph and success sent a thrill of pleasure through his frame.

Some anxious moments passed.

No one seemed to know exactly what to do; but all watched with great eagerness and impatience for the appearance of the doctor.

Blueskin looked on in grim silence, and contemplated the thief-taker with great satisfaction.

The thought that he could see his life-blood so rapidly ebbing from him overjoyed him.

Presently, the sound of steps approaching the stone chamber could be heard, and then several persons entered with great haste and confusion.

The doctor who arrived was no other than our old friend the apothecary, Mr. Snoxall.

He had been fetched because, as his shop was situated at the corner of Skinner Street and the Old Bailey, he was the nearest at hand.

He exhibited great concern when he saw the state of his patient, and called for warm water and sponge.

While these were being procured, he stooped down, and proceeded to remove Wild's neckcloth.

This was a very voluminous affair, and was wound round his neck several times.

The removal of this had the effect of causing the blood to flow much faster.

The sponge and water having now arrived, the apothecary proceeded to wash the wound.

As soon as he had completed this operation, a very ugly-looking gash was disclosed.

This he strapped up in a very skilful manner with some plaster which he took from his pocket.

Everyone of his actions was closely watched by those present, and having done so far, he set about reviving Jonathan by holding a smelling-bottle to his nose.

After about three inhalations, the thief-taker sneezed, and re-opened his eyes.

At first he was unconscious of what had just taken place.

His brain wandered.

But he soon came to his senses.

He caught hold of Mr. Snoxall by the skirt of his coat, and said:

"I have been hurt—stabbed!"

"You have, Mr. Wild."

"Speak! Tell me at once, and tell me the truth, on your life. Is the wound a mortal one?"

"I don't think it will prove so, Mr. Wild, if you are very careful. You have truly an iron constitution."

These words seemed to have a wonderful effect in reviving the thief-taker.

He uttered a loud, howling shriek, and then in a calmer voice, he said:

"Not mortal—you are sure not mortal?"

"It is an ugly affair, Mr. Wild, I can assure you. You have need to be thankful that you happened to have such a thick neckcloth on."

"Why?"

"Because you unquestionably owe your life to that simple circumstance. Had not your neckcloth been such a thickness you would have found yourself with your head half off!"

"Thanks—thanks! You shall be well paid for this!"

Then, turning to Blueskin, the thief-taker continued:

"Ha, ha! Clever as you are, I shall do for you yet—ha, ha!"

Mr. Snoxall touched the thief-taker on the arm imploringly:

"Mr. Wild—oh, Mr. Wild!" he said, "listen—pray do listen! I cannot be answerable for the injury you have received without you keep yourself perfectly quiet! The worst results may follow any undue excitement!"

"Stuff—fudge!" said Jonathan. "I have got a part to perform to-day, and I will not flinch! No, villain! I will have the sentence pronounced! I will do my share towards procuring your death! I—I—"

Jonathan gasped for breath, and made two or three abortive efforts to speak, until at length his head fell back and he relapsed into insensibility.

"It is, perhaps, better so!" said Mr. Snoxall. "I will have him conveyed away while in this state, and the only chance I shall have of doing any good with him will be by keeping him asleep! Will you, Mr. Noakes, allow some of your men to carry him to his house?"

The Governor of Newgate gave the requisite directions, and then four turnkeys took the body of Jonathan Wild and carried it out of the chamber.

Blueskin fixed his eyes upon him up to the last moment.

He experienced a bitter pang when he found that Wild was still alive and that there was some prospect of his recovery.

When they had gone Mr. Noakes turned towards him as he said:

"So, villain, you are balked of your designs! When was a murder committed within the walls of Newgate before?"

"I wish with all my heart it had been a murder!" said Blueskin, "if you call the slaying of a noxious criminal like Jonathan Wild murder! But I was a fool to make the attempt!"

"Why did you do so, then? You will find it will tell against you at your trial!"

"I tried thoughtlessly! I might have known that I should fail! No knife will ever drink Jonathan Wild's blood! He is destined to take his last look of this world at Tyburn!"

"It would be more sensible if I was to prophecy the same thing of you!" retorted Mr. Noakes. "If every any man deserved to die an ignominious death there you do, and you will, too, before many days pass over your head!"

"We shall see about that!" said Blueskin.

"Do not stop dallying any longer here!" continued the Governor. "Lead him on and place him in the dock! I will myself make the judge acquainted with what has just taken place!"

The four turnkeys now led Blueskin up the flight of stone steps we have mentioned.

They terminated in one corner of the dock where the prisoners stand.

In another moment Blueskin found himself standing in this place under the charge of a police-officer.

The turnkeys fell back into the rear.

Mr. Noakes followed the little party up the steps and took his seat in the little box-like place at the side of the dock, which was specially constructed for his use on such occasions.

He sat down in a moment and commenced writing at a furious rate upon a sheet of paper.

Blueskin paid no attention to him, but glanced calmly round the court.

The preliminary business of the day had not yet been disposed of.

The Judge was seated in his chair busily occupied in reading the newspaper.

The barristers were chatting with each other and laughing, or else looking over the briefs and taking notes.

From these Blueskin's eyes roamed over the body of the court, and he gave a passing glance at those persons who were seated in the gallery just above his head.

The crier was administering the oath to the jurymen, and his cracked and jangling voice sounded high above the other minor sounds which filled the court.

This ceremony was at length concluded and order called.

In another moment silence reigned throughout the building.

The only sound audible was the squeaking of Mr. Noake's quill pen.

The Governor was writing away for his life.

Order was again called, and the business of the day began.

The clerk of the arraigns, a young, florid, puppyish young man, rose from his seat in an affected manner.

He held several parchments in his left hand, which were fastened together at one corner.

Having rummaged them over, he commenced reading the indictment.

But such a gabbling noise was surely never before heard.

Blueskin strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, for he was eager to know all the particulars he possibly could about the charge preferred against him.

Very soon, however, he gave up the attempt in despair.

When he looked about him he found that no one was paying the least attention to what was being read.

The Judge still continued the perusal of his newspaper.

The barristers continued to talk and laugh, though in an under-tone.

As a last hope Blueskin glanced at the jury.

But they were no exception to the rule.

To be sure they all tried to look very serious and sagacious, but failed most signally in both.

One had his eyes fixed upon the reflecting mirror above his head, another was playing with a pen, and so on.

All were intent upon something else, and not the business in hand.

Blueskin was roused from this survey by the hearing the clerk of the arraigns say, in a louder and more audible tone of voice:

"Prisoner at the bar, do you plead guilty or not guilty to the charge now brought before you?"

"Not guilty!" said Blueskin, in a clear, firm voice.

A slight bustle followed, and then a counsel, who had been entrusted with the prosecution, rose to his feet.

He was about to speak, when Mr. Noakes, the Governor, rose and said:

"My lord, I am sure you will pardon me for interrupting, but I have here a paper relative to the prisoner, which your lordship will please peruse before going further with the case!"

The Judge hesitated, and asked:

"What is the nature of the communication?"

"It is here in writing, my lord, and concerns some events that took place in Newgate a little while ago?"

"Concerning the prisoner?"

"Yes, your lordship!"

"Pass me the paper, then, I will read it."

An usher of the court now came forward, and taking the folded paper from Mr. Noakes, carried it to the judge on the bench.

His lordship took the paper, opened it, and gave quite a theatrical kind of start when his eye caught the first words.

The dominant curiosity of all the persons in court was keenly aroused by this letter.

Every one wondered what could be the nature of the contents of it, while they watched the countenance of the judge with all-absorbing interest.

His lordship read the document steadily through to the end, and then, looking up, he addressed Mr. Noakes, saying:

"Are you sure there is no mistake here? Will you swear to this?"

"Certainly, my lord!" returned the Governor, readily. "A dozen persons witnessed the transaction!"

"Enough. Gentlemen of the jury, I do not wish to pre-judge this case or excite any detrimental prejudice against the prisoner at the bar! Nevertheless, I must make you acquainted with the subject matter of this communication which I have just received from Mr. Noakes, the Governor!"

A dead silence followed.

The judge rustled the paper in an imposing manner, held it up to the light, and then, in rather a low tone of voice, he spoke as follows:—

CHAPTER CCLXXVIII.

"GENTLEMEN of the Jury,

"This document states that this morning the prisoner at the bar was brought from his cell to the ante-chamber beneath the dock, so as to be in readiness when he was called. It seems he had to wait here some few minutes, during which space of time Mr. Jonathan Wild, very unfortunately for himself, happened to enter. Without suspecting any harm, it seems he incautiously approached the prisoner, who, finding Mr. Wild within his reach, with great suddenness started to his feet, wrenched a knife from one of the turnkeys, and with this weapon stabbed Mr. Wild furiously and dangerously in the throat!"

In modern language, this intelligence produced a great sensation in the court.

As if with one consent, every face in the court was turned to Blueskin's.

The judge went on:

"From the determined and desperate manner in which the attack was made, Mr. Noakes expresses his belief that nothing less than the death of Mr. Wild was the object of the prisoner at the bar. Luckily, however, he was foiled in this design. The wound received by Mr. Wild has been pronounced not mortal, but still a very dangerous one. In order to recover he will have to take extreme care, and to receive the best of medical attention.

"The reason the prisoner failed may be attributed to two causes—first, the promptitude with which he was seized and overpowered by the turnkeys; and second, the fact of Mr. Wild having worn a very thick neckcloth, which obstructed the progress of the knife."

The judge ceased, and looked at the jury-box.

"Such, gentlemen of the jury," he said, "is the nature of the communication just received, which I hand over to you in order that you may peruse it for yourselves, and ascertain the truth of it."

The paper was then passed to the foreman of the jury, who, having looked at it, circulated it among his companions.

As may naturally be supposed the results of this was, that a very unfavourable impression with respect to Blueskin took possession of the jurymen and all the spectators in the court, although there were very few who really, and truly speaking, felt any great amount of sympathy for Jonathan Wild.

Mr. Noakes's communication having been duly handed round by the jurymen, and read by those in possession of so useful an accomplishment, was handed back to the judge, and then the interrupted proceedings resumed their usual course.

If anything, an extra interest was now felt in all that concerned the prisoner at the bar in the remotest degree.

The counsel for the prosecution, who had resumed his seat, now rose again, and having adjusted his black gown to his satisfaction, and flourished his papers formidably, spoke as follows:

In the intense silence of the court, every word he uttered could be heard with painful distinctness.

"My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury,

"It will be proved to you in evidence that the prisoner at the bar, by name Joseph Blake, but better known by the nickname of Blueskin, is one of the most daring and desperate of depredators that the present or any other age has had the ill-fortune to produce.

"I confess, gentlemen of the jury, that it was at first my intention to have expiated at some length upon the numerous offences of the prisoner.

"It was my intention to describe the man in his true and proper colours, but I abandon that intention.

"There is no longer any need for me to take up your time, gentlemen of the jury, with a recapitulation of the deeds committed during his long career.

"The little incident which has just come under your notice does away in a moment with the necessity for anything of the kind.

"The man's disposition and character are fully revealed to you in all their black enormity by this single act.

"The circumstance must be fresh in your memories.

"Mr. Jonathan Wild, who has rendered the Government and the country at large inestimable service in the apprehension of criminals of the deep-dyed desperate class, to whose indefatigable exertions and dauntless conduct the presence of the prisoner at the bar is this day due—I say, this public servant approaching him incautiously was seriously wounded.

"Gentlemen of the jury, what would not that man do who just upon the threshold of taking his trial before you upon a charge affecting his life if proved against him—I say, gentlemen of the jury, what would such a man do who, under these circumstances, attempted to commit a brutal murder.

"Such a man would be capable of anything, and I no longer need dwell upon his character.

"What I have already advanced will be quite sufficient.

"In connection with this attempted murder, gentlemen of the jury, I have, however, something to say.

"At present you only possess the bare knowledge of what the prisoner did; but I can supply you with the motive for his conduct, and when I have done so you will no longer wonder at his having made so cowardly an attack upon the life of Mr. Jonathan Wild.

"The motive is this:

"Mr. Wild was to have appeared before you to-day, gentlemen of the jury, as an important witness in behalf of the prosecution.

"The prisoner fearing the result of the disclosure of certain facts, resolved to prevent Mr. Wild from appearing before you, and there is no doubt that he has succeeded so far in accomplishing his villainous purpose.

"We have been informed, gentlemen of the jury, by Mr. Noakes, the worthy Governor of Newgate, that Mr. Wild is in a precarious condition, and that in order to recover he will have to take the greatest care, and be compelled to have the best medical advice and assistance.

"Under these circumstances, then, he cannot, of course, present himself before you. I might, therefore, ask for the postponement of this trial until the next session upon the ground that an important witness is unable to attend.

"But I shall make no such application, gentlemen.

"I should be sorry to see the prisoner accomplish his purpose. No! We will supply the place of Mr. Wild.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH DISENCUMBERS JACK SHEPPARD OF HIS FETTERS.

"Luckily the evidence against the prisoner is singularly lucid and simple.

"The facts will be simply placed before you and amply borne out by the evidence adduced. One point upon which Mr. Wild's testimony would have been important was the positive identification of the prisoner, but I am instructed to state that there are persons in court who can give this important evidence. In the second place, Mr. Wild would have given an account of all the antecedent proceedings of the prisoner. This, however, must be dispensed with altogether, or supplied in the best manner possible.

"My immediate duty, gentlemen of the jury, after making these introductory remarks, is to give an account of the circumstances of the charge preferred against the prisoner.

"I shall be able to do this in a few words.

"On the 7th day of October last, Mr. Daniel Higgins, a No. 78.—BLUESKIN.

highly-respectable tradesman and citizen of London, in company with a friend, hired a vehicle, and went down as far as Barnet.

"From this place they returned just about sunset the same evening. Mr. Higgins was driving; his friend sat by his side.

"While approaching Finchley, and while it was yet twilight, they were startled by a man who rode out suddenly into the road.

"He held a double-barrelled pistol in his hand, and, aiming this at Mr. Higgins and his friend as they sat in the vehicle, swore with an oath that if they did not pull up that instant he would blow their brains out.

"Influenced by this horrible menace, Mr. Higgins drew the rein. The horseman then, still holding a pistol threateningly at them, demanded the money and whatever valuables they had about them.

"Being unarmed and unable to resist, Mr. Higgins and his friend complied with the highwayman's demands, and surrendered to him every article of value that they had about them.

"The articles consisted of a large silver watch belonging to Mr. Higgins, and some money in coin.

"Having thus succeeded in his purpose, the highwayman rode off, having put the travellers in grievous bodily fear for their lives.

"Gentlemen of the jury—I have said that it was twilight when this took place. Objects not far away could be clearly and plainly distinguished.

"Consequently, Mr. Higgins and his friend—both of whom will presently be called before you—had an opportunity of closely observing the countenance of the man who despoiled them of their property, for, while committing the robbery, he came quite close up to them in a very daring manner.

"That Mr. Higgins and his friend should carefully notice the personal appearance of the highwayman is nothing but natural—any of you, gentlemen of the jury, would have done just the same thing.

"Mr. Higgins and his friend, then, observed their antagonist attentively, and they will be prepared to come forward and swear positively to his identity.

"Moreover, when the prisoner at the bar was captured and brought to Newgate, he was, in accordance with the regulations of the prison, thoroughly searched by experienced officers.

"Among the various articles in this manner brought to light, was a large silver watch, of rather peculiar workmanship.

"That watch, gentlemen of the jury, will be produced by the police officer who found it on the prisoner.

"This will complete the case.

"A respectable citizen of London is robbed by a highwayman.

"A silver watch and other articles were taken from him.

"The watch to be presently produced, which you understand was found upon the person of the prisoner, Mr. Daniel Higgins will swear was his property.

"He will also swear that the prisoner at the bar is the individual who committed the robbery on the night in question, and the friend who sat with him in the conveyance that had been hired will support this portion of his testimony.

"Such, then, gentlemen of the jury, is the case for the prosecution, and I shall now proceed without further delay to call the witnesses before you."

The counsel for the prosecution resumed his seat, and having shuffled his papers about, whispered rapidly to a sickly-looking young man who sat next to him.

There was now a slight lull in the proceedings, and people looked about them a little, and hinted their opinion of the case.

As for Blueskin, he stood like one in a dream.

He could scarcely bring himself to believe in the reality of the events which were taking place around him, and yet the circumstantial coherence of the narrative which came so glibly from the lips of the counsel for the prosecution staggered him.

The reader need not be told that Blueskin did not commit the offence with which he was thus charged.

He knew nothing at all about it.

At first he had listened in doubt whether he had really committed a robbery upon the person of Mr. Daniel Higgins; but when the counsel proceeded to give the particulars, he had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that no such deed was ever perpetrated by him.

Never in the whole course of his career had he committed a robbery on the highway, the details of which corresponded in the least degree with those which had been just mentioned.

Under these circumstances, it is not to be surprised at that Blueskin felt very much bewildered, and was in doubt as to what he should say.

His irresolution was, however, quickly put an end to, and his whole attention absorbed by what was going on before him.

He felt the same curious interest which people feel when they see a play, the denouement of which is unknown to them.

To Blueskin, all the incidents were as fresh as they are to the reader.

The sickly-faced young man, to whom we referred a little while back, and who sat next to the counsel for the prosecution, having got his documents in readiness, now rose to his feet, and said:

"Call Mr. Daniel Higgins!"

This done, he sat down again.

This was the junior counsel, whose duty it was to examine the witnesses.

The whispering between him and his superior went on again with redoubled vigour.

In the meanwhile, the crier of the court, in a high, nasal tone of voice, repeated the name of the witness.

There was a bit of a stir in the recess between the Governor's seat at the side of the dock and the jury box, and then someone could be seen pushing his way through the people who obstructed his progress.

"This way, if you please, sir!" said the crier. "The Court is waiting for you."

Blueskin looked along at this person, but he was not able to see him with any degree of distinctness until he stood up in the witness box.

This elevated position he gained in the course of another moment, and the crier having put the bar across, proceeded to administer the oath.

While this little ceremony was gone through, Blueskin was enabled to have a good look at the individual who answered to the name of Mr. Daniel Higgins.

To the best of his belief, the prisoner had never seen him before until that moment.

He was a little man, apparently about sixty years of age.

He was very thin.

His cheeks were hollow, and his hands as fleshless as those of a skeleton, while all his garments hung loosely about him.

He was attired in a suit of dark grey cloth, which was decidedly the worse for wear.

His rusty black hat he had placed after some hesitation upon the table near him.

He was quite bald.

All the hair he had on his head being like a ragged fringe about half an inch in depth, which extended from one ear to the other.

But the bald part of his head had a dirty unwashed look, which was very disagreeable to the beholder.

He was bent into a perpetual bow, and seemed as though he would cringe to everybody, and allow them even to walk over his body, if they thought fit to do so.

CHAPTER CCLXXX.

BLUESKIN LISTENS WITH GREAT INTEREST TO THE DETAILS OF THE CHARGE PREFERRED AGAINST HIM.

SUCH is a feeble and faint description of the personal appearance of Mr. Daniel Higgins.

We have described him all but his eyes, and these were such a peculiar feature that they deserve special notice.

It was but rarely that they could be seen, owing to his habit of holding down his head.

When he addressed anyone, or when he was spoken to, he would glance furtively from under his shaggy brows.

All that could then be seen of his eyes were two twinkling, glistening stars, which seemed to possess a keenness of vision equal to those of a hawk.

While he took the oath he fixed his eyes steadfastly upon the book, and in conclusion kissed it with rather a "clamorous smack."

Then he gave one of his furtive, stealthy glances round the court.

But in that glance he took in everything.

Blueskin was conscious for an instant that the strange being was looking at him, and then his eyes were directed elsewhere.

The whole time occupied by this stealthy glance was very brief indeed, and when he had done, he stood in an attitude of great affected humbleness and deference.

He rubbed one hand slowly over the other in a manner disagreeable in the extreme with the fidgety notion which Hood describes as "Washing his hands with invisible soap,

In imperceptible water."

The junior counsel was now upon his legs again. Making a pretence of referring to his papers, he turned to the witness, and said:

"What is your name, if you please?"

The witness's lips moved, but no audible sound came from them.

"Speak up, if you please. We can't hear you? What's your name?"

"Daniel Higgins, sir."

"Oh, Daniel Higgins!" repeated the counsel. "And where do you reside, Mr. Daniel Higgins?"

"Little Britain, sir."

"Where?" said the judge, in an imposing voice, as he stopped in the middle of writing his notes.

"In Little Britain, my lord," said the junior counsel. "It's a narrow street that turns, I believe, out of St. Martin's-le-Grand, and leads into Smithfield. Is that right?" added the counsel, inquiringly, as he turned to the witness.

"Yes, sir; that is right."

The judge wrote it down in his notes.

"What is the nature of the business you carry on there, Mr. Higgins?"

"I keeps a coffee-shop, sir."

"Oh—indeed! Well, do you happen to recollect the 7th day of October last?"

"Yes, sir."

"You do recollect it?"

"I do."

"What happened then on that day for you to remember it so particularly?"

"I went for a ride to Barnet in a horse and trap."

"Did you go alone?"

"No, sir."

"Who went with you?"

"A friend of mine."

"What is his name?"

"Bob Siggers."

"Is he in attendance?"

"Yes, sir, he's a-waiting."

"Very well, then, that will do. On the 7th day of October last you say you went to Barnet in a horse and trap, and that a friend of yours, by name Mr. Siggers, accompanied you?"

"That's it, sir."

"Very well. Did anything particular occur to you on the way to Barnet?"

"No, sir. We started about eight o'clock in the morning, and got there between ten and eleven."

"Very good. Then will you have the kindness to tell his lordship and the gentlemen of the jury what happened to you on your way home?"

"Yes, sir."

"Very well, go on. What time was it when you left Barnet on your way back to London?"

"About half-past four in the afternoon."

"About half-past four?"

"Yes, sir. I couldn't say the time exactly, but it was just about sunset."

"Very well. And Mr. Siggers returned with you, I presume?"

"Yes, sir, he did."

"Very well, then. What happened to you after you left Barnet?"

"Well, sir, I was a-driving along, thinking of nothing in particular, when all of a sudden I saw a man on horseback in the road. How he got there I don't know; he seemed to come all at once."

"Go on, if you please."

"Well, sir, I can assure you it gave me a bit of a turn to see him so sudden, and then I saw that he had a pistol in his hand."

"Who had a pistol in his hand?" asked the judge.

"The man on horseback in the road, my lord."

"How came you to see it?"

"Why, my lord, it was only like twilight, and you could see about you pretty well. But not only that, the man pointed the pistol at me, and came quite close up to the cart, and swore with an oath that if I did not pull up he would blow my brains out."

"And what did you do?"

"I pulled up, in course, for I thought he would be as good as his word."

"What then?"

"When the cart had stopped, he came quite close up to us, and still pointing the pistol at me and my friend, Bob Siggers, told us to hand over all the money and valuables we had about us, or he would blow our brains out."

"You will swear he said he would blow your brains out?"

"Yes, my lord."

There was a pause, during which the judge occupied himself in making this important memorandum.

When he had done, he looked up as a signal to the prisoner's counsel that he was ready for him to proceed.

"Well, Mr. Higgins, what did you do when you were threatened in so dreadful a manner?"

"Why, sir, I gave him all I had."

"And your friend?"

"He did the same, sir."

"Well, and what then?"

"When he had taken all that we had got about us, the highwayman rode off, and suffered us to proceed."

"And did you meet with any further interruption on your way home?"

"No, sir."

"That will do. Now, the next thing I want you to tell us is, what articles you gave to the highwayman."

"I gave him some money."

"In coin or notes?"

"In coin."

"Then that I suppose you cannot identify?"

"I cannot, sir."

"What else did he take from you—or rather, what else did he compel you to give him?"

The junior counsel smiled at what he thought an admirable stroke of wit.

"I gave him a large silver watch."

"Was that your own property?"

"Yes, sir."

"Had it been long in your possession?"

"Yes, a good while, sir. It was my father's before it was mine."

"Oh, indeed! then you must be perfectly familiar with the watch?"

"Quite so, sir."

"And this you say the highwayman took, and rode away with?"

"Yes, sir."

"You are sure you would know the watch if you were to see it again?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Gentlemen of the jury," said the senior counsel, "I have stated that a watch was found upon the person of the prisoner at the time of his apprehension. I will now call the officer before you who found the article I have mentioned, and who will produce it to the Court."

The counsel sat down, and his junior said:

"Call George Grimmett!"

A police officer answering to this name now made his appearance, carrying a bundle of some kind in one hand.

Mr. Daniel Higgins was desired to stand down for a moment, so as to give place to this new witness, though the crier signified to him that he was not yet done with.

The police officer was then sworn, and having answered to his name, proceeded to untie the bundle.

Upon this Blueskin fixed his eyes with very great attention.

He was very anxious and curious to know what the bundle contained.

The junior counsel interrupted the police officer in what he was about by saying:

"Now, George Grimmett, attend to me, if you please."

The officer turned round in a moment, and, pulling out his cheeks, looked attentively at Blueskin.

He had been a witness many a time, and knew the exact routine.

"Be good enough to look at the prisoner at the bar."

"I is a-looking at him, sir!"

"Did you take him into custody?"

"Well, not exactly, sir."

"What do you mean by not exactly?"

"Mr. Wild took him prisoner, sir."

"Oh! ah! It is so in my notes. But you were present when the prisoner was brought into the lobby of Newgate, were you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"That will do, then. Be good enough to look at the prisoner at the bar again, and then tell me whether he is the same person that Mr. Wild brought in as a prisoner."

"It is the same, sir," said the police officer, after looking at Blueskin again.

"That will do. Did Mr. Wild say who he was?"

"Yes, sir, he said his name was Blueskin."

"That is not his real name?"

"No, sir, that is his alye-as, sir."

"His real name is Joseph Blake, is it not?"

"I believe it is, sir."

"Do you know the prisoner?"

"Oh yes, sir, I have seen him hundreds of times! He was formerly in the employ of Jonathan Wild."

"Then you can swear to his identity?"

"Certainly, sir, I can."

"That is enough. When he was brought into the lobby, what did you do?"

"Searched him, sir."

"What did you find?"

"These articles, sir," said the police officer, going to his bundle again.

A watch was disclosed, and several other insignificant articles, and a considerable sum in money.

Blueskin recognised all as belonging to him except the watch.

The officer who stood in the witness-box was the one who had searched him.

Blueskin had even had a watch taken from him, but it was not the same one that lay on the top of the other things in the bundle.

It had been a little of Jonathan Wild's cleverness which had brought about the substitution.

The junior counsel continued his examination of George Grimmett.

"Did you find a watch upon the person of the prisoner?"

"I did, sir."

"Have you it there?"

"I have, sir."

"Produce it, then."

The officer held up a watch by the chain that was attached to it.

The watch was of silver, and the size of it was certainly not any larger than a turnip.

Most persons in court felt their visages relax into a smile when they beheld it.

"Is that the watch you found upon the person of the prisoner?"

"It is, sir."

"That will do, then," said the junior counsel. "You swear that the prisoner at the bar is Joseph Blake, better known as Blueskin, and that he is the person from whom you took the watch you hold in your hand?"

The officer nodded his head, and said:

"I do sir."

"Then you can stand down."

"Wait a moment!" said the judge, biting the feather-end of his quill pen. "Who appears for the defence—on behalf of the prisoner?"

A silence followed.

The clerk of the arraigns then rose from his seat just underneath the judge's desk, and, turning round, said:

"I believe the prisoner is undefended, my lord."

"Indeed! that ought to have been mentioned before," then turning to Blueskin, he added: "Prisoner at the bar, have you employed anyone to defend you?"

"I have not, my lord," replied Blueskin, "I had not the means of doing so."

"Hum! ha!" said the judge, looking at the barristers seated round the table. "Perhaps one of my learned friends would be kind enough to watch the case for the prisoner?"

An irresolute pause followed, and then a young man rose and said:

"I will undertake that duty, my lord."

This was merely a matter of form, and the barrister sat down again.

"Prisoner at the bar," continued the judge, "have you anything to say to this witness?"

"Yes, my lord."

"What is it?"

"The watch which he says was found upon me I most solemnly swear was never in my possession!"

"But he swears he took it from you in the lobby when he searched you. He stands there on his oath."

"Then he perjures himself, my lord!"

"Have you anything further to say to him?"

"No more than that, my lord."

The judge made a sign with his pen to the officer, who left the witness-box with all speed.

"Now, Mr. Higgins," said the junior counsel, "we will trouble you to stand up again, if you please."

In the same trembling, cringing manner as before, Mr. Higgins got up into the witness-box.

As soon as he was instated there, the junior counsel continued:

"Now, Mr. Daniel Higgins, be kind enough to look at that watch which you see on the table beside you."

The witness did as he was bid, and looked at the watch carefully.

"Do you recognise it?" asked the counsel.

"I do, sir—it is mine."

"You swear that?"

"Oh, certainly!"

"Very well! Now tell me—will you swear that that is the watch which you surrendered to the prisoner when he stopped you on the high-road, on your way back from Finchley, on the 7th day of October last?"

"I will, sir."

"The money, you say, you could not swear to?"

"I could not."

"Have you any doubt as to the identity of the prisoner at the bar? Look at him, and tell me whether he is the man who stopped you on the Finchley road on the afternoon in question."

Blueskin felt the witness's eyes meet his for a moment, and then Mr. Higgins said:

"I have no doubt whatever—that is the man. I cannot be mistaken. I noticed his face particularly, and you will admit that his countenance is one which, if once seen, could never be forgotten."

"That will do, then, Mr. Higgins. You can stand down, so far as I am concerned. I don't know whether the prisoner has any questions to ask you."

"I have no questions to ask," said Blueskin, "but——"

"Stop, stop!" said the judge. "You will presently have an opportunity afforded you for making your defence."

"But, my lord, I merely wished to say——"

"But you must not! Have you any questions to ask?"

"No, my lord, but——"

"That will do, then. You must reserve your defence. Stand down, Mr. Higgins. And now let the next witness be called."

Blueskin became silent, for he found it was no use to attempt to speak.

Folding his arms across his breast, he looked frowningly and angrily around him.

He could see that the chances of his having fair play were very faint indeed, and that, in spite of the absence of Jonathan Wild, the trial would terminate just as the thief-taker desired it should.

CHAPTER CCCLXXX.

BLUESKIN IS FOUND GUILTY OF A HIGHWAY ROBBERY, WHICH HE NEVER COMMITTED, AND SENTENCE OF DEATH IS PASSED UPON HIM.

"CALL Mr. Robert Siggers!" said the junior counsel.

There was a stir in one corner of the court, and then in a moment afterwards Mr. Siggers, the companion of the delectable Mr. Daniel Higgins, stood in the witness-box.

He was a tall, hulking fellow, whose appearance was certainly the reverse of respectable, notwithstanding the very palpable fact that he had taken extraordinary pains with his toilette.

His hair was cut very short at the back of the neck and so round to his ears, in front of which, coming down from his temples on to his cheeks, were two lank pieces of hair, which were coiled up at the ends into a hook-like shape.

His forehead was low, his nose flat, his mouth large, and the whole of his countenance was characterised by an expression of ferocity and mean cunning.

He made a kind of circular bow when he entered the witness-box, and kissed the bible with great unction when the oath was administered to him.

He turned round then with a smile upon his lips and awaited his interrogation.

The junior counsel rose again.

"Your name is Robert Siggers, is it not?"

"Yes, sir, it are."

From this reply it would seem that Mr. Robert Siggers's notions of grammar were as peculiar as his looks.

"Very well. Do you remember the 7th of October last?"

"I do, sir!"

"What happened then? Please to tell the Court."

"Me and my friend Higgins drove to Barnet. It happened to be the fair, and we wanted to pick up a hoss apiece if we could do so cheap."

"Well, never mind that. You went to Barnet."

"Yes, sir, but we lost our journey. We didn't buy no hoss, bekos the price were too high!"

"Oh, so you returned with a good bit of money about you?"

"We did, sir."

"Well, what happened on your way home?"

"We were stopped by a man on hoss-back, who held a double-barrelled pistol in his hand, which he pointed at us, and threatened to blow our brains out without we handed him over all the money and valuable property we had about us."

"And you complied with the demand?"

"Yes, we gave him all we had, which was a goodish deal, bekos when we set out we meant to buy a hoss apiece, which we didn't do, bekos, as I said before, they was too dear."

"Very well, Mr. Siggers. You sat in the cart or trap, or whatever the conveyance was by the side of your friend Mr. Higgins, who was driving?"

"That is quite correct, sir."

"Did you see the man's face when he rode up to the trap and took your money?"

"Yes, sir, almost as plain as I can see yours now."

"How did that happen?"

"Why the sun had not set very long before, and it was only just duskish like."

"Oh, indeed! Well, now, Mr. Siggers, be good enough to turn round and look at the prisoner at the bar, then tell the Court whether that is or is not the man who committed the robbery you have described."

Mr. Siggers pretended to look very earnestly at Blueskin for a moment or two, and then he said, slowly and with emphasis:

"That is the man! I could tell his face from a thousand!"

This was a very conclusive and emphatic mode of swearing to anyone's identity, and the jury looked at each other, as much as to say, "That's settled."

The judge, addressing Blueskin, asked him whether he wished to put any questions to this witness.

Blueskin replied in the negative.

He could see that it was quite folly to say anything to these people who had been so thoroughly and efficiently drilled by Jonathan Wild. So Mr. Robert Siggers was allowed to leave the witness-box in peace, for which he was very thankful, if one may judge by the alacrity with which he stepped down.

"Call Mr. Noakes!" said the junior counsel.

The Governor of Newgate left his seat at his desk and took his stand in the witness-box.

When the preliminaries had been gone through, the counsel said:

"Your name is Mr. Noakes, I believe?"

"Yes, sir."

"And the position you occupy is Governor of the prison of Newgate?"

"It is, sir."

"Do you know the prisoner at the bar?"

"I do."

"What is his name?"

"He is generally called Blueskin, but I believe his real name is Joseph Blake."

"That is all, Mr. Noakes, thank you."

"Do you wish to say anything to this witness?" asked the judge.

"He is a bitter foe of mine!" said Blueskin, "and would do anything —"

"There—there! That will do! Stand down, Mr. Noakes!"

The Governor left the witness-box.

"That is the case for the prosecution, my lord," said the junior counsel, as he sat down.

The barrister who had taken upon himself the task of defending Blueskin, at a sign from the latter came towards him.

Blueskin whispered something rapidly into his ear, but the barrister shook his head, as he replied:

"I am afraid it is no good—however, I will try."

With these words the counsel returned to his place, and, standing up, said:

"My Lord and gentlemen of the Jury,—

"As you must be well aware, I am not in a position to defend this man properly, although at the wish of the learned judge I appear here on his behalf.

"I have no brief—I have no witnesses to call, and the only instructions I have received are those which have been given me in a whisper a moment or two ago.

"I have, then, gentlemen of the jury, simply to state that the prisoner entirely denies the charge which has been brought against him.

"He maintains that he is perfectly innocent of it.

"On the night in question he was nowhere near Finchley or Barnet, and he also affirms that never until this morning had he beheld either Mr. Higgins or Mr. Siggers, and that the details of the case were as new to him as to any person in the court.

"He admits that when searched at Newgate a watch was found upon him, but he declares that the watch to which Mr. Higgins has sworn is not the same one, but another which has been substituted for it.

"He adds, moreover, that Jonathan Wild swore to be revenged upon him, and has adopted this means of keeping his oath.

"Mr. Noakes, too, he states, has been suborned to give evidence against him, and that the whole of the affair has been concocted by Jonathan Wild.

"Gentlemen of the jury, this is the statement made to me by the prisoner, and this is the only defence I have to offer in his behalf; and if what I have said has the effect of casting a doubt upon any of the evidence brought before you, it is your duty to give the prisoner the utmost benefit of that doubt."

The counsel for the defence sat down.

His address, however, did not seem to produce any great effect either upon judge or jury.

The counsel for the prosecution now rose, and it was clear he intended to exercise his right of reply.

"My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury,—

"I have a few more remarks to make with reference to this case, but they will not occupy me a moment.

"I should be loth to detain you even for so short a time, only duty compels me to speak.

"You have heard, then, the words just uttered by my learned friend who undertook to defend the prisoner unprepared.

"The statements made by him came from the prisoner himself, and therefore I should like to call your attention to them.

"You cannot have forgotten, gentlemen of the jury, the communication which the learned judge handed to you for your perusal.

"That communication states that the prisoner made a most desperate and cowardly attack upon that valuable public servant, Mr. Jonathan Wild.

"Now, I would like you to compare that action with the assertion that Jonathan Wild fabricated this charge against the prisoner at the bar.

"I shall leave you to draw your own conclusions from it.

"In my opinion, a clearer and more distinct case was never placed before a jury for decision."

The counsel sat down, and there was a general buzz in the court, during which the jurymen whispered nonsense to each other, and the judge turned over his notes.

At length he ceased, and looked up.

The crier, who had had his eye upon him all the while, immediately cried out: "Silence!"

All became still, as if by magic; and then the judge, in a mumbling voice, which Blueskin could scarcely understand, commenced his address to the jury:

"Gentlemen of the Jury,—

"The prisoner at the bar is charged with committing a highway robbery on the road between Barnet and Finchley, shortly after sunset on the evening of the 7th day of October last past.

"Mr. Higgins and Mr. Siggers, two citizens and tradesmen in London, who have given their evidence before you, have sworn to the particulars under which the robbery was committed. What one said exactly agreed with what was uttered by the other.

"Both, without any hesitation, identified the prisoner at the bar.

"They have sworn that he was the man who committed the robbery, as they had a good opportunity of looking in his face, and the face happens to be one which once seen could never be forgotten or mistaken.

"Then, a police officer has been brought before you who states on his oath that he searched the prisoner as soon as he was brought into the lobby.

"Upon him he found money to a considerable amount and various miscellaneous articles, among which was a very large old-fashioned watch, almost as unmistakable as the countenance of the prisoner at the bar.

"This watch is shown to Mr. Higgins, who swears it is the one taken from him by the highwayman upon the Finchley road.

"He has no doubt upon the matter, the watch having been in his possession for a long time, and having been his father's before him.

"The chain of evidence is then complete.

"Every link is perfect; and all that is done towards rebutting any portion of it is the statement made by the prisoner through our learned friend, which statement, gentlemen of the jury, I need scarcely say is not, in my opinion, worth even a momentary consideration.

"It would never do to remand a prisoner or declare him not guilty upon such grounds as these, especially when the evidence is so very clear and complete as it is in this instance.

"Indeed, I may say that it has rarely fallen to my lot to have a trial brought before me in which the evidence is so clear and conclusive.

"Gentlemen of the jury, it is your duty to consider over the evidence given, and then give a verdict in accordance with that and your own consciences."

The judge ceased.

The jurymen just whispered to each other, and then sat down again.

They were not long in coming to a conclusion.

The usher of the court then addressed them, and said:

"Gentlemen of the jury, do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty or not guilty?"

"Guilty," responded the foreman of the jury, in a firm voice.

The verdict took no one by surprise.

All expected what it would be.

Indeed, under the circumstances it was scarcely possible for them to pronounce a verdict of a different character to the one they gave.

There was a brief silence, and then the clerk of the arraigns said:

"Prisoner at the bar, what have you to say why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

"I can only repeat what I said before," replied Blueskin, in a clear and steady voice—"I am innocent of the crime laid to my charge; and I state again that Jonathan Wild has fabricated all on purpose to have his revenge upon me."

While Blueskin was speaking these words, the judge was fumbling under his desk for the black cap.

This he put on, and then said:

"Prisoner at the bar, you have had a fair and impartial trial for a very heinous offence, for which the law of the land awards the penalty of death. With the justice of the verdict given by the jury I heartily and cordially agree, and I now proceed to pass sentence upon you."

The judge paused, as though to conceal his emotion.

"The sentence of the Court upon you is, that you be taken hence to the place from which you came, and afterwards to the place of common execution, and that you be there hanged by the neck until you are dead; and may the Lord have mercy upon your soul!"

Blueskin felt someone touch him on the shoulder.

He turned round, and beheld his tormentor, Mr. Noakes.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXI.

BLUESKIN PARTIALLY REVENGES HIMSELF UPON MR. NOAKES AND THE JUDGE.

"He! he!" laughed the Governor, with a malignant chuckle—"who was right, eh? I told you how it would be, old fellow—and here you are. I'll look after you, never fear, and then I and the country at large will have the pleasure of seeing you, and your infamous associate, Jack Sheppard, dangling at the end of a rope from Tyburn tree!"

These words were uttered in a tone of voice quite loud enough for Blueskin to hear, but yet not loud enough to be audible to those who were in the court, though all could see that the Governor was saying something to the prisoner.

Very little attention was paid to them, however.

The interest of the trial was over.

But the attention of every person present was destined to be aroused to the utmost extent.

Blueskin heard these words; and, coming upon his ear at the moment they did, they exasperated him greatly.

He had already had a partial revenge upon Jonathan Wild, and now he thought was an opportunity to pay off the Governor for old scores.

He had long promised himself some kind of retaliation for all that he had suffered at his hands, and these words which the Governor spoke had the same effect upon Blueskin's wrath as a drop of water has when added to a cup already full to overflowing.

He felt that he could endure no more.

His eyes flashed when the last words left Mr. Noakes's lips, and before that worthy had the least idea that the prisoner contemplated such an act, Blueskin doubled up his fists—for the reader will remember he stood in the dock unfettered—and gave the Governor two such cracks, one with his left hand on the mouth, and the other with his right just betwixt wind and water, that down he went like a shot.

A terrible scene of confusion now ensued.

Those people who saw that a contest of some kind or other was taking place in the dock raised an alarm that the prisoner was attempting to make his escape.

The panic thus caused very quickly subsided, however, for the first thing the turnkeys did was to seize Blueskin and hold him tightly.

It was perceived that he was a prisoner; and having accomplished his purpose, Blueskin stood perfectly still, without making the least resistance.

Some more officials now made their appearance and hastened to the assistance of Mr. Noakes.

With some trouble they lifted him up, and then found that he was in a very damaged condition indeed.

His mouth had swelled up in an incredible manner, and an ensanguined stream gushed from his nostrils.

He gasped for breath, for the second blow had materially disarranged his breathing apparatus, so that he looked like some huge, overgrown fish suddenly transported from its native element and left on land.

The judge fixed his massive gold spectacles imposingly upon his nose, and looked severely towards the prisoner.

As soon as something like order and quiet were restored, he addressed him:

"Prisoner at the bar," he said, "what can be the meaning of this unseemly conduct I know not, and I regret that I have no power to punish you further. But the extreme penalty of the law has been awarded you, and this, perhaps, is the reason that you behave thus, knowing full well that your miserable life is forfeited, and that your outraged country can do no more than deprive you of it."

It would certainly seem as though some feeling of utter desperation had taken possession of Blueskin.

It was either that, or else his encounter with Mr. Noakes had had the effect of putting his blood up.

Whichever of these it was, matters not.

No sooner had the judge uttered these words than Blueskin, by a sudden effort of strength, freed his hand from the grasp of the turnkey who held it, and seized the massive pewter inkstand which stood on the Governor's desk close by.

Then, before either of the turnkeys could seize his arm again, or prevent him from executing his intention, Blueskin hurled the inkstand with all the force he was capable of across the court.

He aimed it at the judge.

That functionary saw the missile coming, and ducked his head to avoid it.

That was an unfortunate movement.

Blueskin's aim was not very correct, but it so happened the judge, in his anxiety to escape the blow from the inkstand, put his head just in the way of it.

"Take that," said Blueskin, "and serve you right! You are another of my foes, and I regret I cannot make you feel my resentment."

The judge rubbed his head with a rueful air.

The edge of the pewter inkstand was sharp, and as it happened to catch him edgewise, it inflicted a gash just above his eyebrow, from which the blood streamed plentifully.

It mingled with the ink, which was splashed over his face, and gave him a very ludicrous aspect.

The counsel for the prosecution, fearing that he should next come in for a share of the prisoner's vengeance, made a dive under the table to get out of danger.

He was immediately followed by his junior, for he, too, was alarmed, and a prodigious scuffle ensued between them.

But Blueskin was once more quiet and peaceable, and stood with a smile of satisfaction on his lips, for he felt that to some extent he was revenged.

The blow which the judge had sustained was a severe one, and yet it was not severe enough to deprive him of consciousness.

Several of the officials and persons connected with the court hastened to his assistance, but he waved them aside, and, with a face which looked just the colour of pickled cabbage, he cried:

"To the cells with him—to the cells! Why do you linger? Do you wish to afford him the opportunity of doing still more mischief? To the cells, I say!"

"Yes, to the cells! Number eighteen!" cried Mr. Noakes, spasmodically. "Off with him! I shall be well enough to follow directly. Look alive, now!"

The turnkeys began to haul Blueskin off very roughly, but he said:

"Now, my friends, there's no need to be violent! I have no grudge against you yet, and don't want to have. If you will let me alone, I will accompany you as quietly as you like."

The turnkeys had the wisdom to give heed to his words, and they found he was quite in earnest.

Ere he descended the stairs in the corner of the look, he gave one farewell glance round the court.

He would have been content if he could have inflicted some punishment upon Mr. Higgins, and his satellite, Bob Siggers, but they had both vanished.

The next moment Blueskin was on the way to the condemned cells.

Mr. Noakes specified No. 18, because that happened to be the darkest, dampest, and most disagreeable of the whole series.

It was some satisfaction to the Governor to have him placed there.

In this miserable place, then, was Blueskin immured.

Mr. Noakes took upon himself the responsibility of having him heavily ironed, and so, loaded with fetters, the prisoner was left to ponder upon his situation.

There we will leave him.

While Blueskin was thus made an inmate of one of the condemned cells, Jack Sheppard was busily engaged in making his escape.

The reader now will not be so much at a loss to account for Jack having been able to pursue his occupation unmolestedly.

The cessation of Jonathan Wain's periodical visits to the prison has been accounted for.

The reader will also understand how it was that on the night when Jack made his escape Jonathan never came near the cell at all.

The fact was, that while Jack Sheppard was very hard at work, his mortal foe was lying in a very precarious condition indeed.

The wound in the throat which Blueskin inflicted turned out to be of a more serious and dangerous character than the apothecary had imagined, and the terrible outbreak of rage to which the thief-taker had given way had not made it any better.

Mr. Snazzall sat by the side of the bed upon which Jonathan lay.

He was watching him.

He was compelled to do this, so critical was the condition of his patient.

Could Jack have had a peep into this chamber, it would have spared him some uneasiness.

He would not have been haunted with apprehensions of the thief-taker as he was.

Mr. Noakes, with pain and difficulty, did discharge his duty of visiting Jack, but it was late when he did so, for he was a long time recovering himself sufficiently to perform such a duty.

He satisfied himself with a glance that all was well, and then retired without looking farther.

And so Jack had the night all to himself, for the turnkeys, who were all tired, took the utmost advantage of the Governor's mishap.

The manner in which Jack escaped will be fresh in the remembrance of the reader.

We described the scene which took place in the thief-taker's house while he looked down upon the roof of it.

Will junior had chosen this opportunity for making his insidious proposals to Edgworth Bass, because he knew that he had no interruption to fear from the "gavner," as he called him.

The act will show how much he cared for his father's condition.

Jack had things all his own way.

Such a favourable conjunction of circumstances was far more than he could have hoped for.

And so he was able to creep into the shed in the fields early the next morning without being either seen or pursued.

In fact his escape was not discovered until the turnkey went the first round in the morning.

The consternation of the official is a thing to be imagined, not described.

In the same careless manner as ever, he undid the fastenings on the door of Jack's cell.

Then he tried to push the door open.

But it stuck in its frame.

This was owing to the operations Jack had carried on underneath it.

Exerting a little more strength, however, the door gave way, and that rather suddenly.

The turnkey lost his equilibrium, and put his foot inside the cell to recover it.

But when he did so he did not notice the rather deep excavation which Jack had made when he attempted to work his way out by getting under the door.

The consequence was, that he stepped into it with more abruptness than was at all pleasant or agreeable.

In fact he sustained some very serious bruises, and was a moment or two before he could breathe.

The first use he made of his voice was to utter some very diabolical curses, which he levelled at everything and everybody.

Then he recovered himself sufficiently to lift up his head and look about the cell.

What he saw, for the second time deprived him of breath.

His eyes glared fearfully as he took in the whole aspect of the cell.

Then he gave utterance to a most dismal yell, which echoed and re-echoed through the vaulted passages of the prison.

"Murder!" he cried. "Jack Sheppard has escaped! Oh, what shall I do? Oh, there will be the devil to pay, and no pitch hot!"

Uttering these words, the turnkey scrambled out of the hole in the door.

Just as he regained his feet several of his companions, alarmed by the uproar he had made, appeared upon the scene of action.

"Jack Sheppard's escaped!" vociferated the turnkey.

"He has escaped! Run some one and tell the Governor."

"Run yourself!"

"What for?"

"I would rather you told him than me. Why, he will discharge us everyone."

"It can't be helped!"

"Ring the alarm-bell, then, and someone follow me; perhaps, after all, he has not got out of the prison. Ten to one, now, if we do not find him hiding somewhere."

There was some hope in this, and while one of the turnkeys ran off to ring the alarm-bell, and otherwise spread the alarm, the remainder, with greater calmness than they had yet been master of, set to work to examine the cell, and ascertain by what means the prisoner had left it.

The hole in the floor near the threshold puzzled them a great deal, for they could not think why it had been made until they saw the iron plate which had stopped the prisoner's further progress, and then they immediately understood that his intention had been to burrow underneath it, and then make his way through the stones in the passage.

This point settled, they turned to the chimney, and then they saw the quantity of masonry that had been dislodged and piled up on the floor.

It was really most astonishing.

The reader will remember that when Jack had succeeded in getting one stone out of the chimney, he held it between both hands, and used it as a kind of hammer, and in this way he soon demolished the wall.

As soon as they had overcome their surprise at the aspect which the cell presented, the turnkeys made a rush to the chimney, and commenced scrambling up it.

They were only a minute or so gaining the Red Room.

As soon as they reached this, they saw, to their surprise and dismay, that the door, which had remained so long closed, was gaping wide open.

They rushed out into the corridor at once, and so on until they came to the door which led into the chapel.

Here they paused, and for a moment were at fault.

At first they did not see the place where the spike had been broken off, and when they did perceive it, they could not believe that, slim and agile as Jack was, he had the power of squeezing himself through so narrow an aperture.

It was while they stood here that they were startled by hearing a terrific cry in the rear, which sounded like the yell of some wild beast.

The sound was followed by the rushing of footsteps.

Involuntarily they turned round and caught sight of Mr. Noakes.

He was hurrying towards them, gesticulating violently, like a madman.

"Ten thousand devils!" he cried—"thunder and lightning! what is the meaning of this?"

"Jack Sheppard has escaped!" cried the turnkeys in chorus.

"Damnation! Curse you all, you lie! I saw him safe in the cell last night myself!"

"He has escaped! He has made a hole in the chimney, and so got into the Red Room; the door of this he has forced open, and got here. Look! he has broken off one of the spikes and got into the chapel, and, as we all very well know, that is the high-road to the leads."

Mr. Noakes uttered another cry, more terrible than the first.

He seized his hair with both hands, and violently plucked it out by the roots.

Then he executed a perfect dance of rage and pain.

"After him!" he cried at length, when his senses came back to him a little—"after him! Open the door, idiots! He can't have got away! If he has, I shall lose my place for certain, and Jonathan Wild will murder me! Open the door, idiots, I say!"

"I'm a-hopening it, sir!"

The door creaked back on its hinges, and then the Governor made a frantic dash into the chapel, with all the turnkeys at his heels.

The chapel was now thoroughly illuminated, and they all caught sight in a moment of the door which opened into the passage communicating with the leads.

But recollecting that this passage was defended by another strong door—the strongest, perhaps, in the whole prison—the Governor took heart, for he was not without the hope that after all they would find the prisoner baffled in his attempt to escape.

CHAPTER CCLXXXII.

JONATHAN WILD IS MADE AWARE OF JACK SHEPPARD'S ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE IN RATHER A PECULIAR MANNER.

BUT that hope was, as he soon found, a fallacious one, and a fresh outbreak of impotent rage was the result.

That door, upon the strength of which he so much relied, had been wrenched open like the rest, with a power that seemed superhuman.

The Governor now abandoned himself to despair.

Still he kept on until the roof of the prison was gained.

So great was the despair of the Governor—so much did he dread the result of this escape—that he felt as though he could thank the man who pitched him over the parapet into the street below.

He had not the courage to take the fatal leap himself.

The turnkeys hastily dispersed themselves about the roof, and in a very little time discovered the blanket by the aid of which Jack had descended on to the roof of the house that adjoined the prison.

The loud cry they uttered upon seeing this had the effect of congregating all the others about the spot.

There was no longer any doubt about the route which Jack had taken.

Nor was there any room for the conjecture that he might be even now lurking about the prison.

The tattered blanket swinging lazily backwards and forwards in the morning air made all clear.

But though it was so clear that Jack had gone that way, the turnkeys did not feel at all inclined to risk their necks by attempting to follow him.

They shook their heads as they admitted it was running too great a risk.

How long they would have remained looking down upon the roof of the house is very hard to say.

The Governor was the first to recover himself.

"Follow—follow!" he cried. "After him—quick! He cannot possibly have gone far! Follow—follow, and you will overtake him! If he gets off, we shall all be discharged!"

"Sorry for that, sir!" replied the turnkeys; "but perhaps you would like to try the blanket. It don't look to us to be over secure."

"Fools—dolls—idiots!" screamed Mr. Noakes; "you are all in league with him, and are wasting time purposely in order to allow him a better opportunity to escape than he has at present! Follow me, all of you! Hesitate at your peril, and I will report you all!"

With these words, Mr. Noakes made his way, not to the blanket, but to the door in the leads. He jumped down on to the lower leads, though in a manner that seemed to show he was utterly regardless of personal consequences.

He did not lose his footing, however, but darted through the little door, ran along the passage, crossed the chapel, and made his way by the nearest possible route to one of the doors opening into the Old Bailey.

The turnkeys followed at his heels in a disorderly throng.

They were anxious to recapture Jack Sheppard, if such a thing was possible, for the consequences to them would not be very pleasant if he should happen to get off entirely.

The alarm was now very general.

By this time there was not a person in the prison who was unacquainted with the startling fact that Jack Sheppard had escaped.

The dismal tolling of the alarm-bell of Newgate, which proclaimed the escape of a prisoner, still continued.

The clanging sound extended far and wide over the City, for as yet the hour was too early a one for many persons to be astir.

The sound penetrated into all the rooms of the thief-taker's residence.

It reached the one in which Mr. Snoxall still sat watching his dangerous patient.

The worthy apothecary gave a great start when the sound came upon his ears, for he had lived too long in the vicinity of the prison not to know what the tolling of that bell meant.

It darted into his mind in a moment that Jack Sheppard had been successful in effecting a third escape.

Mr. Snoxall glanced apprehensively towards his patient.

JACK SHEPPARD CUTS DOWN TEBURN TREE TO PREVENT THE EXECUTION OF BLUESKIN.

Jonathan Wild languidly opened his eyes. The blind was drawn, so that the full glare of daylight did not come into the room, but nevertheless the thief-taker's eyes were too weak to bear it, and he closed them again.

Mr. Snoxall hoped he would go off to sleep again, and doubtless his wish would have been gratified, had not the bell continued to toll with ever-increasing loudness.

Wild opened his eyes again, and this time did not close them.

He made several contortions with his mouth, and at length, with a great effort, gasped out:

"Wh—wh—what is that?"

"What, Mr. Wild?"

"Curse you, you know what!"

The apothecary shook his head.

Jonathan grinned impotently and savagely.

"Ah, Mr. Wild," said Mr. Snoxall, "you are very bad indeed!"

"Bah!—stuff!"

No. 79.—BLUESKIN.

"I am sorry to say it is the truth, Mr. Wild—Blueskin almost did for you."

"Ten thousand curses!"

"If the knife had been a little keener, or if your neck had not been so well protected, he would have had your head off!"

An inarticulate howl was the response to this.

"Keep quiet, Mr. Wild—pray keep quiet! If you excite yourself, I will not be answerable for your life. It hangs upon a thread, Mr. Wild—it does indeed!"

Jonathan was silent.

"You must not move, Mr. Wild—you must not speak, hardly, for a day or two. I will try my best to save you."

"Tell me this—tell me this—and then I will be quiet!"

"Tell you what, Mr. Wild?"

"Is the trial over?"

"Blueskin's?"

"Yes."

"It is, Mr. Wild."

"And the verdict?"

"Guilty."

Jonathan Wild burst out into a loud fit of unnatural laughter.

"Is this your promise, Mr. Wild?"

"I had forgotten. But I am all right now. What glorious news!"

Jonathan closed his eyes again.

He was about to gloat over the idea that Blueskin was at that moment the inmate of one of the condemned cells, but his reflections were destined to be interrupted.

The horrible clangour of the bell, which had ceased for a moment, now began again.

Jonathan Wild opened his eyes once more.

"What is that?" he asked.

Mr. Snoxall trembled.

He was in hopes that Jonathan would lie down and be content.

When he was asked this last question, he did not, for a moment, know how to reply.

The thief-taker repeated his interrogation.

"You asked me that before," said Mr. Snoxall.

"I know I did. Why don't you answer me?"

"Did you not see me shake my head?"

"Oh, d—n your head!"

"Very good, Mr. Wild! I have told you the consequences of exciting yourself! Your life is in your own hands, not in mine!"

"Will you tell me what that is?"

"What, Mr. Wild? I would tell you anything you want to know if I thought it would keep you quiet."

"Then just tell me what is the meaning of that horrible ringing which seems to go through and through my brain—it seems as though it would lift the top of my head off?"

Mr. Snoxall thought of an expedient.

He resolved to pretend not to hear the sound, but to set it down to his patient's imagination.

"Ah, Mr. Wild!" he said.

"What do you mean by 'ah,' villain?"

"It is as I feared!"

"What is?"

"This is the result of exciting yourself."

"How do you mean?"

"That noise, Mr. Wild—that ringing sound—exists nowhere but in your own imagination."

"Eh? What?"

"I say it exists only in your imagination."

Jonathan glared fearfully at the speaker.

"Can't you hear it?" he said.

Mr. Snoxall trembled, as he said:

"No."

"Not hear it?"

"No, Mr. Wild!" he added, with increasing confidence—"the sound which you have described takes its origin in your brain, and is audible to your ears alone."

The thief-taker looked at the apothecary with a puzzled expression.

The clanging of the bell still continued.

He evidently did not know what to think of it.

There was something too palpable about the sound—if we may be allowed the expression—for him to be able to set it down to his imagination.

Jonathan Wild was a cunning man; and, though he laid upon the bed in such a desperate condition, yet his cunning did not desert him.

He hit upon a scheme which he fancied would assure him whether the ringing was imagination or reality.

The scheme was to put his fingers closely in his ears, so as to shut out all outward noises; and then if he heard the ringing he should set it down to his own imagination.

If on the contrary, however, when he closed his ears he shut out the ringing of the bell as well as all other sounds, then he should come to the conclusion that it was reality, and that, for some reason or other, Mr. Snoxall was misleading and deceiving him.

Jonathan closed his ears at once.

The moment he did so the ringing seemed to cease as if by magic.

In a moment afterwards, however, he could hear it but with extreme faintness.

He removed his fingers from his ears, and when he did so the ringing appeared to become ten times louder than ever.

Then, like a flash of lightning, Jonathan Wild understood what had happened.

He started upright in bed as though galvanised.

"An escape!" he yelled. "It is an escape! It is the alarm-bell of Newgate, and not imagination! Yes—a prisoner has escaped! But who? Not—! No, no—not him! Not Jack Sheppard; Jack Sheppard has not escaped! That would be too, too terrible!"

"Mr. Wild," said Mr. Snoxall, in an earnest tone of voice, "let me implore you to be calm! Cannot I make you sensible of the consequences of this excitement—your wound will prove a fatal one!"

"Silence!" said Wild—"I will know the truth! Who has escaped?"

"I know not."

"You lie! You do!"

"I don't, Mr. Wild! I don't believe anyone has escaped—I have not heard of it. This is mere delirium!"

"Fool! Tell me no more such stuff! I can hear the clanging of the bell, which is never tolled except when some prisoner makes his escape. Call Quilt Arnold—I will learn the news!"

"Mr. Wild, I dare not call him—I cannot!"

"If you do not I will jump out of bed and call him myself—I am determined to know what has happened without delay! Will you call him, or shall I?"

"Mr. Wild, I leave you to your fate!"

"Will you call him?"

"I will—but I will no longer be responsible for your life."

"D—n you! who wants you to be responsible? Call him, I say!"

Mr. Snoxall thought it would be best to comply, so he opened the door of the room and went to the head of the stairs.

Here he called for Quilt Arnold.

The summons was quickly responded to by that worthy making his appearance.

A glance was sufficient to show anyone that he was the bearer of very important news.

The moment Wild caught sight of his face was enough.

"Speak!" he cried; "tell me the worst! I know it already. Jack Sheppard has escaped?"

"He has, Mr. Wild."

"I knew it! But—but—Quilt—he has been recaptured?"

Quilt shook his head.

"I am sorry to say he has not."

"How escaped? Not been recaptured? Surely he cannot have got clear off?"

"He has indeed, Mr. Wild, and left no trace behind him, while as for—"

Quilt Arnold stopped suddenly in his speech.

Jonathan Wild sprang out of bed, uttering a yell like that of some ferocious wild beast.

He hastily proceeded to attire himself.

Mr. Snoxall watched him with silent wonder, but made no attempt to prevent him.

He knew the uselessness of it.

But Wild trembled.

He stamped his foot violently on the floor, as though by that means he could recover his firmness—but the attempt was a failure.

He felt himself growing weaker and weaker, and strove his utmost to bear up against the feeling, but he could not.

Ere he had half completed the operation of dressing himself he fell to the floor insensible.

He was then replaced in his bed.

Leaving him here, we will return to Mr. Noakes and his followers.

They had marked the house well upon the roof of which Jack had descended, and, after having once gained the Old Bailey, hastened towards it with all the speed they were capable of making.

Upon arriving, they commenced making their inquiries, for they thought it not improbable that Jack Sheppard might still be in the house.

But the evidence of the servant-girl into whose mouth Jack Sheppard had thrust the lighted candle was quite conclusive upon this point.

She did not know, of course, who the flying figure was, but she described the manner in which someone darted past her.

As well as she was able to do so, she indicated the direction in which Jack Sheppard had gone, and this was the only information they were able to obtain.

Mr. Noakes was like a madman.

The prisoner had evidently got clear off, and they had no other resource than to commence an immediate pursuit, in the hope that he might ere long be captured.

The Governor of Newgate returned to the prison in no enviable frame of mind.

He was apprehensive not merely of what the authorities might say and do, but he was terribly alarmed at the thought of Jonathan Wild.

"What will be his anger," he asked himself, "when he knows of it?"

Mr. Noakes shuddered as he asked himself the question. He had one consolation.

"Thank goodness!" he ejaculated, "he's laid up, and cannot possibly get out. How lucky, to be sure! Dear me, I feel quite thankful to Blueskin for putting him out of the way, I do indeed! Why, if Jonathan had been in his usual health—Oh dear!"

The prospect of what would have happened forced a sigh from Mr. Noakes's lips.

He did not dare pursue the subject further.

His thoughts now reverted to Jack Sheppard.

Again there came from his lips another volley of curses. Mr. Noakes was indeed terribly frightened.

It was scarcely possible he should be able to retain his comfortable post of Governor of Newgate after a prisoner had broken out three several times.

He would have been discharged before, only he happened to have some friends who possessed considerable influence, and whom he had induced to make use of it in his behalf.

On the present occasion he feared that their influence would be of no avail, so strong would be the feeling against him.

However, he forwarded the intelligence to the proper quarter, and he had the satisfaction of knowing that in less than half an hour afterwards police officers would be dispersed in every direction charged with the special duty of apprehending Jack Sheppard.

The Governor hoped that by the time Wild recovered himself sufficiently to get about, Jack would be once more in Newgate.

Nevertheless, Mr. Noakes did not sit down to his breakfast that morning with a very good appetite.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD DISCOVERS THAT THE BOW STREET RUNNERS ARE ON HIS TRACK.

HAVING brought the narrative up to the present point, we shall now be able to return to the proceedings of Jack Sheppard, and describe what befell him when he left the shelter of the shed in the fields.

We have shown the reader how it was that Jonathan Wild did not pay his visit to the cell that Friday evening.

We have shown the reader how it was that Jack Sheppard was able to gain the shelter of the shed early the next morning, without being seen by any of his pursuers.

Indeed, when he entered the shed was just about the time when the discovery of his escape was made.

But before night came—that night when he emerged from his place of concealment to obtain food—all the police officers that could be spared for the purpose were sent off in every direction in search of him.

By the time he glided off into the fields all London was ringing with the fame of this exploit.

It was the topic of conversation everywhere.

And not only in London, but in all the towns and villages adjacent to it, to which the news was quickly transmitted.

But Jack Sheppard fully expected all this, and when he set off upon his expedition he perfectly comprehended the amount of danger he was about to run.

But the cravings of nature must be supplied.

A great many hours had elapsed since he had taken any food, and he could tell by the sinking feeling that at times came over him that if he waited much longer he should swoon from sheer exhaustion.

The hope of being able to procure something quickly lent him strength, and he hastened across the fields in a westerly direction with remarkable speed.

He had no idea where he was going.

His intention was to continue on in a straight line until he came to a place where such articles as he required could be procured without danger of detection, or, at any rate, of capture.

And so, looking in the darkness more like a shadow than aught else, he flitted over the fields, more often over his ankles in water than not.

But he heeded not this.

As, however, he continued on his way without coming to a habitation of any sort, a sensation of deadly sickness came over him, and he feared that, after all, he should not have strength enough to accomplish his purpose.

But he struggled on manfully, however, for in the distance he could discern a few twinkling lights.

Towards these he directed his steps.

They seemed to mock his advance, and recede from him, but that was mere fancy, and he knew it.

They were plainer soon.

As he drew nearer to the village—for such indeed it was—he proceeded with less haste and greater caution.

He knew full well how necessary it would be for him to be thoroughly upon his guard.

He would have to consider attentively every step he took, and keep perpetually on the look-out for danger.

Jack Sheppard knew what wonderful energy and sagacity Jonathan Wild possessed, and he knew how active the search would be which he would institute.

He little thought that his powerful foe was helpless in his bed-chamber.

He was as far from thinking that he had left Blueskin behind him in the prison from which he had just escaped, or that Edgworth Bess was confined in the thief-taker's house.

Jack Sheppard entered the village.

It consisted only of one long straggling street, with houses dotted here and there along the sides of it.

But, as the hour was yet early, lights could be perceived at the windows of most of them.

The first place to which Jack came was the village inn.

To him this place seemed the very personification of comfort, after the rough quarters he had just left.

A bright light came from the windows on either side of the door.

This proceeded as much from the huge blazing fire that was burning in the grate as from the flickering oil lamp which was suspended from the ceiling.

Jack crept towards one of these windows with a stealthy step.

The blind was not drawn down to the bottom.

There was just space enough left for him to peep through.

He did so.

He caught sight of the huge blazing fire, the very look of which seemed enough to warn one.

He saw the comfortable seat and the sanded floor.

He saw the villagers sitting round the tables with huge tankards of foaming ale before them.

Complacent content was the predominant expression perceptible upon their countenances.

They seemed by appearance as though care and trouble were unknown to them even by name.

Jack could not bear to look upon this scene.

It offered too powerful a contrast to his own position, which by comparison with them seemed a thousand times more forlorn and wretched than it had ever done before.

He turned away from this public-house with a very heavy heart.

He struck his breast and sobbed bitterly.

But Jack Sheppard was not one to succumb for any length of time to saddening emotions.

Making an effort, he shook them off, and, like a true philosopher, instead of grieving over his position, set to work to try to make it better.

He recollected the errand upon which he had come, and blaming himself for ever having gone near the public-house, he set about his original intention.

This was to find some small general shop where he could enter and purchase a few eatables without exciting suspicion.

Like a shadow, then, he glided along the street, keeping close under the shadow of the houses, and otherwise concealing himself from observation.

At length Jack found what he had been looking for.

He paused before a small cottage, only one story high, which had evidently been built for many years.

It had but one window on the ground floor, and that was a very small one.

The panes in it were very small, and diamond-like in shape.

The glass of which they were formed was green in hue, and only semi-transparent.

A miserable ranslight burned feebly in this window.

By the aid of it, however, Jack was able to see that he had reached a little huckster's shop, where everything is sold for which there is the least demand.

The character of the articles displayed for view was heterogeneous in the extreme.

But Jack caught sight of bread, and cheese, and eggs, and various other articles.

He could not see whether the shop was occupied by anyone.

He looked up and down the street, but he could not see anyone stirring.

All was as silent as the grave.

After ascertaining this, he resolved to enter the little shop, let the risk be what it might.

No sooner had he come to this determination than he approached the door.

It was closed and fastened with a primitive string and bobbin to lift up the latch.

Jack opened the door.

As he pushed it open on its hinges, a little bell began to tinkle.

This was a notification that someone had entered.

Jack closed the door behind him, and then, upon looking round, he saw, to his great relief, that there was no other customer in the shop.

A wheezing, asthmatical kind of cough now attracted his attention, and, looking in the direction from which the sound proceeded, he perceived an old woman emerge from behind a pyramid of bottles of lollypops.

A glance satisfied Jack that he would not have much to fear from her, for she looked aged enough to be mother to the oldest person in all the village.

She was purblind, and very deaf, and she found her way to the counter more by feeling her way than by the use of her eyes.

In loud, querulous tones, she said:

"What do you want?"

"A loaf!" said Jack.

"Eh?" said the old woman.

She put her hand behind her ear as she spoke.

Jack then understood that she was deaf.

"A loaf!" he said, putting his mouth as close to her ear as he could.

"Well—well! I ain't deaf! Only a little hard of hearing, that's all. Do you want a quarten loaf?"

"Yes, two!"

The old woman produced the articles named.

"What else?"

"Two pounds of cheese!"

This, after a great deal of fumbling, the old woman also produced.

Jack then bought a quantity of eggs, and not being able to see anything else in the shop of an eatable character, save some bacon, which would require a fire to cook it, asked her how much the things came to.

The poor old woman added them up correctly enough.

Jack was surprised, for he did not think she could perform such a feat.

But then, she had been used to the same thing every day of her life for very many years, so that it almost became a kind of natural instinct.

Jack paid for the things out of the small sum of money he possessed, and having stowed them about his person in the best manner he was able, left the shop.

He retraced his steps with an exactness which would have surprised anyone who was not aware of the carefulness with which he had noted every object he had passed on his way.

His return journey led him past the village alehouse, and, though he had been so angry with himself for having ventured on the former occasion, he bent his steps towards the window once again.

Why he did so he could scarcely tell.

Some irresistible fascination seemed to draw him thither.

But he was well repaid for his pains, since he was made better aware of the extent of his danger.

The interior of the room in the inn now presented a very different appearance to what it did when he looked in a little while before.

Then all was quiet, contented peace

Now all was excitement.

Everyone of those persons who had been sitting down at the table were now standing up.

They were congregated round a man who Jack immediately recognised as a Bow Street Runner.

The peculiar style of dress, with the glaring red waistcoat did this, just as the blue suit enables anyone to recognise a policeman nowadays.

This Bow Street Runner was standing in the middle of the tap-room, and the villagers were standing in an irregular circle round him.

Their mouths were wide open, and their faces expressive of the utmost curiosity and interest.

The wax-tipped ends of their long clay pipes no longer remained between their lips.

They had removed them in order to be able to pay more attention.

The Bow Street Runner held in his hand a printed paper.

From its limp state, it could be seen that it had only just been printed.

The officer was evidently reading the contents of this bill to his attentive auditors, though Jack had no other proof of it than what his actions provided, for he could not hear a single word.

But the officer's lips moved, and the occupants of the room had all assumed listening attitudes.

The wisest thing Jack could have done under these circumstances would have been to fly, for, beyond all question, the bill which the officer was reading related to himself.

He could not see a word of it, but he felt sure that it contained the intelligence of his escape from Newgate, together with the offer of a large reward to any person who might capture him, and lodge him in one of His Majesty's jails.

But although he was so certain of this, Jack did not attempt to move.

He stood with his face glued to the window-pane, all his senses absorbed by the scene that was taking place before him.

His danger and his hunger were alike forgotten in the invincible desire he felt to see all that was going on.

He watched, then, until the officer had finished reading the bill, and then he saw him turn round and say something in rather a loud tone of voice.

Jack could only distinguish one word in all he said.

That one word was—"Reward."

This over, the officer smoothed the bill out upon one of the tables, and stuck it against one of the walls in the tap-room in a very conspicuous position indeed.

Jack could see it, but it was too far off, and the light too insufficient for him to be able to make out even the large letters.

Having stuck the bill up in the manner described, the Bow Street Runner pointed to it and said something more.

Then he abruptly quitted the room.

Jack Sheppard now thought it was high time to be off.

The Bow Street Runner might be about to leave the inn, and if he did so, Jack would run considerable risk of being seen.

So, without waiting another moment, he once more glided off into the darkness, taking his way across the pathless fields towards the shed which had afforded him safe shelter so far.

He made his way hither, because he knew of no better place to which he could repair.

He was puzzled once or twice, for the darkness was in truth perplexing; but after a moment's consideration he would set forward again.

At last the ruined shed appeared in sight.

Desolate as it had looked when he first beheld it, it now seemed to Jack something like a home

Entering, he closed the door.

The interior was pitchy dark.

He shivered, too, with cold—with that damp, raw cold which seems to strike from the ground.

He deposited his eatables upon the ground.

How great a comfort a fire would have been!

The genial warmth would not only have made that dismal shed appear more cheerful than it did, and warmed his chilled blood, but it would also, he fancied, have alleviated the aching and smarting of his legs, which were terribly galled by the fetters, and swollen to more than twice their usual size.

His feet and legs, too, were very wet, and the damp garments clinging to his skin materially increased the discomfort which he experienced.

But he was compelled to banish the thought, for a fire was utterly out of the question.

He had not the materials wherewith to make it, for everything was soddened with water; nor had he the means of striking a light—if he had, he would not have worked his way out of Newgate in the dark as he did.

So he was forced to abandon the idea altogether.

He contented himself with thinking that his position might be much worse, for he might not have any food.

Now, however, he was well provided with eatables, and there was no fear that he would perish of starvation just at present.

The eggs he ate raw.

In this way they were not so palatable as they would have been if cooked, but Jack ate them because he knew what a large amount of nutriment they contained.

He finished up his meal with a little of the bread and cheese, and tied the remainder up for future use.

Then, feeling much exhausted, he lay down in the warmest and most comfortable corner he could find, and composed himself to sleep.

The deep silence and the darkness were provocative of slumber, and in a few moments Jack was unconscious of everything.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIV.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS IT NO EASY MATTER TO GET RID OF HIS FETTERS.

WHEN Jack Sheppard awoke it was broad daylight.

He started to his feet and looked about him.

But he saw nothing to excite alarm or apprehension.

On the contrary, all was as still as it had been during the whole of his stay there.

Going to the door of the shed, he once more looked out.

But the prospect was as cheerless as ever.

The rain still continued to fall down, without scarcely any intermission, and all the fields he could see were partially under water.

The ground, too, was so thoroughly saturated with water, that it seemed as soft as a bog.

It made Jack uncomfortable when he saw the state of the weather, and he entered the shed again.

Sitting down, he partook of some more bread and cheese, after which he felt much better.

The first and most important thing he had to do was to get rid of his fetters, but how to do this was as great a puzzle as ever.

Still, it was quite certain he would be obliged to disencumber himself of them, or else they would inevitably betray him, let him go where he would.

But how was this to be done?

Jack set to work to think.

He was rather clever in a general way in getting out of these sort of difficulties, but on the present occasion he was baffled.

He had not a tool of any description wherewith to rid himself of them, and his hands were quite useless of themselves.

It was a long time before Jack could think of any expedient whatever, but at last he hit upon one.

Still, it was one that did not please him, and he would have been glad to devise a better; but he could not, so he was obliged to put it into execution.

It was to obtain two stones, and place the ring of his fetter just where it fitted over his ankle upon one, while the other he was to use as a hammer.

In this way he hoped to be able to beat these rings or bawls into an oval form.

If he could do this he felt sure he should be able to slip his heels through, and so get rid of them.

Having resolved upon this course, he looked about him for the stones, and having found two that would answer his purpose, he set to work in the manner we have described.

But the iron was too strong to be bent by any such means.

Moreover, every blow he struck inflicted excruciating pain upon him.

But Jack Sheppard would not have minded that much, if he could have seen that he was making some progress with his work.

He had, however, no such encouragement.

He could not see that he had made the least impression on the strong iron rings, and finally he flung away the stones in despair.

He could almost have wept, so great was his disappointment; but he controlled this manifestation of weakness.

Still he might have been excused for giving way to grief in such a manner.

It was a most disheartening prospect to look forward to.

The difficulty of getting his feet out of the fetters would surely never be less than it was at that moment, and yet he had tried his best, and found it impossible.

Perplexed and grieved, Jack let his head sink between his hands, and for some moments gave way to despair.

He had stayed in that shed quite as long as it was safe for him to do so. It was a lonely, out-of-the-way place certainly, but still there were times when it was visited, and when cattle were stored in it, as the condition of the floor testified.

Any visit, then, could not fail to be dangerous to Jack. But while the iron work still weighed upon his limbs, how was he to leave. There was great peril in travelling by night, and should anyone see the fetters, discovery would be certain.

And not only this, Jack Sheppard was anxious in the extreme to discover the whereabouts of Edgworth Bess, and take measures for removing her from Wild's custody.

He wished, also, to find his old comrade, Blueskin, and be guided by him as to the best plan of action for him to adopt.

But he was confined in that shed almost as much as if it was a prison.

His legs pained him dreadfully.

In hammering the iron rings with the stones he had bruised his own limbs, and their swollen disordered state made them more than ever sensible to pain.

He had not the courage to try this again.

Suddenly he started.

The sound of a footstep came upon his ear.

It came upon him with great abruptness, and, as it seemed, the very moment he heard the step the door of the shed was thrown open.

Jack was sitting down.

He had no time to start to his feet, so he endeavoured to cover over his fetters with the tails of his coat.

A man appeared upon the threshold.

A stout, red-faced, irascible-looking man, who in every way was the living personification of an English farmer.

Jack resolved to sit still, and brazen the matter out as well as he could.

He fancied that while he remained in this position there would not be so much to fear from a recognition.

Everything would depend upon whether this man had heard the intelligence of his escape, and learned that a large reward had been offered.

If he was ignorant of this, Jack fancied he should be able to invent a plausible tale that would deceive him.

This was almost too much to hope for, though.

Had he not with his own eyes seen a police officer in the ale-house of the next village reading a bill offering a reward for his recapture?

Such news would quickly spread in a little place where generally there was a great dearth of subject matter for conversation, and it was too much to hope that this man was quite ignorant of all.

These thoughts, which we have set down at some length, flashed through Jack Sheppard's mind in the course of a single moment.

At first the man did not see Jack, for he happened to be sitting down in the shade.

But as soon as he caught sight of him, the man cried:

"Hallo—hallo! Who have we here?"

"A poor devil," replied Jack, in a whining voice, "who will be heartily glad of a little assistance."

"But who are you? What are you doing here? Don't you know this is my cattle-shed, and that you are committing a trespass? Come, get up—tramp!"

Jack uttered a dismal groan.

"There, there—don't make that awful noise! Get up and be off, and think yourself lucky that I let you off so easily!"

"Worthy sir!"

"Eh—what?"

"I say I am very tired," said Jack. "I have travelled many miles, and just when I was ready to lie down in the road and die of exhaustion, I spied this shed in the distance, and crawled towards it in the hope that I might rest myself for a little while."

"Bah—stuff! Get out! Do you think I can have my cattle-shed made a resting-place for all the tramps in the kingdom? It isn't likely! Be off with you!"

"Let me stay here a little longer, good sir!" said Jack, who began to hope that this farmer-looking man had no suspicions of who he was; "I am so very tired, and when I have rested a little while, I will go my ways in peace."

"Oh! will you?"

"I will indeed, sir!"

"But I don't intend you should remain here, and that's flat!"

"Surely, sir, you wouldn't be so cruel as to force me to leave this place when I have not strength enough to walk? I am not doing you any harm, good sir, nor your shed either. You will let me stay, sir, will you not?"

"Who are you, then? Tell me who you are, and then I'll see."

The farmer relented a little, being evidently touched by the manner in which Jack spoke to him.

Now was the time, then, for Sheppard to exercise his invention, for it would never have done to have confessed who he was.

Without appearing to hesitate, he replied:

"As I told you, sir, I am a poor unfortunate devil who was unlucky enough to get into a scrape."

"What sort of a scrape?"

"Well, you see, sir, I am an apprentice, and lived in the house along with my master, Mr. Smith."

"And what's your name?"

"John Jones, sir, at your service."

"Well, go on, and tell me what sort of a scrape you got into."

Jack laughed.

"I don't know what you will say to it," he said; "but the fact is, I got very friendly with my master's servant."

It was now the farmer's turn to laugh, and laugh he did with great heartiness.

There was something which tickled his fancy in Jack's apparently candid avowal.

"Go on!" he cried, controlling his laughter with difficulty—"go on, you dog, do. I can't help laughing, it so reminds me of a—But go on, you rascal, go on!"

Jack was well pleased to think he had put the farmer into a good temper, and this encouraged him to proceed, and call still further upon his imagination.

"Do you want to know all, sir?"

"Of course I do, you rascal! Ha, ha! And what was the result of you and your master's servant being on such good terms with each other?"

"A very natural result!"

"What was it?"

"Why, some little time afterwards my master found an increase had taken place in his family."

"Good—good! What next?"

"Why, now comes the unfortunate part of my story, and the reason I am in this plight."

"Well, well! Go on!"

"My master sent the girl packing as soon as he could, and her child as well; and then what do you think the ungrateful girl did?"

"Ha, ha—I don't know! Had you up before the magistrate, perhaps?"

"That was just what she did do. Now, don't you call that ingratitude? Why, she ought to have thanked me!"

"Go on with your tale! It fetches tears into my eyes —that it does! It so reminds me—! But go on—go on!"

"I have not much more to tell. She swore the child on to me, and the magistrate ordered me to pay half-a-crown a week!"

The farmer rubbed his hands together.

"Just the same!" he said—"just the same!"

"But that isn't all!" said Jack, "He insisted upon my finding security for the regular payment of the money!"

"The devil!"

"Well, I could not find any security—no one would be security for me! I was earning no wages, and was not likely to be for some years. So the magistrate very kindly sent me to Bridewell."

"The deuce he did!"

"I can assure you he did!"

"Then, all I can say, he was very hard upon you! Perhaps you wonder why I laughed at you? I will tell you. When I was a youngster I got into the same scrape myself, and had half-a-crown a week to pay for thirteen years! Ha, ha!"

"Perhaps you were able to pay the half-crown?"

"Well, yes, I was."

"That's just the difference between you and me, then. I was sent to Bridewell."

"And how did you get out?"

"Escaped."

"Eh?"

"Escaped."

"Escaped from Bridewell?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"The day before yesterday."

"And what have you been doing ever since?"

"Travelling from London on foot."

"And where are you going?"

"To Staffordshire, where all my friends reside."

"Oh!"

"But I got tired on the way, and, having no money in my pocket, could not get a night's lodging at an inn, so I crawled in here to rest myself."

"Are you sure you are speaking the truth?"

"Yes."

"Well, all I can say is you have been very hard done by. But some how or other, I can't exactly believe it."

"Why not?"

"Well, I don't."

"I am sorry for that, sir; and if you will let me stay here a little while longer until I have rested myself, I will depart and give you no further trouble."

"Well, well! I can't help disbelieving you, you know."

"Of course not!"

"However, stand up, and let me have a look at you! When I see what you are like, perhaps I shall believe you."

"Why do you want me to stand up?"

"To see you."

"Can't you see me here?"

"No, for hang me if I don't think you have got into the darkest corner of the shed! I can't see you a bit. Stand up, I say, and let me have a look at you, or you sha'n't stay in this shed a moment longer."

The reader will understand that the farmer had not seen Jack's fetters, and was quite ignorant that he was encumbered with anything of the kind.

But if Jack stood up, he could not fail to discover it.

This would most likely engender suspicion.

Jack was in a dilemma.

He had very little time for making up his mind, but in the end he decided that the best thing he could do was to stand up and explain the circumstances as well as he could.

So he rose to his feet.

But as he did so, he could not prevent his fetters from clanking dismally against each other.

The farmer started back a pace.

"What is that?" he said.

"Oh, nothing!" replied Jack.

"Nothing?"

"Well, that is, nothing particular."

"Stand up, then!"

"I am standing up."

"But come here to the light! Let me look at you!"

Why, may I never drink again if you have not got fetters on?"

"I know that—didn't I tell you so?"

"No."

"Well, I thought I did."

"But how come you with fetters on?"

"They were put on."

"What for?"

"While I was in Bridewell."

"But what for?"

"Oh, nothing particular! I hit the jailer a topper once, and they said I was violent, and put these irons on me; but I made up my mind to escape, and I did so."

"Oh indeed!"

"Yes—here I am!"

"I see you, and I'll tell you what, my fine spark—I don't half like the look of you!"

"I am sorry for that."

"I daresay you are, but it strikes me you look more like some desperate burglar or murderer than anything else!"

"Well, everyone is entitled to his own opinion; and I am sorry my appearance does not please you."

"It don't, and that's flat!"

"I have told you my history, and I thought you would be sorry for me."

"Did you?"

"I did indeed!"

"Then I ain't! I don't like the looks of you a bit, and the sooner you walk your carcass out of my shed, the better I shall be pleased!"

CHAPTER CCLXXXV.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH DISCENURES JACK SHEPPARD OF HIS FETTERS.

JACK SHEPPARD was sadly afraid that the suspicions of the farmer were aroused, and that he guessed who he really was; still, he was loth to think this without some better evidence of the fact.

"I will go directly," said Jack, "if you would lend me a hammer and a punch, to get rid of these fetters; and I would thank you into the bargain!"

"I daresay you would, my spark; but I have no hammer and punch to lend you, so you will have to do without; and let me tell you this once more, if you want to please me, get out!"

"But it can't do you any harm to let me stay here! Let me rest myself and I will depart. You will never see me again, for I am going to a distant part of the kingdom."

"And a good job too!"

"I wish I was there."

"Well, you can stay and rest yourself!"

"Many thanks."

"But, mind you, I don't believe one word of all the long story you have told me, except that you have broken out of prison, and that I can readily credit."

"I am sorry that you disbelieve me, sir," said Jack, "but at the same time I feel more thankful than I can express that you have promised to let me stay here to rest myself, for I feel now that if I attempted to walk a few yards I should sink to the earth."

"You do look tired, and if you have travelled from London with that weight at your heels, I am quite sure you must be! I am not hard-hearted enough to turn you off, but don't let me see you here when I come back again!"

With these words the former rather abruptly quitted the shed.

Jack hastened to the door and watched him take his course across the fields.

By the attitude of the farmer he could tell that he was thinking over what had just occurred.

"This will no longer be a place for me!" said Jack to himself. "I must be off—there's no doubt about that. He may not suspect me much now, but if he happens to come across any of those fellows I saw in the public-house last night, and they get telling him about my escape, he will conclude at once who I really am."

There seemed an extreme degree of probability about this.

"Yes, I must be off!" continued Jack Sheppard, unconsciously uttering his thoughts aloud—"I must be off, for there is no knowing how soon he may make the discovery, and I know very well his head will be full of his meeting with me all the rest of the day. Oh, if I could only get rid of these fetters, how soon would I show them a clean pair of heels!"

But the removal of the fetters now seemed to be a more difficult matter than before, and there were clearly only two ways by which he could rid himself of them.

One was, to file through the thick iron ring.

The other, to punch the rivets out.

There was no longer the least hope of bending them into an oval shape, and slipping them over his heels, as he thought he should be able to do.

The flesh had swollen, both above and below these rings, to such a degree that they threatened to become perfectly buried.

The pain was almost more than he could endure.

He was compelled to call all his fortitude to his aid.

Jack watched the figure of the farmer until he disappeared from view, and then he went back into the shed again.

"I must leave here!" he said. "And yet what a terrible risk to do so by daylight! Would that night would come! Many hours will have to elapse before then! I will try to disguise myself—that is the only thing I can do."

Jack had very limited means of disguising himself, but he made them all available to the utmost.

He took his cap and tore it into shreds, and then bound it on his head with a pocket handkerchief.

He also tore his coat and stockings in many places.

His intention was to make himself look as much like a wandering mendicant as possible.

In this attempt he succeeded tolerably well.

Fortunately his great-coat was long, and this concealed his fetters pretty well.

With one of the strips of cloth he tied them to his legs in such a manner as would, he hoped, prevent them from jingling.

But he could not, with all his art, altogether hide them from view, though they might escape notice at a casual glance.

As soon as he had done this, Jack made a hearty meal, and stored the rest of his provisions about his person in the best manner he could.

Then he cautiously peeped forth.

He was unable to catch a glimpse of anyone.

Not without some regret he emerged from the shed.

It had afforded him safe shelter for many hours, and consequently he felt a kind of affection for it.

Now, however, it was untenable.

Jack glanced up at the sun, which was shining brightly in the sky, though rather low down on the horizon.

This glance enabled him to define the four points of the compass.

He determined not to make his way back to the village from which he had procured the provisions, but to leave it on his left hand, and take a northerly direction.

His intention was, if he could get rid of his fetters, to make his way back to London by a circuitous route.

Every few yards he went he would pause and look keenly and searchingly all around him, so as to be aware at the earliest possible moment when any persons made their appearance.

But he seemed to have those fields all to himself, for he was not able to see a single individual.

Encouraged by this, he pushed on, and ere long he quite lost sight of the shed.

Whether the farmer returned to it was more than he ever knew.

Concealing himself as much as possible by walking behind hedges, and stooping down as he went so that his head should not be seen above them, Jack proceeded for a long time without meeting with any interruption.

At length, however, he saw a village in the distance before him.

What village it was he had no idea, but fancied it must be Tottenham.

To approach this any more closely would be unwise, especially during daylight.

Besides, he had already got quite as far away from London as he desired to be.

He was looking forward to the time when he should return to the scene of his old exploits.

Under these circumstances, then, he very naturally looked about him for some place of concealment.

But he was unable to see another shed.

Still he cast his eyes all around, but he could see nothing but some tall evergreen trees, which grew at a little distance to the right of the spot upon which he stood.

He debated in his own mind whether he should hide in one of these.

"I have heard of such a thing," he muttered. "Did not King Charles hide in a tree when all his enemies were after him? Of course he did. And why shouldn't I?"

There was no earthly reason why Jack should not follow his example if he thought proper.

Jack paused a moment to consider.

"I have a great mind to try it. I can't see any other place, and I am very tired. I have 'some hours to wait, and I think I could spend them as well there as anywhere. It's no good walking on any further; I will climb up and chance it."

Having made up his mind, Jack Sheppard directed his steps towards the little clump of trees which had attracted his notice.

They were conspicuous in consequence of the deep green colour of their foliage, which showed out in remarkable contrast to the bare and leafless branches of the other trees.

On his way Jack abated none of his caution.

He was somewhat surprised to find, however, that these trees grew on the margin of a rather broad road.

Upon seeing this, Jack hesitated as to whether he should carry out his original intention.

By the appearance which the road presented, it seemed as though it was tolerably well frequented.

Still, from behind the hedge where he stood Jack commanded a view for a considerable distance up and down it, but he could not see anyone approaching.

"It's no good hesitating," he said at length. "There seems to be nobody about. I will climb up, and who knows? I might discover something!"

To Jack Sheppard the task of climbing a tree was very easily performed, and though his fetters were in the way he accomplished the feat without difficulty.

For one thing, the branches grew so near the ground that he had but to give a spring and take hold of one with his hands.

All he had to do then was to draw himself up by means of the muscles in his arms.

In less time, then, than anyone would have believed was necessary for the accomplishment of such an act, Jack Sheppard was up in the tree and ensconced among the branches.

From the road below he felt there was no danger of being seen, for the long dark branches of the tree afforded an effectual screen.

Jack Sheppard fancied he should be able to spend the day here quite comfortably.

Ere long, however, he perceived in the distance the form of a man.

He was on foot, and trudging along at a steady pace.

There was nothing in his appearance calculated to attract notice, and yet Jack looked at him attentively.

The reason for this was simple enough.

Jack had nothing whatever to do to pass away the time, and this was the first human being he had seen since he parted with the farmer.

He watched this man, then, with a degree of curiosity and interest that was really remarkable.

As the man came nearer, Jack noticed that he carried in one hand a kind of pail or can.

In the other he carried what looked like a bundle of walking-sticks.

Jack grew more interested than ever.

The next thing he noticed was that the man carried a kind of pouch, which was suspended from his shoulders by a leather strap.

What was in this pouch Jack could not tell.

The man trudged on steadily enough until he came to the tree in which Jack was concealed.

Then he paused.

Jack's interest now gave way to wonder.

"I think that will do!" the man said.

As he spoke, he put the can he was carrying down on the ground, and as soon as Jack caught a glance at this he understood what the man was, and what his object was too.

He was a bill-sticker.

The can contained a brush and a quantity of paste.

The bundle of sticks he used for placing the bills against any object which he could not reach without their aid.

The pouch by his side contained bills.

Jack received practical proof that his surmises were correct, for, with the speed and dexterity produced by long practice, he posted a bill on the trunk of the tree.

So intently was Jack occupied in watching this man that he had failed to notice that a man was approaching from the opposite direction, and did not see him until he halted close to the bill-sticker.

"Hallo!" he cried. "What's the game, mate?"

The bill-sticker turned round.

"Can't you see?" he asked.

"I can see summat sticking to the tree."

"Can't you read?"

"Not I! What do I want with larning?"

"Well, since you can't read," said the bill-sticker, "I will tell you what it says on that paper, and when you hear it, if you don't wish you had learned to read, call me a horse!"

"Go on, then, let us hear it!"

"Well, it offers five hundred pounds reward for the apprehension of the notorious burglar, Jack Sheppard!"

"Lor! five hun—"

"Dred pounds!"

"My eye!"

"You understand the King offers this money to anyone who shall capture this Jack Sheppard and lodge him in jail!"

"Lor, does he? My eye! Don't I wish I could drop across him!"

"Listen!" said the bill-sticker. "He has escaped from Newgate, in which prison he lay under sentence of death. He is a young-looking chap—very thin. Inclined to be dark—is dressed in the costume of a gentleman, and is supposed to have part of his fetters upon him."

"Oh, lawks, don't I wish I knew where he was!"

"Well, keep your eyes open, and look well at everybody, and then you will stand as good a chance of obtaining the reward as anyone else."

"Won't I, that's all! Good morning, Mr. Bill-sticker! I must go; but I be much obliged to you, I be!"

With these words, the rustic continued on his way.

The bill-sticker took up his apparatus, and trudged off in the opposite direction.

We leave the reader to imagine Jack's feelings while he listened to this conversation.

He watched the two men until they were both out of sight.

"How pleasant!" he said, at length. "I suppose that infernal bill-sticker will go on pasting those bills up everywhere. Why, England, in a little time, will be too hot to hold me. Confound him! And that other lubber. What shall I do?"

Jack Sheppard was rather perplexed.

He rubbed his head reflectively.

"I don't see why I should leave that bill there!" he said. "I will go down and get it. It will make one the less. I don't see either, why I should be annoyed by people stopping to read it just under my nose; besides, I should like to know what it is about."

Jack looked up and down the road very carefully.

He could not, however, see anyone coming.

Cautiously, and yet rapidly, he commenced the descent of the tree.

Just before he quitted the protecting shadow of its branches, he gave another glance up and down the road.

But it was quite deserted, and so, without more ado, Jack dropped on to the ground.

To possess himself of the bill was but the work of a moment, for the paste was quite wet, and he stripped it off the bark of the tree very easily.

Crushing it up, he thrust it into his pocket, and ascended the tree with all speed.

In a moment more he had gained his old position.

With trembling hands, then, he smoothed out the bill and began to read it.

He found the bill-sticker was quite correct.

A reward of five hundred pounds was offered by the Government for his apprehension, to be paid to any person or persons who should lodge him in one of His Majesty's prisons.

JACK SHEPPARD PAYS HIS PROMISED VISIT TO SIR JAMES THORNHILL.

The bill gave no particulars of the manner in which he had effected his escape, but simply stated that he had broken out of Newgate while confined there under sentence of death.

The document concluded with a tolerably accurate description of his personal appearance.

Having read the bill from beginning to end twice, Jack crumpled it up again and put it into his pocket.

"This is a very comfortable state of things!" he remarked—"I shall fancy now that every person I see has read one of these infernal bills and is on the look-out for me! Well, never mind—I cannot help it! I should advise those who attempt to interfere with me to look after themselves—that's all!"

With these words, Jack relapsed into silence.

His meditations, however, ran chiefly on the bills, and the effects they were likely to produce.

In this manner he passed away the time until night.

No. 80.—BLUESKIN.

Plenty of people and vehicles passed below him along the road, but of course no notice was taken of him.

He made another hearty meal from his store of provisions, and then, when night came, he felt not only rested, but strong too.

He did not venture to descend until it was quite dark. Then he lowered himself out of the tree.

The road which the trees skirted was deserted, and he made up his mind to run the risk of proceeding along it like an ordinary pedestrian.

There was a gap in the hedge close by, and through this he forced his way.

In another moment he was in the road, trudging slowly towards the village.

CHAPTER CCLXXXVI.

JACK SHEPPARD MEETS WITH A FRIEND AT AN UNEXPECTED MOMENT.

It was a very dark night.

Jack was glad of this, because there was less fear of his being discovered or noticed.

Without meeting with a soul, or having any incident worthy of record, Jack walked about a mile along the road.

He then came in sight of some buildings, and he immediately became more cautious in his progress.

All the way he went, however, his mind was occupied with one idea.

That was, to get rid of his fetters.

He felt that for the sake of being free from them he would gladly run a considerable amount of risk.

Presently Jack paused.

Just a little way further on, on the left-hand side of the road, he could see the dim outlines of a shed.

From the window and door of this place there issued bright but fitful beams of light.

Jack guessed in a moment that it was a blacksmith's shop.

Here, then, was a place containing the tools that would free him from his fetters.

But was there any hope that he would be able to obtain them?

He crept forward slowly.

In about a moment, the blacksmith's shop was reached.

Jack paused near the window, which consisted merely of an aperture in the wall, which could be closed, if necessary, by a wooden shutter.

Grasping this shutter, Jack bent forward, and peeped into the shed.

It contained only one person.

He was a blacksmith evidently, and was engaged at his trade.

Jack watched for several moments.

"Shall I risk it?" he asked himself. "Perhaps I can bribe him to remove the irons! I have some money by me, and I could not put it to a better use. I have a good mind to try. Suppose I tell him the same tale as I told the farmer? He believed it, and why should not this blacksmith? I have a great mind to try it on."

Jack deliberated some moments longer.

It was no trifling thing that he was about to do.

The blacksmith probably enough had seen one of the bills offering a reward for his apprehension, and if so, he would recognise him from the description at once.

Had his position been less desperate than it was, Jack would have continued on his way, in the hope of getting rid of his irons in some less dangerous manner.

But, under the circumstances, he resolved to make the trial.

He walked slowly to the door of the shop.

The fierceness of the blaze had now somewhat decreased, so his body was not revealed with that degree of brightness that it would have been had he entered a little while previously.

Hearing a footstep, the blacksmith looked up from the piece of iron he had been fashioning.

He eyed his visitor inquiringly.

Jack stepped in quickly, and took up his position in the shade.

"Who are you?" said the blacksmith. "What do you want?"

In reply to this interrogation, Jack repeated, with little variation, the tale that he had told to the farmer.

In conclusion, he said:

"So now you know how it is that I have got these fetters on. I am not very rich, but I dare say I could find twenty shillings to give you, if you would take a hammer and punch, and knock the rivets out!"

The blacksmith shook his head.

"You have told me a very plausible tale," he said—"a very plausible tale indeed! It might do with some folks, but it won't do with me! Oh dear no!—not at all! I know you!"

Jack started violently, and clenched his fists.

The blacksmith rested his arms on the handle of his sledge-hammer, and looked with a smile into Jack's face.

"Yes," he said, "I know you! You are Jack Sheppard! I have seen a bill offering five hundred pounds to anyone who should lodge you in jail!"

Jack uttered a curse.

"It's a fact, I can assure you!" said the blacksmith, calmly.

"Well, since you know who I am," growled Jack

Sheppard, "perhaps you will try to take me prisoner? For your own sake, I should advise you to let me alone! You will find it no easy matter to effect my capture! I look a stripling, I know, but I have more strength than perhaps you would give me credit for!"

"Don't put yourself about!"

"I don't intend."

"I mean, you have no cause to be frightened of me!"

Jack laughed.

"I never was frightened yet!"

"You either don't or won't understand me!" replied the blacksmith. "I know you—I recognised you in a moment—but I wish you no harm. You are a clever fellow, and I admire you for your cleverness!"

The blacksmith held out his hand as he spoke.

Jack was so surprised by this speech, so different as it was to what he had expected, that for a moment he stood quite bewildered.

He did not know whether to take the proffered hand or not.

The blacksmith observed his hesitation, and seemed to understand it.

"Do not feel doubtful of my good faith," he said. "I assure you I am quite sincere! Shake hands with me! We shall be friends—I feel certain of it!"

Jack recovered himself.

He looked keenly into the blacksmith's swarthy countenance.

The result of the scrutiny was perfectly satisfactory.

The expression which appeared upon it was certainly friendly to him.

Therefore Jack hesitated no longer, but stretched out his hand.

The blacksmith seized it with manifest eagerness and pleasure.

He shook it warmly—rather too warmly to be pleasant.

Jack could scarcely endure the pressure.

"I seems, then, that I have found an unexpected and unlooked-for friend," he said.

"You have!" responded the blacksmith, heartily.

"But how is it that you are not tempted by the reward?"

"I am not—let that suffice. I don't want such dirty money—I don't believe it would do me or anyone else any good. You have done what was firmly believed to be an impossibility, and I think that you fully deserve your freedom, now that you have made your escape!"

"I wish my foes would think so!" said Jack, with a sigh—"they do not, that is quite clear, or they would not have offered such a large reward for my recapture!"

"Very true! They do not, that is certain; but still, I think you fully deserve your freedom, and I will help you all I can."

"Thanks—thanks!" said Jack, who was completely overpowered when he found how friendly-disposed the man was to him.

"Thanks—thanks! You have indeed the power to perform a service for me, the value of which is quite beyond calculation!"

"I rejoice to hear it!"

"These fetters, which I have asked you to knock off for me, are terrible impediments; and, unless I am freed from them, all my previous exertions will be thrown away."

"Say you so?" cried the blacksmith; "then you shall soon be rid of those encumbrances—I will have the rivets out in a twinkling!"

He turned round and searched in a box of tools.

Jack's heart beat high with joy and hope.

Indeed, he could hardly bring himself to believe in the reality of the good fortune which had befallen him.

Having selected a punch that would answer his purpose, the blacksmith approached Jack with a small hammer in his hand.

"Put your foot up on to that anvil," he said, "and in less time than you can say 'Jack Robinson' the rivet will be out!"

Jack put his foot on the anvil, as requested.

He found the blacksmith had spoken truth.

In less time than he could have believed possible, the fetters fell clanging to the ground.

How strange it seemed, that the task which had baffled all Jack's efforts should be so easily performed!

Having the proper tools made all the difference.

One leg having thus been freed from the heavy mass of iron-work which encumbered it, Jack hastened to place the other on the anvil, in order that it might be subjected to the same process.

When the punch was placed just upon the rivet, one stroke with the hammer did the business.

Jack Sheppard was once more, in every sense of the word, a free man.

"There you are!" said the blacksmith, as he threw the hammer and punch on one side.

"Thanks—thanks!" cried Jack, in a voice which showed how deeply grateful he felt. "Had I the wealth of the world, I could not repay you for this service!"

"Pooh, pooh! Say no more about that, I beg! I never did anything with greater willingness in all my life! However, if you are inclined to show your gratitude—"

"Tell me how I can testify the extent of my obligation, and you will see how readily I shall do so!"

"Well, then, if you would not mind, I should like you to give me a precise account of the manner in which you made your escape."

"I will do so willingly!" replied Jack.

"I mean, I should like you to tell me all—even now you got out of your cell."

"In fact, all the particulars from first to last?"

"Just so."

"If that is all, I will soon do that."

"I desire no more. I don't know how it is, but I have always felt a very great degree of interest in all that you have done. I like your brave spirit, and I would fain hear all I can concerning you."

"I will do my best to satisfy you."

"Come, then—I have done work for to-night! My house is hard by. Come with me, and then you can tell me your tale at your ease."

"But—" said Jack, hesitatingly.

"Fear nothing!" said the blacksmith, who seemed to guess his thought, and to comprehend the meaning of his hesitation—"I am a single man, and live alone in my house; we shall be as much by ourselves there as we are here."

"That is all right, then!" said Jack, "as you must be aware, I am obliged to be very cautious."

"I know you are; but come—all is well, believe me!"

"I do not doubt you."

"I am glad to hear that! It would have grieved me greatly had you suspected me. This way, then!"

The blacksmith passed out of the shed, and closed the door after him.

Jack followed close at his heels.

As soon as he had properly secured the door, Jack's new-found friend led the way to a house which stood at no great distance from the forge.

"Here we are!" said the smith, as soon as they arrived at it—"this is my abode."

He opened the front door, as he spoke, with a key that he took from his pocket.

Jack scarcely knew what to think of this adventure.

He was fully conscious of but one thing only, and that was, that his body was no longer weighed down by the fetters.

Still, he could not think that the blacksmith was insincere, or that he contemplated any evil designs against him.

He seemed to look upon Jack as a very singular specimen of the human race.

He was, too, without the temptation of delivering him up for the sake of the reward, for he had sufficient to satisfy all his wants.

Whatever suspicions might have lingered about Jack's heart were completely dispelled when he entered the house.

His conductor led him into a comfortable room, and placed upon the table a repast such as Jack had not for a length of time beheld.

Foaming home-brewed ale, too, was produced, and the blacksmith invited Jack to eat heartily.

During the meal, and for some time afterwards, Jack occupied himself in relating at length the particulars of his escape from Newgate.

It was easy to see that the blacksmith listened to every detail with the utmost attention.

By his manner, it would seem as though he was treasuring up every word in his memory.

The narrative was one well calculated to inspire interest in almost any breast.

At length Jack finished.

"That is all!" he cried.

"You have paid me over and over," said the blacksmith, "for the service which I have rendered you! I would not have missed such a narrative for the world!"

"I am glad you are pleased with it."

"There is only one thing that I am surprised at."

"And what is that?"

"Nay—nay! It is only a thought of my own, and you ought to know your own business best."

"What mean you?"

"Nothing."

"Come, speak out! There is something which strikes you as being singular."

"Just so!"

"I could tell as much by your manner."

"But never mind; it is no business of mine!"

"Speak out—do speak out!" said Jack, who had a strange, undefined feeling at his heart that he was about to hear something of a very startling character indeed. "Speak out, I pray you! What is it that seems singular?"

The blacksmith looked confused, as though he was at a loss to know how to put his thoughts into words.

He stammered and paused, but said nothing.

Jack's anxiety was unendurable.

"Speak!" he said. "Why do you hesitate?"

"Well, then," said the blacksmith, desperately, "I was afraid of offending you by speaking my thoughts too plainly. I always thought you a brave fellow, and indeed what you have said to-night is quite enough to prove it, and yet I cannot help thinking it strange—"

"What—what?"

"That you, being so bold, should only attempt to accomplish your own escape."

"My own escape?"

"Yes."

"I do not understand you!" said Jack, with a puzzled air.

"I mean what I have said."

"But why should I trouble about effecting the escape of anyone else? I had quite enough to look after myself."

"Why did you not trouble about anything else? That's just what puzzles me."

"Why?"

"When your friend was in Newgate."

"My friend?"

"Yes."

"In Newgate?"

"I have never heard of his escape. Is he free?"

"Who do you mean?" cried Jack, starting to his feet with a suddenness and violence that rather alarmed the blacksmith. "Who do you mean?" he repeated eagerly, almost fiercely.

"Why, your friend."

"What friend?"

"Blueskin."

"Blueskin?"

"Yes. But why all this excitement?"

Jack sank down in his chair again.

He covered his face with his hands.

The revelation had come upon him with as much unexpectedness as suddenness.

The reader will bear in mind that Jack Sheppard was quite ignorant of the fact that Blueskin was a prisoner in Newgate.

That piece of information had been most zealously kept from him by his foes.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD HITS UPON THE NOVEL EXPEDIENT OF CUTTING DOWN TYBURN TREE IN ORDER TO PREVENT THE EXECUTION OF BLUESKIN.

FOR several moments, Jack Sheppard sat silent and motionless.

The blacksmith regarded him with the utmost surprise. "Blueskin in prison!" Jack murmured at length. "Good heavens, can it be possible?"

"You were ignorant, then," said the blacksmith, "that he was an inmate of Newgate at the same time as yourself?"

Jack looked up.

"Nothing was further from my thoughts. I had no idea of such a thing."

"That accounts for it, then!"

"Had I been aware of it, I would never have left Newgate without him. I would have pulled down every stone until I reached his cell, and would either have escaped with him, or remained behind and kept him company."

"Give me your hand," said the blacksmith, suddenly. "I think all the better of you after that speech. I could not imagine how you could be so selfish as to escape yourself, and leave him behind."

"As I tell you, I had no idea he was in Newgate, and yet I wondered what was the reason he never communicated with me."

"It was out of his power, Jack."

"It seems so."

"Then you know nothing of his trial?"

"Nothing."

"I can scarcely believe it possible."

"I know nothing, I assure you; but do not hesitate another moment—tell me all you know. Perhaps even now I may not be too late to save him!"

"I cannot tell you a very great deal."

"Where was he captured?"

"In Drury Lane."

"At the Black Lion?"

"Yes."

"By whom?"

"Jonathan Wild."

"Well, what next?"

"Blueskin was taken to Newgate, of course, and there he remained until last Thursday, when he was brought up at the bar of the Old Bailey to take his trial."

"What was the charge?"

"Highway robbery!"

"And the verdict?"

"Guilty!"

"I thought so!"

"But stop! I have not told you all—and yet, perhaps you may know this."

"If it is connected with Blueskin's imprisonment, I know nothing."

"Well, then, just when Blueskin was about to be placed in the dock, Jonathan Wild came up to him, and began saying aggravating things."

"Well—well?"

"And so, what do you think Blueskin did?"

"I have no idea."

"Why, he snatched a knife from one of the turnkeys, and cut Jonathan's throat with it!"

Jack shrieked with joy.

"Then he revenged himself?" he said.

"He did."

"Is Jonathan dead?"

"No."

"I thought not!"

"You thought not?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because he was born to be hanged!"

The blacksmith stared at Jack in undisguised astonishment.

Such a thought as that Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, who hanged other people, was born to be hanged himself, had never entered his imagination.

"He had a narrow escape from Blueskin's knife, at any rate," he said—"a very narrow escape indeed! From what I heard last, it seems the chances of his recovery are very slight indeed!"

"He will get over it, never fear!"

He then questioned the blacksmith more particularly with respect to what had befallen Blueskin, and ere long he succeeded in obtaining from him all the information he possessed.

At the end of the conversation, Jack Sheppard rose to his feet.

He had heard that Blueskin's execution was fixed to take place on the following morning.

The night was now far advanced.

What steps could he take—what course could he pursue—to meet the current of events?

He knew not.

"I must leave here at once," he said. "In a few hours day will dawn, and I have more work before me than I shall be able to accomplish, I am afraid! If I fail, I will perish with him; but it will go hard with me if I don't save him!"

The blacksmith was astonished.

Jack took him by the hand.

"Farewell!" he said. "Do not seek to detain me! I am more grateful to you than words or actions can express; but I must leave you! The ties of friendship drag me away! Farewell! I shall never forget you!"

"Nor I you!" said the blacksmith, as he led Jack to the door.

Here they parted from each other.

Jack bounded off through the darkness, and was out of sight in a moment.

He went in the direction of London.

He ran on at full speed in a straight line, disregarding every obstacle that lay before him in his path.

He paused at length.

But it was not until he was compelled to do so by sheer exhaustion.

Panting for breath, he sank down upon the ground.

He had reached the outskirts of London.

And now, for the first time, he began to ask himself what he should do.

It was all very well for him to announce his intention of saving Blueskin or perishing with him, but it was necessary to have some plan for future operations.

What could he do?

That was a question he over and over again asked himself.

But in vain.

He could find no reply.

"I cannot break into Newgate," he said, "and carry him off by main force, that is quite clear! How, then, am I to prevent his execution to-morrow morning? There is no time to get together a number of people and attempt a rescue, or I would try that. There is, indeed, no time for anything!"

He rose to his feet.

"I must do my best. Let me see—where am I? London lies to the eastward. Why—stay! It cannot be; and yet—Yes, it is! I am in Tyburn Fields!"

Jack had spoken truly.

All unconsciously he had directed his steps towards the fatal spot where his comrade was doomed to suffer on the morrow.

The hideous, triangular-shaped gallows was not in sight, but some strange feeling sprang up in Jack's breast, and impelled him to make his way towards it.

He walked on at a rapid pace.

Jack was tolerably familiar with the topography of the environs of London, and he was able to direct his steps to his destination unflinchingly.

At length he halted within a few yards of the gallows, which reared itself sombre and spectral-like from the ground.

The outlines of the dreadful instrument of death were but dimly visible.

They assimilated too much in colour with the dark sky behind.

But Jack made out the three upright posts and their horizontal beams readily enough.

"Accursed tree!" he said, unconscious that he was uttering his thoughts aloud—"accursed tree! Fit emblem of our boasted civilisation! The law's last punishment!—the reward of crime! Your timbers groan for more fruit! The day is not far distant when Jonathan Wild shall hang dangling from your beams; then I shall be satisfied! Yes, I feel that if I can only see that day, I shall end my days in peace! By the evil machinations of Jonathan Wild, my father perished here, and I have with difficulty avoided the like fate. Shall Blueskin be another victim? Never! Rather would I raze the whole structure to the earth! Ha! I have a thought!"

Jack broke off suddenly.

In the midst of his vain exclamations, a thought had occurred to him.

"I have it!" he cried again. "I have it! I know what I will do, now! I will cut down Tyburn Tree! Ha, ha! A good thought!—a very good thought! It shall be done. How astonished the sheriffs will be when they arrive and find the gallows has disappeared! Hurrah!"

I will do it, and then they will have some trouble in hanging Blueskin to-morrow, I fancy!"

It was a strange thought that.

It occurred to Jack by pure accident.

As he said, there would indeed be some difficulty in carrying the sentence of the law into effect.

What permanent advantages might arise from it he did not consider so deeply as he ought to have done.

The idea of razing the gallows to the ground tickled his fancy.

It was an achievement which would give him great pleasure to perform.

But he had not the tools requisite for such a purpose.

He resolved to set about obtaining them at once.

An axe was indeed all he wanted.

He glanced around him.

The darkness was most intense.

The spot upon which he stood was about as lonely and desolate a one as any round London.

How different it is now!

Tyburn Fields have been built upon.

They have been covered with palatial residences, and now Tyburnia, as the district is called, is one of the most fashionable in all London.

Upon the very identical spot where the old gallows stood, a noble mansion has been erected.

Those curious in such matters may desire to look upon it.

For the satisfaction of these we give the information.

It is No. 49, Connaught Square.

This square is near the junction of the Edgware Road and Oxford Street.

It is situated, indeed, between St. George's burying-ground and the first-named thoroughfare.

The circumstance that this house stands upon the exact spot where Tyburn Tree formerly was, is specified in the lease.

However, all this is from our story.

When Jack Sheppard looked around him, he could not see the least trace of a human habitation.

Where was he to obtain what he required?

After a moment's hesitation, Jack started off at a run towards London.

He knew he was more likely to meet with houses in that direction than any other.

After going some distance, Jack perceived before him a small house, or rather cottage.

He slackened his speed to reconnoitre.

"Why," he said, "I know this place! I know it quite well! Why, this is Peter Sansom's, who used to work for my old master, John Roots! Why, in time past I have often come here, and I know every trick and turn about the place! I shall get what I want, for certain!"

This was a fortunate thing for Jack.

Until he came in sight of the house, he had forgotten all about it.

Now all rushed back to his mind.

Jack recollected that at the back of the house was a shed in which Peter Sansom was wont to work.

Towards this shed Jack made his way with stealthy steps.

Knowing the ground so intimately as he did, was a great advantage to him.

He reached the door of the shed, and opened it without difficulty and without creating the least alarm.

He entered.

The darkness of the place was profound, but he had no means of procuring a light, and so he was compelled to grope about in order to find what he wanted.

After much delay he succeeded.

His hand grasped an axe which was in a basket containing a number of other carpenter's tools of all shapes and sizes.

Jack seized the axe and took his departure.

With all speed he made his way back to Tyburn.

The night, which had all along been dark and threatening, now changed to rain.

This materially added to the discomfort of Jack's position.

Still he heeded it not.

Delighted to have the means of levelling the hated gallows to the ground, Jack hastened onward.

He was, on the whole, rather pleased with the rain than otherwise, and hoped that it would continue.

He was aware that it was no unusual occurrence, on the night before the day fixed for the execution of a criminal of more than usual importance, for people to take their stand near Tyburn Tree, and wait patiently the hour of execution.

They considered the good position they would thus secure, ample compensation for long hours of waiting.

This rain, however, Jack thought would have the effect of keeping off such loiterers.

It seemed as though Jack was likely to have his wish gratified.

The rain came down with unceasing violence.

The heavens were covered with a dense black cloud, in which not a single rift appeared.

At length Tyburn Tree appeared once more in sight.

With a cry of satisfaction on his lips, Jack approached.

But he instantly became aware of the imprudence of such a proceeding as this, and he at once halted to reconnoitre.

Not a single person, however, appeared in sight.

Feeling assured of this, he stepped forward confidently.

Reaching at length the foot of the gallows, Jack placed himself in the requisite attitude for his purpose.

Then raising the axe above his head with both arms, he brought it down again with full force.

The keen edge of the heavy instrument sank deeply into the wood.

So deeply, indeed, that Jack had some trouble in extricating it again.

This told him that he would have to set about his task in a workmanly manner, or he would not be able to accomplish it.

Not without great trouble he succeeded in extricating the axe.

Having done this, however, he proceeded to use it properly.

Jack was well skilled in the use of the weapon, and knew just how it ought to be employed.

He worked away with right good will.

Crash—crash—the axe descended upon the wood, and each time a huge splinter would fly off.

At length, Jack severed one of the upright posts.

Then, and not until then, did he pause.

He wiped the perspiration from his face.

But he did not rest long.

He went to work again with renewed vigour, for what he had already accomplished gave him great encouragement.

The second post was cut through in less time than the first.

The whole framework now leaned on one side in a very alarming manner.

Indeed, the entire strain was upon the one remaining post, which would make it all the easier to cut through.

Jack felt this, for at the first stroke of the axe the wood gaped open.

Another and another blow followed, and then, with a terrific crash, the whole framework of timber came to the ground.

"It is done!" cried Jack, as the gallows toppled over—"it is done! Tyburn Tree exists no longer!"

Three stumps, each about a foot in height, alone remained to mark the spot where it had stood.

Not content with the destruction he had already caused, Jack set to work to demolish the fragments that lay upon the ground.

He did not cease until he was compelled, by sheer exhaustion, to do so.

Then all that remained of Tyburn Tree was a confused heap of timber.

CHAPTER CCLXXXVIII.

RELATES HOW BLUESKIN STILL FURTHER REVENGED HIMSELF UPON THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE.

It seems very strange to leave Jack Sheppard standing on that piece of ground so lately occupied by Tyburn Tree, but we are forced to do so, while we direct our attention to Blueskin, whose situation seems desperate indeed.

We left him last in cell No. 18, in which miserable place Mr. Noakes had caused him to be placed.

This was truly a most wretched dungeon.

It was entirely destitute of every comfort.

That every precaution was taken to secure Blueskin, the reader may make himself assured.

When left to himself, he quickly relapsed into the same state of despair as had characterised him before his trial.

The excitement of recent events wore off.

Still, he could not help feeling no inconsiderable amount of satisfaction at the thought that he had partially revenged himself upon three of his foes.

We need not tell the reader that Blueskin was quite ignorant of the fact that Jack Sheppard had made his escape.

Had he possessed such knowledge, it is probable he would have aroused himself from the lethargic state into which he had fallen.

So far, however, from thinking Jack Sheppard was at liberty, he pictured him an inmate of a cell the very counterpart of his own.

It was while thinking upon his companion, and upon poor Edgworth Bess, that he felt some portion of his old spirits return to him.

He raised his head, which had up to that moment been bent towards the ground, and as he did so, he said :

"Why should I despair? It is folly! I ought rather to rejoice! The success which I have already met with ought to have the effect of spurring me on to make further efforts. To be sure, the success was very partial, and yet it was once very near being complete. I will despair no longer. I will shake off this heaviness which has oppressed me so terribly. I will be myself!"

As he uttered these words, he folded his arms across his chest.

"Why not?" he continued, after a pause. "Jack Sheppard has made his escape from a Newgate cell, and why should not I? There is no reason. I will do so. And, a good thought. I will find Jack's dungeon, and rescue him, and we will both leave Newgate together! Then, when that much is accomplished, it will be hard indeed if we cannot complete the discomfiture of Jonathan Wild, now that he is in such a precarious condition! I will escape, and that at once!"

Blueskin seemed quite another man, now that he had made up his mind to pursue a certain course of action.

He felt himself become suddenly endowed with a fresh accession of strength.

He rose to his feet, though it was not without difficulty that he did so.

He was loaded with heavy fetters, but he was not chained to the dungeon wall, probably because there was no staple convenient for the purpose.

He had, therefore, the liberty of pacing his cell accorded to him.

It was doubtless thought, however, that he would not avail himself of this exercise much, owing to the weight of iron he would be compelled to carry about with him.

However, Blueskin rose to his feet, and managed to get as far as the door of the cell.

This he proceeded to examine.

But the result of that examination was by no means satisfactory, if one may judge by the manner in which he shook his head after inspecting the fastenings by which it was secured.

"Force will never take me out of this dungeon, that is certain," he said, as he retraced his steps to his stone bench.

He sat down upon it with evident satisfaction, for the weight of the fetters was terribly fatiguing.

"I must use stratagem," he added. "I must devise some cunning means of making my escape. How shall it be done? Let me think—let me think!"

Blueskin buried his face in his hands, and gave himself up to profound thought.

How long he sat thus he knew not, but it was for a long while.

He was aroused at length by hearing the sound of footsteps.

Then he became aware that it was night, and he was conscious also that all his deliberations had not led him to any practical result.

He listened to the footsteps mechanically.

One person was approaching.

"Doubtless the turnkey making his last round," Blueskin muttered carelessly.

But while he spoke the words, a thought darted into his mind.

A thought, too, of a most startling nature.

It almost took his breath away.

It was a bold and desperate means of making his escape from his dungeon which had occurred to him.

But, desperate as it was, he resolved to carry it out, or at all events to attempt to do so.

He rose instantly to his feet, and crept across the dungeon.

Then he paused and listened.

The footsteps came nearer, and at length halted before the door.

Blueskin's eyes glistened, and he prepared himself to carry out his intention.

A key was inserted in the lock of the door.

Blueskin placed himself in such a position that the door on opening would conceal him from the view of the person who stood upon the threshold.

The key turned in the lock.

The door grated open.

A man appeared upon the threshold.

He carried in one hand a bunch of keys, and in the other a lantern.

He cast the broad ray of light which came through the lens into the cell.

He waved it up and down.

"Hallo!" he cried, in a voice of mingled astonishment and alarm, for he could not see Blueskin standing behind the door. "Where are you gone? No larks, you know! You had better come out!"

Blueskin made no reply to these words, and the individual, who uttered them with a disagreeable conviction that something unpleasant had happened, stepped cautiously into the cell.

He continued to wave his lantern about, but its beams fell only on the dark and slimy walls.

Blueskin let the man advance until he got beyond the door.

Then, springing forward, he struck him a blow with the full force of his arm.

The turnkey dropped to the floor as if shot.

He never uttered a word.

The keys fell jingling from his grasp, and the lantern rolled into a distant corner.

Blueskin gave the door a kick and closed it.

His first act was to pick up the lantern.

The next, the keys.

Then, going up to the prostrate form, he proceeded to ascertain the extent of his injuries.

Whoever it might be, he lay very still.

A beam from the lantern fell upon his countenance.

Blueskin uttered an exclamation of amazement and delight.

The man who lay at his feet was no other than Mr. Noakes.

Yes, it was indeed the unfortunate Governor, who had come to pay Blueskin a last visit before retiring to rest.

He had just come from Jack Sheppard's cell, whom he left all safe.

Mr. Noakes was alone, and this happened to be a very fortunate circumstance for Blueskin.

The blow which Mr. Noakes had received had wholly deprived him of consciousness.

"Here is luck!" said Blueskin. "This is more than I hoped for and expected. I shall be free, and doubtless all the doors will open at my approach. I am revenged upon this rash, meddling fool. Now for the key of my fetters!"

Blueskin stooped down, and began to search the Governor's pockets.

He was not long in finding what he sought.

His hand trembled as he possessed himself of the little instrument which would enable him to get free from his fetters.

Putting the lantern down upon the ground, he set to work.

The locks yielded easily.

In a few moments he was quite free from his irons.

Mr. Noakes still lay perfectly motionless.

"Now, what shall be my next step?" asked Blueskin.

"I will take these keys and this lantern. The first will doubtless enable me to open all the doors that may intervene between me and Jack's cell, and the second will show me the way. But, in the meantime, how shall I dispose of the Governor?"

Blueskin considered a moment, and then he said :

"Bravo—I have it! I will try how he likes being made a portable ironmonger's shop of. I will put my fetters on him, and lock him up in the dungeon! Ha, ha!"

This plan so tickled Blueskin's fancy that he could not control his laughter.

He set to work, however, in good earnest to execute his intention, for he was well aware of the imprudence of wasting time.

Accordingly he clasped the fetters about the insensible Governor's limbs, and carefully secured them with the key.

When this was done, Blueskin took up the lantern and the bunch of keys.

For a short time he and the Governor had changed places.

Mr. Noakes, however, began to give signs of returning animation, and Blueskin favoured him with a kick to assist him in recovering himself.

"Wh—what has happened?" gasped the Governor.

"It's all right, old cock!" said Blueskin, with a chuckle.

"How do you like your jewellery? We have changed places, old fellow. Now you are the prisoner, and I am the Governor. Good-bye to you!"

And before Mr. Noakes could recover himself, Blueskin left the cell.

He closed the door carefully after him, and locked it.

Then with a confident step he took his way along the corridor.

It was not long, however, before he found himself completely at fault.

"Which way ought I to take now, I wonder?" he asked himself.

But the question was a perfectly useless one.

It was quite clear that he had nothing but the merest chance to guide him.

In spite of this, however, as he had a large bunch of keys in his hand, he did not despair of being able to discover Jack's cell.

He unlocked a door in the corridor, and passing through it, ascended a long flight of stone steps immediately beyond.

At the top was another door, and through this he also made his way by the aid of the keys.

He now entered another corridor, at the extremity of which was another door.

Blueskin was a long time finding a key that would fit this lock, but at length he succeeded.

The door swung back upon its hinges.

No sooner, however, had he done so than he wished he had failed entering.

He attempted to close the door again, but he was too late.

In his ignorance of the interior arrangement of the prison, Blueskin had unconsciously made his way in a direct line to the turnkeys' room.

The door he had opened with so much difficulty led into it.

The turnkeys, some four or five in number, were sitting, in a half-sleeping state, upon the benches placed around the walls.

Their attention, however, had been attracted by the bungling manner in which Blueskin tried the keys; they all turned their eyes to the doorway, wondering who was about to enter.

Can the reader conceive their astonishment when the door, swinging back, disclosed the figure of Blueskin standing upon the threshold, with a lantern in one hand and a bunch of keys in the other?

A cry of rage and surprise burst from their lips, and, springing to their feet, they rushed after him.

Blueskin, stunned and bewildered by this mishap, felt it only natural to turn round and flee.

He did so.

The turnkeys followed at his heels like a pack of hounds.

The uproar was prodigious.

Away they went at headlong speed, and such an exciting race was surely never before run through the corridors of Newgate.

But the prisoner was not able to go far without meeting with a door.

In the prison, all doors are kept secured.

Blueskin tried to unlock this one.

From sheer desperation, he thrust the key into the lock.

It fitted.

He turned it round.

It yielded.

The door flew open.

But the delay which had of necessity taken place had enabled Blueskin's pursuers to come close up to him.

He felt one of the turnkeys touch him on the shoulder, but at the same moment he gave a bound forward, and got out of his reach.

On they came, however, with unabated speed, and then Blueskin found his progress barred by a second door.

He was now obliged to give up.

He could not hope to be so fortunate as to hit upon the right key twice running by mere chance alone.

However, he made the attempt.

But the key was too small.

He pulled it out and tried another.

This was too large.

He turned round with a curse, for his enemies were upon him.

They outnumbered him by far, and, hopeless as his position was, he determined not to yield without a desperate struggle.

He whirled the heavy bunch of keys round his head—for it was the only thing in the shape of a weapon that he had got—and struck some heavy blows.

But he was almost instantly surrounded and overpowered.

They seized his arms, and held them tightly.

He was powerless, and was at last compelled to succumb; but it was not until he perceived that he had done some execution on his foes.

A great outcry was now made for Mr. Noakes, but the Governor could not of course be found.

A suspicion as to what was the real state of affairs darted into a turnkey's mind, and he communicated his thoughts to his companions without delay.

He had seen the Governor on his way to Blueskin's cell, carrying a lantern and a bunch of keys.

Now, the prisoner had appeared with those articles.

They resolved, at all hazards, to make their way at once to cell No. 18.

They did so.

Ere they reached the door, however, a dull, muffled sound came upon their ears.

It grew louder as they approached.

The Governor was hammering away at the door in the most reckless manner imaginable.

At the same time, he cried :

"Let me out—let me out! D—n you all, I say! Let me out—let me out!"

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIX.

THE HOUR FIXED FOR THE EXECUTION OF BLUESKIN AT LENGTH ARRIVES.

ALTHOUGH the words the Governor spoke came very faintly on the ears of those outside, they were uttered at the very top of his voice.

It was the thickness of the cell door that deadened the sound.

The turnkeys for a moment or two did nothing but stare at each other.

They were perfectly aglazed.

Despite the reaction which he could not help feeling at this frustration of his capital scheme, Blueskin was unable to forbear a smile of exultation when he thought of the astonishment the turnkeys would exhibit when they saw the state of the Governor.

"Let me out!" roared the Governor, who continued, without the least intermission, his attack upon the door.

"Let me out! Ten thousand curses!"

"My eye, Bill," said one of the turnkeys, "ain't he a going it?"

"Rather!" said Bill.

"Crikey! if this here ain't a lark, and no gammon; but the best thing we can do is to unlock the door, and let him out."

"And then won't he be like a rampageant lion?"

"I guess he will! However, here goes!"

With these words, the turnkey inserted the key in the lock.

There was a sharp click, and the door flew open. Then such a howl came upon the ears of the turnkeys that they started back in horror.

They could not believe that a human being had given utterance to it.

The dismal rattling and clanking of chains followed.

So great was the fright of the turnkeys at the inhuman sound, that they would probably have started off, had not the voice of the Governor recalled them to themselves.

They recognised the tones now.

"Come here, villains!—come here, I say! Come here and release me, or, damme, I will discharge you all!"

Terrified at this threat, which they doubted not Mr. Noakes would carry out, the trembling turnkeys rushed into the cell.

There, to their dismay and astonishment, they found the Governor with all Blueskin's fetters fastened upon him.

How long they would have stood by in gaping wonderment is hard to say, had not Mr. Noakes commanded them to set about releasing him.

Thus ordered, they obeyed, and in a few moments the Governor was free.

Never had that functionary been in such an infuriated state as he was at that moment.

He was perfectly beside himself with rage.

Uttering a snarling kind of howl, he sprang towards Blueskin, the perpetrator of this outrage.

He clenched his fist, and struck our old friend two blows in the face which quite staggered him.

"Take that!" said the Governor—"take that! The only consolation I have is, that you will be hanged in a day or two!"

Blueskin was ill prepared to defend himself from this or any other attack that might be made upon him.

His arms and hands were held securely by two turnkeys, so that he could neither ward off the blows nor return them.

He was completely at the Governor's mercy.

It was very cowardly of Mr. Noakes, but he was destined not to escape without receiving some punishment.

Finding he could not use his fists, Blueskin bethought himself of his feet.

He lifted up his foot, then, and dealt the Governor such a kick that he dropped down on the floor of the cell at once, and then rolled over and over, uttering sharp screams of pain.

"Take that yourself!" cried Blueskin. "In a general way, I don't approve of kicking, but then, how else is a man to defend himself from a coward who attacks him while his hands are held?"

The turnkeys could with difficulty conceal the pleasure which the Governor's discomfiture gave them.

No one liked him.

In Newgate he reigned supreme, and, as might be expected from such a man, he converted himself into a perfect tyrant.

At some time or other something had occurred to all those present which caused them to conceive a grudge against him, and consequently all felt delighted when this piece of retribution overtook him.

Nevertheless, having an eye to future consequences, they hypocritically sprang forward to his assistance, and, after a good deal of trouble, they managed to raise him to his feet.

The kick he had received was a very severe one, and Blueskin fully intended it should be.

"I hope you like it!" he said. "Perhaps it will be a lesson to you another time, my friend!"

"Curse you!" shrieked Mr. Noakes, "but I will be revenged for this! Load him with fetters, and then come to me for further instructions!"

At a signal to those who supported him, he was led from the cell to his own apartments in the prison.

All the way he went, he continued to utter such horrible curses that, used as the turnkeys were to that sort of thing, they could not help shuddering at their fearful character.

Mr. Noakes was considerably damaged.

He had far from recovered from the attack which Blueskin had made upon him in the dock, and then he had been knocked down on the floor of the cell, and, to crown all, he had had a kick that had materially disarranged his internal economy.

However, he was taken to his own apartments, and then he gave strict instructions that, in order to prevent all possibility of another escape taking place, two turnkeys were to sit continually in the cell along with the prisoner.

These turnkeys were to be relieved every two hours.

By adopting this measure, the Governor thought he should be able to make sure of him.

Under this conviction, he, with many groans, got into bed, and fell off into a profound slumber.

From this he was aroused by the dreadful tolling of the alarm-bell, for the reader must not forget to remember that the events we have just been describing took place on the night when Jack Sheppard made his escape.

In describing the events which followed the discovery of Jack's disappearance, we stated that while the turnkeys were pausing in wonder before the door of the chapel, they heard a dreadful sound, immediately after which the Governor made his appearance.

Having the key to all that had taken place, the reader will no longer wonder at the violent and extraordinary conduct of Mr. Noakes.

It now remains, in order to take up all the broken threads of our narrative, to relate what took place in Newgate after the despatchment of the officers after Jack, up to the moment when Jack Sheppard performed the unheard-of feat of cutting down the gallows at Tyburn.

The Governor's instructions as to two turnkeys being left in the cell along with Blueskin were fully carried out.

It was not at all a bad idea that, and it is one which is found to work very well at the present day, when all prisoners are kept under continual surveillance.

The plan is found to be far more efficient than trusting to stone walls, bolts, bars, and fetters.

When the two men came and sat down in the cell with him, Blueskin at once gave up all hope of ever making his escape.

He was convinced that it was impossible for him to succeed.

The only chance he had was, that he might be able to win the turnkeys over to his interests, but that hope was so frail a one as to afford no support whatever.

He was also quite unable to get over his disappointment.

It was doubly aggravating to think that he should have got out of his cell so cleverly and easily as he did, and then to be recaptured through his own incaution.

He folded his arms and leant back on his seat in sullen silence.

In this manner the remainder of the night was passed until in the morning Blueskin and his two companions were startled by the ominous clanging of the alarm-bell.

All three were amazed.

"An escape, after all, by jingo!" cried one of the turnkeys.

"I wonder who on earth it can be?"

"I'll be shot if I know!"

"I'll lay two to one it's Jack Sheppard, if it's anyone!"

"So would I!"

A pause of anxious expectation now ensued.

The turnkeys could tell an unusual commotion was going on in the prison, and they wished they could go and see what had happened.

Duty, however, compelled them to remain where they were.

After a time the excitement seemed to subside.

Blueskin's curiosity was greatly aroused, and during the day he managed—though in a fragmentary fashion—to obtain an account of Jack's escape.

He felt thankful that his comrade had succeeded in getting off, and his spirits rose again, for now that Jack was at liberty, he knew all that could be done towards effecting his escape would be done.

He was told, however, that Jack Sheppard had, by the order of Mr. Noakes and Jonathan Wild, been kept in entire ignorance of the fact that he (Blueskin) was a prisoner in Newgate as well as himself.

"That accounts for all, then!" muttered Blueskin. "I thought it was rather strange he made no effort to make me the companion of his flight; but now all is explained. He will not be at liberty very long before he learns where I am."

After making this reflection, Blueskin became more content.

The Governor found his new scheme answered admirably, and he continued to keep two turnkeys constantly in his cell.

"Only let me have Jack Sheppard once more!" he said—"only once more—and I will then take care he does not escape, even if I sit in the cell all the time with him myself!"

And so matters went on in the prison with tolerable smoothness.

Each hour Blueskin expected, in some way or other, to hear from Jack Sheppard; but time passed by, and no news came.

He inquired eagerly whether he had been recaptured, and was each time replied to in the negative.

He could tell by the manner in which he was answered that the men were speaking truth.

Where, then, could Jack be?

Blueskin could scarcely believe that he was even now ignorant of his whereabouts.

No. 81.—BLUESKIN.

And yet, owing to the peculiar circumstances which occurred, such was in reality the case.

Jack did not know until the night before the morning appointed for the execution, and that was too late for him to be of any service.

Saturday came, and Blueskin's uneasiness increased.

The shades of evening began to creep over the cell, and finally night came.

Still there was no news from Jack.

Neither had he been captured.

Blueskin's brain was busy in wondering what had become of him; but he was unable to account for his absence.

And yet, he told himself, Jack even then might be working in his behalf.

But the long night passed away like the preceding one.

Blueskin slept little.

His thoughts were too busy for slumber to meet his eyelids.

Morning dawned.

It was Sunday.

Soon after breakfast, Blueskin was taken by a strong escort to the chapel.

Mr. Noakes brought up the rear of the procession.

Here Blueskin was compelled to sit, the "cynosure of all eyes."

Besides the inmates of the prison itself, there was, in the galleries round the chapel, a great many spectators, to whom had been extended the privilege of hearing the condemned sermon preached, and seeing the unfortunate man to whom it was addressed.

Blueskin gave one look around him, and then fixed his eyes upon the Ordinary, as the prison chaplain was then called.

Leaning back in his seat, he folded his arms, and in this position he remained until the conclusion of the service.

To what was said, Blueskin paid but little attention.

His thoughts were far differently occupied.

He had begun to give up all hopes of assistance from Jack, and was wondering in what way he could make a second attempt to escape.

This was a very embarrassing and perplexing problem, and one which he could only solve in one way.

That was, to endeavour to win two of the turnkeys who had seemed to be rather friendly disposed towards him over to his interests entirely.

This was a poor hope.

Nevertheless, when night came he made the effort.

He used every argument he could possibly think of, but it was all to no purpose.

The men remained firm.

Then, before he had time to argue the matter thoroughly with them, they were replaced by others.

So he gave over that attempt in despair.

He resumed his old dejected attitude.

The conviction pressed heavily upon his soul that he could do nothing to avert the awful fate which impended over him.

He was perfectly powerless.

He could do nothing but submit to the inexorable course of events.

Something might turn up at the last moment.

Perhaps not.

Perhaps the moments that he was destined to live on earth were so few that he could count them easily.

A strange feeling took possession of him.

He fancied that he felt like one who was about to die.

The strange, creeping sensations and the shuddering chills which every now and then attacked him, he imagined foretold his speedy death.

By morning he had worked himself up to a perfect fever of excitement.

His eyes were sunken and haggard.

His under-lip twitched convulsively.

At an early hour breakfast was brought.

He forced a little food down his throat, but he felt no inclination to eat.

What a strange and horrible feeling it must be to have upon the soul that you are doing everything for the last time!

"That is the last meal I shall ever eat," he thought.

Then the Ordinary, attired in full canonicals, entered the cell.

He held a prayer-book in his hand, and on his face there was an expression of mock commiseration.

He came close up to Blueskin, and exhorted him to confess.

"You are guilty of the crime for which you have been condemned, and why refuse to confess it?"

"I am innocent," said Blueskin, angrily—"trouble me no further."

"Alas!—alas! Be just, and confess!"

Blueskin turned his back, and ceased to pay any attention to the chaplain and the exhortations he commenced to utter.

"A hardened spirit!" said the Ordinary—"a hardened spirit! The gates of salvation will be eternally closed against you. You are doomed to perish in everlasting fires. Mind that—everlasting fires!"

Then, in a voice audible only to himself, he said:

"Dear me, how hungry I feel! Confound these mornings! they always do interfere with my breakfast!"

He licked his lips as he spoke.

There was now a stir in the corridor without, and Blueskin looked eagerly and anxiously towards the door of his cell to ascertain the cause of it.

A confused throng of persons entered.

CHAPTER CCCXC.

IN WHICH BLUESKIN COMMENCES HIS JOURNEY TO TYBURN.

FOREMOST among the throng, Blueskin noticed the form of Mr. Noakes.

After him came the sheriffs, in their ridiculous official costume.

Then came several of the turnkeys.

Next came a man who carried over his shoulder a hammer, and in his hand a small portable anvil.

That was the blacksmith.

His duty was to remove the fetters from the prisoner, for it was against precedent for a condemned man to ride to Tyburn in irons.

After the blacksmith came another person, who walked with a strange, slouching, lounging gait.

Blueskin felt his gorge rise as he beheld him.

A most sinister countenance did that man possess.

His hair and shaggy beard were red and matted.

His eyes small and piercing like a ferret's, and deeply set in his head.

A diabolical, unmerciful-looking grin distorted his mouth, and displayed to view two rows of yellow, jagged teeth.

His arms were long and sinewy, and his body strangely disproportionate to his legs, for the first was long and the last short.

It was this, perhaps, which gave his legs an inclination to bow outwards, so that, when he stood, his ankle-bones seemed to rest upon the ground.

This man, as the reader will guess, was no other than the public executioner.

But he had claims to being a remarkable character on mere grounds than one.

He was known in the prison, and to the world at large, by the name of Jack Ketch.

Why he should have assumed this name—for it afterwards turned out that his name was John Price—no one knew.

Nor can we tell how it was that the word became almost synonymous with executioner.

Certain it is that the hangmen after him—no matter what their names might be—were always called Jack Ketch.

It was Jack Ketch, then, who brought up the rear of the little procession that made its way into Blueskin's cell.

That infamous wretch who shortly afterwards was convicted, on the clearest evidence, of the murder of a woman named White, under circumstances of unparalleled brutality.

He was executed at Bunhill Fields, upon the gallows from which he had suspended so many other persons.

It was a fine lesson to the advocates of capital punishment when this man was accused and convicted of the heinous crime of murder.

It was quite clear that the gallows had not been a lesson to him.

And yet one would think that a hangman was about the last person who would perish in such a manner.

But this is apart from our tale.

We have said that a sensation of utter loathing came over Blueskin when he beheld him.

But some strange kind of fascination prevented him removing his eyes from his person.

In his hands Jack Ketch carried a piece of strong rope, to which he imparted a swinging, snake-like movement.

He fixed his ferret-like eyes upon his victim's countenance.

The rope he carried was to pinion the prisoner with after the irons were removed.

He kept in the background.

Blueskin's attention was distracted from him by one of the sheriffs, who said, in a thick, wheezy voice:

"Well, my man, I hope you have listened to the pious exhortations of the Ordinary, and that what he has said has had the effect of causing you to repent of your dreadful wickedness! Do you confess?"

"No!"

"No?—not confess? Why not?"

"Because I am perfectly innocent of the crime for which I am condemned to die!"

The sheriff held up his hands in affected or real astonishment.

"Innocent?"

"Yes!"

"(Oh! and after being tried and found guilty as you were? Why, you can't be innocent! Well—well! How hardened some people are, to be sure! It quite takes away my breath, that it does! Innocent? Dear me—dear me!"

Blueskin turned his back on the sheriff the moment he found he was not gifted with even ordinary intelligence.

The sheriff addressed himself to the chaplain, and as their discourse quickly sinifted round to eating and drinking, they got on with each other pretty well.

At a signal from the Governor, the blacksmith now advanced.

He placed his portable anvil close to Blueskin's feet, and set about the task of knocking off his fetters.

This did not take very long to do.

When the operation was over, the blacksmith rose and fell back, in order to make place for his coadjutor, Jack Ketch.

That worthy, with his eyes fixed on the ground, and his fingers playing nervously with the piece of rope he carried, advanced, with the shuffling gait that was peculiar to him, towards the prisoner.

Blueskin shrank back instinctively as this man approached.

Jack Ketch noticed the movement, and chuckled with satisfaction.

The turnkey, however, by whom Blueskin was held would not allow him to retreat far.

When Jack Ketch saw anyone shrink from him with more than usual abhorrence, he always made it a point to handle them a great deal more than was absolutely necessary.

Blueskin sickened when he felt his slimy hands come in contact with his flesh.

But he could not resist.

No tongue nor pen, however, could possibly tell how overjoyed he felt when the pinioning process was over.

Jack Ketch turned round and nodded to the Governor, as much as to say he was ready.

A slight bustle now took place, and then, forming themselves into a kind of procession, the whole party left the cell.

In the courtyard of Newgate there stood the horse and cart which was to convey the prisoner, the hangman, and the Ordinary to Tyburn, which as all our readers may not be aware, was nearly three miles from the prison itself.

In this courtyard, too, were assembled a large body of police officers.

All were mounted, and armed with cutlasses, which they carried over their shoulders in quite a military style.

These were to escort the cart and its occupants to the place of execution, and protect them from any attack that might be made upon them by the mob.

It was by no means an unusual thing for a prisoner to be attempted to be rescued while performing this last journey.

On the present occasion the muster of police officers was unusually strong.

Besides those in the courtyard, there were quite as many more who had taken up their position in the Old Bailey in front of the doors opening into the courtyard.

This was the place, then, towards which the little procession directed their steps.

This, then, was the view which Blueskin beheld upon emerging into the open air.

To him every object, no matter how insignificant, possessed a fearful interest.

He gazed attentively at all.

The first thing that struck him was a confused murmuring noise, for which he could not account.

It sounded like the breaking of the waves upon the sea-shore.

After a moment or so, however, a cry arose, and that made all clear.

The hoarse, murmuring sound came from the throats of the immense multitude assembled in the Old Bailey, and who were impatient for the procession to start.

Having ascertained this, Blueskin looked upon those things which more closely surrounded him.

He glanced at the high stone walls of the prison.

At the bright blue sky overhead.

At the police officers who completely filled the court-yard. But his eyes rested upon the cart.

Across the sides of this a coffin was placed, in what seemed to be a very ostentatious manner.

It was made of very common wood, and had been daubed over with black paint, in order to hide its imperfections.

Or perhaps the maker deluded himself with the idea that it made it look respectable.

This coffin was rude in shape, and had been hastily knocked together by means of some nails, the whitened heads of which showed out in horrible contrast to the black paint on the coffin.

It is no wonder that Blueskin's whole attention was fixed upon this object.

It is not often that a man looks upon his coffin; indeed, it is not possible to look upon one intended for another person without experiencing some emotion.

The coffin was laid across the cart, so that its two ends rested upon the sides.

Blueskin was not allowed much time to contemplate all this.

The officials were all desirous of having the business over as soon as possible.

Accordingly, our hero was hurried towards the cart and compelled to enter it.

He was followed by the Ordinary, who directed him to sit down on the coffin.

He obeyed.

The Ordinary seated himself by his side with the most indifferent air in the world.

He was used to it.

He took a large prayer-book from his pocket.

The hangman now got up into the cart and seated himself at the front part of the vehicle.

Then two police officers, with drawn cutlasses in their hands, took hold of the horse's head.

One stood on each side.

A signal was then given that all was ready.

The signal was heard by the officers outside, and they at once got themselves in readiness.

The door was thrown open.

A roaring cry came from the mob.

The procession started.

Out into the Old Bailey they passed.

The Ordinary began, in a mumbling tone, to read something out of the prayer-book.

But Blueskin paid not the least attention to what he said. He was busily engaged in looking about him.

But he was so surrounded with police officers that he could scarcely catch a glimpse of the crowd.

The mass of people swayed to and fro, each one being anxious to catch a glimpse of the condemned man.

The houses opposite were thronged with people.

They filled every window, and clustered on the house-tops.

All set up a shout as soon as Blueskin came in sight.

The pace at which the cart went was a walking one, so that some time would elapse before they could possibly reach Tyburn.

Blueskin sat with his back to the horse, so that he could only see the way he had come, and not the way he was going.

The top of the Old Bailey was reached, and then the procession turned down Skinner Street.

Just as the cart was going round the corner, Blueskin heard an unnatural and unearthly kind of shriek.

He looked instinctively in the direction from whence it had come.

As he now sat, he had a full view of Newgate Street.

His attention was attracted to the figure of a man who was leaning out of a window in such a manner as to endanger his safety.

This man was gesticulating violently

Then came another shrieking cry.

Blueskin saw the face.

It was Jonathan Wild!

CHAPTER CCCXCI.

JONATHAN WILD GRATIFIES HIMSELF WITH A PEEP AT THE PROCESSION ON ITS WAY TO TYBURN.

Yes, it was indeed Blueskin's old enemy, Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, who had given utterance to the strange, shrieking sound that had had the effect of attracting his attention.

Although the distance from Skinner Street to Jonathan's abode was considerable, yet Blueskin could see plainly enough who it was.

The gesticulations which the thief-taker made were, no doubt, expressive of triumph and gratification.

He was too far off for his words to be audible.

Suddenly, however, he disappeared, and the next moment the cart commenced the steep descent of Snow Hill.

After his insane attempt to dress himself, as recorded in a previous chapter, Jonathan Wild had sunk to the ground in a swoon.

With a sigh, then, Mr. Snoxall came to his assistance.

The worthy apothecary might well feel disheartened, for it seemed labour in vain to try to improve Wild's condition.

However, Mr. Snoxall got him to bed again, and there the thief-taker lay for many hours in a very precarious condition indeed.

His life hung upon the merest thread, and Mr. Snoxall was full of apprehension as to the ultimate result.

But if ever the term "iron constitution" was applicable to any human being, it was to Jonathan Wild.

His powerful physical organisation seemed to bid defiance to all the ills that flesh is heir to.

But this last was a close touch.

As if, however, to bear out the truth of Jack's singular assertion that he was doomed to die by the hangman's rope, Wild grew better.

When the turn once came, his recovery was rapid.

Upon recovery of his consciousness, almost the first thing he desired to know was whether Jack Sheppard had been recaptured.

He was answered in the negative.

Then a perfect volley of curses followed, which ended in a fit of thorough bodily prostration.

When he recovered his senses again a little, which was not for many hours afterwards, he did not seem to take as a lesson the results of his last excitement.

He peremptorily refused to listen to any of Mr. Snoxall's earnest and well-meant remonstrances.

Wild recollected, however, the reply which had been given to his former question, so did not repeat it, but asked another.

That concerned the safety of Blueskin.

To this, of course, a highly satisfactory answer was given, and the thief-taker felt more content.

He felt that he should be well the moment that he received the intelligence of Jack's arrest.

"What is to-day?" he asked presently.

"Sunday," replied the apothecary.

A dim light only came through the window of the bedroom, and Jonathan did not know whether the day was just about to commence, or whether it had reached its termination; so he said:

"Morning or evening?"

"Evening, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan laughed discordantly.

"Ha, ha!" he said—"why, all is well! To-morrow is hanging-day—ha, ha! I shall not be able to go to Tyburn—that is indeed a bitter disappointment! But I will see the procession—yes, yes—no one shall hinder me from seeing that!"

And he was as good as his word.

Jonathan never closed his eyes during all the long hours of the night.

He kept wide awake, for he was afraid that if he did drop off to sleep Mr. Snoxall would not wake him up to see the procession on its way to Tyburn.

And so he waited for morning.

It came at length, and he watched the first rays of early dawn stream into his room with scarcely conceivable satisfaction.

He listened every time the clock of St. Sepulchre's Church struck the hours, and at last, when eight o'clock came, he would insist upon dressing himself.

Mr. Snoxall did not even attempt to remonstrate.

The determined manner of the thief-taker too plainly proved that it would be unavailing.

It was almost too much for Jonathan, but at last he finished dressing himself.

Then he was so utterly exhausted that he was compelled to lie down on the bed for a little while, in order to regain his strength.

Then nine o'clock struck.

The procession would start in another hour—perhaps less.

Wild closed his eyes, and endeavoured to call before his mind just what was taking place inside Newgate.

It galled him exceedingly to think that he could not be a spectator of the scene.

He felt that it would have done his heart good.

With a weary sigh he turned over on the bed, and shortly afterwards half-past nine was chimed from the church steeple.

He resolved to place himself at the window at once.

From the position occupied by Wild's house in Newgate Street, all the windows in the front commanded a view of the top of the Old Bailey and Skinner Street, with Fleet Market and Holborn Hill in the distance.

Jonathan's bedroom was situated on the third floor, and from this very elevated situation a capital view was obtainable.

Throwing back the lattice till it lay flat against the wall, Jonathan seated himself upon the window-sill in such a manner that he commanded a full prospect in the wished-for direction.

With a demoniac grin distorting his countenance, he sat there, patiently waiting for the procession to make its appearance.

"I would give ten years of my life," he said, "if I could only accompany the procession to Tyburn and see the sentence fully and properly carried out."

But even as these words passed his lips, such a fearful sensation of weakness came over him, that he could scarcely for a moment or two retain his balance, and he was in imminent danger of falling out of window.

He recovered himself, however, and then he gasped:

"No, no, I must not think of such a thing; it is altogether impossible! This accursed weakness is completely master of me—completely; and for awhile I must succumb. Ah! what is that?"

St. Sepulchre's, bell began to toll with a regular and dismal sound.

"The procession has started," said Wild, excitement lending him for a moment a fresh accession of energy. "Now, then, to feast my eyes upon the pleasantest spectacle I have seen for a long, long time! I must not miss anything! I must observe all—all!"

As Jonathan spoke these words, he leaned out of the window to such an extent that it seemed as though he must fall out.

And certainly, it at this moment another fit of weakness had seized upon him, nothing could have saved him from falling headlong into the street.

But Jonathan Wild thought not of this hideous danger.

His faculties were all bound up in and directed to one object.

By the commotion at the top of the Old Bailey, he could tell the procession was close at hand.

The mob was on the move, and was going steadily in one direction.

That was down Skinner Street.

Then the mounted police officers who headed the procession, and whose duty it was to force a way through the mass of people for the remainder to follow, appeared in sight.

And so they slowly went on until at last the cart appeared before Wild's view.

For a moment he gazed upon it like one spell-bound.

He could see Blueskin plainly enough, for really he was not so very far off after all, and Wild had the advantage of his position.

He gloated over the idea that one of his most troublesome opponents was on the high-road to a place where his troubles would be put an end to.

But Jonathan was not content simply with seeing Blueskin.

He wanted Blueskin to see him.

He wanted his victim to be aware that he was not so very bad after all, and that at all events he was well enough to exult over his situation.

It was clear, however, that unless he could do something that would attract the prisoner's attention, he would pass by without seeing him, for Blueskin's eyes were turned in quite another direction.

It was for the reason of attracting the prisoner's attention to his presence at the window that Wild gave utterance to that horrible shriek which rose high above the confused murmur in the street below.

As he fully expected, Blueskin looked up.

Then, in order that there should be no mistake, he waved his arms violently, and this at once had the effect of causing Blueskin to see his foe.

When he was sure that the prisoner's eyes were bent upon him—that, indeed, a recognition had taken place—Wild uttered a second cry more horrible than the first.

That was intended to express how he enjoyed his triumph—how he exulted over the position of his enemy, who he now fancied he had crushed for ever.

Whether the cry had this significance in the case of the person for whom it was intended is more than we can say.

But the excitement which had imparted so much fictitious strength to Jonathan Wild suddenly departed and left him powerless.

He had no more strength than an infant.

It was lucky for him that at this moment Mr. Snoxall happened to be near him.

The apothecary watched all Jonathan's motions closely, and when he uttered the second shriek, he seized hold of him and his apparel, for he really feared that he would fall into the street.

And such an accident would very probably have occurred, for directly afterwards, Wild felt all his strength go from him.

Mr. Snoxall dragged him into the room.

This was how it was, then, that Jonathan Wild disappeared so suddenly and so strangely from Blueskin's gaze.

The thief-taker was certainly not going the right way to get well.

But he was once more placed in his bed and left to recover his consciousness, for Mr. Snoxall had lost all patience.

A cold shudder came over Blueskin when his eyes met those of his implacable foe.

He wondered whether he had really seen him for the last time in this world.

He looked around him at the different familiar objects that he passed, and made the same reflection.

It must be understood that Blueskin had not altogether lost hope.

He could not banish the idea that even yet Jack Sheppard would do something on his behalf.

"By this time surely he must know of my perilous situation," muttered Blueskin.

But he could see nothing unusual.

The people accompanied and followed the cart in vast numbers.

They uttered loud shouts now and then, and an incessant roar came from them, but there was nothing in the shape of a demonstration.

On the contrary, they were unusually quiet and orderly.

When any notorious criminal was taken to the scaffold, it was usual for the mob to howl and groan, and pelt the inmates of the cart with such missiles as came most readily to hand.

Nothing of the kind was now attempted.

It seemed as though Blueskin possessed the suffrage of the mob, and that they heartily pitied his position.

But, be this as it may, the procession was allowed to make its way towards Tyburn without any hindrance whatever.

CHAPTER CCCXCII.

SHOWS WHAT TOOK PLACE AT TYBURN WHEN BLUESKIN AND THE OFFICERS ARRIVED THERE.

In the good old times, as they are facetiously called, it was customary for the procession to come to a halt when half-way on the road to Tyburn.

From time immemorial it had been the custom for this halt to be made, though no one could tell the precise origin of it.

Of course they stopped before a public-house.

This inn was situated in High Street, St. Giles's, not far from the old church, past which they had to go to reach the Oxford Road, for New Oxford Street, which reaches from the corner of Tottenham Court Road to High Holborn, was not then in existence.

At this public-house it was usual for the officers to be supplied with refreshments.

The other functionaries, too, were similarly attended to.

It was also the custom for the landlord of the public-house to present a bowl of ale to the criminal.

None of these ceremonies were omitted on the present occasion.

Blueskin was thirsty and jaded, and he drank eagerly of the proffered draught, and thanked the landlord for his attention.

After a delay of perhaps a quarter of an hour, the procession resumed its progress.

Blueskin saw the cavalcade set in motion again with a feeling of disappointment at his heart.

The only service that he thought Jack could render to him would be to rescue him by main force.

Had he contemplated such a thing, what better place than this could he have selected for the purpose?

Surely, if the attempt was to have been made at all, it should be here.

But no!

The procession resumed its way without even the shadow of a disturbance.

Blueskin felt his countenance change.

The hope with which he had buoyed himself up was sinking within him.

He began to think that after all he should not be able to escape the fate designed for him.

He began to think that the sun was shining upon him for the last time.

The procession turned the corner of the Oxford Road.

At the time of which we write, Oxford Street was merely a broad country road; and now Blueskin could see fields and trees, and gardens and hedges.

On came the mob, rushing and surging like the sea, but still orderly and quiet.

The Governor of Newgate rode close to the cart, darting from time to time looks of triumph and hatred upon the doomed man.

Of this, Blueskin appeared to take no notice.

Mr. Noakes never enjoyed a ride so much in all his life.

More and more downcast did Blueskin become.

It seemed that as Tyburn approached hope receded.

He resigned himself to the worst.

Yet, to his credit be it said, not even a thought derogatory to Jack Sheppard entered his mind.

He never once accused him of wilfully abandoning him to his fate.

Suddenly, however, a tumultuous cry from somewhere in advance struck upon Blueskin's ear.

His heart beat quickly.

Was it the rescue?

The cry was repeated; but he could not help thinking that it sounded more like a cry of surprise than aught else.

Blueskin was unable to see what was going on in advance, but he fixed his eyes on the Governor under the impression that he should be able to gather something from the expression of his countenance.

He saw him start with surprise and look eagerly and keenly before him.

Then an ejaculation came from his lips, and he rode towards the carriage in which the sheriffs were seated.

He said something, and then the sheriff bobbed his head out of the window of the coach.

Notwithstanding this, the procession continued on its way, though it was clear something peculiar had taken place.

The people still kept up the tumultuous shout.

Slowly the cart rolled its way onwards.

At each step the riot grew more and more prodigious.

Blueskin fancied naturally enough that the uproar in some way concerned him, and he felt anxious to a degree to know what it meant.

He turned his head and looked as well as he could, but he could see nothing.

The Ordinary, however, stood up in the cart. "God bless me!" he ejaculated, as he settled his spectacles on his nose to be sure that he saw rightly.

"What has happened, reverend sir?" asked Blueskin.

"Happened?—why—why—why—the gallows has disappeared! Where's it gone to? What does it all mean?" Blueskin started violently.

"At last!" he muttered—"at last!"

He fancied he could detect Jack's agency in all this.

At this moment the cart stopped.

Blueskin looked around him.

There was certainly no gallows to be seen, though he could tell well enough that they had reached the spot where it ought to stand.

A very animated discussion appeared to be going on between the Governor and the sheriffs.

The fact was, they were not a little puzzled as to what they should do.

To carry out the sentence of the law seemed an impossibility, and yet they did not know what to do about taking the prisoner back to Newgate again.

And now a cry of a different character came from the mob.

Upon hearing it, the police-officers formed a circle round the cart, so as to protect it should any attack be made.

We must now go back for a moment to Jack Sheppard, and relate his proceedings.

After accomplishing his object of cutting down Tyburn Tree, he very industriously set to work to render his recognition a matter of difficulty.

He had already taken some steps with this end in view, and he now proceeded to render what he had already done in the way of disguise more effectual.

He plentifully besmeared his face and hands with mud, and so altered his countenance as to defy identification.

His slim, agile figure he could not alter; but he stooped, and made it appear as though he had a hump on his back.

This done, he retired to a distance, and fixed his eyes upon the heap of wood which was all that remained of Tyburn Tree.

Had he possessed the means of procuring a light, he would assuredly have set fire to the wood, and made a glorious bonfire of the whole.

He waited here until in the distance he saw the throng of persons approaching.

At last they reached the heap of wood, and then Jack joined their numbers.

As one amongst so many he was not noticed, and he reasonably anticipated that the attention of the mob would be directed to the heap of wood, and not to him.

It was in consequence of this discovery that the mob had uttered the cry which sounded to Blueskin like one of surprise.

Then the procession arrived, and halted at the usual spot.

The dismay of the officials may be imagined when they discovered what had taken place.

Such a thing had never happened before, so they had no precedent to guide them.

A very animated discussion ensued in consequence.

Of this delay—or rather suspension of execution—Jack thought he should be able to take advantage.

He was no stranger to the peculiarities of an English mob.

He knew well that they were capable of being swayed with the utmost ease in any direction.

They had assembled with the avowed intention of witnessing the execution of Blueskin.

Now, however, it was impossible that the sentence could be carried into effect.

It was only natural they should desire to do something.

Of all this had Jack thought, and, in addition, he remembered that it is a peculiarity of the English disposition generally to delight in setting authorities at defiance.

If any proof is wanted of this, it is only necessary to think of the various outbreaks and insurrections which have taken place.

The leading object, and very often the professed intention, was to overturn the power by which they were governed.

And then there was not only this, but there was the strong antagonism which has existed, and which we suppose always will exist, between the populace and the police.

Upon all these various and discursive reflections, which he had plenty of time to make, Jack Sheppard founded the hope that he should be able to create an influence upon the mob which would prove beneficial to his comrade, Blueskin.

How far he was right in his calculations, and how far he succeeded, we shall quickly see.

Mingling with the throng, Jack waited until the authorities were in the midst of their discussion.

Then turning to those who were nearest to him, he addressed them in a peculiar tone of voice.

He suggested what good fun it would be, now that the gallows was cut down, if someone would overthrow the police and the cart and all, and set the prisoner at liberty, who it would be a shame to bring out for execution a second time.

The casual words which Jack dropped, all of them having the above tendency, made an immediate impression on the people, and the words spread like wildfire.

All seemed to think that a collision with the authorities would be something specially delightful.

Moreover, Blueskin was rather a favourite than otherwise with the people at large.

Jack Sheppard watched with the most intense anxiety the effect which his words produced.

He saw that they were taken favourably, and his heart beat high with hope.

In a few moments he felt confident that the mob was ripe and ready for action.

If left to themselves, however, they would probably do nothing; they required something to give them an impulse in the required direction.

That impulse Jack now attempted to give.

"Down with the cart!" he shouted. "Down with the cart! Let us all make a rush, and over it will go!"

These words were responded to with a shout of delight, which showed how much the plan of action was in accordance with their wishes.

It was this shout which had inspired Blueskin with hope, and which had caused the officers to range themselves round the cart.

However, the people made a rush.

The officers saw them coming, and endeavoured to present a firm front and stand their ground.

But it was a vain effort.

They might just as well have tried to prevent the progress of the ocean.

On came the living mass with irresistible power.

A general movement was communicated to the whole of the vast body, and the result of such a combination of strength was really extraordinary.

The officers were swept down, their ranks broken, and finally the cart was overthrown.

The mob was now out of all control.

Jack Sheppard forced his way towards the cart.

He reached it at an opportune moment.

He raised Blueskin in his grasp, and prevented him from being trampled underfoot, as he otherwise would have been.

"Good friends," cried Sheppard, "here is Blueskin—let him escape!"

The seething mass of people divided, and showed a clear passage through.

"A knife—a knife!" cried Jack, "a knife to cut his bonds!"

One was handed to him immediately, and one stroke was sufficient to sever the cords by which Blueskin was bound.

"Hurrah!" cried Jack.

He was responded to by a loud cheer from the vast throng.

CHAPTER CCCXCIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN FLY FOR THEIR LIVES, AND MEET WITH A STRANGE ADVENTURE.

THE living lane which was opened for Blueskin and Jack Sheppard to pass through closed up behind them immediately.

In a few moments both fugitives were clear of the mob.

They looked back, and could see that the contest was going on with full vigour.

Of this state of things it was highly necessary that they should take the utmost advantage.

Accordingly, after speaking a word or two to each other, both started off at a rapid pace.

They took the direction of the open country.

If the people could only keep the officers busily engaged for a little time, they would, beyond all doubt, be able to get clean off.

They made the best use of their limbs that they possibly could.

In the distance they could see a clump of trees, and towards this they directed their steps, being aware of the importance of getting out of sight of their pursuers.

This clump of trees—for such at first it appeared to be—was a long way off; and as they drew nearer, they found it very rapidly increase in size.

In fact, it expanded itself into quite a little wood.

They glanced back from time to time, but could not perceive that they were yet pursued.

This circumstance, however, did not cause them to slacken their speed; on the contrary, it induced them to strain every nerve to the utmost.

At length the welcome shelter of the trees was gained; and then—and not till then—did Jack Sheppard and Blueskin pause to recover their spent breath, and to wipe the perspiration from their faces.

"So far, then, all is well!" gasped Jack. "But come, we must not pause. On—on! We are too near our foes to be safe. On—on!"

"All right, Jack!" exclaimed Blueskin. "You are a brave fellow! I thought you would not desert me, though I confess I lost heart when we left St. Giles's behind."

"Forward—forward!" said Jack. "Spare your breath, my friend, until a better opportunity."

"Hallo!" said a gruff voice at this moment. "Who are you, and where are you going to?"

These words were uttered by a tall, brawny man, dressed like a labourer, who planted himself exactly in the way of our friends.

"Stand aside!" cried Jack. "We have no leisure to answer questions. Stand aside, I say, or it may be the worse for you!"

"Now, now—don't you be so fast, young 'un!" said this man, doggedly. "Don't be so fast! If you turn out to be who I take you for, you will bless your stars you run agin me—that's all I've got to say!"

The man's manner was most certainly not unfriendly.

Jack knew not what to think, and paused irresolutely.

"There was to have been a bit of a lagging match down there—wasn't there?" said the man, pointing in the direction of Tyburn—"only there's been a bit of a scrimmage, and the party's got off!"

"What of that?"

"Why, I have been on the look-out, and saw what took place," said the man; "and I saw you two coming, so I said to myself, 'Then it's the party what was to have been scragged, and here an' I, Ned Cantle, ready to help them;' so by that I came towards you."

The tones in which this man spoke made our friends think he was sincere, and Jack said:

"If you are disposed to befriend us, we shall be very thankful. This is Blueskin! He was to have been executed, but he escaped at the eleventh hour!"

The man nodded.

"We want to find some place where we can hide from the pursuit which the officers will make after us."

"Exactly; I knowed it!" said the singular individual who had called himself by the no less singular name of Ned Cantle—"I knowed it! Just you follow me, and I will show you where the officers will never find you!"

"But why are you so anxious to do us such a service?" asked Blueskin.

"Well, if you must know, the blessed officers is my enemies, and I look upon anybody else as the officers is enemies to as friends of mine. Now, to show you I mean the square thing, I will just tell you this: Me and my pals we've got a comfortable place in this here wood, into which we retire ourselves—when circumstances render it necessary! We go out o' nights on our own account."

"Then we are brothers of the quill!" interrupted Jack Sheppard.

"In course we are! and seeing you in such a predicament as this here present, why I felt I could do no more nor no less than render you what service I could!"

"We are obliged to you," said Blueskin, "and if you will find us a place of concealment, you shall receive from us some more substantial proof of our gratitude than mere thanks."

"Oh, blow that! Come on, or it may be you'll be too late!"

Ned Cantle turned on his heel and plunged into the wood, leaving our friends to follow him.

They did so with mingled hope and fear.

They were afraid the man would prove treacherous, and yet he spoke fair enough.

He might be sincere, and if so, the meeting would be lucky for them; and as for the other, they resolved to keep a sharp eye upon all his movements.

In an unconcerned manner Ned Cantle threaded his way through the wood, and presently paused on a small open space, in the centre of which a large oak tree grew.

"Now, here we are!" he said. "I am a-going to show you one of the best hiding-places in the world, and where your foes will never find you! Just observe my motions!"

Our friends did not need this invitation, for they watched every movement with the greatest attention.

But in a few minutes their suspicions vanished and gave way to emotions of astonishment.

Ned Cantle walked right up to the large oak tree of which we have spoken, and seized a branch which was quite destitute of leaves, and which grew out in a very peculiar way in a horizontal direction.

This branch Ned Cantle seized firmly with both hands, and then hung upon with all his weight.

The result which ensued from this proceeding was very singular indeed.

The trunk of the tree lost its perpendicular position.

Ned Cantle pulled more and more, until the tree assumed an angle of about forty-five degrees.

Observing the astonishment that was depicted upon the countenances of Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, he said:

"There now, that's what I call a neat contrivance. You see that branch I caught hold of acts as a lever, and also as a support to prevent the trunk from going down too far. Then you see just by the root a hinge is fixed to one side of the trunk, and the roots are cut on the other, so that it lifts up in the way you see, and covers the entrance to our cavern."

Our friends were quite lost in admiration.

"But come, come!" said Ned Cantle. "You must look more closely at this here beautiful contrivance another time. You must not linger now. In with you, and I'll follow!"

As he spoke these words, he pointed to a small aperture in the earth, which the removal of the tree had disclosed.

Jack and Blueskin looked dubiously at each other for a moment, and then, banishing their suspicions, they lowered their bodies through the hole, which was just large enough for the purpose.

Ned Cantle prepared to follow them.

Our friends found themselves on a rude kind of staircase, which seemed to have been cut out of the solid earth.

They stood aside, and the next moment their singular companion joined them.

Jack and Blueskin were both curious to know how he would restore the tree to its original position, and they were not long kept in suspense as to the means employed.

Ned Cantle produced a long piece of wood, which looked very much like a boat-hook, only its length was much greater.

This he projected upwards, and placed the hook in a staple that was fixed in the bottom of the tree.

Then, exerting all his strength, he pulled down.

The tree followed, and reached its proper position with a dull thump.

They were now in profound darkness.

"Remain where you are for a moment!" said Ned Cantle—"I know all the ins and outs of the place, but you don't. Wait a moment, and I will fetch a light!"

Our friends had no other resource than to obey.

But they had to a great extent lost the suspicions which they had first entertained as to Ned Cantle's good faith.

They could not conceive why he had behaved as he had if it was his intention to betray them.

He seemed, however, to be a long while absent, and our friends grew anxious and uneasy.

In a little while, however, they saw the bright gleam of a light, and then they discerned the form of their new and strange companion.

He was carrying a faggot, which was burning brightly at one end, and which served admirably for a torch.

"I've been a long while," he said, "but the fire was almost out. It's all right now, however! Follow me carefully down the steps, and mind you don't slip!"

This last caution was by no means an unnecessary one, for the steps only being cut out of the clayey soil, were very slippery.

However, the bottom was reached in safety, and then, after going a few yards along a passage, the little party emerged into a tolerable-sized cavern.

In one corner a fire was burning, and in the centre was a rude table, round which still ruder seats were placed.

But the cave did not appear to contain any other living inhabitant besides themselves.

"There's none of the chickens at home just at present!" said Ned Cattle. "They all went off to the scragging match, leaving me to take care of the premises."

"I suppose the chickens are your companions?"

"They is," returned Ned Cattle; "and I suppose you is Jack Sheppard?"

"You might be further off the mark!"

"Then tip us your charley, old fellow! I am glad I have been able to do you a service—and you too, Blueskin!"

"I am much obliged to you!" said Blueskin. "You have indeed done us a service, and a very important one too! Until we saw you, it was very doubtful whether we should escape, but I don't think the officers will be cunning enough to find out this snug little crib!"

"In course they won't, and here you can remain as long as you think proper! We shall be glad of your company!"

"Thanks! thanks!"

"I dare say you are curious to know who I am," said Ned Cattle, and why I am inclined to stand your friend?"

"We are curious upon that point."

"Well, then, I'll tell you. In the first place, you will understand that there's six of us."

"Chickens?"

"Yes! Well, whenever it is necessary, we take up our quarters here, and when we go out, we pick up our livings in the best manner we are able."

Blueskin nodded.

"I quite understand" he said, "and I suppose your comrades set out for Tyburn, in the hope of picking up something?"

"Just so! Of course we had all heard of you and Jack Sheppard too, and we knew that this morning was fixed for your tucking up! We wished all of us that we could save you. I had to stop to look after the place, as I told you. However, I climbed a tree and had a look out, and then I saw the gallows was gone, and that there was a regular scrimmage going on!"

"Well?"

"And after that, I saw you running this way, and I guessed who you were in a moment."

"And so you came down and met us?"

"That's it."

"Then we are much obliged to you!"

"It's all right, and we shall all be pleased if you will join our band, and take the lead in it."

CHAPTER CCCXCIV.

JACK SHEPPARD PAYS HIS PROMISED VISIT TO SIR JAMES THORNHILL, AND CAUSES A "SENSATION" AMONG HIS GUESTS.

"We will talk about that another time, when more of your companions are present," replied Blueskin.

"What's that?" said Jack.

A peculiar, clattering noise fell upon his ear, and caused him to ask this question.

"It's all right!" said Ned Cattle. "Don't alarm yourself, I beg."

"What is it?"

"Some of the chickens have returned."

"And that clattering noise is a signal that they desire admission?"

"Just so."

"But stay!" cried Blueskin, as Ned Cattle was about to leave the cavern. "Are you going to let them in?"

"Of course I am!"

"But it will be dangerous! There are our foes, you know!"

"All right—all right! You may depend the chickens wouldn't come near this here blessed place if there was any officers about! It's all right, and when they come in we shall be able to learn further information."

With this assurance our friends were compelled to be satisfied.

Ned Cattle left them, and in a few minutes returned with two men, whose exterior appearance was very similar to his own.

By their manner, it was quite clear that Ned Cattle had informed them who were in the cave.

They treated Jack and Blueskin with a respect, which it was easy enough to see was not feigned.

In their rough way, they bid them a hearty welcome.

"There's a hottish searching made, I can tell you!" said one of the new-comers. "But don't be alarmed; they will never find you here, if they search till doomsday!"

"I am glad of that assurance!" said Blueskin. "You are certain you were not seen to enter?"

"Oh, quite!"

"That's all right, then!"

Some time elapsed, during which Blueskin and Jack Sheppard got upon very friendly terms with the men who made that cave their hiding and abiding place.

At length more came, until the whole band was assembled.

Everyone seemed to treat our two friends with great consideration, and they evidently thought it no mean honour to have among them two such celebrated characters.

In this underground region, they heard nothing of the officers, to whom the sudden disappearance of Blueskin must have been mysterious in the extreme.

As soon as they possibly could, our friends took the opportunity to withdraw to a corner, where they rapidly talked over their affairs.

This conversation, however, it is unnecessary for us to place before the reader.

Blueskin and Jack did no more than inform each other what had individually happened to them since their sudden, forced parting in the mysterious house in Spring Gardens.

Jack learned, with grief and dismay, that Blueskin was ignorant of the whereabouts of Edgworth Bess.

He told Blueskin, however, what Jonathan Wild had stated to him respecting her.

This, and an attentive consideration of the whole affair from first to last, forced them to the conclusion that Edgworth Bess must once more be an inmate of Jonathan Wild's house.

"How unfortunate it is!" said Jack Sheppard, with vexation—"we are now in a worse position than ever to render her any assistance, and you may depend she stands in very great need of help!"

"She does—she does!" replied Blueskin. "For some time, though, I fancy Jonathan Wild will not be in a position to do much harm, if he has ever so much inclination. Had he not been born to be hanged, the wound which I inflicted upon him would have been a mortal one."

Jack Sheppard uttered a curse.

"We must wait a few days," he said, "and then see what can be done. We were uncommonly fortunate in finding such a place of refuge as this. I fancy we are quite safe."

"So do I."

"However, Blueskin, as soon as night comes, I shall set out."

"Do what?"

"Set out."

"Are you mad?"

"Not a bit of it."

"But you must be!"

"Why?"

"To dream of a such a thing."

"Pho, pho! You cannot have forgotten what I told you about Sir James Thornhill?"

"But you will not be so foolhardy under the circumstances as to keep your word?"

"I intend to try."

JACK SHEPPARD ESCAPES FROM THE PUBLIC HOUSE IN RUPERT STREET.

"Nay, nay—be persuaded by me! This is utter folly."

"I differ from you—differ from you entirely! Sir James Thornhill is a gentleman."

"He may be."

"And I am sure I have nothing to fear from him."

"That is not the point! On your way to his house, or else on your return from it, you will be most certainly apprehended!"

"I will take care that does not happen."

"Then, if you go, let me accompany you."

"I cannot do so, for such a proceeding would have no other effect than to double the danger. I cannot consent to that. While I am gone, do you remain here, and think over our future proceedings. It may be that I shall return with important information, which will guide us as to our future proceedings."

"Well, well, Jack, since you are so determined to go, I suppose you must do so. I cannot detain you. But be careful!"

"That advice is not needed," said Jack.

No. 82.—BLUESKIN.

By the time our friends had ended this conversation, they found, upon appealing to Ned Cantle upon the subject, that night had fairly come.

Accordingly, Jack signified his wish to leave the cave, and was permitted to do so.

Once more, then, he stood beneath the canopy of heaven—about to set out on an expedition of the utmost danger.

To enter London so soon after what had occurred seemed to be an act of utter madness.

There was everything to lose, and very little to gain, by such an enterprise.

But Jack had signified to Sir James Thornhill his intention of paying him a visit, and he determined that, were the risk ten thousand times greater than it was, he would prove to him that his words were not a mere empty boast.

Besides this, Jack was really anxious to see his portrait.

Not without a due and proper amount of caution, Jack made his way out of the little wood in which the robbers' cave was situated.

He looked around him as well as the darkness would permit, but he could see nothing whatever of his foes.

Encouraged by this, he proceeded with more confidence, taking his way to London by a rather circuitous route.

The night was rather dark and blusterous, and of a sufficiently disagreeable character to keep all those persons indoors whose business did not compel to be out.

This was a state of things that Jack by no means found fault with.

Sir James Thornhill's residence was situated in the Bird-cage Walk, St. James's Park, at the time whereof we write, a much more fashionable locality than it is at the present day.

This spot Jack knew he could approach without passing through any populous, well-thronged thoroughfare.

The distance he had to go was, however, considerable, and he made it still further by the circuitous manner in which he approached his destination.

He had agreed to call to see the portrait some time between sunset and midnight.

It was now much nearer the latter than the former.

Leaving Jack on his way, however, we will precede him to his destination.

Sir James Thornhill's mansion was one blaze of light.

The very exterior was sufficient to inform the most casual passer-by that something of an unusual character was taking place within.

The fact was, the great painter had given a dinner that evening, and a large number of guests had assembled.

It is, however, to one particular room in his mansion that we wish to direct the reader's attention.

It was a spacious chamber, and brilliantly lighted by a chandelier which depended from the ceiling.

Seated round the table in this room were several of Sir James Thornhill's guests.

The table was covered with wines of the choicest vintage, to which the guests paid their respects freely.

No females were present.

Sir James Thornhill was seated at the head of the table, and speaking in a rather serious tone of voice.

"He is a very singular young man," he said—"a very singular young man, indeed, and I should not at all wonder if he is as good as his word."

The guests laughed and shook their heads.

"No, no!" said one who sat next to Sir James, and who was easily distinguished from the rest by his wearing spectacles. "We can believe a great deal about Jack Sheppard, but not that. You may depend it was a mere idle boast."

"Oh, certainly—certainly," said another. "Though I must confess I feel a very great curiosity to see this fellow, who has done such wonderful things, but I am afraid there will be no such luck."

"Well, gentlemen, we shall see!" remarked Sir James Thornhill. "When he first spoke I must confess I ridiculed the idea, but he spoke in such an earnest, confident tone that I altered my mind."

"He has performed a portion of his promise at any rate!" said the young man with spectacles.

"He has! Who would have thought it possible he could have escaped from Newgate? I know, for a fact, that every possible precaution was taken to guard against such an occurrence!"

"He must have had assistance!"

"I don't believe it! With regard to his keeping his engagement, however, it seems to me that he has got over the principal obstacle, and I am in expectation of his making his appearance every moment."

"I fear you will be disappointed."

"I have little fear of it myself," said Sir James. "No one knows of his intention save myself and my apprentice Hogarth, and I am quite certain there is no one here who would betray him!"

"No—no—no!" said all the guests, in chorus.

"Then, rely upon it, he will come."

"But do you really think that, in order to keep his word, and perhaps to satisfy some curiosity he may feel about seeing his portrait, he will run the frightful risk of venturing through London streets?"

"I do, indeed!"

"After what occurred this morning?"

"Yes—why not?"

"Well, if he does come, I shall confess him to be the boldest and most desperate character that ever existed!"

"We shall see before long!" said Sir James Thornhill. "I have given instructions to the servants that if anyone calls, and inquires for me, immediate admission is to be granted to the person so inquiring."

"Then, that will be no obstacle?"

"None whatever! I must admit that at first I was very doubtful whether he would come, but that was because I saw how securely he was confined in Newgate."

"And he has broken out?"

"He has, which seems to me incredible. However, in my opinion, the most difficult part of his enterprise is over, and, having done so much, he will consider the rest comparatively easy."

"Well, it may be so," Sir James—"it may be so! and I, for one, do not hesitate to say that I feel very much obliged to you for having invited us to your house on the present occasion. I only hope we shall not be disappointed in seeing him, but I must confess I have my doubts!"

"Patience, gentlemen—patience! His agreement with me was that he would call on Monday evening some time between sunset and midnight!"

"Then all I can say is, Sir James," said another of the guests, as he took a magnificent chronometer from his pocket, "that if Jack Sheppard is to keep his word, he will have to make good speed, for it is now on the very stroke of midnight."

"Then I am punctual to the moment!" said a voice, which Sir James Thornhill instantly recognised as being that of Jack Sheppard. "I am very sorry, gentlemen, that I could not come before, but I had no idea so many distinguished persons were awaiting my arrival!"

CHAPTER CCCXCV.

JACK SHEPPARD HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE THROUGH THE TREACHERY OF THE NEGRO.

UPON hearing the words with which the last chapter concluded, Sir James Thornhill and his guests, with one accord, turned their faces towards the door, for it was from this direction that the voice they had heard proceeded.

The young man in the spectacles, who had expressed his belief that Jack Sheppard would not appear, fairly rose to his feet with curiosity and surprise, while Sir James himself turned half round in his chair.

There was now no longer any doubt about the matter.

Just within the doorway, standing in the attitude of half confidence, half diffidence, stood the daring prison-breaker, Jack Sheppard, with whose daring exploits all London was then ringing.

"Come in!" said Sir James Thornhill, "and close the door after you. You have nothing to fear. These gentlemen present you have nothing to apprehend from."

"I will take your word without any hesitation," said Jack, as he closed the door behind him as desired.

"Come here, then," said Sir James; "sit down; you shall see your portrait presently."

Jack seated himself in the chair to which Sir James Thornhill pointed, though he felt awkward and uncomfortable.

As for the guests, their curiosity to see Jack Sheppard was so great that they gladly enough permitted him to have a place at the table beside them, because they would then have better opportunity of observing his personal appearance.

The amount of interest which was felt in Jack Sheppard at this period is really inconceivable, but a reference to the public prints of the time will show the lengths that people went in order to have a peep at him, and his fame was greatly enhanced by his last exploit.

Some choice wine was poured out and placed before Jack, who drank it freely enough, and in a little time he felt a considerable portion of his awkwardness wear off.

As may be expected, Sir James Thornhill's guests asked him many questions with regard to his past proceedings.

As the reader, however, is in full possession of all that has taken place, there is no need for us to place these questions at full length before him.

To nearly all these questions Jack returned truthful and straightforward replies; to several, however, he replied evasively.

On the whole, they could not help being pleased with their strange guest.

As for Jack himself, he soon grew tired of this scene, and heartily wished it at an end.

For a long time, however, he hesitated to say anything respecting it, but at length he summoned courage to speak.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I feel very much obliged to you for the kind reception you have given me. You will, however, excuse me for mentioning that I live, as it were, in an atmosphere of danger, and that if I stay here long I shall run a very great risk of being captured on my way back to my place of refuge. In a short time, now, the dawn will come."

"You are quite right," said Sir James Thornhill, "and we ought not to have required a reminder from you upon the subject. We will not detain you a moment longer."

The painter rose as he spoke.

This example was followed by Jack and the remainder of the guests.

"You must not forget the occasion of your visit," continued Sir James. "Follow me, and I will take you to my study, where the portrait is."

The painter led the way towards a door at the further extremity of the room.

He was followed by Jack and the whole of the guests, who were everyone anxious to compare the portrait with the original, and pass their opinion upon it.

The studio was quickly reached.

The most prominent object in this apartment was a newly-painted portrait on an easel which stood near the centre of it.

This was the portrait of Jack Sheppard.

A strong light from a lamp was thrown upon the canvas, and Jack showed his appreciation of the fidelity of the likeness by uttering a shout of astonishment.

Murmurs of approbation came from the guests as they noted the excellence of the portrait.

The resemblance was, indeed, perfect, and it seemed as though not another touch was wanting.

This done, Jack now proceeded to take his leave.

He was anxious to be gone, for he feared that daylight would overtake him before he could reach the wood in which he had found so safe an abiding-place.

A strange, indefinable feeling, too, took possession of his breast.

The presentiment of coming danger seemed to cast its shadow over him.

Jack Sheppard was not one who altogether disregarded such feelings.

Each moment that he remained only served, therefore, to increase his anxiety.

Could he but have known what was taking place close at hand he would have been inclined to attach more importance than ever to the presentiment he experienced.

When Sir James Thornhill told Jack Sheppard that he could place confidence in the assembled guests he spoke the truth.

Not one of them would for a moment have thought of betraying him.

The painter imagined, too, that he could place confidence in his servants, but in this supposition he was mistaken.

That he had painted Jack Sheppard's portrait was quite a notorious fact, and therefore it could not fail to be known by all the members of his household.

They, like the rest of the world, felt a very great degree of curiosity upon the subject, and if the reader knows anything of servants he will easily believe that they took efficient means to satisfy their curiosity.

Although strictly and specially forbidden to do so, they all managed to enter the studio and have a peep at the portrait.

Its appearance was, as a matter of course, well commented upon.

But, of all the servants in Sir James Thornhill's mansion, the one that felt the greatest amount of curiosity and interest upon this subject was a negro.

He was employed to wait upon the guests.

While engaged in this capacity he heard the whole of the conversation between his master and his guests; and, though he could not comprehend all that was said, yet he had little trouble in arriving at the conclusion that Jack Sheppard was about to pay a visit to the house.

The negro's eyes rolled and his teeth glistened when he thought of the large reward which was offered for Jack's apprehension.

"Me hab dat!" he muttered to himself as he was arranging the articles upon a sideboard at the extremity of the room; "me hab dat money and de buccara man! Plenty eat—plenty drink! No work! Oh, golly!"

His ruminations were put an end to by the arrival of Jack Sheppard, who entered the room in the manner we have described.

The negro bustled about, pretending to be busily occupied, but from time to time he glanced stealthily towards Jack, who he would have had no difficulty in recognising, from his resemblance to the portrait, even if the guests and Sir James had not spoken so freely as they did.

The negro's mind was now fully made up.

Like the rest of his race, he had a wholesome horror of work, and to be enabled to eat, drink, sleep, and do nothing, was the height of his ambition.

He had never thought he should attain it, but he believed he now had the means within his grasp.

Accordingly, he took the earliest opportunity he could of slipping out of the room.

He left the house by a private door, and ran as fast as his legs could carry him to the Westminster police station.

Upon arriving here, he made his statement to the officers, and they, overjoyed at the prospect of effecting the capture of so notorious a character, followed the negro with the utmost willingness.

They took his advice, and did not enter the mansion, but posted themselves opposite to the door, so that they could observe everyone who came out.

As soon as Jack Sheppard appeared, they would pursue upon him, and carry him off to Newgate in triumph.

From where they stood, they could see the door easily.

The negro, fearing his absence would be noted, now returned to the house and resumed his duties.

The officers on the watch whiled away the time with considering by what means they could cheat the negro out of his share of the reward, and as several were cunning fellows, there was little doubt they would succeed in over-reaching the African.

We should not regret any loss he might thus sustain.

Such was the aspect of affairs on the exterior of Sir James Thornhill's house when Jack was about to leave it.

Beyond the vague presentiment of coming danger which weighed so heavily upon his spirits, he had no idea of the perilous position in which he stood.

We tremble for his safety.

Had he been upon his guard, it would have been another matter.

He could then have taken precautions to escape.

But it seemed that if he appeared upon the doorstep, that moment he would be a prisoner.

Sir James Thornhill made no attempt to detain him, after finding how much he desired to go; but he set the example of making Jack a present of a small sum of money, which was followed by all the guests, without exception.

Jack had no hesitation about receiving this money.

He well knew how useful it would be to him in the plans which he was determined to carry out, despite the opposition of Jonathan Wild.

This done, Sir James beckoned the negro to approach, and then instructed him to lead Jack to the door.

His eyes gleamed when he received this order.

He did not anticipate that Fortune would favour him so far.

Never in his life had he obeyed a command so willingly.

"Come sar!" he said. "Dis way, if you please, sar!"

Jack darted a keen look into his countenance.

It did not reassure him.

He felt somehow that he was gazing on an enemy.

The negro's face, too, had a very treacherous look, which would scarcely have escaped the notice of a less observant person than Jack Sheppard.

Despite the dislike he had taken to his conductor, Jack had no other resource than to follow him to the door.

While descending the staircase, Jack caught a glimpse of the negro's countenance.

It was now expressive of malicious triumph.

"That rascal has been up to something," thought Jack, who, as he then felt, was inclined to view every circumstance with suspicion. "I must keep a sharp look-out, and be continually on my guard!"

This was a wise determination for Jack to make, let things turn out as they would.

As he looked around him and saw how quiet the house appeared to be, his suspicions in a great measure abated, and yet he shivered when the front door was opened.

He attributed that, however, to the sudden change of temperature.

In another second, however, he heard a low whistle which he knew well as a signal by which police-officers communicated with each other.

A hurried rush of feet followed, and then a voice cried: "There he is my lads! There he is! Hurrah! Forward! We have him!"

"Igh! Igh!" said the negro, and as he uttered this guttural laugh, he sprang forward and grasped Jack Sheppard tightly by the arm.

CHAPTER CCCXVI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS MAKE AN UNEXPECTED ENTRY INTO THE CELLAR AT CHARING CROSS.

To turn around like lightning was Jack Sheppard's first impulse.

He caught sight of the grinning features of the negro.

Then with a rapidity which astonished that sable individual beyond measure, Jack doubled up his fist and struck him two terrific blows between the eyes.

He followed them up with another blow delivered with full force in the stomach.

This put the finishing stroke to the negro's discomfiture.

Uttering howls of pain and rage, he let go his hold and sank down upon the steps, where he writhed his body about like some wounded reptile.

But by this time, the officers arrived upon the scene of action, and then a struggle of the most fearful nature ensued.

When Jack saw the number of his opponents, he felt almost ready to sink with despair.

But he rallied himself.

Right and left he dealt his blows with a force and precision that produced a wonderful execution among his foes.

To continue such a contest in the hope of being eventually victorious, Jack well knew to be futile, and having dealt a few staggering blows, he darted forward like an arrow, and broke through the ranks of the police-officers.

Not a moment was lost in commencing a vigorous pursuit.

But Jack had got the start.

He was rested and refreshed, and, as he well knew, possessed of rather unusual fleetness of foot.

Away then, he bounded like a hare.

The officers came on at his heels like a pack of hungry hounds.

They uttered loud and fierce shouts and cries, in order that passers-by might join in the pursuit.

Although they had failed in their first attempt to secure him, the officers felt pretty sure they should overtake him in the end.

Jack Sheppard plunged at random into the labyrinth of streets surrounding Westminster Abbey.

By continually doubling upon his track, he founded his hope of eluding his pursuers.

But though he had the start, yet it was so slight a one, that he was not able to get out of sight of his pursuers for more than a quarter of a minute at the time.

They kept up the chase with great vigour and determination.

Jack Sheppard, however, had upon his mind the conviction, that if he was captured once again, all hope of ever making his escape would be at an end.

He seemed to feel that he had made his last escape, and that if he once again entered the gloomy walls of Newgate, he would never again leave them, save in the cart appointed to convey him to Tyburn.

If one thing then, was more calculated than another to cause Jack to make the utmost exertion, that was.

He felt that he was flying not for his liberty, but for his life.

He felt that if he was captured, the penalty would be death.

Can it be wondered at then, if he seemed to bound over the ground at a speed that really seemed to be super-human.

Ere long, he had the satisfaction of perceiving that he had increased the distance between the police-officers and himself.

In spite of all they could do, they could not overtake him.

A great many people, attracted by the cries and shouts of the officers, had joined in the pursuit.

Quite a mob, then, was at Jack's heels, and each moment its size was augmented in spite of the falling off of those who found it impossible to run any further.

The fugitive's chances of escape were therefore very few indeed.

But, urged on by the feelings which we have described, Jack ran with incredible speed, and his tremendous exertions were at length rewarded by his obtaining a still better start of them.

Now that he had once increased the distance between his foes and himself, he was well aware that he had only to continue his exertions to make a very great difference, indeed; while, if he once lost ground he could scarcely hope to regain it.

It was a very tortuous route that Jack took, and one that led him nowhere near his destination.

Indeed, he had not studied much where he was going, but now, on looking around him, he perceived himself in the vicinity of Charing Cross, then a spot quite out of town.

Jack looked behind him.

His pursuers were not in sight.

Now was, then, the opportunity to seek some place of refuge.

The time allowed him for selecting it was brief indeed.

In another moment his foes would be in sight again, and he would have lost the by no means inconsiderable advantage which he had gained.

Jack looked around him for a place of concealment in rather a strange manner.

"Where would they think the most unlikely place for me to go?" he asked himself. "I want to find some place which they will pass by at once under the belief that I could not possibly have sought shelter there. By this means, and this only, can I hope to elude them."

At this moment Jack's eyes fell upon a place which he fancied would just answer his purpose, and he directed his steps towards it without further hesitation.

This place was a cellar, though the word, considered under its usual signification, would altogether fail to give an idea of the nature of the place to which it was applied.

It was, indeed, an underground place, and so the word cellar might be appropriately enough applied to it; but it was used as a kind of public-house, with this difference, that eatables of every description could be obtained there.

It was at night that these places were open, and in a general way there was no lack of customers.

The entrance was from the pavement of the street by means of a flight of wide steps.

Down these Jack made his way in as unconcerned a manner as could possibly be imagined.

Reaching the bottom of the steps he pushed open a door, and then entered the cellar—a place which, from the singularity of its character, well merits a few words of description.

Imagine, then, a large and cavernous-looking apartment, filled with men and women of all grades seated round tables, busily engaged in eating and drinking.

Such was the scene which Jack beheld immediately upon passing through the doorway.

The tables were placed in such a manner as to accommodate the greatest possible number of customers.

Several flaming oil-lamps depending from the ceiling, and a number of candles in rude candlesticks upon the tables, illuminated the cellar.

The uproar was prodigious.

Shouting, swearing, singing, knocking, were mingled with the jingling of glasses and the clatter of knives and forks.

But little could be seen, however, for the atmosphere, close and stifling as it was, was heavily laden with tobacco smoke, which gave to all objects a hazy look.

Hot joints smoked upon the various tables, and ale and spirits were there in great profusion.

Jack Sheppard was no stranger to such places as these, and therefore he made his way to the further end of the cellar in a manner that was well calculated not to attract more than passing notice.

To have seen him, no one would have believed that he stood in such tremendous peril as he did.

His face was calm, and his movements unconcerned.

Seating himself where he could command a distant view of the door, Jack ordered refreshment of the waiter.

He was served quickly, and he set to work to eat and drink, so as to give the appearance of his having been in the place for a much longer period of time than he really had.

He was pleased to see that arrivals kept taking place every moment.

There were no signs of his pursuers.

What had become of them he knew not.

No doubt they were searching for him in every direction, never dreaming that, with such a reward hanging over his head, he would venture to enter so public a place.

Almost unconsciously, Jack found himself listening to the conversation of those persons who sat nearest to him.

"It is such a thing as never happened before!" said one. "The idea, now, that the old gallows, which has borne so much ripe fruit, being cut down! There is but one person alive who could have done such a thing!"

"And who is that?"

"Jack Sheppard!"

"I quite agree with you! Indeed, when Blueskin was rescued this morning, it is stated that Jack Sheppard was there and led the mob on!"

"I have no doubt he was! The whole thing, depend upon it, was planned by him from beginning to end!"

"I am of that opinion! Well, I, for one, hope he will get off, for he was a daring fellow!"

"There is not much chance of that, I am afraid!"

"Why not?"

"They are sure to have him sooner or later!"

"Well, perhaps so! Where he is now, though, no one knows, and both he and Blueskin may get out of the country undetected!"

"I am not of your opinion there!"

"For what reason?"

"Well, if you must know, Quilt Arnold, Mr. Jonathan Wild's head man, is a friend of mine!"

"Oh, indeed!"

"I knew him many years ago—but that's neither here nor there; however, he told me that Jack Sheppard and Blueskin had sworn a solemn oath together that they would not rest until they had seen Mr. Jonathan Wild hanging on the gallows at Tyburn!"

"Ha, ha!"

"You may well laugh! I look upon it as a good joke myself!"

"The idea, now, of hanging a thief-taker!"

"It is rather a droll notion, to be sure, and yet, if all I have heard is true, Jonathan Wild has done quite enough to richly deserve such a fate!"

"Hush, hush!"

"What is the matter?"

"Mind what you're saying! It's very dangerous talk, and you cannot tell who may overhear you!"

"Thanks for your caution."

"It may not be out of place. In my humble opinion, Jonathan Wild is a man who is best let alone, for he has almost unlimited powers of mischief!"

"He has! He has!"

"And I should be sorry for any harm to overtake you."

"We will change the subject, then?"

Jack listened to these words with feelings which can scarcely be described.

No doubt he formed the common topic of conversation in all the public places in London.

Hope, however, began to arise in his breast.

Some time had elapsed since his entrance and all was well.

His enemies had probably lost the scent entirely, or else gone off upon a false track.

These hopes, however, were quickly put an end to.

An unusual tumult came upon Jack's ears.

He directed his eyes towards the door.

At the same moment it was flung open rather violently upon its hinges, and a body of police-officers entered the cellar.

CHAPTER CCOXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS THAT DIFFICULTIES AND DANGERS THICKEN ABOUT HIM.

THE sudden advent of the police-officers into the cellar produced a very great amount of consternation and confusion, for a large proportion of its occupants were obnoxious to the law.

Accordingly there was an immediate tumult caused by every person in the place springing hastily to his feet.

Among so many Jack Sheppard certainly had some slight chance of escaping detection, but the chance was so slight a one that he felt it would never do to rely upon it.

"Order! order!" screamed one of the police-officers, who doubtless had command of the expedition. "Order! order! You have no call to feel alarmed, I only want one person, and when you have given him up the remainder of you will be unmolested."

The officer succeeded, by straining his lungs to the utmost, in making himself heard by the motley crew, and something approaching a silence now ensued.

"Order! order!" cried the officer again.

"Who do you want?" growled a chorus of gruff voices.

The officer paused a moment in order that his reply might come with full effect, and then he said:

"I want Jack Sheppard!"

The pronunciation of this name had a visible effect upon all those present.

Each one looked narrowly into the countenances of those who stood near him.

"A ten-pound note!" continued the officer; "I will give a ten-pound note to anyone who detects him!"

An immediate bustle ensued as soon as this order was given, but by degrees all became calm again.

"Well," said the officer, "where is he?"

There was no reply.

He repeated his question rather angrily.

"It's my belief he is not here at all. I should say this was about the last place he would poke his head into. I am almost sure he is not here."

"And who are you?" asked the officer, addressing the man who had just spoken.

"The landlord."

"Of the cellar?"

"Yes."

"Oh, indeed! Wright and Clark!"

"Yes, sir," replied two police-officers, standing forward.

"Take that man into custody," continued their superior; "and see that you keep him safe. He knows a great deal too much."

"But here, I say, mister!" vociferated the landlord, as soon as he found himself seized by the officers—"I say, mister, what have I gone and done, to be took prisoner?"

"I suspect you of harbouring and abetting a felon, to wit, Jack Sheppard, and it is my duty to keep you secure!"

"I, indeed!" said the landlord, in a rage. "Then I wish I had bit my d—d tongue off before I said a word!"

"Now!" cried the officer to the remainder of the company, who looked upon the prompt arrest of the landlord with far from comfortable feelings—"now just listen to me! I have very good reasons for believing that Jack Sheppard is in this place, and I intend to have him. There is only one way that the affair can be settled to my satisfaction, and I should advise you not to attempt any kind of resistance, because if you do, it will be all the worse for you!"

"What do you want us to do?" asked a voice.

"Something very simple!"

"Let's hear it then?"

"I want you to walk out into the street one by one, and stay there until the cellar is empty, and then you can return, and remain unmolested as long as you like. I tell you all this. It don't matter to me the toss up of a button who's here to-night. I want Jack Sheppard, and no one else, and everyone but him will be allowed to pass by!"

The officer acted very wisely in announcing his intentions in this manner, for the company generally rather shrunk from too close a scrutiny by the police-officers.

"Here am I!" said a man; "I'll make the first, and the sooner you all follow my example the sooner we shall be able to sit down in peace again!"

"Very true!" said the chief police-officer, who satisfied himself by a glance that this man, let him be whom he might, was most certainly not Jack Sheppard. "Very true! Pass on!"

The man thus addressed ascended the steps, and in another moment stood in the street just outside.

Seeing this man allowed to depart freely, and without hindrance, seemed to have an encouraging effect upon the rest, for another stepped forward, and then another.

The chief police-officer was well acquainted with the person of Jack Sheppard, and felt sure he should be able to recognise him, no matter how he might be disguised.

In most cases the slightest examination was sufficient for his purpose.

The place thinned very quickly, for all struggled towards the steps, being fearful, if they hung back, that suspicion would fall upon them.

In a very short space of time, then, the cellar was empty. No capture had been made.

The officer was certain that Jack Sheppard had not passed him.

A glance was sufficient to show that he was not in the now deserted cellar.

The officer stamped his foot with vexation.

A search in this cellar was his last hope, and it appeared to have failed him utterly.

He had lost sight of Jack, and had pursued various directions, but without succeeding in perceiving the object of his search.

Despairing altogether of effecting his purpose, he resolved to make one more attempt, and that was to search the cellar.

We have seen how the search resulted.

Jack Sheppard's disappearance, unaccountable as it may seem, is easily explained.

The officer, when the cellar was empty, made his way into it, and one of his subordinates, desirous of exhibiting his cleverness, looked under the tables and benches, thinking there was a chance that Jack had concealed himself in some such place.

But he found no trace of what he sought.

Suddenly he uttered a cry which had the effect of immediately attracting the attention of his comrades and the officer in command.

The latter saw in an instant what had caused the utterance of the cry, and sprang forward with a shout of anger.

"This is the secret!" he cried. "Look, here is a door! You may depend he passed through it at the first alarm! And who is to tell where he is now?"

"We shall have him, sir—never fear!" replied one of his men. "You forget that this place is so well surrounded that he cannot leave without being seen!"

"True—true! I had for the moment forgotten that important circumstance. Follow me, and we shall soon see where he is!"

The officer sprang to the door as he spoke, and attempted to open it.

But it was fast.

"Down with it!" he cried. "Down with it! Our passage must not be stayed by a door!"

As he spoke, he himself set the example of flinging his body against the door.

It shook before the blow, but did not give way.

Another rush, however, did the business.

The police-officers now found themselves at the foot of a flight of steps, which led upwards in a spiral direction.

They ascended these without hesitation, and quickly arrived at the top.

Here they looked around them, and then opened a door.

They found themselves in a room which, in contrast with the steps, seemed to be one blaze of light.

The first glance showed them what this place was.

It was the bar where the requisite liquors for those below could be obtained.

The room was empty, and the police-officers immediately made their way to a door that led out into the passage.

Just as one put his hand upon the knob, however, a loud shout came from the outside of the building.

"They have found him!" cried the chief officer. "Forward, and the reward will yet be ours!"

The men uttered a cry of gratification, and made their way, as well as they could judge, towards the spot from whence the sound had come.

They soon ceased to have any doubts upon this point, for the uproar continued and appeared to increase.

Before, however, we will follow the officers any further, we will return to Jack Sheppard and relate his proceedings.

When the officers, then, burst into the cellar, Jack, in common with the rest, sprang hurriedly to his feet.

He had had his eye fixed for some time upon a door close by, through which, he observed, the waiters continually passed.

"That must lead somewhere," he muttered, "and should occasion arise, I will pop through!"

He came to the determination just in time, for immediately afterwards the officers appeared.

In the general scene of confusion which ensued, Jack found it the easiest matter in the world to slip through the door unperceived.

Attention was universally directed towards the officers.

Upon passing through the door, Jack's first care was to pass his hand down the edge of it in order to ascertain whether it had any fastenings upon that side or not.

His hand almost immediately encountered a bolt, which he shot into its socket.

There was another bolt near the bottom of the door, and this he treated in the same manner.

Then, having assured himself that he had covered his retreat, he turned round and perceived the flight of steps.

He listened.

No sound, however, came from above, and so, as light as foot could fall, he slipped up the stairs.

Upon reaching the top he paused again and listened.

The low murmur of voices struck upon his ear, and, looking straight before him, he could perceive the outline of a door which was made visible by a bright line of light appearing all around it.

That this door led into a room, and that the murmur of voices came from some persons in that room was an easily-formed supposition.

Jack now found himself very awkwardly situated.

He could not tell how soon the officers might attack the little door at the bottom of the steps, which the reader will admit was but a poor defence against his foes.

To open the door close to which he stood was, however, by far too dangerous to be thought of.

And so, in a state of mind which we will not attempt to describe, Jack stood at the top of the flight of steps, listening intently to every sound.

He was surprised that he heard nothing of the officers, though he would have ceased to wonder had he been aware of what was really taking place.

Such a thing, however, never for a moment entered his thoughts.

Presently, however, the murmuring of voices ceased, and the sound of footsteps succeeded.

Then a door was closed, after which all was silent, and Jack began to indulge in the hope that the room, or whatever the place was, on the other side of the door was vacant.

He listened.

Finding all was still, he slowly and silently turned the handle round until the latch was raised, and then opened the door to the extent of about half an inch.

He could see nothing, nor was any notice taken of the opening of the door.

This confirmed him in his idea that the room had been left.

After waiting a moment, for he was fearful of ruining all by any undue precipitation, he opened the door wider, and perceiving there was no one in sight, he crossed the threshold and closed the door behind him.

CHAPTER CCCCXVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS A NOVEL HIDING PLACE FROM HIS PURSUERS.

PANTING and breathless with excitement, Jack Sheppard stood within this room.

With one hand he grasped the knob of the door which he had just closed, and with his body bent forward, and an anxious look upon his face, he listened for any sounds which would indicate the approach of his foes.

But all was still.

No sound came from below or from around him.

Re-assured, Jack crossed the bar in the direction of the only door he could see.

Opening this he emerged into a passage, but where this said passage led he had no very clear idea.

He glided along it for a few feet, and then he was startled by some one approaching.

He glanced around him for some place of concealment, and by good luck he found he was standing at the foot of a flight of stairs, which, from their appearance, seemed to lead up to the bedrooms of the house.

This staircase Jack did not hesitate to ascend.

He sprang up three steps at a time, and without making a scarcely audible sound.

Just as he reached the top, however, he saw some one pass the foot, and then a door slammed, which made him fancy that the person he had just seen had entered the bar.

He congratulated himself upon his narrow escape.

Had he lingered in the bar or entered it a moment later than he did, he would have been discovered.

An anxious question now obtruded itself upon his consideration.

What was he to do?

How was he to escape?

It would not do to remain where he then was.

The officers would search the house from top to bottom, and he would be discovered if he attempted to conceal himself.

Then, in all probability, the house was well watched and surrounded, so that the moment he made his appearance on the outside, he would be pounced upon and made prisoner before he had even a chance of getting away.

What, then, was he to do?

He pressed his hands over his temples, and sat down on the top of the stairs in deep and anxious thought.

"I see but one chance!" he said—"only one chance, and that is a desperate one, for I am wholly ignorant of the interior arrangements of the house! Nevertheless, it must be tried, and that at once, or it will fail me!"

Jack rose quickly to his feet as he half muttered these words.

What it was that he intended to do will very quickly be seen.

The top of the stairs was profoundly dark, and Jack had no other guide for his progress than that afforded him by his hands.

With these outstretched before him, he crossed a landing, feeling carefully about him for the flight of stairs above.

He was not long finding these, and taking bold of the bannister, he mounted quickly enough, and with much less trouble than he had done before, for he had ascertained the shape and construction of the staircase, he ascended the next flight.

In this way he continued until he reached the top of the house.

A faint gleam of light, which came through a small window on this top landing, enabled him to indistinctly see about him.

He looked up, and saw, in the white ceiling above his head, a black patch which pointed out the position of the trap-door which led out on to the tiles.

In London, few houses are to be found without these trap-doors, their use being to enable the inmates to reach the roof in case of fire, and when the staircases might have been impracticable.

Jack had fully expected to find one of these trap-doors, and this calculation was shown to be a correct one.

The first thing he did, however, was to grope round and round for the short ladder by which the trap-door could be reached.

He found this reared up against the wall.

Easily enough he moved it, placed it in its required position, and then ascended.

The construction of these trap-doors does not differ much, and so, although it was dark, Jack had no trouble in undoing the fastenings of this one.

Raising it up, he crept out on to the tiles, taking the precaution to pull the ladder after him.

He did this in order to make it as difficult a matter as possible for the officers to follow him, and because the ladder might be of service to him in getting from one house to another.

The plan Jack had formed was a very good one.

It was to make his way over the house-tops with all speed possible, until he got to a distance, and then to enter another house, and so make his way into the street.

If he could manage this without having the officers too close at his heels, he had strong hopes that he would be able to make his escape.

Thus stimulated to make all possible exertions, Jack crept down the slanting portion of the roof, until he reached the gutter, which was defended by a low parapet.

A feeling of curiosity which he could not repress induced him to look over.

That was an unfortunate act, and it would have been well for him if he had resisted the inclination.

A loud shout came from below, which told him in a moment that he was seen.

A curse came from his lips, and so greatly was he enraged, that he seized the ladder with both hands, and flung it with full force down upon the people who he could see were collected there.

Without waiting to see the effect of this, he hurried over the roofs with more speed than was consistent with safety.

But he was reckless now, and almost despaired of being able to make his escape at all.

This, then, was the shout which struck upon the ears of the chief officer and his party when they emerged into the passage.

Of course they could not tell what was the cause of it, and the only thing they could do was to make their way to the spot from whence the sound emanated.

Upon arriving here and learning that Jack Sheppard had been seen on the roof, they felt much enraged, as they ought to have ascended the stairs at once.

However, the chief officer fancied that it was not yet too late to effect his purpose, and resolved to make the best of a bad job.

Accordingly, he gave instructions that the alarm should be spread, so that the inhabitants of the various houses should be on their guard against the intruder, and then, at the head of his men, he dashed back into the house, and ascended the stairs.

Some delay took place in reaching the trap-door in consequence of Jack having removed the ladder, but a substitute was formed by placing a chair on a table, both of which articles of furniture they dragged out of the nearest bedroom.

When the chair and table were thus placed, it was the easiest matter in the world to reach the trap-door, and in another moment the whole party was standing on the roof.

The officer looked about him, but could see nothing of the fugitive, and had it not been for the people in the street below, he would have been at a loss which way to turn.

From them, however, he learned by signs which way the fugitive had gone, and he commenced the pursuit in good earnest.

Still he could see nothing of Jack, nor did any open garret window seem to point to the fact that he had sought shelter in one of the houses.

A roaring sound came from the street below, and from time to time the officers looked over the parapet in order to ascertain the state of affairs.

Nothing could be learned, however, beyond the fact that the fugitive had not been seen.

Suddenly the police-officers were compelled to come to a halt.

Before them there was a chasm of such a tremendous width, that it was out of the question to think that the fugitive had crossed it.

He had either entered one of the houses or else they had passed him on the roofs.

This latter contingency was not entertained for a moment, for the officers had one and all taken special pains to guard against it.

They adopted the former supposition without the least hesitation, but felt it would be no easy task to ascertain into which of the houses it was that he had penetrated.

Leaving them thus engaged, we will return to Jack Sheppard.

His first burst of rage at being seen was quickly over.

His recklessness ceased, indeed, when he made a false step and rolled down the rough tiles.

Had it not been for the low parapet, against which his body went with considerable force, he would have rolled down into the street.

As it was he saved this.

Scrambling to his feet he placed his hand with a puzzled expression, to his brow, and wondered what he had better do next.

The exigency of his position quickened his invention.

"Yes, yes!" he said. "In another moment, or less, they will be here, and then what shall I do? The alarm will be spread. The inhabitants of every house will be on the look-out for me. The moment I enter one I shall be seized, or at any rate, I shall find it impossible to gain the street. Let me think—what can I do? I know. I must hide somewhere, and let the officers pass me when they come out upon the roof, and then double upon my steps and so escape. But where shall I hide, that is the question?"

That was, indeed, the question, and one that it was very hard to find an answer to.

Jack looked around him thoughtfully.

At length his eyes rested upon a chimney, the height of which was but a few feet above the tiles.

"I think that will do," he said; "it must do, in fact, for I can see no other place. Here goes, then, for it will be a desperate venture!"

As he spoke these words, Jack Sheppard crept on his hands and knees towards the chimney.

Then as soon as he reached it he rose up slowly, so that the shadow which it cast was sufficient to hide him from the observation of the watchers in the street, if any should happen to have their eyes directed towards that particular spot.

The mouth of the chimney was a good size.

Jack looked down with a misgiving air.

Fearing, however, each moment to see the officers appear upon the roof, when all hope of hiding himself would be at an end, he hastened to execute his intention, though it was easy to see it was repugnant to him.

Raising himself up, Jack gradually got to a sitting position on the top of the chimney.

A turn of his body now enabled him to drop his feet and legs into it.

Then seizing the edge of the brickwork with his hands, he gradually lowered himself into the chimney until not a sign of him could be seen.

He displaced the soot in rather large quantities—indeed, he was half choked by it.

Jack's intention was to remain here holding the edge of the chimney until the officers went by.

Then, as soon as they had passed, he would draw himself up, get on the tiles again, and then creep stealthily along the roof, in a direction just opposite to that taken by his foes.

Jack Sheppard had fully expected that he would have to remain all the time holding by his hands, and he doubted whether his strength would suffice for this.

By accident, however, he struck his foot against something which he found was a projection in the wall of the chimney.

Upon this he was able to place his feet, and support his body by pressing his back against the wall.

CHAPTER CCCCIX.

JACK SHEPPARD SEEKS REFUGE AT THE LITTLE PUBLIC-HOUSE IN RUPERT STREET.

It was fortunate for Jack that he made this discovery, for even had he possessed sufficient strength in his arms and fingers to hang thus for a length of time, it is highly probable that the exertion would have so exhausted him as to make it impossible for him to pull himself up.

Now, however, there would not be much trouble, and he remained contentedly enough listening for the approach of his foes.

He was not kept long in suspense.

Ere long, he heard unmistakeable sounds, which indicated the presence of the officers upon the roof.

He listened intently, for he had no other sense to guide him.

The trampling of feet came nearer and nearer, until they reached the chimney.

Jack felt pretty well at his ease.

Even if the officers were curious enough to peep down the chimney, he had little doubt of eluding their observation, for, of course, the interior was a uniform mass of black.

No such thing, however, was attempted, and in less than a moment he had the satisfaction of hearing their retreating footsteps.

He waited until he thought they were far enough off, and then he set about leaving his unpleasant hiding-place.

He drew himself up until he could just see over the top of the chimney, and then he paused and gazed about him.

All was well.

The officers were at a distance, and busily engaged in exploring the roof.

Cautiously and stealthily Jack drew himself up higher, until at length he reached the tiles again.

Crouching down, then, so as to avoid the possibility of his body being seen by anyone in the street below, Jack crept along the gutter.

He was consoled by the thought that each step took him further and further from his enemies.

After going some distance, he came to a halt, determined, without further loss of time to make a descent into the street.

Could he succeed in doing this, he had strong hopes he should be able to achieve a complete escape.

There was no easier means of reaching the street than to look out for some unfastened garret-window, through which he could pass, and so descend the stairs, and walk out either of the front or back-door, as circumstances might render expedient.

This, then, was the course which he resolved to adopt.

Fortune favoured him so far that the second garret-window he came to yielded to his touch.

To spring into the room, and close the window behind him was the work of but a moment merely.

The attic into which he had intruded was empty.

The fact of the window being unfastened was almost a sufficient guarantee of this, and so, as noiselessly as a ghost, Jack stole to the door, and leaned over the banisters to listen for any sounds of alarm.

But all was profoundly still, and this was nothing to be surprised at, for the hour was one when most people had retired to rest.

The inhabitants of that house were doubtless all wrapped in slumber, and, acting upon this supposition, Jack descended the stairs as swiftly as was consonant with security and silence.

No alarm was given, and at length, to his inexpressible satisfaction, the bottom of the stairs was reached without a soul in the house having been disturbed.

All that now remained for Jack to do in order to perfect his escape, was to leave the house unperceived.

This was by far the most difficult part of the enterprise.

If he was seen, all his previous success would go for naught.

A light would have been of the greatest service at this juncture, but he had not one, and so he was obliged to grope his way in the best way he could.

After some trouble he succeeded in finding the front door.

It was fastened in a complicated manner, but by exercising his patience he was enabled to undo them all silently.

Cautiously and hesitatingly he opened the door and peeped out.

The street was silent and deserted.

The door was defended by some kind of porch or portico, and the shadow of this Jack thought would conceal him when he emerged.

He opened the door no wider than was necessary to allow the passage of his body, and closed it silently after him.

As he expected, the shadow of the porch was quite sufficient to conceal him, and from this place he looked out.

Some little distance down on his right hand, he saw a dim, undefined mass of something.

This was a crowd of people, and from them came that strange roaring sound which is always audible when a multitude assemble.

Jack needed nothing more to guide him in the direction he had to go.

Keeping close in the shadow of the houses, and looking cautiously around him whenever a lighter spot than usual in his path had to be crossed, he took his way westward, for he was anxious to reach the cave where he had left Blueskin before day dawned.

So far as he could tell, he had stolen away unseen.

He could see no signs of his pursuers, and he was not aware that he left any track behind.

As he increased his distance from the scene of the late events, so did he increase his pace until he went forward.

No. 83.—BLUESKIN.

Suddenly, however, he reeled, and almost fell to the ground.

By a strong effort he recovered himself, but for a moment or so, he was quite unable to proceed.

"I am exhausted!" he murmured. "Many hours have elapsed since I either satisfied hunger or thirst, and I have recently made some tremendous exertions! What am I to do? I cannot go further without first obtaining some refreshment, and where is there that I can obtain it?"

Jack looked all around him as he asked himself this question, and then he exclaimed:

"How fortunate! Why this is Soho! And now I recollect there is an old woman I knew in happier days, who keeps a public-house somewhere close at hand! I will go to her at once—no doubt she will give me the refreshment I require! Let me think a moment! It is in Rupert Street!"

From this thoroughfare Jack was not very far distant, and he immediately bent his steps in that direction.

The hope of being able to procure what he required lent him strength to go with increased speed, and ere many moments had elapsed he arrived at his destination.

He had scarcely expected to find the house open, and he was proportionably joyful when he saw the door ajar and a dim light in the interior.

He entered without hesitation, and walked straight up to the bar, the position of which was well known to him, for he had been in the house many times before.

The landlady was sitting in a crouching attitude over the fire, but upon his entrance she rose to her feet.

Jack forgot, at the moment, how changed his personal appearance was, and he felt surprised that the old woman should not recognise him.

Recollecting himself, however, the next moment, he asked for some refreshment.

A customer was almost a novelty at the poor widow's house, and with great obsequiousness she showed Jack into a very comfortable tap-room.

Here Jack seated himself, and in a little while the landlady placed on the table a plain though very tempting repast, together with some ale of first-rate quality.

While thus engaged, she endeavoured to enter into conversation with Jack, who, it was clear, she failed to recognise.

She did this, probably, with a view of making herself agreeable to her visitor, or else it was because she was naturally of a loquacious disposition, and was pleased beyond measure when she had anyone to talk to.

"I s'pose you've heard about what has taken place at Tyburn this morning, when Blueskin was to have been hanged?"

"I have heard something about it."

"Of course you have. Who is there in London that hasn't?"

"Very few, I suppose."

"I never knew so much talk about anything in all my life. Whatever do you think of Jack Sheppard?"

"Who—I?" asked Jack, who was for a moment nonplussed by this question. "Oh, I don't know! I should like to hear your opinion."

The landlady shook her head.

"Ah!" she said, "I can't help feeling sorry!"

"Sorry for whom?"

"Jack Sheppard."

"Indeed?"

"Ah yes, sir! I can recollect him when he was a mere child. He has been here many and many a time!"

"You surprise me!" said Sheppard, who resolved not to declare himself at present.

"But it's a case with him, I believe. He has escaped from Newgate, it is true, but the officers will soon have him again!"

"What makes you think so?"

"Oh, I have heard that every effort will be made to secure his apprehension."

"But he may leave England."

"Ah, no, sir! There is no fear of that. Not a ship is allowed to leave England without first being examined; so you see he is in prison even now, although his prison is a large one."

"It is," said Jack; "and so you think he will be captured?"

"I have little doubt of it; but I shall be really sorry for him, poor young man! I believe myself that it is more Jonathan Wild's fault than his own."

"I have heard the same thing."

"It is true, no doubt. A dreadful wretch is that Jonathan Wild."

"I quite agree with you—he is. But now, what should you think was Jack Sheppard's chief danger?"

"Chief danger?"

"Yes."

"I don't quite understand you, sir."

"Why, which would be the most likely cause of his being apprehended?"

"I really don't know; what do you think?"

"Well, in my opinion the chief peril he has to guard against is treachery."

"Treachery?"

"Yes, treachery! For instance, he might put faith in some person who did not know him, and declare himself, and then be betrayed by that person to the police."

"But that would be base."

"I grant you it would—very base; but then, in a general way, people are not very particular in such matters."

"You are quite right, sir."

"Cannot you see that it would indeed be a terrible danger if he was betrayed to his foes?"

"I can quite understand it, sir; and all I can say is, that those persons who would act in such a manner ought to—to—I don't know what they would deserve!"

Jack smiled at the landlady's earnestness.

"Then you would not betray him, I suppose?"

"Who—I? Do you wish to insult me, sir?"

"By no means—by no means! Quite the reverse, I assure you!"

"Then what did you ask such a thing for? Me betray him? No, no—and I hope a curse will fall on those who do!"

"And so do I; and, to prove to you that I fully believe you are in earnest, I will simply say that I am Jack Sheppard!"

CHAPTER CCCC.

THE POLICE-OFFICERS FOLLOW HARD UPON THE TRACK OF JACK SHEPPARD.

THIS was a revelation which the landlady was not at all prepared for, and she opened her eyes to quite a preternatural extent, and gasped once or twice for breath.

Jack Sheppard had discovered himself because he fully believed that he would be likely to secure his own safety by doing so.

He could not tell what might happen in the course of the next few moments, and it might be of service to him if the landlady knew who he really was.

Observing her astonishment, he continued:

"Yes, I am indeed Jack Sheppard! I know I can trust you, and so I declared myself. I thought you would have recognised me, but I have much altered."

"You have indeed!" said the landlady, recovering herself. "Well, dear me, who would have thought of such a thing? I had no idea who you were, though I fancied the voice was familiar to me!"

"Your ears did not deceive you."

"Oh, I know you now, fast enough! Ah, Jack! I little thought that things would ever come to such a pass as this."

"Nor did I. But, come! Never mind the past. What's done can't be helped, and what now remains for me to do is to seek safety by flight."

"You know what I told you just now."

"Oh, yes! I know all about that; but still, I think I shall be able to elude their vigilance, and in another land I shall find that rest and repose which I have never known here."

"But how is it," asked the landlady, "that you are here? Here, in the very heart of London! How is it that you do not seek to find safety in flight?"

"That is too long a story to tell now," said Jack. "Let it suffice for me to say that circumstances will not permit me to leave London just at present."

The landlady shook her head.

"Ah, then," she said, "it will indeed be all over with you! Such close search is being made for you in all directions that you cannot possibly for long withstand detection."

"We shall see."

"We shall! But you are in great danger even here."

"Here?"

"Yes."

"In what way?"

"It is a mystery to me how you have entered unseen."

"Is the house watched, then?"

"I fear so."

"But how?"

"That is more than I can tell you."

"How do you know it?"

"The officers have been here several times."

"This is most serious!" cried Jack, starting to his feet; "I had no idea I was in such peril!"

"I speak true."

"I do not doubt you for a moment. Still, I am at a loss to think why this house should be watched."

"Perhaps they fancied you would come here."

"But what grounds could they have for thinking such a thing?"

"That is more than I can tell; but probably they are aware that in former times you paid visits here."

"Ah, I see now!"

"And you may depend upon it," continued the landlady, "that any place which has ever been visited by you will be very closely watched indeed, in the hope that you may turn up."

"You are right. Still, I have reached here in safety."

"But you do not know how long you may remain safe."

"True!"

"The officers even now may be meditating an attack upon this place, and have lingered thus long in order to take effectual means to accomplish their end!"

This was not only a very probable supposition of the landlady's, but it was a very alarming one too.

"It seems," said Jack, "that this is about the last place I ought to have shown my face in."

"The very last, though, rely upon it, a close watch is kept upon every house where you have once been known to be."

"No doubt of it, and I shall therefore be careful to avoid them. But I must ask you to render me a service."

"What is it? You have only to name it for it to be performed."

"Thanks—thanks!"

"What is it you wish me to do?"

"To go to the front door and try whether you can ascertain anything concerning the proceedings of the police officers."

"Gladly—gladly! It may be that they have given over their watch upon this place, and if so, all will be well."

"I should be glad to hear that they have done so."

"I will go and see."

"Do so—do so at once; and, above all things, be careful not to excite suspicion!"

"I will, you may depend!"

With these words the landlady quitted the room, leaving Jack in a far from comfortable frame of mind.

Anxiously—most anxiously—did he listen to every sound, and await her return with nervous impatience.

He shuddered when he thought of the frightful risk he had run by venturing into that place.

But he had escaped, and might he not reasonably enough augur from this that he would be able to escape a second time?

He could not feel very comfortable about it either, for he well knew that it was one thing to enter a place and another to leave it.

The first the officers would probably allow him to do readily enough, while it was likely they would resist the other with all the power they possessed.

This was what Jack dreaded, and very reasonably too.

A few minutes only elapsed until the landlady returned, but the term of her absence really seemed to be an age.

"Well?" asked Jack, impatiently, the moment she made her appearance.

"It is not well, but the reverse."

"What has happened?"

"Nothing—nothing!"

"What have you seen?"

"Why, quite enough to convince me that this house is watched more closely than ever."

"Is it possible?"

"It is quite true. I distinctly saw several police-officers hovering about."

"But what can be their object in doing that? If they fancy I am here, why do they not come in and see?"

"I cannot tell you that, Jack," replied the landlady; "you ought to be able to understand the movements of your foes the best."

"Yes, yes—I ought! Wait a moment! Let me think!"

As he spoke these words, Jack Sheppard clasped his hands tightly over his face and strove to arrive at some conclusion concerning the movements of his enemies.

"I cannot tell," he said, at length. "It may be that they think of effecting their capture more easily by giving no alarm, and pouncing upon me the moment I go out."

"That might be their motive; but I don't think it is."

"What is your opinion, then?"

"I fancy that they have set a good watch while one has gone off for reinforcements, so that when the attack is made it shall be effectual."

"By heaven, you are right! I am sure that is it!"

"Oh, Jack—Jack! what will you do? I am afraid it is all over with you!"

"No, no! have no such fear! I shall escape them, never fear—I shall escape them! Their extra carefulness will be the means of ensuring my safety!"

The landlady shook her head at this speech, as though to imply that she did not comprehend it.

But Jack took no notice of this.

"Listen to me!" he said; "pay attention for one moment—only one!"

"I am all attention, Jack!"

"But this is important!"

"Say on."

"Is there a yard at the back of this house?"

"No."

"No?" ejaculated Jack, with a tone of disappointment—"no? Are you sure you have no yard?"

"Of course!"

"I hoped you had."

"Why?"

"To escape."

"If there had been a yard, it would have been watched."

"I would have risked that! But tell me, are there not windows at the back of this house?"

"Yes, one."

"Where does it look out on to?"

"A court."

"What court?"

"Great Crown Court."

"Leading out of Wardour Street?"

"The same."

"Capital! That will do!"

"But you cannot leave the house that way!"

"Why not?"

"It will be watched."

"I will chance that!"

"Alas, Jack!" said the landlady, wiping her eyes with her apron—"I feel convinced that you will be captured! You cannot escape!"

"Nay, nay—do not be too sure of that! Dry your eyes, and show me the way to the window you spoke of!"

"Alas! alas!"

"Do not grieve, now, but be quick! Every moment is of the most vital importance! Lead the way to the window, or I shall have to find my way there myself."

"No, no—I will show you! This way! Ha! What is that?"

The landlady paused suddenly in the passage just outside the tap-room.

A loud knocking at the front door had come upon her ears.

"My foes!" cried Jack, between his clenched teeth. "Be quick, or it will be too late!"

"Come on, then! All is well for a moment—I have bolted the front door."

"I am glad you thought of that. But you must let the officers in; I cannot consent to allow you to get into trouble on my account."

"Never mind me—think only of yourself!"

"Where is the window?"

"There—there!"

"Where?"

"On the landing at the top of the stairs. Quick—quick, for your life!"

Jack Sheppard did not need any incitement.

As soon as he knew where the window was situated, he darted up the stairs at full speed.

Reaching the top, he paused a moment and looked back.

The landlady was still standing at the bottom.

"Open the door," he said; "I implore you to open the door!"

"I cannot!"

"But you must! If you do not, you will excite their suspicions! If you do, I shall escape unsuspected!"

Jack disappeared from the head of the stairs as he uttered these words.

CHAPTER CCCCII.

JACK SHEPPARD MAKES HIS ESCAPE FROM THE PUBLIC-HOUSE IN RUPERT STREET, AND AT LENGTH SUCCEEDS IN REACHING THE LITTLE WOOD.

THE landlady happened to be possessed of a tolerable amount of common sense, as several of her remarks would fully intimate, and fortunately she now saw that the best thing she could do was to obey Jack's commands.

Accordingly, when he disappeared with the intention of escaping from the window, she turned round and walked towards the front door.

The knocking still continued with very great violence. The police-officers were, doubtless, much enraged that admittance should be denied them.

"Who's there?" asked the landlady, in a shrill voice.

"Is it fire—or what?"

"Open—open!"

"I dare say—to a lot of thieves, perhaps!"

"Oh, that won't do! We are police-officers, and you know that well enough! Open your door! I command you in the name of his most gracious majesty the King!"

"If you are officers, all right enough; I will let you in in a moment."

"Then why did you not do so at first?"

"Because I came to the door as soon as I could."

As she uttered these words, the landlady withdrew the bolts, and the moment she did so the door was dashed open, and the police officers entered in a tumultuous throng.

The landlady shrank back, hoping in the confusion to escape all observation.

But in this she was disappointed.

An officer seized her rather roughly by the arm, and, as he did so, said:

"Come now, don't let's have any more bother, but tell me at once where he is!"

"He? Who?" asked the landlady, affecting, to admiration, not to understand him.

"None of your gammon—I mean Jack Sheppard! It's no good your saying he ain't here, because he is! He was watched in, and it is quite certain he has not left; so what do you say to that?"

"Nothing."

The officer was about to say something in a very angry tone, if one might judge by the expression of his countenance, but he was interrupted by one of his companions, who said:

"Come on—come on! Never mind that old woman—you won't get anything out of her! All she will do will be to hinder you as much as possible, so as to give our man a better chance to escape!"

"You are right! Forward, all of you! But beware!" he added, turning menacingly towards the landlady—"beware!"

"Fiddle-de-dee!"

The house was a small one, and it did not take the officers long to search the ground-floor.

Having done this thoroughly, they ascended the stairs. Upon reaching the top, the first thing they noticed was a current of cold air.

They rushed towards the window.

It was open.

They looked out, but could see nothing but darkness.

The distance to the ground was considerable.

There was nothing to guide them to the conclusion that the prisoner had escaped by this means, save the bare fact of the window being open.

What was below them they knew not, nor was there anything to show how he had accomplished his descent.

Nevertheless, one of the police-officers, in a voice of extreme vexation, said:

"He has escaped! I will lay my life upon it he has escaped! Where on earth does this window lead to?"

"I don't know—and yet it's d—d odd to me if that is not Great Crown Court! If it is, you may depend he has dropped into it, and is far enough off by this time!"

"Follow him, then—follow him!"

"Don't you wish you may get it! I fancy I see myself hopping about with a broken leg!"

"Let us go down, then, and find out where this window really does look on to! You go all of you, and I will remain at the window, and you will know then whether you have got to the right place."

The others immediately took their departure.

They were greatly chagrined at Jack's escape, for on this occasion they had taken so many precautions, that they made sure of capturing him.

The fact that a window in the back of the house overlooked Great Crown Court had escaped their notice.

They were not long in making their way round, and the one who had stationed himself at the window quickly heard the sounds of their approaching footsteps.

"Hallo!" he cried—"what place is it?"

"Great Crown Court!"

"Have you seen anything of him?"

"Nothing at all!"

"Curses on this chance! I made sure of having him this time!"

"We must hope for better luck!"

"How far is it to the ground?"

"A goodish way!"

Upon hearing this the officer shrunk back, for he had contemplated saving himself the trouble of going round by dropping through the window.

"I think it's very likely he has hurt himself!" said a voice from below—"it's a precious long way to fall, and there's some very orkard stones about!"

"Then there is hope yet!" cried the officer at the window. "If we are quick, we shall perhaps succeed in overtaking him."

There was some slight hope in this, so the officer ran downstairs and out of the house, without troubling about the landlady.

He joined his companions at the corner of Wardour Street.

But here they were compelled to pause in doubt.

There was not the ghost of a trace to show them which of the many turnings the fugitive had taken.

He was already out of hearing, and it was quite madness to think of looking for him in the wilderness of streets of which Soho is composed.

They were obliged to content themselves with the somewhat meagre and unsatisfactory consolation that ere long he would fall foul of some other party of officers.

Leaving them to get over their disappointment as well as they are able, we will turn to Jack Sheppard, who had not got off so easily as it might appear.

Having spoken to the landlady in the manner we have recorded, he dashed across the landing towards the window of which the landlady had spoken, and the position of which was quite apparent in consequence of the dull light that came through it.

To open it was the work of a moment.

He glanced out, and then for the first time he wondered how far it was to the ground.

He regretted that he had been so thoughtless as not to obtain this piece of information from the landlady.

It was no use thinking of that now.

He looked out, and strained his vision to the utmost, in the hope of being able to form some estimate of the distance.

It might be so great as to render a fall from it impossible without sustaining severe injuries.

An uncomfortable feeling came over his heart, and he fancied he was on the brink of some very great danger indeed.

His hesitation was quickly put an end to by the sounds which came from below.

These inspired him with a desperate and reckless kind of courage.

"Better, far better," he muttered, "to risk the fall than fall alive into the hands of the officers. It is my only chance. Ha, they come!"

The officers were now very close at hand, indeed, and Jack had no other resource than to get out of the window.

This he was not long doing, and gradually lowered his body until he hung at the full length of his arms by means of the tight grasp which he kept upon the window-sill.

While in this position he looked down, or rather endeavoured to do so.

But he could see nothing, not even his feet, so deep was the obscurity in which the narrow court was plunged.

With a sickly feeling about his heart, Jack slowly let go his hold.

He reached the ground with great violence and suddenness.

For a moment or so he lay without motion, and almost without sense.

All the breath seemed to have been driven out of his body.

Slowly, however, and painfully, too, he raised himself up.

He was some time in gaining a standing posture. When he did so he became aware that his left foot caused him intolerable pain.

He could scarcely bare to place it on the ground at all.

"I have sprained my ankle," he said. "I suppose I ought to be thankful that it is no worse, as it might easily have been. But what am I to do? I shall be pursued and, I fear, overtaken, for how can I possibly make any speed!"

Jack's position even now seemed to be a very critical one.

He was, however, fully impressed with the importance of removing from the spot where he then was, even if that removal was accomplished at the expense of a very great deal of pain.

Accordingly, he limped off as quickly as he could.

Upon reaching the corner of Wardour Street he paused to reconnoitre, but seeing no one, he hastened off with what speed he could make.

He was, however, rejoiced to find that his ankle was by no means so bad as he first thought it.

The pain had abated, though even now it was excruciating.

Still, he was able to place it upon the ground, and to make use of it.

He found, too, that as he went on using it the better it became, until, by the time he had emerged into the Oxford Road, he suffered only comparatively trifling inconvenience from it.

Still he had a long way to go to reach his destination, and already in the eastern horizon he could discover long beams of grey, misty light, which heralded the approach of the new day.

He crossed the Oxford Road, and breaking through the hedge on the opposite side, struck boldly across the fields.

He took his course almost in a straight line for his destination, only deviating from it when some insurmountable obstacle lay before him and compelled him to do so.

In spite of all his efforts, however, it was fairly daylight by the time he reached the little wood.

Ere he ventured to enter this, he looked scrutinizingly all about him, but without being able to see a single person.

Encouraged by this, he plunged among the trees.

A new difficulty now presented itself before him—one that he had not thought of until that moment.

He had not noticed the tree which covered the entrance to the cave with sufficient attention to enable him to distinguish it from the others.

How, then, was he to find it?

And even then he all at once recollected he should be at fault, for he knew not how to make the inhabitants of the cavern aware that he was on the outside, and awaiting to enter.

CHAPTER CCCCII.

IN WHICH A FORGOTTEN CHARACTER IS RE-PRESENTED TO THE READER.

At this juncture we think we cannot do better than take a glance at the state of affairs in Jonathan Wild's house.

The aspect of things is rather peculiar.

The person who first claims our attention is the thief-taker himself.

Despite the injuries he had received and the excitement he had undergone, Jonathan Wild was slowly but surely getting better.

It was a dreadful moment, however, when he became aware that Blueskin, at the eleventh hour, had escaped from Tyburn.

Nothing would calm his terrible and impotent rage, nor did he grow calm until absolute exhaustion compelled him to be.

It was then that he began to reflect that he was taking very great pains to retard his recovery, and he resolved that he would, for the future, put a bridle upon himself, and pay greater attention to the advice of the apothecary.

He could not avoid coming to the conclusion that if he had been out and about, these vexatious occurrences would not have taken place.

By this time he told himself Blueskin and Jack Sheppard would no longer have existed as obstacles to his schemes.

It was no good groaning and lamenting about the past, however.

What he had got to do was to remedy the present state of things.

Clearly, then, it was necessary that he should get better—that he should become himself once more.

Then, and not till then, did he feel that his schemes of vengeance would be carried out.

Accordingly he assumed a calmness which he was far, very far from feeling.

Still it was beneficial, and an improvement soon began to manifest itself.

Jonathan Wild made the most extravagant promises to Mr. Snoxall if he would get him well by a certain time.

On such occasions the apothecary, with a view of quieting his patient, would tell him that all was progressing favourably, and that he would soon be well.

Then he would add a caution about the danger of trying his strength too soon.

And so, like a captive lion, Jonathan Wild chafed and fretted in his bed-chamber, though every morning he could tell that he was much better than he had been on the preceding night.

So much for the thief-taker.

We will turn now to another inmate of that gloomy abode in Newgate Street, one in whom it is presumed the reader feels a much greater degree of interest.

We allude to Edgworth Bess.

Poor, girl! Hers was an unhappy lot; and yet how happy a one it would have been had fate thrown her in the way of friends who possessed not merely the inclination, but the power to benefit her.

As it was, Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, although their intentions were good enough, in reality did her more harm than good, from the mere fact of their being unable to set about, in a proper manner, the task of effecting her restoration to her rights.

And then, in Jonathan Wild she had a powerful enemy—one who would not scruple to commit any deed, no matter how black, so long as it offered him a chance of effecting his purposes.

Alas! she is much to be pitied, for there appears, at present, no prospect of a termination of her persecutions.

In George Wild, the thief-taker's rascally son, she had an enemy more to be feared than even the thief-taker himself, for, in addition to all the evil qualities which his father possessed, he possessed a large amount of cunning, of which the other was deficient.

Between these two, what chance had poor Edgworth Bess!

In pursuance of the plan of action which he had chalked out for himself, and which his father's illness enabled him to execute with far greater ease and security than he had ever hoped for, George Wild continued to visit Edgworth Bess, and endeavour to persuade her that he was willing to be her friend, and assist her to escape, as well as to put her in the way of recovering her rights.

At first she had felt the greatest possible amount of distrust for George Wild, which feeling would have been invincible had she but known who he really was.

By slow degrees, however, Wild junior succeeded, in a great measure, in removing the unfavourable opinion she had formed against him.

And this is not to be wondered at, for truly was he one who, by his plausibility, would have been able to

"Sugar o'er the devil himself."

George Wild viewed his own progress with very great satisfaction.

The success he had gained did not tempt him into any precipitation.

If anything, he became more cautious than before.

Edgworth Bess at first fully believed in his good intentions, and looked forward to the time when he should come to speak to her with feelings of pleasurable impatience.

Then they would talk over their plans of future operations, when George Wild would tell her how easily she would be able to obtain possession of the estates.

Then the poor girl's heart would bound with joy, for with wealth at her own free disposal, how much good might she not do to Jack Sheppard and Blueskin.

Somehow or other, she shrunk from speaking about them to her companion.

"Patience—patience!" Wild junior would say, after leaving the poor girl each night, and rubbing his hands together as he spoke—"patience—patience, and I shall succeed! The scheme is almost ripe enough for action, but not quite. A little more patience, and then all will be well!"

Such, then, was the aspect of affairs in that quarter.

But there is another inhabitant of Jonathan Wild's house—one who, as no mention has been made of him for some time, the reader may have forgotten.

That was Steggs.

In him Edgworth Bess had a true and stanch friend—one who would do anything to serve her.

But that unlucky blow which Jack Sheppard struck him while blinded with passion had well nigh estranged him from her for ever.

However, as he lay upon his bed, hovering between death and life, he had ample opportunities of thinking over all that had occurred, and arriving at a correct conclusion upon the subject.

He saw clearly enough that Edgworth Bess was not to blame.

It was absurd to hold her responsible for a blow struck by Jack Sheppard while in such a state of excitement as not to be responsible for his own actions.

He determined, therefore, if he got better, to still continue a friend to her.

It may be that he was influenced in coming to this determination by the bitter hatred which he felt against Jonathan Wild.

It was a hate which could be obliterated in no other manner than by death.

The wound he had received was as near being a mortal one as any wound could possibly be.

But he had escaped injury to any vital part, and though his recovery was very slow indeed, yet he did get better.

Even after his wound had healed over, he was in such a dreadful state of weakness that some time would have to elapse before he would be strong enough even to walk about for any length of time.

We have before stated that the room in which he lay was next to the room which was occupied by Wild junior.

It was divided from it, not by a wall, but by a wooden partition, which had been put up long after the house had been built.

Originally there had been but one room with two windows in it.

This room was divided into two by the partition already mentioned, in such a manner that one window was allotted to each.

The miserable stump bedstead upon which Steggs lay was placed close up against this partition, so that he was able to hear, with tolerable distinctness, all that was said in the adjoining chamber.

This had interested him, and served to pass away more pleasantly many a lonely, weary hour, for he was visited in his sick chamber very rarely, and indeed, had it not been for the thoughtfulness and humanity of Mr. Snoxall, he would have perished.

In such a case, we can easily imagine how gladly he would avail himself of any opportunity of occupying his thoughts.

One day he found, close to the head of the bed, a knot in one of the panels of the partition.

The wood had dried and shrunk from round it, so that now the knot was partly loose.

It occurred to Steggs that if he could remove this knot, he would be able to see as well as hear what took place in the next apartment.

When once this thought took possession of his mind he set to work immediately to try whether the knot could be removed.

He was not long in effecting his purpose.

He took care, however, not to push the knot out into the next room, but to draw it towards him, so that he could replace or remove it at pleasure.

This he succeeded in doing, and then to his great satisfaction he found that the position of the hole was such that he was able to command a view of nearly the whole of the next room.

Wild junior would not have felt very comfortable if he had been made acquainted with the facts which have just been laid before the reader. It happened, however, that he remained without the slightest suspicion of anything of the kind.

Scarcely a night passed without Steggs removing the knot of wood and taking a peep at the interior.

One night he was rewarded for his trouble in a manner that he little dreamt of.

It was the night when Wild, junior, concealed the papers referring to the Donnull Estates, and without the possession of which Edgworth Bess would have great difficulty in establishing her claim.

At first Steggs did not know what these papers could be, but the stormy interviews between Wild junior and his parent, soon let him into the light of it.

He saw the care with which Wild junior secreted these precious documents underneath the floor; and while he was so engaged, Steggs took accurate notice of the exact position of the bit of flooring which he displaced.

"I will have those papers as soon as I am strong enough to take them!" he muttered; "and then I shall indeed be able to revenge myself upon Jonathan Wild!"

It will be seen that he was actuated more by this feeling than a desire to do good to Edgworth Bess.

For several days after the papers were hidden, Steggs made repeated trials of his strength, but he found himself unable to leave his bed.

He was in agony of dread lest the papers should be removed and placed somewhere out of his sight.

This was likely enough to happen, and it was decidedly best to lose no more time than he was compelled.

Wild junior however, seemed to think the hiding-place a good one, for he made no attempt to remove the papers for some time.

CHAPTER CCCCIII.

THE PACKET OF PAPERS RELATING TO THE DONNULL ESTATES IS CONSIGNED TO ANOTHER HIDING-PLACE.

ONE day, a long time after this, Wild junior came into his room and locked the door.

It was the day that had been appointed for the execution of Blueskin.

Steggs heard the door opened, and then locked, and he immediately removed the knot and peeped into the next room.

There stood Wild junior sure enough.

And now Steggs thought the time which he had so much dreaded had arrived.

Beyond all doubt Wild junior was about to remove the papers.

The opportunity which should have been seized was lost, for if he secreted the papers in some other part of the house, Steggs would stand but a poor chance of obtaining possession of them.

No words could portray the amount of anxiety with which Steggs watched all Wild junior's proceedings.

He was in a perfect fever of excitement.

The first words, however, that George Wild uttered, had the effect of reassuring him.

It was a strange habit that, Wild junior had of always half uttering his thoughts aloud when he was alone, though there are few persons who have not at some time or other, caught themselves uttering their thoughts aloud, and we suppose that this habit, like all others, soon increases.

"I have a good chance now!" Steggs heard Wild junior say—"a very good chance indeed! I don't know how it is, but I feel very uncomfortable about those d—d papers. However, I will just ease myself by taking a peep at them now! I need fear no interruption, the governor's safe enough,—ha! ha! ha!"

And this was the way the son expressed himself about the dangerous condition of his father.

Steggs was now considerably relieved, for he fancied that all George would do would be to satisfy himself by a glance that the papers were safe.

Producing the same instrument from his pocket, he soon raised the piece of planking by its aid, and then thrusting his hand into the cavity he drew forth the packet of papers.

The dust had already settled somewhat thickly upon them, and he knocked the packet on the floor to remove it. "Ah!" he said. "Here they are all safe enough. What a d—d fool I must have been to frighten myself about nothing! Let me see! I wonder, now, whether I had better put them back again, or whether I had better find some other hiding-place."

Wild junior paused to consider this point.

Steggs felt that the crisis had now arrived, and whether he should be able to obtain possession of the papers would be known to him in a very few moments.

"I think I had better put them back," said George Wild, presently. "It's a good hiding-place. The room has been searched once without their being found, and why remove them? I will put them back!"

Having come to this conclusion, Wild junior replaced the packet of papers, and restored the floor to its ordinary appearance.

This done, he left the room again, and Steggs heard him slowly ascend the stairs.

"Now for it," he said—"now for it! I must make the attempt at once. He has his suspicions already, though they are very vague and undefined. There is no knowing, though, how soon he may remove them. If I am not quick I shall lose my chance!"

Steggs was much stronger now than he had been, indeed he thought he was quite strong enough to perform the task which he had set himself.

After mature deliberation, he resolved to wait till night before he attempted the execution of this scheme.

Slowly and wearily the hours passed, until at length the darkness came.

One by one the various noises which could be heard within the thief-taker's residence during the day died away, until all was still.

When he fancied all the house had retired to rest save the two men on the watch in the hall below, Steggs slipped gently out of bed, and hastily put on a few articles of apparel.

Then he stole to the door of the room, and, opening it a little way, listened.

But all was still.

Reassured by the silence which prevailed, he emerged on tiptoe on to the landing, and in less than a moment stood before the door of George Wild's room.

He knew the door was not locked, so he turned the handle, and found it yield easily.

He entered immediately.

His first care was to secure the door, so as to guard against any sudden intrusion; and having done this, he crept on tiptoe, and trembling in every limb, towards the spot where the papers were concealed.

He lifted up the carpet, and then recollected that he would require a tool of some kind to raise the plank from its position.

A long clasp-knife which he had in his pocket would, he fancied, answer this purpose, so he at once made a trial.

The board was not secured in any way; it was newly placed in, so that by using the blade of the knife as a lever, it was easily enough raised.

Poor Steggs felt his heart beat so violently when he found he had successfully accomplished this much of his task, that he could scarcely stoop down to put his hand under the flooring in quest of the packet of papers.

The necessity, however, of being speedy in all his movements gave him strength to master his emotion in some degree.

George Wild was in the habit of visiting his chamber at all hours, and it was impossible to say how soon he might make his appearance.

This was a powerful incentive to exertion, and so Steggs, pressing one hand violently above the region of the heart, sought with the other under the boards.

So well had he noted every movement which George Wild made that he was able without hardly any trouble to place his hand upon the packet.

He produced it with a faint cry of joy.

"At last—at last!" he muttered. "Now, Jonathan Wild, do I indeed triumph! I—poor, weak, crawling thing that I am—have sworn to have my revenge upon him, and I will have it—a full, a deep, and long-sought vengeance. Nothing will touch him more than the frustration of this the darling scheme of his heart; and I will frustrate it! I have the means of doing so at this moment in my hands!"

Steggs felt his face glow as he muttered these words.

The feeling served to give him an idea of the pleasure he would experience when he had accomplished all his schemes, and when his revenge should have been fully glutted.

Little did Jonathan Wild dream that he had so subtle and dangerous an enemy beneath his roof.

He slept calmly the sleep of false security.

Not for long did Steggs give way to the pleasing anticipations of consummated vengeance.

He would have plenty of time in the solitude of his own room to ponder over the future.

Accordingly he thrust the packet of papers into his pocket, and hastened to replace the board in its original position.

He took care to do this in such a manner that it would not present, even to the keen gaze of George Wild, the least appearance of having been disturbed.

This done, he replaced the carpet and left the room.

As he passed out on to the landing, his ear caught the sound of a footstep on the stair, and this so terrified him that he felt as though he should sink on to the ground.

Summoning all his strength, he darted into his own chamber and closed the door.

But this was all he was able to do.

A sensation of deadly faintness came over him, and he sank powerless on to the floor.

How long he laid there he knew not, but by degrees he recovered his senses, and then he rose to his feet.

All was still, and he believed that no alarm had been given.

He crept towards the bed.

Another anxious question now occurred to him, and it was one that occupied his attention for a long time.

Now that he had got the papers, what was he to do with them?—where was he to conceal them until the time arrived when it would be necessary to make use of them?

He looked all round him, and thought of a dozen different hiding-places.

But there was not one that pleased him—not one that he thought secure enough.

"I have heard," said Steggs, "that the best way to hide a thing is to place it where it will be seen by everyone, and where no one would think it was concealed. I might hide it behind the wainscot, but if the papers are missed, and the least suspicion attaches to me, that will be the first place searched, and they will certainly be found. No, I must think of some better place!"

There was a large cupboard on one side of the fireplace, and towards this Steggs now crept.

He had never looked into it before, and therefore knew not what it contained, or whether it was empty.

Upon this point, however, he resolved to satisfy himself.

He flung open the doors, and, to his surprise, found that the shelves were loaded with books and loose papers of every description.

There was not light enough for Steggs to ascertain the nature of these volumes and documents, but he fancied he had hit upon a place where the packet would be safe.

"I must wait till morning," he said, "and then I shall know better."

With the most intense anxiety that could possibly be conceived, Steggs watched for the dawn of the new day.

He laid down on the bed, with the packet of papers tightly clutched in his hands, and with his ears strained to catch the slightest sound.

The night passed away without any alarm.

As soon as ever there was light enough for his purpose, Steggs arose from the bed and went towards the cupboard.

Opening the door again, he found what he had seen was no delusion.

The shelves were indeed filled with books and papers.

Of the latter some were loose and others tied up in packets and labelled.

The contents Steggs could not very well make out, but most of them were inquiries from different persons respecting stolen property.

"I have it!" said Steggs. "The packet will now be secure enough, in all conscience, and defy the closest search. I will make it up so as to resemble in all respects the remainder of these packets. A good thought! I will, too, mingle with them several of these loose papers, which, from carelessness or otherwise, have not been tied up like the rest. Then indeed it will be difficult to say which is the packet, without making an examination of them all."

This plan was indeed a most excellent one, and Steggs was not long in putting it into practice.

In a little time he had quite altered the look of the packet of papers concerning the Donnull estates, and, so far as an outward glance went, no eye could possibly have distinguished it from the other packets in the cupboard.

This done, Steggs thrust the precious documents at random amongst the rest, convinced that this was the best way to conceal them should a search be made.

CHAPTER CCCCIV.

BLUESKIN MAKES A STARTLING PROPOSAL TO JACK SHEPPARD.

WE now return to Jack Sheppard, who we left standing in the little wood near Tyburn, quite at a loss which way to turn, and without any idea how he should gain the shelter of the cavern.

He plunged at random into the recesses of the wood, looking closely at each tree as he did so, for he fancied he should be able to recognise it when he saw it.

He soon found this was a great mistake, and he was at length, from sheer exhaustion, compelled to pause and acknowledge himself baffled.

What to do now he scarcely knew.

There seemed to be but one course open to him, and that was to wait in the hope of seeing some of the inmates of the cave.

This was a frail hope, for the "Chickens," as Ned Cattle had called them, were very shy about being seen.

An hour or more passed by, but the silence of the spot was unbroken by any sound, save the chirping of a few melancholy-looking birds on the branches of the leafless trees.

At the end of that time, Jack felt his patience was completely exhausted, and he rose to his feet again, determined to resume his search for the secret cave.

Ere he had gone far, however, he was startled by hearing his name pronounced by a rough voice.

The next moment a man appeared, whom Jack recognised as one of the "Chickens."

He was soon made aware of the difficulty in which Jack was placed, and he led him to the cave without delay.

Upon arriving he pointed out the manner in which he could tell that tree from any other.

He also showed him how to communicate with those below.

This done, they waited a moment, and then the man, seizing the arm of the tree, pulled it down in the same way that Ned Cattle had done, thus disclosing the entrance to the cave.

Jack entered gladly enough, and the tree was made to assume its natural position by the means already described.

As may be expected, Blueskin was glad enough to see Jack Sheppard return in safety.

His long absence had given him great anxiety; and it was at his request that the man who had hailed Jack had gone out in the wood to look for him.

Jack Sheppard was terribly exhausted, and so, almost as soon as he entered, he flung himself down on the hard floor of the cavern and fell into a profound sleep.

He did not open his eyes for many hours, for he was thoroughly worn out.

When he awoke he looked around him, and to his surprise, saw that Blueskin was the only other inmate of the cavern besides himself.

He looked inquiringly into his old comrade's face, who said:

"You are surprised to find the cavern empty?"

"I am!"

"It is night, and all the men have, I fancy, gone off upon some poaching expedition, leaving me in charge."

"Can it indeed be night?"

"Yes; you are surprised, no doubt, but you have slept almost ever since you arrived."

"I am rested now."

"Come, sit here by the fire. I want to have some talk with you, for during your absence, and while I have been watching you asleep, I have been thinking a great deal about what will be best for us to do."

"And what is the result?" asked Jack, as he seated himself near the fire.

"I will tell you as soon as you have given me an account of your adventures, but not before."

Jack soon told him all that had passed; but as the reader is already in possession of the facts, there is no necessity to repeat Jack's narrative.

As soon as he had concluded, Blueskin said:

"Now, Jack, I have a plan to propose to you, which I think you will consider to be about the most daring that can be imagined by any one; but it has other things besides daring to recommend it."

"No doubt—no doubt. Let me hear it at once. If it is something desperate, it will accord with my humour exactly."

"In the first place, I have been thinking over many things, but most particularly about Edgworth Bess."

Jack was immediately interested.

"I have arrived at the conclusion," continued Blueskin, "that there is but one place where the poor girl can be found, and that is in Jonathan Wild's house!"

"I am of the same opinion myself."

"I feel certain of it!"

"We must rescue her from that place."

"That is the plan I was about to propose to you."

"Go on, then! Speak—speak! Tell me in what way you think her rescue can be effected!"

"Gently, Jack—gently! It will be no easy thing for us to go to the house that stands next door to Newgate; but luckily there is something in our favour."

"What is that?"

"Jonathan Wild is very ill, and confined to his chamber, so that he will not be able to interfere with us much."

"True—true! But what is your plan?"

"Simply this—to make our way to Jonathan Wild's house to-morrow night. You know how we can gain admission."

"Through Newgate Market?"

"Just so! That, I fancy, can be managed easily enough."

"Well, what then?"

"I propose that we creep in stealthily, and gain possession of Edgworth Bess. Then, when we have done that, we will set fire to the house, and take advantage of the confusion that must ensue to escape with her."

"What, burn down Jonathan Wild's house?"

"Just so!"

"That is indeed a daring scheme, but it is one which I would gladly assist to carry out. It would be some revenge!"

"It would—it would! Jonathan Wild, even if he did not perish in the flames, would grieve exceedingly about the destruction of his house!"

"It shall be done, Blueskin! I am glad that such a scheme should have suggested itself to you! To-morrow night it shall be done!"

"There will be time to agree about the means by which we will enter the house when we arrive upon the spot. One thing in our favour is that we are both well acquainted with the interior of the house."

"You especially, Blueskin!"

"Yes, I know every nook and corner in it! When we once gain admission you had better leave the lead to me!"

"I will do so gladly, because you must be better qualified for such a task than myself."

"That is agreed upon, then. And now Jack, there is another point I want to consult with you about."

"Speak—what is it?"

"When we have gained possession of Edgworth Bess, what shall be our next step?"

"Next step?"

"Yes; it requires careful consideration. We are both in a very dangerous condition; and if we don't arrange our plans beforehand, we shall find her a clog on all our movements."

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ENTERING WILD'S HOUSE.

"I see—I see!" said Jack, gloomily, resting his head on his hands, for he could not see the drift of these remarks.

"What, then, do you propose should be done? If we are once more captured, it will be farewell to all her hopes of gaining possession of that which is rightfully her own."

"It will indeed."

"What, then, are we to do?"

"I am at a loss to know; but you, Blueskin—doubtless you have been considering this point for a length of time, and have decided on some plan which you think had better be acted upon. Have you not done so?"

"I have, Jack."

"Then let me know what you propose."

"I don't know whether you will like the plan, or even whether you will consent to its adoption, and I should have preferred to have had a suggestion from yourself."

"I have not one to offer, and I am impatient in the extreme to hear what you have to propose."

No. 84.—BLUESKIN.

"I will tell you, then. In the first place, we require money, let us do what we may. That difficulty can, however, be easily got over. We shall be able to find enough in Wild's house to put us all right."

"Are you sure of that?"

"About as sure as I could be about anything. I know several places where Jonathan keeps quite a little store of wealth, and we can help ourselves freely."

"What next?"

"When we have done all which we intend, we would hasten with all the speed we could make to the river-side, where we would arrange to have a boat waiting."

"You think that could be managed?"

"Oh, yes; unquestionably! Well, we would get into that boat, and row down the river as fast as we were able."

"But what should you do then? You would be pursued."

"Very likely; but before we had got far down the river, we should be sure to pass some outward-bound vessel, which we would hail, and get on board."

"There are many difficulties in the way."

"I know that; but they must be thought of, and removed. Depend upon it, if we look them steadily in the face, they will disappear."

"Well—well; supposing that, what shall we do next?"

"If the vessel is bound for France or Holland, all will be well—we shall land! The money we shall take with us will enable us to exist, and when affairs are blown over a little, we will come back again. At present, the country is too hot to hold us, and it would be foolish to think of remaining."

"I am afraid we should find more trouble in leaving England's shores than you imagine!"

"Perhaps so; but we must hope for the best."

"I can see my way pretty clear as to rescuing Edgworth Bess, but I confess I don't like the idea of trusting to some vessel overtaking us."

"Nor I, but I could think of nothing else. But yet!—stay! A fresh thought has struck me. I think we shall be able to manage all first-rate."

"How so?"

"It has just occurred to me that Ned Cantle is the man to help us out of this difficulty."

"Indeed! What makes you think that?"

"Merely what I have heard; but we will wait until we can see him, and put the question direct."

"What question?"

"Whether he can assist us to leave England."

"Would you trust him?"

"I feel certain that we could do so with perfect safety. He is willing to be a true friend to us if we will allow him the opportunity."

"And do you really think he could aid us to get abroad?"

"I fancy so. Some conversation which I overheard between him and some of his companions leads me to form the opinion."

"Hark!" said Jack. "I can hear a footstep! Some one comes!"

CHAPTER CCCC.

NED CANTLE SHOWS HIMSELF TO BE AN IMPORTANT AID, AND IS THE MEANS OF SIMPLIFYING BLUESKIN'S PLAN.

BLUESKIN paused instantly, and then both our friends assumed listening attitudes.

Nearer and nearer came the footstep.

By the sound, they could tell that some one was descending the steps that led from the upper ground into the cavern.

In another moment a figure made its appearance.

Blueskin immediately seized one of the faggots from the fire, and held it high above his head, so as to diffuse its beams as far round him as possible.

The ruddy torchlight fell upon the advancing figure, and revealed the form of Ned Cantle.

"All right!" he cried. "Have you had any alarm?"

"No," replied Blueskin, to whom the question had been addressed. "All has been still."

"That is well."

"Have you returned for the night?" said Blueskin.

"Why do you ask?"

"Simply because, if you are not going out again, Jack Sheppard and myself would feel it a favour if you would sit down with us, and give your opinion and advice upon a certain matter."

"No, I am not going out again to-night, and I shall be glad to help you, if it is in my power."

"I quite believe it; I fancied from the first that you were a man who could be trusted, and what I have since seen of you has confirmed me in that belief."

"I am very glad to hear you say as much," replied Ned Cantle, who looked up to our two friends with a very great amount of respect indeed.

"Sit down here by the fire," said Blueskin, "and then we can talk together at our ease."

Ned Cantle complied, and rolling a small cask from one corner of the cavern to the fireside, he sat down upon it, prepared to listen with the greatest intentness to all that might be said to him.

A moment's silence ensued, for Blueskin scarcely knew how to broach the subject.

He resolved, after some consideration, to give him a general outline of their position, believing that in this instance at least a whole confidence was better than a half one.

Having come to this determination, he spoke:

"We have known each other but a short time," he said, "but still long enough for me to feel quite certain of your sincerity. You are willing to stand a friend to us?"

"I am indeed!" returned Ned Cantle, in a tone of voice which showed that he was thoroughly in earnest. "You will never have cause to regret placing confidence in me, though I am afraid I shall never be able to render you any important service."

"Well, that remains to be seen. I will explain to you the difficulty in which we find ourselves placed, and perhaps you may be able to suggest some means of getting out of it."

"I willingly would if I could!"

"Listen, then! In the first place, it is quite certain that, after what has occurred, the sooner we leave England the better it will be for us."

"Do you really think of making the attempt to go abroad?"

"Yes."

"But this cavern will be a secure hiding-place for you."

"I don't dispute that for a moment."

"Then why not stay where you are until the excitement of the people has died away?"

"To answer that question properly I must explain matters to you a little."

Ned Cantle nodded his head.

"In the first place, then, there is a young girl who, by the villany of her uncle, has been deprived of her property and estates. This uncle called in Jonathan Wild to his aid, who got all he could out of him, and when he had learned the precise state of affairs he resolved to have the property himself."

"Just like him!"

"As you say, it was just like him. His first care was, then, to obtain possession of this young girl, and induce her, either by fair means or foul, to consent to aid him in his schemes."

"I understand."

"Had it not been for the exertions of Jack Sheppard and myself, the villainous thief-taker would, beyond all doubt, have succeeded in his plans. As it was, he experienced nothing but defeat, and it is solely in consequence of our having espoused the cause of this poor girl that he has shown so much animosity towards us. He resolved upon the destruction of both of us, and you are already aware how nearly he succeeded."

"I can speak for you, Blueskin, at all events," said Ned Cantle, "for you had a very narrow escape!"

"If it had been much narrower I should not have escaped at all!"

"Go on with your story, I am greatly interested in it."

"Well, we thwarted him, but, owing to our position, we were not able to do just as we should have wished. Had it been otherwise, we should have obtained a victory over him easily enough."

"And what was the result?"

"For some time past it has been a regular struggle between Jonathan Wild and ourselves which should retain possession of her. We have had her, and so has Jonathan Wild."

"And where is she now?"

"That we cannot tell for certain. For a long time past we have lost sight of her, nor have we been able to trace her beyond a certain point. We have reason to believe, however, that she has fallen into the power of Jonathan Wild, and is at this moment in his house."

"And you want to rescue her?"

"Just so! If we could once more obtain possession of her, we would go abroad, and not return to England until she was of age. We should then be more secure."

"But how are you to do this?"

"That is just the point! I will tell you our scheme, and the manner in which we should like you to aid us, and after that you can tell us whether it is in your power."

"I hope it may be! I would assist you with very great pleasure! Go on!"

"Our scheme, then, is to get into Wild's house——"

"Eh?"

"Get into Wild's house!"

"You must be mad!"

"You are astonished at such a daring feat, no doubt; but still, we are resolved upon it."

"But Jonathan Wild's house is next door to Newgate."

"We know that."

"Well, you quite take my breath away! Why, it is the last place I should have thought you would have ventured to, without you wished to ensure your own capture!"

"Quite a mistake! We shall manage that part of the business easily enough. We shall be safe there, because no one would think of looking for us so close to Newgate!"

"Well, there may be something in that!"

"There is a great deal in it! In the event of our accomplishing our purpose, which I need scarcely tell you is to rescue this young girl from Wild's house, we shall want your assistance."

"How can I serve you?"

"Why, when we get out into the open air along with our prize, we shall at once make our way down to the banks of the Thames, choosing the nearest point."

"Yes—yes?"

"Well, here we shall want to have a boat waiting."

"And then you will all three enter, I suppose, and push off from the shore with all the speed you can make?"

"Just so!"

"And what next?"

"We should want to get on board some vessel bound either for France or Holland."

"Ah!"

"And then we should be all right."

"Of course you would."

"You can now perhaps guess what we want you to do. It is, to have a boat in readiness at some point that we will agree upon, and then help to row us off."

"Exactly!" said Ned Cantle, "and when I tell you something more, I think you will be glad that you took me into your confidence."

"What is it?"

"Why, it so happens that I am in a position not only to render you the service you have named, but also a more important one."

"I am glad to hear that! What is it?"

"The plan you have laid is a good enough one, and yet I fear, if you were pursued, as probably you will be, that you would have but a poor chance of escaping capture."

"How so?"

"Because part of your plan is to get on board of some outward-bound vessel, and that you would find a very difficult thing; indeed, I look upon it as an impossibility."

"Do you indeed?"

"I do, and you will perhaps be inclined to attach more value to my opinion when I tell you that the river is well known to me, having been for many years engaged upon it."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, a man has often to do strange things, and to tell truth, even now I am connected with the water, and that is what made me say I should be able to render you a further service."

"Let us hear what you have to propose."

"In the first place, then, I may as well say that I will undertake to be in waiting with a boat at any point you may think proper to agree upon."

"Thanks for that! We did not think you would be able to aid us further."

"But luckily I can do so! A particular friend of mine, who would gladly serve me in any way he could, is captain of a lugger which plies between London Bridge and Amsterdam."

"Indeed!" cried Blueskin, exultantly. "That is good news indeed; and where is this vessel now?"

"Lying at her moorings, just below London Bridge."

"Better and better! When does she set sail?"

"I believe in two days' time."

"That is a pity!"

"It is nothing! The time of starting is not absolute. I could arrange for the vessel to depart at any hour you think proper."

"Can you indeed?"

"I think I may safely say I can. The captain is a friend of mine, and entirely master of his actions."

"What does the boat carry?"

"Well, never mind that! I could tell you, of course, but then it is his secret, not mine!"

"All right! It is of no importance!"

"I will tell you one thing, however. If you can once succeed in getting on board that boat, you are safe!"

"How so?"

"You will see in good time. I propose, however, that in the morning I go to London Bridge and see my friend, and make all necessary arrangements with him."

"I should be glad indeed if you would do so."

"Then I will, depend upon it, and when I return I will let you know the result of my mission."

"Good! If you can arrange for the boat to weigh anchor the moment we get on board, and go down the Thames, my mind will be quite at rest, because I have no doubt whatever about our being able to accomplish the other portion of our enterprise."

"I think I could almost promise it to you on my own authority. However, it will be best for me to go and see how matters stand, so as to prevent all possibility of a hitch in the business."

"Certainly, certainly! and as you will pass through the City on your way, take notice of what is going on around you. It may be that you will be able to pick up some important piece of information."

"I shall keep my eyes open, depend upon it!" said Ned Cantle. "Dawn cannot now be far distant, and so with your permission I will lie down and get a little sleep before I set off upon my excursion."

"Do so—do so, by all means!"

Ned Cantle withdrew, and laid himself down in one of the corners of the cavern, where he quickly fell asleep.

Indeed, it was his intention to immediately seek his couch when he had entered the cavern.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard sat for some time talking, and then they followed the example of their new friend.

They had a very important task to perform, and they would require all the strength and endurance they could command, and they were well aware that nothing is so strengthening to the body as a sound sleep.

CHAPTER CCCCVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SET OUT UPON THEIR DANGEROUS EXPEDITION, AND SUCCEEDED IN GAINING ADMITTANCE TO THE YARD AT THE BACK OF JONATHAN WILD'S HOUSE.

THE fortunate fact of Ned Cantle's being acquainted with the captain of a vessel that plied between London Bridge and Amsterdam had the effect of greatly simplifying Blueskin's plan.

Indeed, both Jack Sheppard and himself now looked upon it as perfect.

The only doubt they had had was about being able to get on board a vessel possessing the requisite qualifications, and now that promised to be done easiest of all.

Under such circumstances, we cannot wonder that their sleep should be sound.

How long their slumber would have continued is hard to say, but they were awoken by Ned Cantle.

He shook them rather roughly by the shoulders, and then he said:

"I am off now! I shall not be long away, and during my absence, pray do me the favour of remaining where you are. Do not be tempted on any account to leave the cavern!"

"We promise that readily enough," said Blueskin.

"We will wait here until your return. If you can arrange for the vessel which your friend commands to be in readiness to start at any moment between midnight and dawn to-morrow morning, that will suit us excellently."

"I think that can be done. However, I will let you know when I return. Is there any further commission for me to execute?"

"No—none that I am aware of."

"Then I am off, and you may expect me to return as soon as ever it is possible."

"All right—farewell!"

"Farewell!" said Ned Cantle, and as he uttered the word, he turned on his heel and left the cavern.

It is not our intention to follow him upon his expedition.

He was absent several hours, and during the whole of that time, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard remained in the cavern, anxiously awaiting his return.

They occupied themselves in still further arranging their plans with greater exactness than they had been able to do the night before.

It is not necessary, however, to place before the reader the whole of their conversation on this occasion—it will be sufficient to relate their adventures when they set out.

At length, when the day was very far advanced, Ned Cantle made his appearance.

A glance at his countenance was alone sufficient to inform our friends that he had succeeded in his enterprise.

"All is well!" he said, anticipating Blueskin's question. "I have been able to make the arrangements with even greater ease than I had anticipated."

"That is good news!"

"It had been agreed upon that the vessel should start at dawn to-morrow morning, and if it is necessary, they can easily weigh anchor an hour or two before then."

"Good!—and what more?"

"Nothing, except that I have engaged a boat, and I shall be seated in it waiting for you at Puddle Dock—do you know it?"

"Quite well!"

"It is the nearest point on the river's bank to Newgate, and if you go down Warwick Lane and keep on in a straight line, you will come to it."

"All right! Was there anything more?"

"Nothing, except that the closest possible search is being made after you. The officers are out in all directions, and they are backed up by Jonathan Wild's men."

"I quite expected that."

"And, moreover, orders have been issued by the police authorities that no vessel should leave port without an examination being made; or, rather, I should say the commanders have been ordered not to take anyone on board who is not provided with a certificate."

"We shall be able to dispense with it, I hope."

"Oh, yes; that will not matter!"

"And is that all the news?"

"Yes."

"Then we must wait patiently until night, and when night comes we will set out."

"Agreed!"

Nothing more of any importance took place until Ned Cantle gave Blueskin and Jack Sheppard warning that night was close at hand.

They then set to work to get themselves in readiness for their expedition; and by the time they had done this, it was time to start.

All three set out together, intending to separate when they got near their destination.

They used the utmost caution in their progress.

Up to a certain point Ned Cantle was allowed to take the lead; but when London was reached, Blueskin took his place, because he believed he was best qualified for the task.

They reached the City about an hour before midnight.

This was full early; and, as they had plenty of time to spare, it was proposed by Jack Sheppard that they should all three bend their steps to Puddle Dock, and leave Ned Cantle there.

His object for doing this is obvious enough.

They would then know just where the boat was situated, and be able to jump into it without delay.

A wiser proceeding than this could not have been decided upon, for in the hurry and confusion of their flight it would be an immense advantage to know just where to go.

This was seen at once.

Upon reaching the point he had named, Ned Cantle showed them the boat.

"Now," he said, "when you have been gone an hour, I shall take my seat in that boat, and remain there with the oars in my hands, in readiness to push off, until you come."

"reed—agreed!"

"Farewell, then, for a short time, and good luck go with you!"

In a few minutes afterwards, Jack and Blueskin took their departure, and directed their steps in a straight line towards their destination.

Crossing the top of Ludgate Hill, they made their way up Warwick Lane until the large gateway leading into Newgate Market was reached.

Under this they passed, and in a moment were lost to view in the obscurity with which the market was filled.

Presently they paused, and Blueskin said:

"I have been thinking, Jack, that we shall have to abandon the course of action which we had decided upon."

"Why so?"

"Depend upon it, Jonathan Wild, now that he is aware that we are acquainted with the door leading out of the passage into his yard, has taken good care to secure it in such a manner as will defy all our attempts to force it open."

"What are we to do?"

"Why, first of all, try. It may be that nothing of the kind has been done."

"We will try."

It was at the mouth of the passage which we have so often had occasion to mention that the two friends had paused, and now they hastened along it, and soon reached the door.

As Blueskin had anticipated, it was as firm as a rock.

Their united strength just enabled them to shake it slightly in its frame, but that was all.

But this was more than Blueskin had dared to hope for.

"All right!" he said; "the door is secured on the other side, but only by ordinary fastenings, so we shall be able to remove them. I should say, from the feel of it, that the door is locked, and bolted at the top and the bottom."

"But how are we to open it?"

"I shall have to get you to do that."

"How?"

"Come here, and I will show you. You must get on the top of that wall, and then drop down on the other side."

"All right—I understand!"

"I will help you up on to the top of this stall, and then you will easily be able to get on to the wall."

"So I shall."

One of the butcher's stalls in the market happened to be in immediate contiguity to the wall at the back of Wild's house, and by the means Blueskin had mentioned the feat could be easily performed.

In less than a moment Jack Sheppard was on the roof of the stall.

It was rather a slippery roof, composed of smooth wood planking, which afforded hold to neither hand nor foot.

He slipped alarmingly once or twice, and had a narrow escape from a serious fall, but each time he succeeded in saving himself.

The highest part of the roof, which Jack was endeavouring to gain, reached to within about a couple of feet of the top of the wall.

At last Jack arrived here.

Seizing firmly the top of the wall, he drew himself up by it.

He was very cautious, though, not to expose too much of his person to view at first, for fear some one should be in the yard below.

He peeped over, therefore, and after a stealthy glance or two assured himself that the coast was clear.

Upon this he raised himself still higher.

He was now able to say for certain that there was no one in the yard, so nothing remained for him to do but descend into it.

First of all he looked up at the thief-taker's abode.

The ground floor was plunged in darkness.

From one or two of the upper windows, however, there came faint beams of light, showing that there was some one in them.

A profound silence reigned around, and after one more glance into the yard below, Jack commenced his descent.

He acted very wisely in taking all these precautions. Should they be discovered, or the least alarm given, the whole of their scheme would be ruined.

The reader will therefore see the necessity of being careful to a fault.

Jack Sheppard had no other means of reaching the yard below than lowering himself by his hands until he hung at the full length of his arms, and then dropping the distance.

This was the course, then, that he adopted.

This distance to drop was considerable, and the yard was paved with large flagstones, which would not be very comfortable things to alight upon.

Shutting his eyes, Jack let go, and reached the ground with great force.

For a moment or two he lay perfectly still.

At first, it was because all the breath was knocked out of his body, and he had no power to rise; and afterwards, when he recovered his senses a little, he lay still to ascertain whether any alarm had been given.

But all was quiet, so he rose to his feet.

The door in the wall was close by, and upon going up to it, he found that Blueskin's conjecture was perfectly correct.

The door was locked and bolted.

The latter fastenings Jack had but little trouble in removing, although they were very rusty.

He forced them back.

The lock, however, was not to yield so easily.

He felt about for the key at first, in the faint hope that he would be able to find it sticking in the keyhole; but in this expectation we need hardly say he was disappointed.

It was a very strong, large lock, but Jack found that it was screwed on to the door on the side on which he then stood.

This at once suggested means for removing this obstacle to their entrance.

Jack took a small knife from his pocket, and with the point of the large blade set to work to remove the screws by which the box of the lock was secured to the door-post.

This was a tedious and difficult operation, and he broke the blade of his knife more than once.

Still he made progress, and this encouraged him to continue his efforts.

Blueskin was on the other side listening attentively.

Although Jack had not spoken a word, he could tell quite well what he was about.

He remained quite silent, being fearful that if he raised his voice he should give the alarm.

CHAPTER CCCCXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN SUCCEEDED AT LAST IN GAINING ADMITTANCE TO JONATHAN WILD'S HOUSE.

JACK SHEPPARD did not hurry himself in what he was about.

He was content to see that he was making progress, and so worked on quietly and silently.

He well enough knew that there was no hurry.

It was just about midnight, and at this hour he could scarcely hope to find all the inmates of Jonathan Wild's house at rest.

While those lights remained at the windows, he would not dream of attempting to effect an entrance.

And this made him more deliberate than he would have been.

It was all for the best that Jack Sheppard acted thus.

Succeeding events will show that the least precipitation upon his part would have ruined all.

At last, however, the box of the lock gave way, and the door was opened.

"You have been a long time," said Blueskin, in a whisper. "I began to lose all patience."

"Hush!" said Jack, in a still lower tone of voice. "Be silent! Look there!"

He pointed as he spoke to the windows from whence the beams of light issued.

"All right, Jack; we can venture to speak in a whisper."

"I daresay we can; but pray be cautious!"

"I will, you may depend upon it. First of all, I will close the door, so that the fact of its being open shall not attract suspicion."

Jack consented, and Blueskin shut the door.

This done, he placed his back against it.

"Come here," he said to his companion. "Stand by my side. In the shadow we cannot possibly be perceived."

Jack saw this at once, and hastened to place himself by his side.

From this position, they were able to gaze up at the lighted windows.

For some time they were silent, and then Blueskin said:

"What do you think now, Jack? Which will be the best way to enter the house?"

"I was just considering the point when you spoke."

"Had you arrived at any conclusion?"

"No."

"Think, then, for the time is drawing near when it will be necessary for you to decide."

"I know that; but first of all I want to know something from you."

"What is it?"

"Have you decided what shall be our first proceeding when we enter?"

"Yes."

"What?"

"I will take you to those secret places with whose position I am acquainted, and where Jonathan Wild used to secrete a portion of his enormous and ill-gotten wealth."

"Good!"

"We will stow about our persons as much as ever we can, choosing all the most valuable articles we can find."

"Good again! But this part of our enterprise will require to be conducted with very great secrecy and caution."

"Of course it will! We must be careful in the extreme not to give an alarm, for when we enter we shall have several hours' work to perform."

"We shall unquestionably."

"The point is, in which way are we to make an entrance?"

"We shall have time to decide. In the first place, whereabouts in the house are those secret hiding-places you spoke of as containing the valuables?"

"In various places. The most I should think in the office. You know the place where Wild used to sit at his desk?"

"A little room on the ground floor, with a door opening into it out of the hall?"

"The same."

"Is there any other means of gaining admission to it?"

"No."

"Then it's awkward."

"Very awkward, because of the two men on guard in the hall."

"I should think, however, from what you have just said, that the best means of gaining admission would be by raising the flag-stone and descending into the dungeons."

"So do I. We will try, at any rate, and when we have accomplished so much it will be time to decide upon the rest, for we cannot possibly tell what may occur."

"True; but look, out goes that light! That's a good sign, and—ah! there goes the other!"

It was as Jack had said, and now the back of Wild's house was perfectly dark.

They waited a little while after this in silence, and then they ventured to commence operations.

Gliding stealthily across the yard, they paused as nearly as they could upon the spot where they believed the trap-door was situated.

With the position of this trap-door the reader will be perfectly familiar.

A very brief search indeed sufficed to show them the iron ring by which the flag-stone covering the steps could be raised.

Blueskin seized it with both hands and endeavoured to raise it.

But it remained immovable.

Blueskin exerted his utmost strength.

But in vain.

He might as well have tried to raise a mountain.

"It's a case with that, at any rate," he said, as he raised himself to an upright posture. "Jonathan has taken good care to make the stone secure from the inner side. Doubtless he anticipated that we should attempt to make an entrance into his house by means of it."

"You are right, Blueskin. We ought to have known that at once. He has fastened the trap-door evidently, and you may depend he has done so in such a manner as to make it an impossibility for anyone to raise it from this side."

"Yes, yes! We must at once abandon all hope of gaining admittance by this route."

"We must indeed. But what are we to do?"

"Hush! do not speak so loud. Come back to the shadow of the doorway again, and let us consider."

Jack obeyed.

"I fear we must give up all hope of entering the office," he said.

"So do I."

"In what other part of the house did you say these secret hiding-places were to be found?"

"In that front room on the first floor where you had your first interview with Jonathan Wild."

"I know it. That will do, I think. There is no one posted there to interfere with us, is there?"

"Not that I am aware of."

"Let us try that, then."

"But how shall we enter?"

"Do you see that out-building?"

"Yes."

"Well, we could get on to the roof of that, could we not?"

"Certainly."

"And does not that window just above open on to the first-floor landing?"

"It does."

"Then we will get through that."

"You will have to be very careful. The least noise in that quarter would be plainly audible from the hall below."

"We must be careful. But can you see any better way of effecting an entrance?"

"No—none."

"That is sufficient, then. Come, and if you will assist me I will go first."

"Nay, let me. I am the heaviest, and shall be better able to assist you than you would be able to assist me."

"True; and now let us be as silent as possible, for there is really great danger from being overheard. Do not even speak, without you are really compelled to do so."

"Agreed."

In pursuance of this arrangement not another word was uttered, and Jack Sheppard immediately assisted his comrade to ascend to the roof of the out-building of which he had spoken.

This was by no means difficult.

Having obtained a secure footing on the roof, Blueskin assisted Jack to follow him.

The latter being light and agile easily gained the roof.

Both now crouched down and commenced crawling towards the window.

Without any accident they reached it.

Jack Sheppard was an expert at making a surreptitious entrance into any place, and so he tried his hand upon the window on the present occasion.

It was a very ticklish operation.

If he was so clumsy or so unfortunate as to make the slightest sound, it would be fatal to the success of their scheme.

The mere fact of this was sufficient to make anyone nervous, but Jack never trembled in the least—his hand was as steady as a rock.

He had no other tool than the knife of which we have spoken, and which he had seriously injured in attempting to unscrew the box of the lock from the door.

Nevertheless, with this he succeeded in removing the fastening.

A slight snap announced the result.

The sound struck through Jack's heart like a bullet.

The window creaked open a little way.

Jack Sheppard applied his ear to the crevice in a moment, and listened intently.

"Eh!" he heard a voice say, "What was that?"

Jack felt greatly inclined to reply:

"Nothing!"

But the conviction that this would not answer his purpose came strongly over him, and he did the only thing that lay in his power, and that was to remain silent.

He felt he could do no more than allow events to take their course.

"What was that?" said the same voice again; "I am sure I heard something!"

"Did you?" said the same voice. "What was it like?"

"I'll be hanged if I know, for at the moment I really do think I had just dropped off to sleep, but something woke me!"

"What?"

"I tell you I don't know!"

"Listen, then! Can you hear anything?"

There was a pause, and then Jack heard one of the voices say:

"I can't hear anything!"

"You may depend it's all right, then! It was your fancy!"

"Perhaps it was, but I shall keep my ears open!"

These voices came from the two men on guard in the hall below, and the reason Jack heard so distinctly all that they said to each other was, because the men had to raise their voices to make themselves heard—one being seated near the front door, and the other near the iron grating that covered the entrance to the cells.

Jack waited several moments, but all was still.

The man below who had been awake by the snap of the window was doubtless listening with all his ears.

This was very unfortunate for Blueskin and Jack.

They could scarcely hope to open the window and get through it without making some slight sound which would now arouse the man's suspicions, but which had he not been on the alert would have escaped notice.

Under these circumstances they had no resource but to wait, though they were in a very inconvenient, dangerous place.

Some time passed, and all continuing to remain silent in the hall below, Jack, by a sign, signified to Blueskin his intention of making an entrance.

Blueskin assented.

With great care and noiselessness Jack opened the window.

In doing this he felt certain he had raised no alarm, and cheered and encouraged with this success, he gradually passed his body through the casement.

At last he stood in safety upon the landing.

It was now Blueskin's turn, and Jack trembled, for he could scarcely hope that his comrade would be able to achieve the feat with the same amount of dexterity as he had.

Blueskin was rather bulky in the body, and as a matter of course was clumsy in his movements.

CHAPTER CCCCVIII.

BLUESKIN DISCOVERS TO JACK SHEPPARD THREE OF JONATHAN WILD'S SECRET HOARDS OF WEALTH.

BLUESKIN, however, on this occasion was not so clumsy as might have been expected, and he got through the window very silently indeed.

Jack Sheppard now fell into the rear, and allowed Blueskin to take the lead, because the latter was best acquainted with the interior of the thief-taker's abode.

Like two ghosts they glided across the landing, and in less than a moment they paused before the door of that room in which Jonathan Wild had so often sat and concocted his diabolical plans.

How strange it seemed for those two men to be standing on such a threshold!

Who would have believed that Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, after all their narrow escapes, and with the officers of justice making close search after them—who would have believed that they would have had the temerity to return to London—to come back to Newgate—to break into the house of Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, situated as it was next door to the very prison?

And yet there they were, as calm, and cool, and self-possessed as they possibly could be.

The interior of Jonathan Wild's house was very silent now, and the slight noise which was produced by Blueskin turning the handle of the door sounded with alarming loudness.

He pushed the door open quickly, being well aware that such was the most noiseless method, as many hinges will creak when moved slowly.

The door opened silently, and Blueskin crossed the threshold.

Jack followed close behind him; and then, with the greatest conceivable care, they closed the door behind them.

So far, then, they had succeeded in their enterprise quite as well as they could possibly have hoped for or expected.

Their next proceeding was to obtain a light.

There was no difficulty about this.

Blueskin took from his pocket a small dark-lantern of exquisite workmanship, which he had obtained from Ned Cantle.

Jack had the means of procuring a light, and the lantern was quickly ignited.

With a curiosity which he did not attempt to repress, Jack Sheppard looked about him.

He had not paid a sufficient number of visits to that room for its interior to be familiar to him.

But Blueskin had seen it hundreds of times, and he said, in the faintest of whispers:

"Come, Jack, we will get this part of our business over as quickly as we can. We have yet much more to do, and we have already consumed more time than I had reckoned for!"

"All right! I wonder what Jonathan is doing just now?"

"Lying in bed, I daresay! He may boast about being made of iron, and all that, but he won't recover from the wound I gave him in a hurry! It was as near fatal as could be!"

"What made you attempt his life?"

"I don't know! I felt a sudden impulse which I could not resist. He had taunted and aggravated me beyond endurance, and the means of having my revenge upon him happening to be within my reach, I availed myself of them."

"Well, if you will believe me, I am glad you did not succeed—I should have been disappointed for life if the rascal had come to any other death than that of the hangman's rope at Tyburn!"

"Don't get on to that subject now, we have no time to discuss it! Just hold the lantern for a moment, and I will show you one of Jonathan's hiding-places for his treasures!"

Jack Sheppard took the light, as requested, and then Blueskin, somewhat to his companion's surprise, placed two of the chairs that were in the room just in front of the fireplace.

"Now, Jack," he said, "get on to that chair, and I will get on to this!"

Full of curiosity and wonder, Jack obeyed.

"Hold the lantern so that the light falls on that picture," continued Blueskin, "and then I shall be able to see what I am about!"

The picture alluded to was rather a large one, in a massive frame, and which hung just over the mantelpiece.

What the subject was they did not trouble to look.

Jack just saw that there were several human figures and a good deal of bright colour, and that was all.

His attention was entirely occupied by his comrade's proceedings.

Blueskin took hold of the bottom portion of the frame and endeavoured to lift it off the hook.

After one or two efforts he succeeded, and placed the picture on the floor.

The wall now presented quite an ordinary appearance.

Blueskin stepped on to the chair again, and passed his hand over that part of the wall which the picture had covered.

He was feeling for some projection.

"Here you are!" he said, suddenly; and then, somewhat to Jack's surprise, a little door in the wall flew open, disclosing a dark-looking place beyond.

This secret door appeared to open into the chimney.

Blueskin thrust his hand and arm through the opening and felt about for some moments.

Then he withdrew his hand, and Jack saw that he held a small wooden box, which was nearly as large as the secret door through which it had to pass.

"Here you are, Jack!" said Blueskin. "Get down, and we will open this box, see what it contains, and pocket the most valuable portion of its contents!"

The box was placed on the table, and the lid was forced open, but not until after several trials had been made with the knife which had already been so useful.

When the lid was raised, a very pretty sight presented itself.

The box was small, but it appeared to be filled with precious stones of all sizes and colours.

They were unset, having evidently been torn from their settings to prevent identification, for to several of them small shreds of gold were still clinging.

"There is a few guineas' worth here, Jack!" said Blueskin. "We won't encumber ourselves with the box, though! Turn them out on the table, and divide them into two portions. You fill your pockets with one, and I will fill mine with the other!"

This was done in a very few minutes.

The stones were small, and did not occupy much room.

When they were all stowed away, Jack said:

"Now, Blueskin, show us another box like the last, and then we shall do, so far as money is concerned!"

"You are right! But I have taken you to the best place first. If we were in the office, now, it would be a different matter!"

"I think we had better abandon that idea altogether. It is too great a risk, and in attempting to get there we may ruin our plan altogether!"

"I am afraid so, too!"

"Depend upon it, Blueskin, the best thing you can do will be to show me what other hiding-places you know of, and we will make the best of them!"

"Very well. Jonathan had a fancy for hiding his wealth in various places, and there are several more in this room. Come here, and I will show you another."

Blueskin led the way to one of the windows.

In former times it was customary to build windows in a kind of recess, and at a convenient height there was what is still called a window-seat.

They were generally made so that they formed a kind of box, in which different articles could be kept.

This one was so provided, and Blueskin raised the lid.

A quantity of articles of clothing was disclosed.

These were tossed aside until the box was empty.

There were coats and caps, and wigs, and false whiskers and mustaches—everything in fact that was necessary to form a disguise.

When the bottom of the box was disclosed, Blueskin pressed upon one corner of it.

The opposite corner immediately rose, thus showing it to be a false bottom merely.

It was a loose piece of wood, which, however, fitted it closely enough to prevent any suspicion.

Blueskin took it out, and then told his companion to direct the broad beam of light which came from the lantern into the recess which it disclosed.

A number of bags, tied up closely, was revealed.

"Do those contain gold?" asked Jack.

"To tell you the truth, I scarcely know what they contain, except that it is something valuable. Here, take them, and put them on the table. We will soon find out what is inside."

Jack took the bags and placed them on the table.

They were seven in number, and very weighty.

With considerable eagerness one was untied, and its contents poured out upon the table.

They were small masses of gold of all shapes and sizes.

"These," said Blueskin, glancing at them, "are most likely the settings of the stones we have pocketed. The fine gold work, you see, has been rudely beaten up into lumps, so as to defy detection!"

"Then these seven bags represent a considerable sum of money?"

"They do! We will take them! In Holland we shall have no trouble in turning them into coin! You take half and fill your pockets, and I will do the same!"

Jack Sheppard obeyed.

He was, of course, highly delighted with this very successful result of their expedition.

The operation of transferring the golden contents of the bags to their pockets did not occupy much time; and when they had done, Jack said:

"We can still carry a little more. If you can show us another secret hoard, we shall do very well!"

"We shall; for I can assure you what we have already got would fetch a great deal of money—more, perhaps, than you imagine!"

"I am glad to hear it!"

"In fact, there is no place where such things can be disposed of to so much advantage as in Holland; and that is where we are bound for, you know!"

"Yes, exactly!"

"Well, come here! I know of one more hiding-place in this room, and only one!"

"What does it contain?"

"Gold coin, I think. In fact, it is the place where Jonathan keeps whatever ready money he may happen to have in the house."

"Glorious!"

"Show the light here! The hiding-place is in the panelling of this wainscot."

Blueskin went to one portion of the room, and, by the aid of the light, examined the wainscot narrowly.

"Here it is!" he said. "Here is the spring!"

He pressed upon it as he spoke.

This room—like nearly all the rooms in Wild's house—was fitted with a wainscot which reached about half-way up the walls, and which was wrought so as to represent panels surrounded with massive frames.

CHAPTER CCCCIX.

BLUESKIN SETS FIRE TO JONATHAN WILD'S HOUSE, AND EVENTS BEGIN TO ASSUME A VERY COMPLICATED APPEARANCE.

WHEN Blueskin pressed the spring, the centre of one of these panels slid slowly downward, revealing a small chamber, in appearance not unlike the interior of a modern iron safe, for it was fitted with partitions and drawers.

One of these drawers Blueskin pulled out and handed to his comrade.

It was filled with guineas.

Jack placed it on the table and returned for more.

There were four drawers, each of them filled with loose gold.

In the partitions were several books and other papers.

These they did not trouble themselves with, but emptied the drawers on the table, and filled their pockets with the guineas.

They were now pretty well loaded.

They would have found it difficult to have carried away any more than they had already got without feeling great inconvenience.

"I think we may safely say that we have accomplished another portion of our enterprise!"

"I think so too, and we have not been long about it either!"

"About an hour, I should think."

"Not more."

"If that is the case, we have a good two hours before us; and what we have to do will not, I should think, occupy us more than half that length of time!"

"I should think so too! You reckon the time, then, to be two o'clock?"

"I do!"

"I wish we knew for certain. Hush! What is that?"

"St. Sepulchre's clock!"

"Listen, then, and we shall know the time!"

Jack and Blueskin assumed listening attitudes

The clock struck twice.

"I was near the mark! Now, then, what shall we do next?"

"Fire the house!"

"Before we rescue Edgworth Bess?"

"Yes, certainly! We shall have no trouble in obtaining possession of her, and by that time the flames will have taken firm hold, and amid the smoke and confusion we shall have a much better chance of getting off!"

"All right! Where shall you lay the fire?"

"In as many places as we can, and then there will be less fear of its being extinguished."

"You must take care not to have the flames spread too rapidly, or we shall be destroyed as well."

"Oh, never fear; we shall have plenty of time. Don't waste any more time in talking, but come and help me."

To this Jack consented.

Blueskin gathered together all the combustible articles

he could find in the room, and divided them into four portions.

He put one in each corner of the room in such a manner that, as it burned up, it would set fire to the wainscoting.

When this firstly caught the blaze, the fire would gain ground rapidly.

Having arranged these heaps in a manner that displayed a great deal of skill, Blueskin set fire to them one after the other.

They blazed up quickly.

This done, they left the room hastily, and closed the door.

The most perilous and difficult portion of their enterprise still lay before them.

They had to find the room in which Edgworth Bess was concealed, and to escape with her.

And, after all, they had no conclusive evidence to show that Edgworth Bess was really an inmate of that house.

We happen to know that they were perfectly correct in their supposition.

But even had they been certain upon this point, it would have been no easy matter for them to have decided in which room she was to be found.

Any mistake upon this point would be fatal.

One thing in their favour was the fact of Blueskin being so intimately acquainted with the interior of the house as he was.

Thus he was able to say with precision that she was not in any room on the first floor, because those apartments were otherwise occupied.

He motioned to Jack to follow him up the staircase that led up to the second story of the house.

They reached the top and stood upon the landing without having given the least alarm.

Blueskin put his finger to his lips in token to Jack to remain silent.

That was the floor upon which Jonathan Wild's bedroom was situated.

Without a word he crossed the landing, and ascended the next flight of stairs.

He was closely followed by Jack.

"That danger's over," he said. "You may speak in a whisper now."

"Which is the door?" said Jack.

"Wait a moment!" replied Blueskin. "Let me consider! You see that door yonder?"

"Yes."

"That leads into the room in which I was confined."

"Then she is not likely to be there."

"No; for, if you remember, I removed several of the iron bars that were placed before the windows."

Jack nodded.

"She must be in the next room."

"Do you think so?"

"I do. In fact, I am as sure of it as I well could be of anything about which I had not positive knowledge."

"Let us try, then."

"We cannot do better; I feel sure that is the room."

Blueskin was so lucky as to be quite right.

The room in which he himself had some time previously been confined was the one in which Wild junior had taken up his quarters for a time.

The door Blueskin paused at was the next room to it, and this, as we know, led into the room in which Edgworth Bess was confined.

Although he had said he was so sure, Blueskin felt very uncomfortable when he tapped lightly upon the panel of the door.

What if he was mistaken?

But it was done now.

No notice was taken of this summons for admission; but as he listened, he fancied he could hear the sound of whispering voices.

He thought at first he was mistaken in what he had heard.

But no! The whispering was continued.

Blueskin drew back in alarm.

"What is the matter?" asked Jack anxiously, for he was too far off to hear the whispering sound.

"I am afraid I have made a mistake!"

"The devil!"

"There is no doubt about it! I can hear some one inside whispering!"

THE COMBAT BETWEEN WILD JUNIOR AND THE FUGITIVES.

"Whispering?"

"Yes."

Somewhat Jack felt his blood flush up into his face as he heard this intelligence, though he could not tell why it should do so.

At this moment, however, they heard a footstep.

Then the door was flung wide open.

A man appeared upon the threshold.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard recognised him instantly.

It was George Wild.

There was an angry look upon his face, and he stepped out on the dark landing, as he said:

"What is that? What is it, I say? Speak at once!"

Our friends were silent; but they felt that their discovery was inevitable.

It is probable, however, that in the darkness they would have escaped notice.

No 85—BLUESKIN

As George Wild stepped out on to the landing, however, his position on the threshold was occupied by another person.

As soon as he saw who the second comer was, Jack uttered a cry and sprang forward.

It was Edgworth Bess who had appeared upon the threshold.

She echoed the cry to which Jack Sheppard had given utterance, and sprang forward to him.

George Wild uttered a horrible curse, and drew his sword.

Blueskin did the like.

Edgworth Bess clung to Jack's arm with passionate tightness.

But he put her on one side, and he too drew his sword.

The reader will scarcely require an explanation of the apparently singular circumstance of Edgworth Bess and Wild junior being in the room together.

In pursuance of that plan of action upon which he had decided, Wild junior had paid her one of those stealthy nocturnal visits, his object being to still further delude and impose upon her.

How far he would have succeeded we cannot say.

The progress he had already made was quite enough to satisfy him. Edgworth Bess, doubtful at first, had at last learned to put trust in him.

When Blueskin tapped at the door, Edgworth Bess was urging upon her false friend the desirability of embracing their present opportunity of leaving the house.

But Wild junior, whose plans were not yet ripe, combated her arguments in the best way he could, and persuaded her to remain, at any rate, a day or two longer.

The faint tapping at the door had discomposed both of them.

Wild junior knew not what to think of it, and for probably the first time in his life hesitated what he should do.

He whispered to Edgworth Bess and told her there was danger.

Then he fancied he must have been deceived by some slight accidental noise, and so he flung open the door in the manner we have recorded.

Being under this impression, it is probable that he would have retired into the room again without having perceived our friends, had it not been for the effect which the appearance of Edgworth Bess produced.

Wild junior had his failings, but cowardice was not one of them.

Although he was singly opposed to two men, who he well knew were about the most desperate characters that ever existed, he did not hesitate to attack them.

Their blades rang together with a clashing sound.

Jack Sheppard fought at a disadvantage.

Edgworth Bess clung tightly to him, and prevented him from moving with freedom.

And not only that, but he was terribly alarmed for fear she should receive some injury.

The din made was truly terrific.

The whole of Jonathan Wild's household would quickly be aroused, and our friends would find it difficult, if not impossible, to escape.

Moreover, there were palpable signs that the fire had already made alarming progress.

Up the staircase, as up some huge chimney, there came dense volumes of curling smoke.

The air, too, that was around them grew rapidly hot.

Through the crevices in the flooring the smoke came and the heat too.

The fire had, indeed, made much more rapid progress than Blueskin had calculated upon.

The materials he had accumulated were of a very combustible character, and they had given out a great quantity of flame.

This had seized upon the wainscot, which being old was exceedingly dry, and it burned like so much tinder.

In less than ten minutes after they had left that room on the first floor the interior was just like a raging furnace.

Of course the flames spread to the adjoining chambers; and now, while the terrific combat between Wild junior and his two assailants was taking place on the landing, the fire continued to spread and to take a firmer hold upon the building.

Still the swords clashed furiously.

Wild junior bawled out at the top of his voice for assistance.

But no one appeared to take the least notice of his cries.

A confused roar of many voices came faintly upon his ear, and that was all.

And still the smoke continued to pour up the staircase in ever-increasing quantities.

CHAPTER CCCCX.

FERILS AND DANGERS THICKEN ABOUT THE FUGITIVES
IN THE THIEF-TAKER'S ABODE.

HAD Wild junior happened to have been possessed of fire-arms, he would certainly have inflicted some severe injury upon his assailants; but he had nothing but his sword, and with this he laid about him with right good will.

He was perfect master of the use of his weapon, and his attack was characterised by great impetuousness, so that our friends were fully occupied in warding off his blows.

Jack had pistols in his pockets; but he could not get at to use them.

Blueskin, too, was similarly provided, and with his left hand he felt in his pockets for one, and cocked it.

This, however, was not done in a moment.

It was no easy thing to do while his right arm was so fully occupied as it was, and while it was necessary that the whole of his attention should be directed elsewhere.

At last, however, the pistol was cocked, and he rapidly brought the weapon to a level, and pulled the trigger.

A blinding flash and a loud report instantly followed.

The discharge of the pistol mingled with a shriek of agony that came from the lips of Wild junior, who, with that awful cry, fell gasping to the ground.

It was rather too bad, but we could scarcely expect that Blueskin would be over gentle with one who had taken such pains to make himself their implacable enemy.

Besides, their situation was so desperate that it could only be improved by some desperate act.

"Now!" cried Blueskin, as soon as he witnessed the result of his shot. "Quick, Jack—quick! There is yet hope for us if we are quick."

"Lead the way, then," cried Jack Sheppard, "and I will follow with Edgworth Bess."

Blueskin did not hesitate a moment, but rushed towards the head of the staircase.

But the smoke by this time had increased so much in density that he was compelled to retreat.

Not only was the smoke pungent, but it was scorching-hot, like the air in the interior of a furnace.

His heart sank within him, for now it seemed as though they were doomed to perish in the flames which had destroyed the building and seized upon every piece of woodwork with a rapidity that was awful in the extreme.

Edgworth Bess was almost swooning with affright, and had it not been for the frantic manner in which she clung to Jack's arm, it is probable she would have sunk to the ground.

She gave herself up for lost.

She was sickened and horrified, as well as frightened, by the combat which had just terminated.

The sudden death of the person she had looked upon as a deliverer and friend filled her with horror.

"What is to be done?" said Jack, whose pale face showed how anxious and alarmed he felt.

"We must descend."

"Impossible!"

"It is our only chance. You must cover your mouths closely so as to avoid the smoke, and descend the stairs with as much swiftness as you possibly can."

"Go on, then."

"Now, quick—follow me! There seems to be a lull in the smoke for a moment. Quick—oh, quick!"

With his drawn sword in his hand, ready for instant use, Blueskin precipitated himself down the staircase.

Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess followed.

But as for the former, he almost had to carry his companion down.

In another moment the landing was reached.

Here the fire was raging with the utmost fierceness, and Jack and Blueskin were literally blinded with the flames and smoke.

Just as their feet touched this landing, a demoniac howl came upon their ears.

Well—too well—did they know from whom that awful sound proceeded.

There was but one human being capable of it.

It was Jonathan Wild.

In another moment he came in sight.

He was attired hastily and partially.

His countenance was red with passion, and his eyes were bloodshot with angry rage.

In one hand he held his ponderous hanger, and in the other a pistol.

"Yield, villains!" he shrieked; "yield, or I fire! Yield, I say!"

Blueskin sprang forward.

He saw Jonathan was levelling his pistol, and so he struck the barrel upwards with his sword.

He was only just in time.

Wild's finger was on the trigger, and he was in the very act of pulling it, so that he could not stop.

Bang it went, and the couple of bullets with which it was charged lodged themselves somewhere in the ceiling above.

Exasperated beyond all measure at this failure, Jonathan Wild sprang forward, uttering another howl.

He waved his long heavy hanger around his head as though it had been a straw.

He was determined to sweep all three of our friends from the face of the earth.

He seemed totally heedless of the great danger he was in from the fact of the fire raging so fiercely.

It is probable that in his excitement and rage he was quite oblivious of it.

Rushing to the stair-head, as though to cut off all retreat, he waved his sword, and again called out to them to yield.

But Blueskin saw that Jonathan Wild was alone.

In all probability the other inmates of the house had made their escape from it.

Blueskin therefore attacked Jonathan Wild with great vigour and resolution.

We must pause here a moment to give a few particulars concerning the thief-taker, in order to remove all singularity from his sudden appearance on the landing.

While Jack Sheppard and Blueskin were entering the house, and pillaging it of its most valuable contents, Jonathan Wild was sound asleep.

Since he had made up his mind to be more quiet, he had got better very rapidly, and Mr. Snoxall was soon able to pronounce him out of danger.

But the apothecary feared that some night or other Jonathan would get up when he had no business to do so.

To guard against this, he had been in the habit of administering to his patient a rather powerful narcotic, which caused him to sleep soundly until the apothecary arrived in the morning.

To remove the depression which the opiate caused, a small quantity of cordial was given, which used to have such a pleasant effect upon Wild that he always clamoured for more.

On this particular and eventful night, then, he lay plunged in one of those deep artificial slumbers which would require something extraordinary to break.

It so happened that the room in which the thief-taker slept, being, as we have already stated, in the front of the house, was immediately over the room which Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had set on fire.

The flames ascended, as flames have a tendency to do, and very soon made Jonathan Wild's bedroom most unpleasantly hot.

Still Jonathan Wild slept on.

First came the smoke, and it was a wonder that this did not suffocate him.

It would have done so had it not been for the fact that the flames soon broke through the floor of the room and the smoke made its way upwards.

It was not until a long tongue of flame had licked Wild's face once or twice that he awoke, and then, uttering a howl of pain and fear, he sprang out of bed.

But his position was not much improved, for the boards were almost red-hot with heat.

Although his faculties were so clouded, Wild comprehended the exact nature of his danger.

He knew that the house was on fire, and that if he wished to escape a horrible and painful death, he would have to exert himself to the utmost.

It was just at this moment that there came upon his ears the sound of the conflict that was taking place on the landing above.

He listened, and could hear his son shouting frantically for assistance, his voice making itself heard above the roar of the flames and the clashing of the steel.

Then, somehow or other, there seemed to flash into Wild's mind just what had occurred.

Something seemed to tell him that Jack Sheppard and Blueskin were above, attempting to rescue Edgworth Bess, and that his son George was doing his best to prevent them.

At this moment he reeled and almost fell.

Then, all at once, he thought of the bottle containing the cordial, a few drops of which always had such a marvellous effect upon him, making him feel like a new man.

He knew where this bottle was kept, and he seized it and drew the cork.

The next moment the bottle was to his lips, nor did he remove it until every drop had been drained out.

The dose was almost too much for him, for the cordial was a very strong one, and only fit to be taken in very small quantities.

Suddenly, however, Jonathan felt his blood circulate like lightning through his veins, and at the same moment he experienced a really wonderful accession of strength.

He slipped on his clothes in a very imperfect manner, and armed himself.

Then he sallied forth on to the landing.

Just as he did so, the three fugitives descended.

The fiery redness of his face was no doubt in a great measure produced by the cordial he had drunk.

He felt that he had the strength of a thousand men, and that he could single-handed keep a whole army at bay.

About his own fate he appeared to be quite heedless.

And so, intent upon their destruction, and maddened with the liquor he had drunk, Jonathan Wild stood at the head of the stairs, determined to bar their passage.

The smoke and flames rolled up in incredible quantities.

The stairs crackled, and the woodwork was already consumed to a dangerous extent.

But this he cared not for.

It almost seemed that he had made up his mind that he would rather perish with them than that they should escape.

Blueskin, however, knew the extent of his danger, and determined not to be stopped by one man, even though that man was Jonathan Wild.

So with his sword he attacked him fiercely, and pressed upon him.

Wild would not give way.

To have retreated a step or two would have been equivalent to a defeat, for if his adversary was on a stair above him he would in consequence have a wonderful advantage over him.

And so from these reasons Wild preserved his ground manfully, and would not budge an inch.

How the contest would have terminated, and when, is very hard to say, had not Jack Sheppard come to the assistance of his comrade.

He drew a pistol from his pocket, cocked it, and pulled the trigger.

But the weapon flashed in the pan.

Jack uttered a curse, and under the impulse of his rage he flung the undischarged pistol into Wild's face.

Jonathan saw the missile coming, and tried to avoid it. In doing this, he gave Blueskin an advantage which that individual instantly availed himself of.

Striking the thief-taker's sword upwards with his own blade, Blueskin doubled up his fist and struck Wild a tremendous blow on the breast with his left hand.

Wild stood on the topmost stair, and he tottered.

Another blow, delivered nearly in the same place, completely overbalanced him, and with a shriek and a crash he fell headlong backwards down the blazing staircase.

CHAPTER CCCCXI.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES SUPERHUMAN EFFORTS TO PREVENT THE ESCAPE OF THE THREE FUGITIVES.

"THAT is done!" said Blueskin, as he drew back a step.

"What a frightful fall!" said Jack, with a shudder.

"What shall we do now?"

"Descend—descend!"

"How is it possible?"

"We must either make the attempt or stay here and be burned to death. If we can reach the landing window on the floor below, all will be well!"

"We should have a chance of escape then; but, alas! I fear it is impossible to descend!"

"We must try, I say! Quick! This is our only chance, so waste no more time in conversation; we shall never have a better opportunity than we have now! Quick, I say! Cover your faces as well as you are able, to avoid the heat and smoke!"

Blueskin uttered these words with great energy, and he set the example of acting upon his instructions.

But it seemed nothing short of utter madness to attempt to descend that blazing staircase.

It was like taking a leap into a furnace.

The balustrades were blazing in many places, and the stairs themselves crackled with the tremendous heat.

Seeing Blueskin make the start, Jack followed, though Edgworth Bess, who was half dead with terror, and who only partially understood what was going forward, shrank back alarmed.

Blueskin, however, by his example inspired them with courage, and, covering their faces as he had directed, they followed him.

But not only did they have to pass through a perfect atmosphere of flame, but the stairs felt red-hot, and crumbled beneath their feet.

Never was that staircase descended with more rapidity than it was by the three fugitives.

Blueskin, of course, reached the bottom first.

But as he trod upon the last few stairs he felt them give way beneath him, and his heart quaked for those who were behind.

Down came Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess with marvellous swiftness.

But, to his horror, Jack felt the fourth or fifth stair from the bottom giving way under him.

That was an awful moment.

His arm was tightly clasped around his companion's waist, and, pressing her still closer to him, he gave a terrific leap on to the landing.

That leap unquestionably saved both their lives.

Even as their feet left the stairs, they fell with a terrific crash.

A shower of sparks shot up, and for the moment the flame appeared to be subdued.

But soon it burst forth with redoubled fury, and then the remainder of the staircase was a pit of fire.

Jack and Edgworth Bess both fell when they reached the landing.

They quickly recovered their feet, however, and in doing this they they were assisted by Blueskin.

The three fugitives, half suffocated and half scorched as they were, cast around them terrified glances, for even then they were doubtful whether they should be able to make their escape.

Blueskin soon espied the window, and towards this they hastened.

To open it took but a moment.

Blueskin was the first to scramble through.

Then, standing on the shed as securely as he could, he held out his arms for Edgworth Bess, and lifted her out, calling aloud to Jack to follow.

Nothing loth to obey this order, Jack sprang on to the window-sill; but, as he did so, he heard a roar behind him.

At the same time, some one seized him with a powerful grasp, and dragged him back into the burning building.

Jack conjectured at once that his assailant was no other than Jonathan, who, by something little short of a miracle, had escaped from the consequences of his fearful tumble down the stairs.

Both rolled to the ground.

Jack grappled with his foe, and then he found that his conjecture was verified, and that he was struggling with the thief-taker.

Over and over they rolled, getting into frightful proximity to the roaring pit of fire which marked the spot where the staircase had been.

Jack's hands and face were burnt dreadfully.

He could feel his hair singe with the intense heat.

He would have been suffocated by the dense smoke had his face not been so close to the ground as it was.

Ere long, Jack felt that he had the advantage of his adversary.

Jonathan Wild was weak and exhausted.

By a sudden effort, Jack disengaged himself from his grasp.

When he had done this, he did not wait to do any more, but bounded to the window, under the belief that in less than another minute the roof would fall in.

No person who was in the building when that catastrophe occurred could possibly escape with life.

Jack reached the window, and got through it this time without any hindrance.

Under the full belief that Jack would follow close behind him, Blueskin had, without delay, assisted Edgworth Bess down the sloping roof of the out-building, and had finally enabled her to reach the ground.

Half a dozen steps took them across the little yard to the door in the wall which opened into the passage leading into Newgate Market.

This door, the reader will remember, had been closed, but not fastened.

Blueskin pulled it open immediately, but as soon as he got inside the passage he paused.

For the moment they were out of danger.

Their escape up to the present was something wonderful to think of.

But it encouraged them to make still further efforts for freedom.

Turning round, Blueskin missed Jack for the first time, and wondered what had become of him.

He apprehended the worst, and was about to return to the window from which he had just escaped when he saw Jack make his appearance.

Jack Sheppard rolled down the roof of the little out-building with great precipitation, and had it not been for Blueskin he would have had a serious fall.

He was saved this, and then his comrade said:

"Quick, Jack! Let us fly! So far all is well, but the sooner we reach the river-side the better. Come—forward, forward!"

"Hush!" said Jack, as he paused near the entrance of the passage. "Hark! What is that? It is the roof!"

A confused, roaring, splitting sound had made itself heard, and caused Jack to give utterance to these words.

Then there was a loud explosion, followed instantly by a crash.

The roof of Wild's house had fallen in.

The fire had reached its climax.

High up into the air flew the sparks and masses of burning materials, which soon after fell black and charred upon all objects in the vicinity.

As their eyes were fixed upon the upper portion of the building when the roof fell in, the fugitives did not notice a dark figure that crawled out of the open window on to the roof.

Tremblingly that dark figure cowered down until it lay flat upon the tiles.

It seemed to be gasping for breath.

The fugitives gazed with admiration on the column of bright fire that shot high up into the heavens, illuminating everything with wonderful distinctness.

It was by the aid of this bright light that the fugitives perceived, and all three at precisely the same moment, the dark figure lying at full length upon the tiles.

Just then the figure raised its head.

It was Jonathan Wild.

But his hideous features were so disfigured with smoke and so scorched with the heat that none but those who knew him very intimately indeed could have recognised him.

Gradually, and, as it seemed, painfully, the bleeding, blackened man raised himself up.

The eyes of the fugitives were fixed upon him in a kind of fascination, which they found it impossible to resist.

The glaring eyes of the villainous thief-taker were plainly visible as he rolled them horribly around.

He licked his scorched and bleeding lips with his parched tongue.

How he had escaped from the fire, or how he managed to get upon the roof, the fugitives knew not.

Truly did Jonathan Wild seem to have as many lives as a cat.

We can only account for his numberless wonderful escapes upon the supposition that he was destined to die by the hangman's rope.

There is a very old proverb which is still extant, to the effect that "he who is born to be hanged can never be drowned."

In Jonathan Wild's case it would seem that he who was born to be hanged could not possibly perish in any other way.

With a slow and painful movement, the thief-taker began to make his way down the tiles.

As soon as they saw this, the spell which had fixed the eyes of the three fugitives upon him was removed, and they turned round and fled.

Blueskin led the way, leaving Edgworth Bess in charge of Jack Sheppard.

Ere many minutes had elapsed, they emerged through the gateway into Warwick Lane.

The roar of the people in the contiguous thoroughfares came with increasing plainness on their ears.

They hurried off down the street in the direction of the river.

Ere they had gone far, however, Jonathan Wild crawled out into the first-mentioned thoroughfare.

He had guessed the route the fugitives had taken.

The open air revived him, and the cordial he had swallowed began to re-assert its influence.

He moved more quickly.

Reaching the lowest part of the roof, he gradually lowered himself, and attempted to hold by his hands while he dropped the distance.

But his strength was insufficient for this purpose.

He reached the yard with such force and suddenness as to deprive him of breath for a minute or two.

But all the while he did not lose sight of the idea that those three persons whose capture he so much desired were getting further and further away from him.

It was this thought which enabled him to rise to his feet and stagger along the passage and through the market until, as we have stated, he emerged into Warwick Lane only a few minutes after our three friends.

Wild was forced to cling to the iron gates for support.

The cool night air fanned his brow.

He passed his hand over his forehead, as though by that process he could clear his faculties a little, and then, with a grin of satisfaction, he fumbled in the breast of his coat.

After a brief search, which would not have been so long as it was had he set about his purpose in a cooler manner, Jonathan produced a large whistle which he always wore in a little breast-pocket in his coat, to which it was secured by a short steel chain.

Placing this whistle to his mouth, he collected all the breath he had in his body, and blew into it.

A shrill blast followed.

He repeated the summons again and again, and then he had the satisfaction of hearing the trampling of many feet.

Directly afterwards, he saw several persons approaching him.

Two were his own men—the others, officers of the regular police and a few ragamuffins.

Wild blew the whistle again.

The sound guided those who were approaching, and they quickened their steps.

But when they saw the black, bleeding, charred, and half-dressed figure clinging to the iron gates, they one and all recoiled aghast.

CHAPTER CCCCXII.

STEGGS FEARLESSLY PERILS HIS LIFE TO PRESERVE THE PAPERS RELATING TO THE DONMULL ESTATES.

JONATHAN WILD blew his whistle again.

Then the men who had drawn back recovered themselves a little, and with a feeling of great curiosity they pressed forward.

The thief-taker recovered himself somewhat, and then, with some of his old manner, he said, or rather shrieked:

"A thousand pounds—a thousand pounds—a thousand pounds reward out of my own pocket to anyone who will capture them, alive or dead! Quick—quick! That is the way they went—down towards Paternoster Row! Are you all idiots, that you stand stock-still? A thousand pounds, I say! Capture them alive or dead!"

"Capture who?" cried everybody in a breath.

"Jack Sheppard, Blueskin, and a young girl!" shrieked the thief-taker, making a wry face every time he pronounced the names of his hated opponents. "After them, or you will be too late! Down towards Paternoster Row they went!"

No more was needed.

Yelling, shouting, and screaming like so many fiends, away went the whole of the crowd at the very top of their speed, being stimulated to the utmost by Wild's promise of so large a sum.

The thief-taker got better.

He was satisfied now that he had done something, and he wiped his reeking face with a contented air.

"I shall have them yet," he muttered, with fiendish joy—"I shall have them yet! Curse this weakness, I can scarcely stand! How glad I should be to follow them!"

At this moment a man made his appearance, running down the lane.

As soon as he saw him, a fresh thought darted into Jonathan Wild's mind, and when the man was near enough to him for it to be effective, the thief-taker gave vent to a horrible kind of howl.

The man stopped short, as though he had been arrested by some magical process, and then seemed as though he was about to start off again.

His face was the picture of the most absolute and ridiculous fright.

But Wild spoke, and though the tones of his voice were discordant in the extreme, yet the man stopped and listened.

One magic word reached his understanding.

"A guinea," Wild had cried—"a guinea for a hackney-coach, if you have one here in two minutes!"

Never had that man run so fast as he did then.

It so happened that there was a hackney-coach close by, and he fairly earned his guinea.

"Where to, sir?" asked the jarvey, as Wild, with many hideous groans, scrambled into the vehicle.

"Go on down the lane," he said, "towards Paternoster Row, and keep behind a crowd of people you will see a little way ahead. Follow them wherever they go, and keep as close to them as you can. You shall be well paid."

"All right, sir!" said the coachman, who whipped his horses until they started off at a half-gallop.

He was inclined to think his fare would be liberal because he had seen him give a guinea to the man who had played the part of waterman.

Jonathan Wild, although he quite despaired of being able to take any active part in what would presently happen, yet determined to be an eye-witness of the scene.

He hoped to be, like some general on the battle-field, able to give his orders at the proper moment when anything required to be done.

For a brief space, however, we must leave Jonathan Wild and the three fugitives, and the troop in pursuit, while we return to the burning house, and describe what happened there.

If Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had had the least idea that the papers which were so vitally important to Edgworth Bess were concealed in a cupboard in Wild's house along with a quantity of other documents, we feel quite sure that the last thing they would have thought of doing would be to set fire to the house.

Yet this was precisely what they had done.

Already at some length have we described the fearful havoc wrought by the destructive element.

We have seen how things the most substantial fell a prey to the flames, and how could a packet of unprotected papers escape?

Besides, the roof had even fallen in, and after that, what hope would there be of recovering the precious documents from the blazing ruins?

Without them, Edgworth Bess would find it a very difficult matter indeed to substantiate her claim.

Perhaps she might never succeed in doing so, although she tried her utmost.

But if she had those papers in her hand, all would be comparatively easy.

The reader will remember how Steggs became acquainted with the secret hiding-place in which Wild junior had stowed those very papers.

He will also remember how, with a very great deal of cleverness, Steggs had concealed the packet in a cupboard in his room, along with a mass of other papers the property of Jonathan Wild.

Here they would doubtless have remained untouched and secure until the moment he wanted them, had it not been for the fire.

When that took place, the cupboard became the most dangerous of all the places in which they could possibly be.

Like almost everyone else in the house that night, Steggs was asleep, and little dreaming of his danger.

In obtaining the papers too, he had somewhat overtaxed his strength, and now, as a natural consequence, he was exhausted.

On this night then, and from the cause just named, he slept more heavily than usual, for this was the means which Nature took to restore herself.

Like Jonathan Wild, almost the first thing he heard was the clashing of steel.

But as the combat took place much nearer to his chamber than to the thief-taker's, he heard all with a much greater degree of distinctness.

Then he became conscious that the room was full of dense, suffocating smoke, and he inhaled so much of the vapour that he almost lost his senses.

Indeed, he did fall heavily to the floor, but as his mouth was downwards he recovered, for near the ground the air was cooler and freer from smoke.

By the time he was able to rise to his feet the noise of contention which had been going on outside had ceased.

This, however, he scarcely noticed.

When he made the alarming discovery that the house was on fire, the first thing he thought of was the papers belonging to the Donnull estates.

These he resolved to save and preserve, even if it cost him his life.

Should they perish in the flames, there would be an end to all his hopes of obtaining a cherished revenge upon his mortal enemy Jonathan Wild.

This revenge he could not possibly forego.

Accordingly, then, as soon as he gained his feet, he staggered across the room towards the cupboard, and flung the door open.

Dimly and faintly the contents of it presented themselves to his view.

"Let me think!" he murmured, as he clasped his hands over his brow. "Let me try to recollect, if I can, the exact spot where I placed that packet of papers!"

This baffled his powers of recollection.

As we have stated, he had thrust it in along with the others quite at random.

All he could do was to place himself as nearly as possible in the position in which he had stood on the occasion referred to, and put forth his hand.

This he did, and took hold of a packet, which he drew forth.

And now he found himself in another difficulty.

There was not light enough in the room for him to ascertain whether the packet he had taken hold of was the one he was so anxious to preserve.

It would not do to leave with any doubts upon this subject, nor would it do to linger where he was.

The air in the chamber was becoming insufferably hot, and the floor almost blistered his feet as he stood upon it.

But he did not experience so much discomfort from the smoke as he had done.

The reason of this was simple enough.

The dense vapour was making its way upwards.

The flames were approaching the floor.

Looking down, Steggs now perceived between the crevices of the boards, long, bright, shining lines of light.

Another moment, and the flames burst through.

There was now no lack of illumination.

Every object became clearly and distinctly visible, even as though shone upon by the noonday sun.

It now became a very nice question to know how long the floor would be able to support his weight.

Perhaps a few seconds only.

If it gave way, he would be precipitated into a pit of fire.

Already he could feel his skin dry and shrivel up, while his clothes became reduced almost to tinder.

Still he flinched not, but used every effort to ascertain whether the packet he held in his hand was the one he required.

A searching examination convinced him it was not the right one, and he flung it into the flames with a feeling of angry vexation.

But he did not despair.

He thrust his hand again into the cupboard, the contents of which he expected every moment to see burst into a flame.

Another packet was produced.

He took it as nearly as possible from the same place.

How much he regretted now that he had not been careful to place the packet just where he could lay his hand upon it!

But, then, who could have foreseen such a contingency as the present?

There was something about the look of the packet that made Steggs think it was really the one that he wanted.

A second glance convinced him that he did indeed hold within his grasp his priceless treasure.

There could be no doubt upon the point, for the bright firelight revealed all.

He hastily thrust the packet into his breast, taking extreme care to do so in such a manner that it would be perfectly safe, and then he looked about him for some means of providing for his own security.

A sudden accession of light filled the room.

The papers in the cupboard had all burst into a blaze, as he fully expected they would do.

Looking across the room, as well as the blinding glare would permit him, he strove to look for the door.

He could just see it.

But it seemed an utter impossibility to reach it.

The boards in the centre of the room were neither more nor less than red-hot, and, by their flaky appearance, it seemed as though they would sink and give way beneath the slightest superincumbent weight.

It would be madness to think of reaching the door, and then, even if he did, he questioned whether his position would be any better.

Close to the cupboard, near to which he stood, was the window.

He had not thought of this as a means of escape, because of its great height from the ground.

But now he was forced to it.

One step took him to this window.

It was a latticed casement, and he flung it open with ease.

The moment he did so, his ears were greeted with a loud shout.

He had been perceived by the crowd below.

Steggs climbed out on to the sill.

A cry of horror and alarm saluted him.

What to do now he knew not.

To drop into the street, which was an awful depth, would be mere suicide.

To remain where he was would be to court certain death.

CHAPTER CCCCXIII.

RELATES HOW STEGGS AND WILD JUNIOR ESCAPED FROM THE FIRE.

AFTER all that he had gone through—after all the narrow escapes he had had—after having, as one might say, accomplished his great purpose, it really did seem as though he was destined to fail at last.

How could he escape?

Now that the window was opened, the flames found an exit from the room, and came roaring through into the open air with ever-increasing fury, so that Steggs's position became more and more untenable.

With a cry of agony, he seized the window-sill with his hands and lowered himself down until the full length of his arms was reached, for if he had remained sitting on the sill he would have been roasted.

But even now he had not bettered himself.

The flames now burst through the windows on the first floor, and came curling upwards, rising higher and higher each moment, as though intent upon wrapping themselves round his shrinking body.

Poor Steggs shrieked out again, and the cry was echoed by the mob below.

He looked down and saw thousands upon thousands of faces upturned towards him.

They looked ghastly white in the firelight.

In front of Jonathan Wild's house and in all the adjoining thoroughfares a vast mob of persons had collected.

Every moment showed some additions to their number.

The fire raged with unexampled fury, and threatened the destruction of the buildings contiguous to it.

Steggs fears were entertained for the prison of Newgate itself, although its walls were of such a thickness. As the roof, the Governor and most of the officials of the prison were collected, doing their best to subdue the flames. But they defied all their efforts, and grew fiercer and fiercer than before.

Far up into the sky the flames upreared themselves, tinging the firmament with a ruddy brightness, and alarming the country for miles round.

All could tell that a conflagration on a fearfully large scale was going on, and all hurried to the scene.

In those days they lacked the means and appliances which we possess, and therefore it is not to be wondered at that the fire should obtain the complete mastery, for even now buildings are burnt down to the ground, despite the tons of water poured upon them.

And so the fire had nearly all its own way.

All the people did was to try to check the further spread of the flames, and to confine them to the building in which they had broken out.

An incessant roar had come from the crowd of people from the first moment of its collection.

It was the aggregated sound of some thousands of voices speaking all at once.

But when they saw the fearfully hazardous position in which Steggs was placed, all became as silent as the grave.

Everyone seemed to hold his breath.

No steps were taken, however, to render the least assistance to the man who was in so much peril.

Then Steggs uttered a shriek.

It sounded high and clear above the roaring of the flames.

"Help—help!" he cried. "Save me! oh, save me!"

He felt that he was being slowly roasted, and that the strength was gradually leaving his arms.

His fingers were losing their grasp upon the sill.

In another moment he was sure he should be precipitated to the earth.

But his cry for aid had been heard, and served to rouse the people to action.

A man stepped forward who wore one of those long ample cloaks which were fashionable for so many years.

He took this off instantly, and said to those nearest to him:

"Take hold of this and stretch it out! We shall be able to catch the poor devil when he falls!"

A dozen sprang forward and took hold of the cloak, which they held like a blanket.

Then the owner of the cloak said:

"Let go your hold! Don't be afraid! Let go your hold! We will catch you below! You won't be hurt!"

Steggs had seen what they were about, and understood it.

This gave him strength enough to continue his grasp a few seconds longer.

As soon as they spoke he let go.

Down he fell with frightful velocity.

But the cloak caught him, though the violence with which he fell bore it to the earth, and laid the holders of it prostrate.

Still it admirably served to break the force of his fall.

Indeed, he was quite unhurt, though, in consequence of his great state of weakness, he relapsed into a death-like swoon.

Upon this being perceived, he was carried off to the nearest hospital for his hurts to be attended to.

Here we will leave him, and return for the last time to the scene of conflagration.

Whether there were any more persons in Wild's house was what no one could tell, but they believed all had escaped, though the thief-taker himself had not been seen.

Suddenly, however, another shout came from the crowd, which signified that some one else had appeared.

This time it was on the roof.

It was a man.

He was crawling along on his face like a serpent, and he would not have been perceived had he not raised his head and peeped over the parapet.

The bright firelight played upon his countenance; and, had there been anyone below who knew him, that man would have been recognised as George Wild.

But how came he on the roof?

When Blueskin had fired at him with the pistol he had fallen down on the landing.

What was the extent of his injuries, or whether the wound which the bullet had inflicted was a fatal one or not, Blueskin had not troubled himself so far as to ascertain.

He had left him to his fate.

The wound was not a fatal one, however, for the end of Wild junior's career was not yet reached.

It was the heat of the fire that was raging around him that was the means principally of restoring him to his senses.

With returning animation had come returning recollection.

He remembered perfectly all that had taken place.

His wound was a serious one, and he had lost an immense quantity of blood; and now all objects swam around him, and his feet gave way.

He would have fallen to the ground, had he not seized the balustrades of the staircase.

These creaked ominously at the strain that was put upon them, and threatened every instant to give way.

Wild junior gasped painfully for breath.

Instead of cool, revivifying air, he gulped down nothing but dense smoke.

"I must make an effort to ascend," he said, "or else I shall be burned alive!"

Probably nothing else than such a contingency as this would have enabled Wild junior to crawl up the attic stairs.

But he did crawl up them, though it was very, very slowly; and he could feel them get hotter and hotter, while the smoke grew denser.

But he struggled upwards, for he felt that he was struggling for his life, and Wild junior had no inclination to say farewell to the world just at present.

The uppermost landing in Wild's house was at last gained.

But here the smoke had accumulated in surprising quantities.

With more presence of mind than under the circumstances anyone would have given him credit for possessing, Wild junior went to the window on the landing and flung it open to its full extent.

This had the effect of allowing the smoke to escape with great rapidity.

At the same time, by thrusting his head out, he was enabled to inhale the fresh, cool night air, for such it seemed to be.

This had a wonderful effect upon him.

He could feel himself grow stronger.

"The roof!" he said. "Yes, the roof! That is the only chance I have! The roof! I shall be safe then!"

While he had stood at the window the fire had made alarming progress.

This was attributable to a great measure, no doubt, to the draught caused by the open window.

But the landing was pretty clear from smoke.

The ladder that was used to reach the trap-door in the roof was in its accustomed position, and George Wild hastened to ascend it at once.

To remove the trap-door itself—which was covered on the outer side with lead—was almost beyond his strength.

But the flames beneath him continuing to rise, caused him to make the utmost exertions.

Little by little he pushed the trap-door aside until he had removed it sufficiently to crawl through.

The very tiles on the top of Wild's house were now hot, and they continued to get hotter and hotter with alarming and disagreeable rapidity.

Wild junior crawled down to the gutter, and then looked over the parapet in the manner we have described.

He shrank back again.

The people in the street were too far off to be able to render him any assistance.

He looked about him for some means of effecting his escape from his dangerous position.

His attention was now attracted by another shout, which seemed to come from somewhere above him.

He looked up.

On that part of the roof of Newgate which adjoined Wild's house a number of persons was assembled.

They waved their hands to him to approach them.

George obeyed, for he fancied that he now saw the means before him of making his escape.

Inspired by this feeling, he crawled along the hot tiles much faster than he had before.

The reader will remember that, although Wild's house adjoined the east side of the prison, yet it was by no means so high as the prison was itself.

Even from the apex of the slanting roof the distance to the parapet of Newgate was many feet.

Wild junior kept in the gutter until he reached the prison wall, then he commenced scrambling up.

He heard a cry from above, and then something fell on the roof before him.

It was a rope.

He seized it with a cry of joy.

"Tie it tightly round your body under the arms," cried a voice from above, "and then we will haul you up!"

Blessed words!

With trembling eagerness, Wild junior set about obeying this, the most welcome command he had ever received in his life.

He tied the knot in a moment, and signified that he had done so to those above.

Just as he did so, however, and before the rope was pulled quite tight, he heard a crackling noise beneath him.

Immediately afterwards the roof fell in with a terrific crash.

Wild junior gave himself up for lost as he felt himself fall a foot or two, and then stop with a jerk.

He had fastened the rope just in time.

Had he been a moment longer, he must have perished.

And what an awful death!

But it was not to be.

Those above had got firm hold of the rope, and they quickly enough pulled him up.

The fire was smothered for a moment, by the falling in of the roof, and by the time the flames broke forth again, as they did with redoubled violence, George Wild was in safety on the top of Newgate.

But he fainted away.

He was carried down at once, and every attention was paid to him, though the Governor of Newgate, as he rubbed his hands together, secretly hoped that the great thief-taker had perished in the flames.

Little did he dream of what had taken place.

Little did he think that, so far from being a dead man, Jonathan Wild was at that moment pursuing his prisoners with great vigour and determination.

CHAPTER CCCCXIV.

FOLLOWS THE FUGITIVES AND THEIR PURSUERS TO THE BANKS OF THE THAMES, WHICH IS MADE THE SCENE OF A TRAGEDY.

AND still the fire raged.

But its fury soon abated after the falling of the roof, for when that happened, almost everything in the interior had been consumed.

All hope of saving the building had been abandoned, and the crowd still stayed watching the havoc wrought by the flames, as though impelled to do so by some irresistible fascination.

It was hoped that all the inmates had escaped.

Almost at the first alarm those janizaries who were in the house had rushed forth.

There were only two or three.

Most of them were out in search of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

Many speculations were hazarded as to the origin of the fire, but we need scarcely say that not one of them approached the truth.

And so, in the presence of a gaping multitude, Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker's house, was burnt to the ground.

We use these words in a literal sense.

A large quantity of wood had entered into the structure of Wild's house, and one after another the walls had fallen down, for the house was a very old one.

By daybreak nothing remained but a smouldering heap of ruins, to look at which it was difficult to believe they were all that remained of a large house.

But so it was.

Beyond all doubt, when Jonathan came to realise the full extent of his loss, which certainly up to the present moment he had not done, his wrath would be very indeed.

Leaving all that remains of his much-dreaded residence and leaving the people gazing on the smouldering ruins, we will follow the fortunes of those three persons in whom it is presumed the reader feels the greatest possible amount of interest.

We have said how, after passing through the market-gates, the three fugitives had hurried down the lane.

Blueskin led the way.

In his hand he held his drawn sword.

He was fully determined to cut down any person who might be rash enough to attempt to stop him.

But no one appeared.

The streets were quite deserted; and gathering hope from this circumstance, they hurried along at the top of their speed.

Soon, however, there came upon their ears the sounds of pursuit; and when Edgworth Bess heard them she was ready to sink to the ground with fear.

But Jack Sheppard cheered her up as well as he was able, and told her how short the distance was that they had to go, and that when once they were on board the boat they would be safe.

This rallied the poor girl's energies, and she kept pace bravely with her companion.

Blueskin was just in front, and Jack took care to keep him in full view.

If he should happen to lose sight of him the consequences would be serious.

When Blueskin heard the sounds of pursuit, he became immediately attentive to them, in order to ascertain whether their pursuers were gaining upon them or not.

He soon found that those in the rear were gaining upon them rapidly.

So rapidly that long ere they could reach the banks of the Thames they would be overtaken.

It was necessary then that he should change his tactics.

Instead of continuing to go in a straight line towards his destination he began to wind about, in the hope that by rapidly doubling upon his course he should be able to throw his pursuers off the scent.

In this he appeared to have partially succeeded, for in a few moments afterwards they had manifestly gained upon their pursuers.

"Forward! Forward!" cried Blueskin. "We are close to the boat now, and a bold rush will do the business! When we once cast off we are right!"

This was by no means so right as Blueskin would have made out, for Jonathan Wild was not the man to abandon in a hurry any pursuit which he had undertaken.

Still it urged Edgworth Bess to make fresh exertions, though the poor girl was ready to sink to the earth with terror and fatigue.

And now another turn brought them into full view of the broad and silent river.

That was, indeed, a welcome sight to the three fugitives.

Blueskin knew just where the boat was stationed, and he was able to make his way towards it in a straight line.

It was between two tall warehouses that they caught a glimpse of the River Thames.

After going a few steps further, they espied the boat, and in a voice of exultation, Blueskin cried:

"There it is! there it is! All is well now! One more effort, and then we shall be beyond the reach of danger! There is the boat that will take us to another and a happier land!"

It was not until Blueskin spoke these words that Edgworth Bess obtained any clue as to what was likely to be their future proceedings.

But it was with unfeigned pleasure that she learned that they intended to leave England.

She pictured in a moment some happy country where Jonathan Wild was powerless to injure them.

Nothing could have inspired the young girl with so much strength and fortitude as these few words.

Her fatigue and terrors were for a time totally forgotten.

She bounded lightly and swiftly towards the river's edge.

JACK SHEPPARD, ON THE POINT OF ENTERING THE BOAT, IS SHOT BY JONATHAN WILD.

There was the boat close up to the shore.

Ned Cantle was seated in it, and when he saw them approach he immediately unshipped his oars so as to be in readiness to push off the instant they had taken their seats.

Blueskin reached the boat first, and leaped into it without delay.

He held out his arms to assist Edgworth Bess to follow him.

She seized them in a moment, and then as easily enough swung her into the boat.

Jack soon followed in the best way he was able.

The boat was rather a small one—almost too small, in fact, to carry four persons.

It sank down rather deeply when they entered it.

Just as Jack was scrambling into the hind part of the boat, the grating of wheels and the roar of voices in the distance came upon their ears.

"Quick, for your life—quick!" cried Ned Cantle—"cut the mooring-rope, or we shall be too late, after all!"

Jack cut the rope by which the boat was secured to a post driven into the shore, in a moment.

Ned Cantle dipped his oars into the water to give a vigorous sweep.

But the boat did not move.

The reason of this was simple enough.

While Ned Cantle had been seated in it awaiting the fugitives, the tide had run out, leaving the boat in shallow water.

Nevertheless, while Ned Cantle alone sat in it it remained afloat.

But the immediate consequence of the addition of weight which it received when the three fugitives entered was that the keel of the boat sank deeply into the soft ooze which had been left by the receding tide.

Several persons in the throng carried firearms, and a straggling, irregular volley was fired after the receding boat.

But it was already out of pistol-shot, and the bullets fell harmlessly into the water.

At this moment there came upon the ears of the tumultuous and excited throng that stood upon the river's bank the sound of oars rowed rapidly in the rowlocks.

Then, with a rush, a large boat came alongside, and a stentorian voice cried :

"Hilloa here, hilloa! What is the meaning of all this? Speak, somebody, at once!"

Jonathan Wild looked towards the boat that had come alongside, and then a perfect shriek of pleasure came from his lips.

The boat was a galley, and one of the largest of its kind.

It contained somewhere about a dozen men, all of whom were well armed, and attired in a kind of uniform.

The man who spoke stood up in the stern of the boat, and it was easy to see he was in command over the rest.

One glance was sufficient to inform not only the thief-taker but all the other persons on the shore that these men were the Thames police.

At the time of which we are writing, depredations were carried on upon the river to such an alarming extent, that it was found to be necessary to have large galleys filled with well-armed men, whose special duty it was to protect the craft in the river from the attacks of the Thames pirates, as the men were called who made a practice of boarding vessels which lay at anchor, and despoiling them of their most valuable contents.

Well might Jonathan Wild feel rejoiced when he saw who the arrivals were, and, in a loud screaming voice, he replied to the commanding officer in the boat.

"A thousand pounds reward!" cried Jonathan, who well knew that those few introductory words would have the effect of causing the utmost attention to be paid to all that followed. "A thousand pounds reward! In yonder boat is Blueskin, the notorious housebreaker! After him, I say! In the name of the King and Government I offer five hundred pounds, and I, Jonathan Wild, will give another five hundred pounds for his capture, alive or dead!"

"Blueskin, do you say?" said the officer of the police galley.

"Yes, yes!"

"And you are Mr. Wild?"

"Yes, yes! Look at me!"

"Well, I should not have known you!—you look as though you had been half roasted!"

"Curses! After them, I say, or you will be too late!"

"Pho—pho! We can go two feet to their one. Where do you say the boat is?"

"There! there!" said Wild, pointing across the river.

The officer followed the direction of his finger, and then perceived, in the far distance, something that looked like a small black speck on the surface of the water.

"A glass!" he said, to the man nearest to him, without moving his eyes.

A ship's telescope was handed to him, and placing it to his eye, the officer directed it to the speck, which by this time had almost ceased to be visible.

"Ah!" he said, "I see it. A small boat—a wherry. Two men are in it. One is rowing; the other is stooping down, doing something which I cannot make out."

"Yes, yes!" said Jonathan, "that is the boat. Your description is correct. Bring the persons in it—not forgetting the girl—to me, and you shall have your reward upon the spot!"

The officer shut up the telescope with a snap.

"Now my lads," he said, "you hear what Mr. Wild says. I would take his word for double the amount! After the boat! Bend your backs to it! This is likely to prove a good night's work for us, I think."

The river police uttered a cheer, and at once allowed their oars to dip into the water.

There were ten men, five on each side of the vessel, and each one had an oar.

One pull was given by all in concert, and then the boat shot out into the river like a racehorse.

The men were evidently highly stimulated by the reward which Jonathan Wild had offered, and they made up their minds to earn it.

This was a contingency upon which Blueskin and Ned Cattle had not calculated.

Truly was their position more perilous than it had yet been.

There seemed but little chance of their being able to escape.

They had a start, and that was the only thing in their favour.

A proverb, too, says, "A stern chase is a long chase."

But this is all the hope that can possibly be derived from a contemplation of our friends' position.

The police galley, urged by ten oars, flew over the water "h at least double the speed of their little skiff."

For a brief space, however, we will leave them, while we return to poor Jack Sheppard, whose position was certainly the more desperate of the two.

At the very moment when he felt more assured that he should make his escape than he had done at any other moment during that eventful night—when he was congratulating himself upon having achieved a victory over his enemies—when even he had succeeded in launching the boat—at that very moment was he unexpectedly struck down by the bullet from Wild's pistol.

Oh, that was indeed a triumph for the villainous thief-taker, and he chuckled hideously with delight when he thought of the extent of his victim's disappointment.

To strike him down at the moment when he did strike him down, was a glorious revenge indeed.

He would not have missed it for worlds.

As we have said, Jack Sheppard was seized by several of the crowd, and pulled out of the water.

He seemed to be quite lifeless.

He neither moved nor spoke when he was thus roughly handled, while from his breast there came a stream of blood.

All who touched him were of opinion that he was dead, and so he was left just where he was, on the ground, and no further notice was taken of him.

But now Jonathan Wild's thoughts turned towards his victim.

He had done all that he had the power to do in the way of ensuring the capture of Blueskin and Edgworth Bess.

Unfortunately for himself, his hurt prevented him from following in the pursuit, as he would have been delighted to do.

He consoled himself, though, with the thought that he had delegated it to persons who would strain every nerve, for no one knew better than he did what a powerful incentive so large a reward would be.

With his face expanded into a grin of horrible satisfaction, Wild watched the police galley until he could see it no longer, and then he bethought himself of Jack Sheppard.

He strode hastily to the spot upon which he lay, and for a moment gazed at him without saying a word.

The men who had been crowding round the body had shrunk back when the thief-taker approached; but one of the men now stepped forward, and said :

"What are we to do with him, Mr. Wild? I fancy that bullet has settled his business!"

Jonathan looked round, and then he saw that it was Quilt Arnold who had addressed him.

He had been about to utter something angrily, but now changed his intention.

"Is he really dead, Quilt?" he said.

"I don't know, Mr. Wild," was the reply; "but I fancy he is. You see the bullet struck him full in the breast."

"That cannot be," returned Wild. "His back was turned towards me when I fired."

"Then, if that is the case, the bullet has made a hole through him! Can you see where the blood is oozing from his breast?"

Wild looked downward. By the dim reflected light which came from the surface of the rippling water he could see that the breast of his victim was dappled with blood.

The crimson fluid oozed slowly forth, in consequence of the blood having coagulated over the surface of the wound.

Jack's face was turned upward.

His eyes were wide open, and covered with a glassy film.

His arms were extended, and his fists tightly clenched.

In fine, every appearance of a sudden and violent death was there.

"It does indeed look like it," said Wild, at length; "but I hope it is not so. If he dies by any other means than the hangman's rope, I shall be balked in my revenge. Take him up, some of you, and carry him!"

"I had better make a kind of litter, or stretcher, had I not, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes, yes; and then carry him to Newgate. I will follow with the hackney-coach, for I am sick and faint!"

Jonathan Wild was, indeed, sick and faint, and when he uttered this last sentence he reeled, and would probably have fallen heavily to the ground, had it not been for the interposition of Quilt Arnold.

That worthy, however, stretched out his arm just in time to save his rascally employer, and then he half carried him to the hackney-coach.

Jonathan recovered himself sufficiently just to scramble in and fall back on one of the seats.

There he sat, looking very little better than his unhappy victim.

The thief-taker had really made some remarkable exertions on this eventful night, considering the state in which he was, and now it is nothing surprising that a reaction should set in.

And a reaction it was, of a truly dreadful character.

It was not until his excitement thus suddenly subsided that Wild became conscious of the pain he was suffering.

Not only was there the ghastly wound in his throat, which was near being the death of him, but he was one mass of burns and bruises from head to foot.

The agony he suffered was most acute, and it was this alone which prevented him from falling into a state of unconsciousness.

The happy oblivion of pain which this would have produced was denied to him, and hideous groans issued from his lips.

In the meantime, Quilt had issued directions to several of the crowd, who dispersed themselves about the shore in search of materials with which to extemporise a litter.

Some rude planks were found, and these were deemed sufficient for the purpose.

When all was ready, the motionless body of Jack Sheppard was placed upon the planks, and carried by four men.

Jonathan Wild was then made acquainted with the fact that the cavalcade had started.

This seemed to rouse him more than anything else possibly could have done.

He shook off, in a great measure, the languid feeling which had weighed him down, and ordered the coachman to keep by the side of the body.

In this manner, then, was Jack Sheppard for the last time in his life, taken to the prison of Newgate.

Wild clutched the side of the carriage window convulsively, and leaned out on that side next to the body.

He was thus able to feast his eyes with a contemplation of his victim.

Slowly the strange procession made its way towards Newgate, which was at no great distance off.

This time, at least, there seemed but little chance of Jack Sheppard being able to elude the grasp of his captors.

Before they started, water had been dashed upon his face, in the hope of restoring him.

But it was in vain.

He remained as still as death itself.

And so, slowly though surely, the procession took its way through the streets, each moment swelling more and more, as other people, from curiosity or interest, joined it.

CHAPTER CCCCXVI.

JONATHAN WILD TAKES EFFECTUAL MEASURES TO PREVENT JACK SHEPPARD FROM MAKING ANOTHER ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.

AT last the corner of the Old Bailey was turned, and then the black and gloomy prison of Newgate came in sight.

Forewarily it looked upon those who approached it.

Then, in a moment or two more, the whole of the strange cavalcade halted before its portal.

Quilt Arnold now took upon himself the task of assuming the direction of affairs, and so he ran up the little flight of stone steps leading to the door that opens on to the vestibule of Newgate, and seizing the ponderous knocker with both hands, he gave such a summons for admission, that the whole street echoed with the sound.

Strange to say, however, such immediate attention was not paid to the knocking as one would have expected, and after waiting as he considered long enough, Quilt Arnold renewed the summons.

Then the door was opened, and there appeared on the other side of it a crowd of excited-looking faces.

Prominent among them was Mr. Noakes, the Governor.

It seemed as though he was about to make some angry remark, and then his eye fell upon the throng outside, and he remained silent.

"I have brought you a prisoner, Mr. Noakes," said Quilt Arnold—"one you will be very glad to receive, I am sure. It is Jack Sheppard!"

Such a yell of delight came from the lips of the Governor of Newgate, when he was made the recipient of this intelligence, that the vaulted roof of the vestibule rang again with the sound.

"Jack Sheppard!" he ejaculated. "Where is he?"

"Here!"

The Governor ran down the steps.

But when he saw the pale, inert body on the planks, he drew back aghast with surprise.

And now Jonathan Wild leaned his head still further out of the window of the coach, and, in his old shrieking tones, he said:

"Curse you all! Are you going to stay here all night? Take him, will you? Curse you, make haste!"

This was another surprise for Mr. Noakes.

He had not noticed the hackney-coach, and the well-known accents of Jonathan Wild's voice came upon his ear like a thunderbolt.

The reader will remember that he had been secretly feasting himself with the hope that Jonathan Wild had perished in the burning ruins of his house; and yet there he was, and, so far as he could judge by the voice, strong and violent as ever.

The thief-taker's words produced an immediate effect upon the throng.

The rude bier upon which Jack was laid was lifted up, and carried into the vestibule.

Jonathan got out of the coach, and followed it.

Then the door of the prison was closed, and the mob left outside.

The vestibule of Newgate was tolerably well illuminated by the numerous oil-lamps that hung about, so that all things could be seen distinctly enough.

Attention and curiosity were equally divided between Jack Sheppard and the thief-taker.

The first was unquestionably most seriously hurt, for even now he gave no signs of returning animation.

As soon as he perceived this, Jonathan Wild was in an agony of fright that his victim would escape the death he had designed for him.

He impatiently shrieked out an order for a medical man to be summoned to make an examination of his hurts.

A man was immediately despatched upon this errand, and he returned with Mr. Snoxall, who happened to be the nearest.

A better man could scarcely have been found, for he was well skilled in the treatment of all kinds of wounds.

In a very business-like way, he removed a portion of Jack's clothing, and then sponged away the blood that had clotted about the wound.

"Why," he said, at length, "there is nothing serious in the matter here beyond the escape of blood and consequent exhaustion. A day or two will put this all right."

"Indeed? that is good news!" said Jonathan, hoarsely.

Mr. Snoxall started.

He had not noticed that the thief-taker was standing in the vestibule, but he recognised his voice at once.

His astonishment was much increased when he saw Wild's horrible condition—covered with smoke, dirt, blood, and bruises.

He was about to remonstrate; but Wild, with a curse, bade him be silent and attend to Jack Sheppard.

The apothecary's statement was a correct one.

Jack was not seriously hurt.

The bullet from Wild's pistol had struck him in rather a peculiar manner.

It had passed through the fleshy part of the body, just under the armpit, and ploughing the flesh along the ribs, finally flew off at his breast, for when Wild fired at him he was standing sideways.

From this it will be seen that the wound was nothing serious, though, no doubt, from the manner in which the bone was laid bare, it was a most painful one at the time it was inflicted, and quite sufficient to cause unconsciousness.

Then the flow of blood had been very great.

In fact, Jack's body had almost been drained of the vital fluid.

Beyond this, however, no harm had been done.

Can the reader imagine the delight with which Wild listened to this?

All his hopes revived again, and he should be able to execute his darling plan of causing Jack Sheppard to be executed.

Stimulants were then administered, and Jack shortly after opened his eyes.

But he was in such a weak and exhausted state, that he evidently had no idea of where he was.

He closed his eyes again; but this time it was in sleep.

Snoxall looked up inquiringly, as he said:

"Where shall you put him?" Although the wound is not dangerous, yet he will require to have great attention paid to him."

A consultation between the Governor of Newgate and the thief-taker hereupon took place, and it was decided that Jack Sheppard should be taken to one of the strong rooms in the prison.

"I will never leave him now!" Wild muttered. "I will never leave him again! I will keep my eye upon him till the moment comes for execution, and I will take care to see that life is really extinct! What else may happen I care not; but, until his execution, I will never leave him!"

Such was the thief-taker's muttered resolution, and we shall see shortly how well he adhered to it.

A strong room was selected by the Governor, and into this Jack Sheppard was now carried.

He was as helpless as any infant, and, for some time at least, there would not be much trouble in keeping him secure, for he did not appear to have so much strength as would enable him to lift up his hand.

A bed was carried into the strong room, and on this Jack was laid, still in a state of perfect unconsciousness of all that was going on around him.

This done, they prepared to depart.

"You need not feel alarmed about him now, Mr. Wild," said the Governor, addressing himself aside to the thief-taker.

Jonathan showed his teeth like some wild animal about to bite.

"Why not?" he asked.

The Governor shrugged his shoulders.

"He can't move."

"I don't know that," said Wild. "Would you trust him?"

"Certainly, I would now."

"Then I would not."

"Mr. Wild, I know this young imp, whose execution I pray for quite as devoutly as you do yourself, has caused more ill blood between us than anything else. But, just for once, do me the favour of leaving him in my charge, and I will answer for his safety with my head."

"Bah!" said Wild; "I left him to you before, didn't I, and what was the result? No, no! In this affair, at least, I will employ no deputy. I will see to his safety myself."

"As you will, Mr. Wild. I shall always be glad to oblige you in all things. Would you be good enough to step this way?"

"What for?"

"To leave this room."

"Leave this room?" repeated Wild, in a shrieking voice.

"Yes, Mr. Wild," said the Governor, who was not a little alarmed at his manner. "You don't think of staying here always, do you?"

"Well, not always!" said Jonathan, with peculiar significance.

"I thought not. As for Jack Sheppard, he is all right now. He can't stir if his life depended upon it, and so you need not be afraid that he will break out of this room."

"Indeed!" said Wild, in the same tone as he had previously employed. "Indeed!"

The Governor looked at him mistrustfully.

He wondered what that odd tone meant.

No good, he felt sure.

But so great was the dread that he had of the thief-taker that he resolved to take no notice of it, for he was afraid if he did that he would only exasperate him the more.

Therefore he spoke quite calmly, and somewhat persuasively.

"Come, Mr. Wild, I give you my word this is a very strong room—very strong indeed. And look at the door. It is as secure as the door of a cell. Here are two massive bolts, and an excellent lock; so you need have no apprehension—he will be quite secure!"

"And so," said Wild, with a sneer, "in spite of all that has occurred, you would still be fool enough to trust to such things as bolts and locks to keep Jack Sheppard safe?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Wild?"

"What do I mean? Just what I say, and no more. Answer my question."

"What else can be done?"

"I will tell you, Mr. Noakes. That young villain has slipped through my fingers and baulked my vengeance more than once, as you very well know."

"And mine, too," said the Governor.

"Well, perhaps so!" returned Wild; "but I am resolved, now that I have once more got him in my power, that I will not let him slip through my fingers again."

"I don't think you need be apprehensive this time. Look at him, Mr. Wild. There he lies as helpless as any kitten."

"Bah! I shall not trust to that."

"Then you have some plan, Mr. Wild, for keeping him secure?"

"Of course I have."

"What is it, Mr. Wild?"

"I will tell you," said Jonathan, "and then you can pass your opinion upon it."

"Very good."

"Then," said the thief-taker, in a voice of malignant earnestness, "I have firmly made up my mind never to remove my eyes from Jack Sheppard's body until after I have seen him executed at Tyburn."

There was something so cold-blooded in the thief-taker's manner that even the Governor of Newgate shuddered as he said:

"Never take your eyes off him, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes."

"But how shall you manage that?"

"Simply enough. I shall sit with him, no matter where he is placed, and never stir away for a moment."

"Impossible, Mr. Wild!"

"Bah! stuff! I know very well that it is possible, and if there are any little difficulties in the way, I shall have to constrain you to remove them."

"But it is against the prison regulations."

"What do I care for that? It is quite clear that you are not able to keep him in safety, and so I shall take that upon myself. If anyone wants me, I can't be seen. Here I am, and here I shall stay; and I tell you once for all that I shall not leave this cell, or strong room, or what you call it, until Jack Sheppard does so."

"Well, if such is your will, Mr. Wild, I must try what can be done."

"Of course you must; and now, in the first place, fetch me a table and a comfortable chair—one that I can go to sleep in when necessary."

"It's against all the regulations."

"D—n the regulations! I must have them, and I will. Fetch them! And, look here, bring a stone jar of brandy and a cup to drink out of."

Mr. Noakes was not in a position to deny anything that Wild asked, and so he promised to obey.

This little conversation had gone on between them with great vigour.

At the close of it, some one tapped gently at the half-open door of the cell, and then Mr. Snoxall, the apothecary, entered.

He had been to his own house to procure some bandages and other articles necessary for dressing Jack's wound.

Wild came up to the bed-side and watched the proceedings.

The Governor, at a word from the thief-taker, set off to fetch the articles for which he had asked.

Even Wild was surgeon enough to know that Jack's wound was by no means dangerous.

Mr. Snoxall did his work in silence; and then, turning round to the thief-taker, said:

"Mr. Wild, what brings you here, and in such a condition as you now are, I know not. I have ceased to wonder at anything you may do."

Jonathan grinned, for he took this remark as a kind of compliment.

"Never mind what brings me here, Mr. Snoxall. Let it be enough for you to know that for some few days or so I am going to share this cell along with my friend Jack Sheppard, and so you will be able to attend to both of us at the same time."

In spite of what he had just said, Mr. Snoxall stared with surprise.

"Going to share this cell?" he repeated.

"Yes."

"Very well, Mr. Wild; but let me tell you that you are in a very dangerous state, and unless you are very careful I would not give so much as two pins for your life."

"You can attend to me here, can you not?"

"Certainly I can."

"Then do so."

"But what ever have you been doing?"

"Never mind. Don't you know my house is burned down?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, I got singed a little in making my escape—that's all."

The apothecary smiled at Jonathan's idea of being singed a little.

In reality, he was one mass of burns from head to foot.

Mr. Snoxall attended to him, however, with his usual skill; and when he had finished, the Governor, accompanied by two turnkeys, entered the strong room.

The latter carried between them a small round table and a chair, which were intended for Wild's convenience.

They were placed against the wall opposite to Jack Sheppard's bed, so that the thief-taker could sit and watch his victim to his heart's content.

Mr. Noakes brought the jar of brandy and a cup.

Jonathan sat down with a feeling of relief, for he was terribly exhausted; and after a few more words the door of the strong room was closed and fastened, and he was left alone along with the prisoner.

CHAPTER CCCCXVII.

BLUESKIN AND NED CANTLE ARE PURSUED BY THE THAMES POLICE.

LEAVING the thief-taker to exult over his victim—to feast his eyes upon him, and rejoice at his helplessness—we will follow, for a short time, those persons whose position when we last saw them was one of so much danger.

We allude, of course, to Blueskin and Edgworth Bess, and to their new-found but faithful friend, Ned Cantle.

Can the reader form some idea of the feelings of the former?

He had been congratulating himself that all was well, and that they should escape, when he saw Jack Sheppard fall beneath the bullet of his foe.

It was well for them all, however, that Ned Cantle had rowed so promptly into the middle of the stream, for had he not done so, or had they attempted the rescue of their companion, they would most certainly have been captured.

Still, Blueskin could not reconcile himself to thus deserting his friend, although he well knew that Jack Sheppard was able to look after himself.

He had faith in his power to extricate himself from a perilous position, but yet he felt uneasy.

Something seemed to tell him that Jack was in greater danger than he had ever yet known.

All hope of helping now was at an end, and so he turned his attention to their own position, which required all the consideration he could possibly give to it.

Edgworth Bess still lay in a swoon at the bottom of the boat, just as she had fallen.

His first care was to endeavour to restore her.

For this purpose he dipped his hat into the water, and sprinkled her face with the cool fluid.

It revived her in a few moments.

She opened her eyes, and gave utterance to a piteous moan.

Blueskin stooped down in order to raise her to a more comfortable posture.

It was while he was thus engaged that the police officer in the galley looked through his telescope, and reported what he saw to Jonathan Wild.

The fugitives were too far off the shore, and otherwise too intently occupied, to notice what was taking place, and they remained ignorant for some time longer yet that they were pursued.

Nevertheless, although all seemed well, Ned Cantle continued to use the oars with great vigour.

It was only for a moment that Edgworth Bess retained possession of her senses.

The full tide of recollection came back to her.

She remembered what had occurred, and with another shriek fainted again.

It was at this moment that Ned Cantle caught sight of the police galley swiftly approaching them.

"By heaven," he cried, "we are pursued!"

Blueskin looked round immediately.

"The Thames police!" he cried.

"Yes," said Ned Cantle. "You may depend they have been set on by Jonathan Wild."

"Row—row for your life!"

"It's no good! It's all up with us now! We may as well give in at once!"

"Never! never!" exclaimed Blueskin. "Lend me an oar!"

"What's the use of exhausting yourself? Can't you see they are coming up hand over hand? They go two feet to our one! They must overtake us!"

"Lend me an oar!" said Blueskin, seizing one.

"Now," he said, "make an effort. We have not much further to go. Yonder is London Bridge. Row with all your might. We shall escape them yet!"

"I will try," said Ned Cantle; "but I tell you beforehand that it will be no good."

Blueskin was well skilled in the use of the oar, and the manner in which the boat flew over the water was really astonishing, for his efforts were ably seconded by Ned Cantle.

Still the police galley gained upon them.

Not so rapidly as before; but still it did gain upon them, and in a manner to make the race a very exciting one.

In the distance could be seen the black arches of Old London Bridge, the whole structure looking more like some huge cloud than aught else.

Blueskin felt that if they could pass the bridge all would yet be well, as among the number of different vessels lying in the Pool it would be difficult to follow them.

But despite their almost superhuman exertions, the police galley came nearer and nearer still.

And now, having got as they considered near enough, the officer in command fired a pistol in the air.

On the river this was understood as a signal for a boat to leave-to.

But of course our friends paid not the slightest attention to it.

When the report of the pistol had died away, something was said in a loud voice, which was in reality a command to the fugitives to stop.

To this they paid no more attention than they did to the other signal.

Urged by ten oars, the police galley gained upon the fugitives in a manner that was terrible to witness, and Blueskin began to think that after all Ned Cantle was right, and that they could not possibly escape.

But for all that he could not bring himself to think that he had better give in.

London Bridge was now only a few yards off, and beyond that the vessel was stationed which was to take them in safety to Amsterdam.

The tide was running out with great velocity, and as they got nearer to the bridge they could hear the roaring, rushing sound produced by the water flowing through the narrow arches.

Old London Bridge bore but a very slight resemblance to the present one.

Its arches were exceedingly narrow, and rendered still more so by the platforms or starlings which had to be built round the buttresses to protect them from the action of the tide.

It required great skill on the part of the boatmen to guide their vessels through these narrow arches, and in spite of all their care and skill, accidents happened with alarming frequency.

By the roar of the water, Ned Cantle could tell that on the present occasion the greatest care would be necessary in order to guide the boat safely under.

The great obstruction to the water that these buttresses and starlings formed, caused it to flow through the arches as through so many flood-gates.

When several yards from the bridge, Ned Cantle shipped his oar and stood upright in the boat, holding it in his hand.

He knew the boat could not go any faster than the tide would carry it without incurring great danger, for the direction in which the tide flowed had a tendency to draw the boat against the starlings.

His task now was to keep the boat as nearly in the centre of one of the arches as he could, for by this means alone could their destruction be avoided.

Blueskin watched him anxiously.

As they got nearer to the bridge, he could feel the velocity of the boat increased until its speed became alarming.

By a skilful use of his oar, however, Ned Cantle succeeded in keeping in the requisite direction.

Another moment and they were under the shadow of the bridge.

Then the tide gave a capricious turn, and a cry of alarm came from Blueskin's lips.

But Ned Cantle saw in a moment that the course of the boat was changed, and he thrust his oar against the starling towards which the head of the boat was driving.

A collision seemed inevitable.

He pushed with all his strength, but he could not compete with the power of the tide.

Blueskin sprang to his assistance.

By their joint efforts the boat was kept off, though the prow of the boat grated against the wooden piles.

The next instant they were under the bridge and out in the open air, having sustained but a trifling damage.

Their first care now was to resume their oars, and make for the vessel which was awaiting them.

Ned Cantle, however, cast an anxious glance after his pursuers, and an ejaculation of satisfaction came from his lips.

It was immediately echoed by Blueskin.

The police officers in the galley had relied a little too much on their own skill.

They saw Ned Cantle stand up in the boat in order to "shoot the bridge," as the phrase went, and they resolved to make one desperate effort to secure their prey.

It will readily be believed that the large reward which Wild had offered called forth all their energies.

To gain so much they would not mind a little risk, and besides, they soon began to feel the excitement of the chase.

Shooting the bridge was no fresh thing to them.

They had done it safely hundreds of times, and they resolved to pass under at full speed.

This movement they fully expected would enable them to overtake the fugitives.

Two men stood up in the prow of the boat with strong boat-hooks.

The officer in command held the tiller.

Having got the boat in a proper direction, the men were ordered to bend their backs to their task.

The eight remaining rowers pulled as if for life and death.

As the flow of the current was so very rapid, it may be imagined how great their speed was.

It was terrible to look at.

The boat seemed to fly over the water, as though impelled by more than mortal power.

The men at the prow held their breaths, for should they strike against any projection while going at such a frightful rate, their destruction would be certain.

Even the officer in command set his teeth hard as he grasped the tiller, and strove to keep the head of the boat in the centre of the arch.

Then came a dark shadow over the vessel.

They were beneath the arch.

Another moment—or even less—and then all would be well—they would be free.

At this moment the cross current, which was so near being fatal to the fugitives, caught the boat.

The chief officer called out hoarsely to his men.

But his voice was drowned in a terrible crash.

The men with the boat-hooks were powerless against the tide, and the boat struck with full force against the wooden piles of the starling.

There was a loud cry from many voices, and then the police galley and its occupants vanished as if by the influence of magic.

Their terrific speed made their destruction certain.

Such was the force with which the boat struck that it was shivered to atoms, although it had been made of double strength in consequence of the kind of service required from it.

The men, each clinging frantically to their oars, were carried with breathless rapidity far down the stream.

It was this catastrophe which had brought the ejaculations from the lips of Blueskin and Ned Cantle.

Those enemies who had caused them so much alarm were now no more to be dreaded.

Their discomfiture was complete.

Not a trace of them remained.

"Now," cried Blueskin, "we have fresh hopes. Row, Ned, and all will yet be well! How far is it to the vessel?"

"Not more than half a mile."

"Quick, then!"

"All right; but you have nothing to fear from the river police now. That accident was a most fortunate one for us, for it has rid us of our enemies entirely."

"It has—it has! But do not let us trust too much to our apparent safety."

"No, it were best not. Can you see anything of them?"

"Nothing; and yet, stay. Is not that a head?"

"Yes; and there is another—and another!"

"Quick—then, quick! We must by no means relax our efforts. The officers will swim towards some of the vessels, get on board, and spread the alarm."

"And institute a fresh pursuit."

"Yes, yes! Push on with what speed you can!"

Away went the boat, threading its way with remarkable facility among the other craft at their moorings, until at length Ned Cantle said:

"Take my oar for a few minutes, and row onwards."

"What are you about to do?" asked Blueskin, as he obeyed.

"Give the signal that we are at hand."

"All right!"

Blueskin urged the boat onwards, and Ned Cantle stooped down and picked something up from the bottom of the boat.

What this was, Blueskin could not very well make out, for Ned Cantle turned his face in the direction in which they were going.

The next moment, however, he heard a peculiar rushing sound, and there shot up into the air a beautiful bright light.

It was a rocket.

After ascending to a certain height, it burst with a loud report, and a shower of fire came down.

Ned Cantle fixed his eyes steadily in advance, on the look-out for the responsive signal.

He had not long to wait.

Just before them a bright crimson light shone out of the darkness.

"That is our vessel!" he said, turning to Blueskin.

"Will you row, and I will guide the boat alongside?"

"Certainly!"

The boat rapidly neared the red light, and then Blueskin was able to discover the outlines of a rather heavy-looking vessel.

In another moment they were alongside.

Some words were exchanged between Ned Cantle and those on board, and then a rope was thrown, with which the boat was secured to the lugger.

This being done, the whole party were helped on deck. Edgworth Bess still remained insensible.

CHAPTER CCCCXVIII.

IN WHICH BLUESKIN DISCOVERS THAT HE IS BY NO MEANS OUT OF DANGER.

In this unconscious state poor Edgworth Bess was carried down into the cabin, whither Blueskin followed her.

His first care was to restore her to her senses, but this he found to be no easy task.

This second relapse was aggravated by a blow on the head which she had received when she fell backwards to the bottom of the boat.

Water was sprinkled upon her face, and her temples were chafed with brandy, but all to no purpose.

Ned Cantle remained on deck in close conversation with the captain of the lugger.

In a few words, he contrived to make this individual acquainted with the exact state of affairs.

On his part, the captain lost not a moment in giving instructions for the vessel to get under-weigh.

It was a small craft, but well built, and evidently constructed with a view to making great speed, though she had not outwardly the appearance of it.

Her crew was altogether formed of Englishmen, and the manner in which they obeyed their captain's commands showed that they were no novices in their trade.

In an incredibly short space of time the lugger was got under-weigh, and was slowly forging its way among the vessels in the Pool, as that part of the Thames is called that lies between the docks and London Bridge.

A sharp look-out was kept, for Ned Cantle fully expected that they would be pursued by the River police, who would not allow themselves to be baulked by the occurrence of an accident such as we have described.

The captain fully agreed with him, for he, too, knew full well the determined character of these men.

When once they pursued an object, it was but rarely they abandoned it.

It was, then, the best thing that could be done to get clear of the Pool as soon as possible, for it was unusually crowded with vessels, of course obstructing the speed of the lugger.

When they were clear of these they would be able to hoist sail at once, and then their danger would be much diminished.

At present, however, they could perceive no signs of pursuit.

Blueskin was anxious in the extreme to be upon deck, where he would be able to judge better of the state of affairs.

But he controlled this desire, and continued his attentions to Edgworth Bess, whose condition excited in his breast feelings of very great alarm.

At length his assiduous endeavours were crowned with success.

The poor girl once more opened her eyes, and looked feebly around her.

She was amazed and, as it seemed, half terrified by the strange objects on which her glance fell.

The rattling of the cordage, too—the hoarse cries of the men on deck—and, above all, the motion of the vessel itself—were all well calculated to inspire her with terror.

But her eyes rested at last upon Blueskin's countenance, which had on it an expression of great concern, and then she grew calm and assured, for she knew that she was in safety, or he would not be bending over her.

"Let me entreat you to keep perfectly quiet for a little while!" he said. "Let me entreat you to do so. Pray be calm! Our immediate danger is over, and I trust ere long I shall be able to say all is well."

"What place is this?" asked Edgworth Bess, once more glancing around her; "and what is this movement? and what are those strange sounds?"

"Compose yourself, and I will tell you. You are on board a small ship which is bound for Amsterdam. I have every hope that we shall be able to reach our destination in safety."

"And Jack?" cried the poor girl, in a voice of anguish, as she recollected what had happened to him—"Jack—

Jack! Where is he? Tell me at once! Do not—pray do not keep me in suspense!"

"I am sorry to say that Jack has fallen into trouble."

"Alas!" she cried. "He is killed!"

"No—no! I do not think that—indeed I do not! He may be hurt, and perhaps seriously, but not killed."

"But why did you not put back to the shore and aid him?"

"I wished to do so, but Ned Cantle convinced me that it was too late. I might have shared captivity with him, but I could not have saved him, so I thought it best to look after your safety."

"Alas—alas!"

"Do not weep!—dry your eyes! I think I can speak some words of comfort."

"What are they?"

"We are, as I have told you, on board a vessel bound for Amsterdam. What trouble we have had to get on board your little dream of. We should all have been prisoners by this time but for the accidental capsizing of our enemies' boat. This alone enabled us to gain the ship!"

"But what are your words of comfort?"

"Jack Sheppard, I firmly believe, is at the very worst a prisoner. Assuming so much, I do not think there is much need of apprehension, for past events ought to prove to you that such a thing is not to him so great a calamity as it is to others. He has a sort of talent for making escapes!"

"Well—well?"

"You want to hear my words of comfort?"

"I do."

"Well, then, they are these: I shall take the earliest opportunity of getting on shore, and when I have done so I shall make my way direct to London. I will then either save Jack Sheppard or perish with him!"

"And me?"

"I propose to leave you along with Ned Cantle."

"Who is that?"

"The man you saw in the boat."

"Is he to be trusted?"

"Fully and completely."

"What then?"

"I shall supply him with funds, and leave him to take you to Amsterdam, in which city, or somewhere near it, I doubt not he will be able to find you a place of refuge."

"And what will you do?"

"I will save Jack Sheppard if I can, and we will both repair to Amsterdam with all speed, where we shall join you."

"And should you fail?"

"We will not talk of that. I have made up my mind to succeed!"

"Alas! Was anyone so persecuted as myself?"

"No one so cruelly or undeservedly. But come, cheer up! Do not give way to despair!"

"Where are we now?"

"That is what I should very much like to know. We are somewhere on the Thames, but that is all the information I can give you. I should very much like to take a glance above, and see how matters are progressing, if you would not mind me leaving you for a short time."

"No—no! Go at once! But return soon!"

"I will—I will!"

"And bring me a faithful report of how matters are going on above."

"Depend upon me!"

"Go, then, for I can imagine your anxiety by what I feel myself!"

Blueskin was much pleased to obtain Edgworth Bess's consent so easily, and to find that she spoke so reasonably.

He lost no time in leaving the cabin and making his way on to the deck.

Here all was calm enough.

Day had just dawned, and there came over the surface of the water long rippling streams of light.

A glowing redness, too, in the eastern horizon proclaimed that the sun was about to rise.

Ned Cantle saw Blueskin come on deck, and at once hastened towards him.

The captain followed.

"Is all well, Ned?"

"Yes, at present. But here is my friend the captain."

JACK SHEPPARD AWAKES TO FIND HIMSELF ONCE MORE IN THE POWER OF JONATHAN WILD.

Blueskin and the captain shook hands with each other warmly, and the latter said, in a rough voice:

"I am glad to see you, and gladder still to do you a service! You may depend I will do all I can for you!"

"Thanks—thanks!"

"Nay, never mind thanks! It's done willingly enough."

"Are we pursued?" asked Blueskin.

"At present, I think not; but I cannot tell how soon we may be. It is more likely that we shall than not."

"Is your vessel a good sailer?"

"Excellent. She was built purposely for speed."

"I am glad of that."

"You may have cause to be."

"How far down the water are we? In this dim light I can scarcely make out where we are."

"We are nearly opposite Limehouse."

"No further than that?"

"No; the fact is, the Pool was over-crowded, and we have had a great deal of trouble in making our way out of it. It is a great loss of time to keep dodging in and out of vessels, and as for putting your sail on, that's out of the question."

No. 87.—BLUESKIN.

"Of course—of course!"

"We shall get on all right enough now, though. It's a lovely morning for a run! There's a good stiff breeze, blowing from the right quarter, and we have got every stitch of canvas spread. Look aloft!"

Blueskin did so, and saw above him a perfect mass of sails.

"I do not understand it," he said, "but we are cutting through the water at a good rate."

"Yes; and when we get lower down the stream, we shall make better progress still."

The captain now hurried off to issue some instructions to the crew, and Blueskin took advantage of this opportunity to speak to his new friend Ned Cantle.

"What do you think of the state of affairs now?"

The reply was a shake of the head.

"What is the meaning of that?"

"Why, I fancy the Thames police will make themselves known to us before long! Jonathan Wild is not the sort of man to suffer you to slip through his fingers without making an effort to prevent you!"

"Very true."

"Then look out for squalls, say I, for you may depend you won't have it all plain sailing."

"I never asked you, Ned, how far you intended to go with us."

"To speak the truth, I did not think of coming on board at all, only what has occurred made me think I had better do so."

"And what were your intentions?"

"Why, if there was a chance of such a thing, I thought of being put ashore somewhere between here and Sheerness, and making my way back to London."

"Well, Ned, I have a favour to ask of you, and I should like to ask it now, because time serves, and we may not have another such an opportunity."

"That is very likely indeed."

"Well, then, I need scarcely tell you that the misfortune which has befallen Jack Sheppard has had the effect of upsetting all my plans."

"I can easily believe that."

"I think the worst that has happened to him is that he has been made prisoner of Wild."

"I hope that is the worst."

"If it is, I shall not so much care—that is, if you grant me the favour I thought of asking you."

"You may be sure I shall do all in my power to aid you."

"Well, then, I want you to let me be put ashore in the manner you proposed to be yourself, and I want you to take my place, and accompany the lady in the cabin to Amsterdam."

"I will do that willingly enough! I suppose you intend to return to attempt the rescue of Jack Sheppard?"

"Just so."

"Well, I wish you luck."

"I can provide you with ample funds, and when you arrive I want you to find some place of refuge for the lady—somewhere out of the reach of Jonathan Wild."

"I know what you mean, and, what is more, I am acquainted with a place that will just answer our purpose."

"Better and better! May I consider that as arranged, then?"

"Certainly you may."

"That is sufficient! Keep snug, and I will take the earliest opportunity of visiting Amsterdam."

"And I hope you will bring Jack Sheppard with you!"

"I shall not come without him—but stay, we may as well have this matter thoroughly settled while we are about it."

"What do you mean?"

"When I arrive at Amsterdam, what steps shall I take to find you?"

"That is well thought of!"

"Some means must be adopted."

"There is no difficulty about it, whatever. I am well acquainted with Amsterdam, although it is some years since I last visited it. Have you ever been there?"

"Never."

"Then you will have to pay particular attention to my instructions. The finest and largest building in the whole city is called the Stadhuis. Of course you will have no difficulty in finding it. Well, opposite the back part of the Stadhuis, and abutting upon the canal, is a small beer-house, kept by a widow named Graacht. You will see it pointed up over the door. Can you recollect this?"

"Oh, certainly."

"Well, then, enter this house and pronounce the word Keizer. Let me hear you. That will do. When you say that, she will know you are a friend, and, upon your telling her you want to see me, she will send a guide with you who will take you to where I am to be found."

"That is a very excellent arrangement!"

"You will not forget it?"

"You may depend upon that! I am glad we have succeeded in so adjusting the affair. I trust that we shall get off without being pursued, and that an early opportunity will be found of putting me ashore."

"I will speak to the captain about that, and ascertain from him which is the safest place to touch at. It may be that he has some place to call at down the river."

"Just so; or he might put me in the boat we came aboard with, and I could row myself on shore."

"You might do so, but it won't do to talk about it just at present. Look there!"

"Look where?"

"Yonder! It is just as I expected from the first! The Thames police have got hold of a vessel, and are coming down upon us with every stitch of canvas set!"

CHAPTER CCCCIX.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE SAUCY KATE FINDS EXCELLENT HIDING-PLACES FOR THE THREE FUGITIVES.

DURING this conversation with Ned Cantle—and more especially during the latter part of it—Blueskin forgot that they were in danger of being pursued.

The words which his companion had just spoken came, therefore, upon his ears with great suddenness, and he looked around him with a startled air.

By this time the sun had fairly risen, and his cheering beams had dissipated the clouds of mist that hung about the shores or over the surface of the river.

All objects could now be readily perceived, but nothing showed out with so much distinctness as the vessel to which Ned Cantle had called attention.

It was a small boat, but it carried a great quantity of sail, and was, moreover, propelled by oars, the sparkle of which, as they dipped into the water, could be plainly distinguished in the sunlight.

It was evident in a moment that its speed was far superior to that of the lugger, and consequently ere long it would most certainly overtake it.

Blueskin looked upon this vessel uneasily, and turned an inquiring glance upon his companion, who replied by simply saying:

"It is no more than I have all along expected! While we have been talking, my eyes have been constantly directed up the stream. My only wonder is that our enemies have not made their appearance before!"

"They will overtake us!"

"Most certainly! It would be ridiculous to suppose that we could outsail a craft of that sort!"

"What is to be done, then?"

"We must ask the captain."

"It is a much smaller vessel than this one, and does not contain so many men. We could fight it."

"Such a course as that would never do."

"Why not? Would you yield without striking a blow?"

"If we were to engage with that craft in broad daylight, we should have all the vessels in the river down upon us!"

"But what is to be done?" said Blueskin, anxiously.

"I can see that she draws nearer and nearer!"

"You are right; but we must place ourselves under the orders of the captain. Here he comes!"

The captain could now be perceived approaching, and, by the expression of his face, it could be easily seen that he intended to accost them.

First, however, to make all things clear, it will be necessary to say a word or two about the vessel in the rear.

Ned Cantle's conjecture came very near the truth.

After the accident at the bridge, the police officers, who were in the galley supporting themselves with the oars, swam towards the nearest vessel.

The news of the accident quickly spread among the different craft that were at anchor near the spot, and they immediately lent all the aid in their power.

To any other men than the Thames police, the accident would have been a serious one.

But they could all swim, and were as tough as leather, and a good ducking was a thing they cared nothing about.

In a very few moments, indeed, they shook themselves and became quite recovered.

The chief officer was terribly angry to think such an accident had happened.

He did not waste time in regrets, however, but, like a sensible man, set to work to repair the damage done.

With this view, he in a very short time got the boat under his control which we have described as being in the wake of the lugger.

It was so constructed as to be used as a sailing or rowing vessel.

He resolved to adopt both oars and sails, and by this means he made very great speed indeed.

First of all, however, he inquired whether any other vessel had left the Pool, and was informed that the Saucy Kate had not long before got under weigh, but was now almost out of sight.

This intelligence caused the officer to ponder a little.

The Saucy Kate was a vessel well known to him as a suspicious craft, though he had never been able to make out anything direct about her.

But her starting off now seemed a suspicious circumstance.

In order to ascertain whether his suspicions were well grounded or not, the commanding officer directed the boat to a vessel close to which the Saucy Kate had been moored.

Here he learned that a boat containing three persons had been seen, but he could not learn anything as to their having gone on board the Saucy Kate.

As there were no traces of the boat, however, the officer decided that his suspicions were correct, and set off down the river in pursuit.

It was not long before he made her out, though she was a long distance ahead.

Still he had confidence in his ability to overtake her, and he urged his men forward accordingly, encouraging them with the prospect of the reward.

The men scarcely needed this incentive, for they looked upon the fugitives as being the cause of the discomfort they had undergone, and conceived a personal hatred against them accordingly.

Some even went so far as to feel angry with them for giving them so much trouble to earn the reward.

But when they saw how rapidly they were gaining upon the Saucy Kate, they felt more at ease with themselves.

Such being the state of affairs on board the police vessel, they will now return to Blueskin, whose position is one of the most imminent danger conceivable.

So impatient was he, that he could not wait for the captain to speak first, as he doubtless would have done, but he cried:

"Do you see that vessel behind us?"

"Ay, ay! I see her!"

"And what do you make her out to be?"

"One thing is certain—she contains police officers. They must have a suspicion that you are on board."

"What is to be done?"

"That requires consideration."

"Can you not outslip them?"

"Oh dear, no! Such a thing is quite out of the question! Look how they gain upon us!"

"I can see they do. Are you going at the top of your speed?"

"Yes; we could not crack on another rag of canvas!"

"It's all over with us, then! I can tell you, however, that I will not surrender without giving them battle!"

"Pho, pho! Who spoke about surrendering? Why, if you will just put trust in me, I shall be able to make you all right—that is, without—"

"Come, come!" said Blueskin; "speak out! You must not keep me in this state of terrible suspense! What can you do?"

"Well, it all depends upon whether the officers know you are on board, or whether they only suspect it."

"Well, what then?"

"If they have any direct knowledge, it will be difficult."

"But how can we find out whether they have or not?"

"We cannot find out."

"Tell me your plan, then."

"I will; and in half a dozen words, too."

"Make haste, then."

"I should first tell you that the Thames police have had their suspicions of the Saucy Kate for a long time—and not without good reason—but, thank the fates, they have never been able to verify them in any way. I have always been lucky enough to keep clear of them. Now, for instance, I have not got a single article on board that they could find fault with, and so I am right enough as regards myself."

"Well, what then?"

"You see I have got nothing to fear from this visit.

Now, the Saucy Kate is a curious old craft, with more hiding-places in her than anyone would think for."

"Hiding-places?"

"Yes. Now do you begin to see my plan?"

"Is it to conceal us somewhere?"

"That's it."

"But do you think you have got hiding-places in this boat that would escape detection by the officers?"

"Yes, I do, and, what is more, I am sure of it!"

"All is well, then. If you can hide us somewhere securely, we have nothing to fear."

"There is only one danger, as I said at first, and that is, you may have been seen to come on board."

"I don't think we were."

"Well, perhaps not; but, you see, if the officers know for certain you are here, they won't rest until they have found you; but if they have only got their suspicions, it will be another matter."

"We must risk that."

"I really do not see what else you can do, and if it will be any satisfaction, let me tell you that I have such confidence in the hiding-places that I feel sure you are all right."

"If you have not settled it now, it's quite time you had, for the police are close behind!"

"All right, we have settled it."

"Be speedy, then!"

"Come this way, then," said the captain. "I shall have to hide you as well, Ned. Come below!"

The trio now descended into the interior of the vessel.

"There is the lady," cried Blueskin. "You will conceal her first?"

"Certainly."

"And if there is any choice in the nature of the hiding-places, you will give her the best?"

"Of course. You had better tell her to come out of the cabin, for there is no time to spare."

Blueskin hastened to the cabin, and in a few words made Edgworth Bess acquainted with the danger that threatened them, and the means which had been proposed to avert it.

He then led her out of the cabin.

"This way—this way!" said the captain, who had taken advantage of Blueskin's visit to the cabin to run upon deck. "That lubberly craft is coming up hand over hand, and they have begun to signal us to haul-to!"

"You will obey?"

"Obey? If I do not, they will be sure to be suspicious!"

"I was going to say you had better haul-to."

"I shall, as soon as ever you are in safety. Look here!"

While this conversation was going on, the captain had led Blueskin and Ned Cattle down some steps until the lowest portion of the vessel, just above the keel, was reached.

The dim radiance that came from the small lantern that the captain carried was all that illuminated this place, so, as a matter of course, Blueskin was only able to see about him in a very imperfect manner indeed.

The captain, too, gave him no leisure for examination, for he said to him:

"Just hold the lantern a moment, and you, Ned, lend a hand!"

"Ay, ay!"

Blueskin looked curiously to see what was going forward.

The captain and Ned Cattle stooped down, and then carefully pulled up one of the planks just above where the keel should be.

A small recess was then disclosed, in size and shape not unlike a coffin.

"The lady must hide there," said the captain.

Edgworth Bess shrank back on hearing this announcement.

But her timidity was only natural.

A whispered word from Blueskin reassured her, and she answered that she was ready.

There was no difficulty about lying down in the little recess, for it was both wide and long enough for her to lie down at full length.

This she did, and the captain said, as he held the plank in his hand with which he intended to cover her:

"For safety's sake, miss, you mustn't mind a few disagreeables! I am going to shut you in this place, but I will promise not to keep you here a moment longer than I can help. If you hear a tremendous noise above you, don't you mind. You won't be hurt, and all you have got to do is to keep quiet."

"I will obey your instructions faithfully."

"That's right, then! Keep still, and I will come and release you as soon as I am able."

With these words, the captain and Ned Cantle fitted the plank very carefully over the recess, and no one would have dreamed for a moment that there was such a hiding-place in existence.

"Now, Blueskin," said the captain, "and you too, Ned, I have got to dispose of you, and in a word I can tell you how I intend to do it."

"How—how?"

"Well, my cargo is a great quantity of ale in hogsheds. There they are, look!"

The captain waved his lantern in one direction, and then a number of casks piled up became visible.

"Now, those casks are full," he said, "with the exception of three."

"And you will put us into two of them?"

"Just so."

"Be quick then, I beg!"

"All in good time! Here's yours."

The captain paused before a cask which, in appearance, no way differed from the rest.

He tapped it with his knuckles to show that it was empty, and then raised the head.

"Now then," he cried, "jump in! You will be all right!"

Blueskin sprang into the cask without hesitation, and the captain occupied himself with fixing the head in.

While doing so, he said:

"Don't be alarmed if I roll you about a little, or if you hear a tremendous noise. You are safe, and can come to no hurt."

"All right!"

By the time he had said this, the captain had completed his task, and Blueskin was a prisoner.

He now turned round to Ned Cantle, whom he served in a precisely similar manner.

Neither of them fully understood what the captain meant to do, but they were certain his scheme for baffling the Thames police was not yet completed.

With a great amount of impatience and anxiety, they awaited the result.

Scarcely had the sound of the captain's footsteps died away than they heard many hoarse voices, and the trampling of heavy feet.

Before they had time to speculate upon this occurrence, the casks in which the fugitives were concealed were turned over on to their sides, and then rolled to a considerable distance, much to their personal discomfiture.

But they were mindful of the injunctions they had received from the captain, and remained perfectly silent.

When the casks had been rolled to a certain spot, they were set up on end again.

They were then allowed to remain.

But a terrific lumbering followed, for which the words of the captain had in part prepared them.

This continued for some time, but what it meant they could not form the least idea.

Suddenly, however, they were startled by hearing a loud voice say:

"Ahoy—ahoy! Below there! All hands on deck!"

CHAPTER CCCCX.

THE RIVER POLICE ARE BAFLED BY THE INGENUITY OF THE CAPTAIN OF THE SAUCY KATE.

A CLOUD of mystery completely enveloped the Saucy Kate, and Blueskin was one of those who failed to penetrate it.

What was the meaning of what had just taken place he could not conceive.

But though he was so entirely in the dark, there is no reason why the reader should be, and therefore, before we proceed any further, we will explain some of the mysteries connected with this vessel.

In the first place, she was, as may have been expected, a smuggler.

With all the details of this, however, we will not trouble the reader, for they have no immediate connection with our story.

Let it suffice to say that the hiding-place at the bottom of the vessel—and which was so cleverly concealed as to absolutely defy detection—had been constructed for the purpose of storing lace and silk goods, or other articles of great value that are comprised in a small compass.

We have seen that it was quite large enough to contain Edgworth Bess, for it was empty, its contents having been cleverly disposed of some time before.

We may state that the Saucy Kate was looked upon as a vessel sailing between London and Amsterdam, and engaged in legitimate trade.

And this was the case, but she did a little smuggling safely and quietly, thus differing from those vessels that openly professed to do nothing else but cheat the Customs.

On the present occasion, the Saucy Kate was making a return voyage, and had no contraband articles whatever on board, being freighted with strong ale, which was to be delivered at Amsterdam.

The Thames police had some suspicions of her, but no positive information.

The captain was now in a position to laugh them to scorn, should they board his vessel.

The hiding-place in which Edgworth Bess was bestowed had escaped detection many times when a close search had been made, and therefore it was only fair to infer that it would do so on the present occasion.

But the captain resolved to make assurance doubly sure.

Blueskin, too, and Ned Cantle might be said to be perfectly safe.

The captain, however, had more than a desire to save them for their own sakes alone, though he was willing enough.

But it was manifestly to his interest to do so, for if the fugitives were discovered concealed on board his vessel, the consequences would be most serious to him, as he would at once be connected with some daring offenders against the laws.

What we have just said will be quite sufficient to make clear how highly important it was to his interests to conceal the fugitives effectually; and the means which he adopted were well calculated to achieve the end in view.

After leaving Ned Cantle in the cask, the captain hastened on to the deck, where he gave some hasty instructions to about half a dozen of his crew, who disappeared at once into the interior of the vessel.

In accordance with the commands they had received, they rolled the two casks containing Blueskin and Ned Cantle from their present position, and placed them upon end immediately above the hiding-place where Edgworth Bess lay.

This done, they set to work upon the full casks, and removing them from where they stood, stacked them up in rows, until the two containing our friends were quite hidden from view.

Long practice had made these men skilful in handling these large casks, and they performed their arduous labour with great ease and rapidity.

In much less time than one would have considered possible for the performance of such an amount of work, they had removed the whole of the casks, and stacked them up in a manner that would prevent all suspicion of their having been removed.

In the meantime, let us see what was going on on deck.

After issuing his orders to the men, the captain looked towards the boat containing the river police, and found that it was much nearer than before.

Several shots had been fired, doubtless as signals for the Saucy Kate to heave-to; but no notice had been taken of them.

The captain took a telescope, and had a good look at the vessel in chase.

She was coming along at an alarming rate, and even as the captain gazed another pistol was fired.

He saw the flash of blue smoke, and then the next moment the report reverberated over the sunlit waters.

After noting the distance between them, the captain shook his head, and muttered:

"We are not ready to heave-to yet; but we will reply to their signal, and that will give us time."

He took a pistol from his pocket as he uttered these words, and fired.

It was a large holster pistol, and the report sounded with great effect.

Scarcely had the echoes died away than it was replied to by another shot from the police vessel, after which there could be no reasonable pretence for not attending to the order to heave-to.

The captain therefore was compelled to issue the necessary directions to his men, though he would fain have put it off a little while.

Still a considerable distance intervened between the two vessels, and some time would necessarily have to elapse before the police could board.

Before then, the captain hoped that all his arrangements would be completed.

The Saucy Kate was now brought-to, and her rapid motion was exchanged for a dull, plunging movement.

The captain watched the approach of the pursuing vessel with great interest, and he could not repress a certain amount of admiration when he saw how skillfully she was handled.

At length the police vessel was near enough to be hailed, and the captain resolved to boldly take the lead in the affair.

Seizing a speaking-trumpet, he placed it to his lips, and shouted:

"Boat ahoy! Who are you?"

There was an immediate commotion on board the other vessel, and then a voice replied:

"His Majesty's Thames Police! Heave-to!"

"Heave-to it is! Do you want to come on board?"

"Yes!"

"All right!"

No more was said, and the police rapidly approached.

The two vessels were now very close together—so close that they could see on to each other's decks.

A few more minutes only would have to elapse, and then they would be alongside.

It was at this juncture that the captain passed the word for all hands to come on deck.

He was obeyed with true naval promptitude, and shortly had the satisfaction of learning that his instructions had been fully and completely carried out.

This took a great load off his heart, and he advanced to meet the officers with a smiling face.

As the two vessels touched, ropes were thrown, and they were made fast to each other.

Sword in hand, the officer in command sprang on board the Saucy Kate.

He was well backed up by his men.

"What's amiss?" asked the captain, with well-affected astonishment.

"You need not ask that question! We want three fugitives from justice who got on board your vessel while you were in the Pool. Save all bother by giving them up. It will be your best plan!"

The captain shook his head.

"Don't be such a fool," continued the officer, "as to pretend that you know nothing about it! If you are wise, you will keep yourself out of trouble by giving them up at once!"

"Who do you want?"

"You know very well who I want; but I see you are not inclined to act openly with me as you might do, and so I shall search the vessel at once. If I find them, I warn you the consequences will be serious to yourself!"

"If you are in search of any persons who have got on board in the Pool, you will not find them. You are in some error. I have only my own crew on board."

This was said in a tone of voice that staggered the officer; for, be it remembered, he had only a suspicion that the fugitives were on board.

Nevertheless, he did not allow the effect of the captain's words to be visible, but said:

"I can't take you at your word. Your conduct has been altogether very suspicious."

"As how, sir? As how?" asked the captain.

"Why did you not attend to our signal, in the first place, and lay-to?"

"We did lay-to."

"But not till after great delay."

"Well, I know nothing about that. I was down in the cabin, and upon receiving a report I came on deck. I could not make you out to be river police, however. The vessel was the reason of that!"

"There may be something in what you say. We got this vessel at a moment's notice, in order to continue the pursuit, our own boat having been dashed to pieces against London Bridge. But that is neither here nor there. I have my suspicions, and I do not intend to cast off until I have searched your vessel thoroughly in every part."

"Very good, sir. I don't wish to hinder you in the slightest. You have my full permission to search as much as ever you think proper; but, if you find anything on board besides my own crew and the hogsheads of ale which form the cargo, I will take the consequences!"

"You will have to do that, rely upon it. Now, my men, keep a sharp look-out around you! Half a dozen follow me!"

Six men rose up and followed their officer, who at once descended into the interior of the vessel.

Here they dispersed themselves, and every corner was rigidly searched.

But all was straightforward, and just as it should be. At last they descended into the hold, where they saw the casks stored up in the manner we have described.

To have removed these casks would have been a greater amount of labour than the officer would have been justified in taking.

The casks were, however, tapped with the butt-ends of pistols; but the uniform dull sound that was produced showed at once that they were filled with liquor.

But although they did not remove these casks, they searched all round and about them; for the police were not slow to perceive that they would form capital hiding-places.

Nothing, however, was found, and so, after a great deal more searching, they came on deck.

The captain now began to congratulate himself that he should be able to get rid of his unwelcome visitors, but he was disappointed.

As he came up the ladder on to the deck, a brilliant idea entered the head of the officer in command.

He fancied the three fugitives were on board, but that they were disguised as part of the captain's crew.

He resolved to satisfy himself upon this point.

He was sure no one was below, and when he came on deck the men were all standing in a throng engaged in conversation.

The captain came towards him as soon as he appeared, but that worthy could tell by the expression of his face that there was something more in store.

"This is the Saucy Kate, is it not?" asked the officer, when the captain approached.

"Yes, sir, it is," was the reply, given civilly and respectfully enough.

"What is the number of your crew?"

"Fourteen."

"Does that include yourself?"

"No."

"Very good. Smithson!"

"Yes, sir," said one of the police.

"Go down into the cabin with the captain, and come back with the ship's book. We will have the crew mustered."

The captain's eye twinkled when he heard this order, because he knew very well the police officer was on a wrong scent.

He followed Smithson down into the cabin, and gave him the ship's book, containing the names of the crew.

He quickly returned with it.

The officer first of all ran his eye down the list of names.

They were fourteen in number, so in that respect the captain spoke truth.

He could tell, too, by the appearance of the roll that the register had not been meddled with.

Had the ruse which he suspected have been put into execution, he would have infallibly detected it.

The captain was contented enough.

One by one the officer called out the names as they stood on the book, and as he did so the men came forward and answered, and then stood apart.

When he had done, the officer found that the number of the crew was quite correct.

Nothing, therefore, was left for him to do, but to admit that his suspicions were groundless, and to take his departure.

He did this with a very bad grace indeed, and got into his boat along with his men with a discomfited air.

No other course of action was open to him, however.

He was compelled to go, and he had satisfied himself by a rigid personal examination that those he sought were not on board.

Reluctantly he gave the order to cast off.

His men were not less sullen than himself, for it seemed pretty evident that they had taken all their trouble for nothing.

Having made so great a mistake as to suppose the fugitives were on board the Saucy Kate, they imagined all hope of achieving their purpose was at an end.

The fugitives doubtless were far enough off by this time.

Such were the thoughts that filled their minds as they cast off.

They quickly dropped astern, and the order was given for the Saucy Kate to get underweigh.

When the commanding officer saw her spread her white sails to the breeze, the fancy somehow or other came over his mind that the thousand pounds offered by Wild were drifting away.

Minute as his search had been, he now grew doubtful of it.

His feelings were shared in by his crew, and to such an extent, that it was agreed that, as they could not possibly do any good by returning to London, they would take their course down the river so as to keep the Saucy Kate full in view.

CHAPTER CCCCXXI.

EDGORTH BESS IS RESCUED AT A CRITICAL MOMENT, AND THE THAMES POLICE STILL KEEP IN THE WAKE OF THE SAUCY KATE.

ONCE more, then, did our friends have occasion to congratulate themselves upon having had another narrow escape from their foes.

It was not until he had got the Saucy Kate fairly underweigh, and had left the police vessel far astern, that the captain ventured to release our friends from their place of imprisonment.

Then he descended.

First, however, the casks had to be removed; but this was at length happily accomplished, and Blueskin and Ned Cantle were released from the casks in which they had been confined.

They were very much cramped, of course, and generally uncomfortable.

But such minor inconveniences as these they thought nothing of, being heartily glad to find that they had escaped the danger which had threatened them.

Their next care was to release Edgworth Bess, and the casks were removed from over the plank for that purpose.

The lid was then raised.

Ejaculations of surprise and grief came, however, from their lips.

Edgworth Bess was there, but she was lying in her prison as though lifeless.

She presented, indeed, every appearance of a corpse, and of the corpse of one who had died anything but a comfortable death.

Her lips were wide apart and flecked with foam, while her body was drawn up as though from the influence of a spasm of more than mortal agony.

Her hands were tightly clenched and bleeding.

Blueskin staggered back when this horrible spectacle burst upon his vision.

"Good heavens!" he cried, "what can be the meaning of all this?"

"Quick—quick!" said the captain, addressing Ned Cantle, who stood stock-still with surprise—"quick—quick! Help me to raise her and carry her on deck! I see it all now, and I trust we are not too late. That place must have been air-tight, or nearly so, and she has been suffocated!"

The captain had hit upon the true solution of this terrible occurrence.

The little recess was indeed almost air-tight.

It was some time before Edgworth Bess felt the suffocating sensation come over her, but when it did come, it was truly terrible.

She gasped painfully for breath.

Clenching her hands, she struck violently against the coffin-like sides of her hiding-place, and strove to shriek aloud for aid.

But a faint, inarticulate murmur alone came from her lips, and the sound she produced by striking with her fists against the woodwork was so slight, that it was not audible above the plashing of the waves against the sides of the vessel.

Still she continued her frantic efforts, though all she did was to still further exhaust herself.

Blood streamed from her delicate hands as she bruised them against the hard timbers; but she heeded it not.

She continued her exertions with the same vigour.

At last her strength failed her.

Foam gathered about her lips, and dreadful pains racked her limbs.

Then all became a blank.

She was in this death-like state when the officers examined the hold.

In one way it was as well that she had swooned, or some faint sound might have reached the acute ears of those suspicious men.

But all was as silent as the very grave itself.

Ned Cantle sprang forward in a moment to obey the captain's command, which was certainly a good one; for, under the circumstances, nothing better could be done than to take the poor sufferer on to the deck.

Blueskin followed like one stupefied, for he fully believed that the young girl was dead.

Such was not the case, however.

She still lived; though if she had remained much longer in that recess, she would have ceased to exist.

Upon getting her on deck, every attention was paid to her, and ere long they had the satisfaction of seeing her recover from what bore so close a semblance to death itself as to be undistinguishable from it.

The fresh sea air soon had the effect of completely restoring her, though she was very, very weak.

We altogether despair of being able to convey an idea of Blueskin's joy when he saw her once more in life.

"Cheer up!" said the captain—"all is well! In twelve hours at least we shall come in sight of the coast of Holland, that is, if this favourable weather continues. Be of good heart—the danger is past!"

This accident to Edgworth Bess had the effect of driving out of Blueskin's mind the course of action he had decided upon.

How long his forgetfulness would have lasted is hard to say.

It was Edgworth Bess herself who reminded him of it.

He promised to see to it without delay, and started off to confer with the captain.

Of course, the sooner he was put on shore the better, inasmuch as he should arrive in London all the more speedily.

He was already much further down the river than he intended to be, and therefore he resolved to leave as soon as possible.

With this view, he approached the captain and made him acquainted with his intentions.

"It is impossible!" was the reply.

"Impossible? How so?"

"Take this telescope and look through it—that will give you the best answer to your question!"

Not without a certain amount of surprise, Blueskin took the telescope as he had been directed.

"Now!" continued the captain—"just look in our wake, will you, and tell me what you can see?"

Blueskin levelled the instrument in the direction indicated, and, after looking about for a moment, he caught sight of some small object.

He looked at it with more attention, and adjusted the focus of the telescope so as to suit his eye.

He then caught sight of a vessel, upon the white sails of which the morning sun shone with great power and beauty.

She was too far off for her crew to be perceived, and yet there she was, clearly enough following dead in their wake.

"What do you make her out to be?" asked the captain, after a pause.

"I cannot make her out to be anything else but a vessel!"

"You do not recognise her, then?"

"No!"

"It is the vessel containing the river police, who paid us a visit a little while ago!"

"Then they are retreating?"

"Nothing of the kind! They have evidently changed their course. They have tacked round."

"Are they following us?"

"Yes! and they manage to keep just about the same distance in the rear."

"But what can be their motive?"

"That is best known to themselves."

"Cannot you hazard a guess?"

"Well, yes! If I am to give my opinion, it is this—they are not altogether satisfied with their search, and are following us in the hope of being able to make out something."

"Do you think so?"

"I feel pretty well sure of it. So you see now how it is that it is impossible for you to land—at any rate, just at present. I have no doubt they are watching us closely with their glasses, and they would at once perceive you put off in a boat. No, it must not be thought of just at present!"

"But at night?" urged Blueskin.

"Well, that will be another matter; but I fancy we shall be fairly out to sea by that time. We must wait and see, however; perhaps we shall tire the patience of those gentlemen yonder!"

This was but a poor consolation, though. Blueskin could see very plainly that it would never do to attempt to effect a landing, for, if he did, their position would be dangerous in the extreme.

He did not make Edgworth Bess acquainted with the exact state of affairs, but simply told her that at present it would be unsafe for him to land, as the vessel containing the police officers was in sight; but he assured her that he would go on shore at the first opportunity.

With this the poor girl was obliged to be content, though she shed tears of bitter anguish when she thought of Jack Sheppard's terrible situation.

The Saucy Kate was now under full sail, and scudding over the smooth surface of the Thames before a brisk wind.

Still, as they looked back from time to time, they could perceive the police vessel apparently just the same distance in the rear.

Blueskin himself was not a whit less anxious than Edgworth Bess.

Fain would he, at all risks, have made his way to the shore, and hastened on to London, for he felt that Jack stood greatly in need of his aid and assistance.

But while the present state of things continued it was impossible.

As the Thames grew wider and wider, and of necessity the shore more and more distant, Blueskin's anxiety increased.

Then he noticed, too, that the wind increased greatly in force, though it was still nothing more than what a sailor would call a stiff and favourable breeze.

If the force of the wind, however, continued to increase, that breeze would soon become a gale.

As a matter of course, the speed of the Saucy Kate was much increased, but the wind enabled the police to maintain the same distance.

Blueskin was in despair.

He wished the speed of the vessel to be retarded, not accelerated.

At length, so much did the breeze increase that it was found necessary to take in some of the sails.

And now a preternatural darkness began to spread itself over the surface of the water.

Clouds began to pile themselves up in the sky, and the waves had a strange lurid tint.

The air, too, became perceptibly colder.

More sail was now taken in, but still the Saucy Kate ploughed the waters at a furious rate.

Darker and darker grew the sky, and the weather portents became more and more ominous.

Blueskin had all this time been watching the vessel in the rear, but now he rose to his feet with the intention of seeking out the captain.

He found him, with an unusually grave-looking face, watching the clouds above.

"What is your opinion of the weather?" asked Blueskin, eagerly.

The captain shook his head.

"If I am any judge in such matters, we shall have a rougher night than has been known upon this coast for years."

"What shall you do?"

"Keep right ahead. The storm will be much worse near the land than it will be out in the Northern Ocean."

"Where are we now?"

"Just beyond Sheerness. If the gale will only hold off a little while, we shall be well out at sea, and then I shall care little, for the Saucy Kate is a good vessel, and has braved many a storm."

With these words, the captain moved off to give some necessary directions to his crew.

Blueskin looked about him with a heavy and foreboding heart.

Fate seemed set against his return to London.

To think of landing now was nothing short of madness, and so he said not a word further upon the subject.

Indeed, his whole attention was absorbed by the state of the weather.

The wind still continued to blow steadily from one point, and the Saucy Kate flew on before the breeze like some light bird.

But the clouds got thicker and thicker.

They gradually spread themselves until they covered the whole face of the firmament.

The sea looked white and angry.

The captain was continuously employed in giving orders to the men for the management of the ship.

To do this he was compelled to use the speaking-trumpet, for the wind had now increased to such an extent that he could scarcely make his own voice heard above it.

As they got further and further from the land, the violence of the wind and waves increased, until presently there came from behind one of the clouds a vivid flash of lightning.

For a moment every object for miles round could be distinctly seen, and then double darkness followed.

Then came an awful rattling peal of thunder.

The storm had now begun in earnest.

CHAPTER CCCCXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD AWAKES AND FINDS HIMSELF THE INMATE OF A NEWGATE CELL, AND JONATHAN WILD DICTATES A LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

LET us once more take a peep at the interior of Newgate.

It is to that strong room in which Jack Sheppard is confined that we would wish to direct the attention of the reader.

The time is the day succeeding the night upon which Jack Sheppard was again made the inmate of the gloomy City prison.

That same day when Edgworth Bess and Blueskin on the Thames were in so perilous a position.

It was a bright, beautiful, sunny day that made even dingy London streets look pleasant, but no rays of the glorious sunlight made their way into the strong room.

It was but a dim reflected light that at the best of times made its way through the grated windows, and on the present occasion all that told of the brilliancy of the sun was a slight increase in the reflected light.

Jonathan Wild had so far been as good as his word.

He had not left that strong room for an instant.

With the jar of brandy by his side, he had sat with his bleared and bloodshot eyes fixed upon his victim.

Scarcely had he for an instant relaxed the fixity of his gaze.

He watched Jack Sheppard as some wild animal might be expected to watch some unusually tempting and delicate prey.

At the slightest movement that was made by the unconscious prisoner, he would start violently, and lay his hand upon his pistol.

But up to the present time the movements Jack had made consisted merely in rolling over restlessly, or moving his arms above his head.

He had not yet awakened to the knowledge of where he was.

It seemed so strange that Jonathan Wild should adhere closely to the resolution he had expressed.

One would have thought that, seeing the condition of his prisoner, he would have left him for a brief space of time, while he paid a visit to his own house.

But no—Jonathan never moved.

Whatever desire he might have felt to view the ruins of his habitation he repressed.

He seemed to forget everything in his one great purpose.

It absorbed all.

This proved, then, that he was fully in earnest in what he had said.

He had learned with comparative indifference the condition of his son, and when asked if he would like to see him, as he was merely in the prison, he returned a snarling negative, at the same time repeating the resolution he had made.

This, indeed, was carrying out his intentions to the very letter, for he need not have been absent more than a few minutes for this purpose.

Whether time would have the effect of relaxing this rigid adherence to his resolution remains to be seen.

His self-imposed imprisonment had not yet lasted long enough for the novelty to wear off and to become tiresome.

Such a ghastly and horrible-looking object as the thief-taker was at this time had probably never been seen in Newgate.

His whole aspect was frightful in the extreme, and now his countenance was inflamed by the quantity of brandy he had drunk.

But this was apparently the only effect which the fiery stimulant produced upon him.

The thief-taker had partaken of a slight breakfast which had been brought to him in the cell, and since that time he had remained alone with his victim, and undisturbed.

What were his reflections during this period would indeed be hard to say.

The only interruption he had had was caused by Mr. Snoxall, who called to look at his new patient.

He declared Jack to be in a sound and deep slumber, which would strengthen and do him more good than all the drugs in the world.

After the departure of the apothecary, Wild had taken another deep draught of brandy, and then resumed his meditations and watching.

Towards mid-day the character of Jack's sleep changed. It no longer continued tranquil and trance-like, as it had done.

He moved about wildly, and uttered incoherent cries.

He was dreaming, and going through the transactions of the night before.

He muttered incessantly, and Jonathan endeavoured to catch his meaning.

In this manner the thief-taker discovered that he and Blueskin had broken into the house, and, having first robbed it, had set fire to it.

The words which he kept uttering induced Wild to rise and make an examination of the prisoner's pockets.

In them he found ample confirmation of Jack's mutterings.

He recognised the different articles as he rapidly brought them into view with all the dexterity of an accomplished pickpocket.

He could tell just what part of his house had been rifled, and he swore horribly as he transferred the valuables to his own pocket, leaving Jack without anything at all.

This done, Wild shrank back in his seat and awaited the awakening of his victim.

This would, he felt sure, ere long take place, and he looked forward with evident gratification to the moment when Jack should first discover where he was.

As he had expected, he had not long to wait.

Soon after noon had passed, Jack opened his eyes.

At first Wild did not know this, for Jack lay with his face turned towards the wall.

As might be supposed, he was at first only in a semi-conscious state.

He looked about him dreamingly, evidently not knowing where he was.

His whole mind was a blank to him.

But by degrees his memory came back to him, and almost unconsciously he found himself striving to recollect what had last happened to him.

For a time he was baffled, but by beginning at a certain point, he was able to proceed up to the time when he had stood on the muddy shore and endeavoured to push the boat into the stream.

But he could go no further.

After that memory seemed annihilated.

In vain he strove to force his remembrance further.

Then, naturally enough, he began to wonder where he was and what had happened to him.

How was it, he asked himself, that he was lying there without being able to remember anything about it?

He was bewildered.

And while these thoughts were chasing themselves rapidly through his brain, he remained perfectly still.

By degrees, however, he began to realise that there was before him a rough stone wall.

Then he wondered again where he could be, with a stone wall so near to him.

Strangely enough, he never surmised for a moment that he was once more an inmate of Newgate.

That contingency was so terrible a one, however, that it never once occurred to him.

He resolved to look further.

It is easy to account for his dreamy state, and the want of energy he displayed, by the quantity of blood which he had lost from his wound.

By degrees, however, he grew stronger.

He glanced upward at the wall without turning his head in the least.

Still nothing but the rough stone wall met his gaze.

Then, like a lightning's flash, the idea entered his mind that he was either dreaming or else the inmate of a cell in Newgate.

It could not be the former.

He was quite sure that he was wide awake.

It was too horrible to think the latter.

And yet it must be so!

With a scream he raised himself upon the bed, though only slightly, for he found himself almost destitute of strength.

But the one hasty glance which he cast around convinced him that his worst forebodings were realised.

The rough walls, the arched roof, the heavy iron door, and the grated window, they could not possibly belong to any other place than a cell in Newgate.

It was at this moment that a horrible, low, chuckling laugh broke upon his ear.

Instinctively and involuntarily he turned his head in the direction from which the sound proceeded.

For one moment his eyes met those of his mortal foe gleaming upon him.

The same glance revealed the hideous face and form of the thief-taker, from whose lips the chuckling sound had come.

Jack Sheppard, as soon as he caught sight of him, uttered a scream.

For a moment his lost strength came back to him.

That one glance at his enemy seemed to make him acquainted with all that had taken place.

With the scream we have mentioned still trembling on his lips, Jack Sheppard sprang from the rude bed.

Jonathan Wild started up with his pistol in his hand.

But this alarm was needless.

The prisoner's sudden accession of strength vanished as quickly as it came.

He staggered for a moment, and then fell to the floor of the cell.

There was a man outside the door who was, by the directions of the Governor, stationed there on guard, and now he made his appearance.

By his aid, Jack was raised, and unresistingly laid at full length upon the bed.

But Jack had not lost his consciousness this time.

It was his body that had failed him, not his mind.

He knew perfectly well what they were about, but he could not, for the life of him, make a single movement.

Oh, that was a horrible situation to be placed in!

To have the body like a mass of inert clay, and the mind strong within.

He could not even move his lips enough to speak, so thoroughly prostrated was he.

EDGORTH BESS, BLUESKIN, AND NED CANTLE ESCAPE FROM THE BURNING VESSEL.

But his brightly gleaming eyes showed what his feelings were.

With what words could we hope to convey to the reader an idea of Jack Sheppard's mind at this moment?

How awful, under the circumstances we have mentioned, must have been his feelings when he found himself, after all his pains, once more the inmate of a Newgate cell, and with his deadly enemy, Jonathan Wild, watching over him!

And to be so powerless as he was, too!

Oh, his heart swelled almost to bursting!

His brain burned, and he felt almost as though he should go mad.

Insanity then might even have been a blessing, and not a curse.

But he was denied the sweet oblivion of madness.

His body destined to lie in that deathlike state, and yet to be in full possession of all his mental faculties!

No. 88.—BLUESKIN.

That was a revenge more deep and subtle than the thief-taker, with all his cunning, had been able to think of.

It is some consolation, though, to be aware of the fact that Wild did not thoroughly comprehend Jack's condition.

Had he done so, his exultation would have been much greater than it was.

He did not think he was able to hear or understand what was going on, and in this belief, after once more glancing in his face, he left him, to resume his old position in the arm-chair by the table.

By degrees Jack grew calmer, but it was not until his mind was almost exhausted.

Then he began to speculate upon all that had occurred, and wondered what had happened to Blueskin and Edgworth Bess after he had fallen.

It was only natural for him to suppose that they had been taken prisoners, like himself.

Probably, at that moment, he thought, they were the occupants of cells adjoining his.

So anxious did he feel upon this point, that if he had possessed the power, he would have addressed himself to Jonathan Wild, and sought to elicit something from him.

But he could not articulate a murmur.

How long he lay thus, a prey to the most bitter thoughts that could agitate one's mind, he knew not, but he was aroused by hearing a slight sound.

A strong effort enabled him to turn his eyes in the direction from whence it came.

Then the door opened, and the Governor of Newgate entered.

He walked straight up to the thief-taker, without paying the least attention to the prisoner.

"I am glad you have come!" growled Wild. "I want pen, ink, and paper!"

"All right, Mr. Wild; you shall have them."

The Governor called the man on guard, and then despatched him for the articles named.

A silence ensued during his absence. Meanwhile, Jack lay listening and wondering what was going to take place.

In a few minutes the man returned, and the things were put down on the table.

"Mr. Noakes," said Wild, as soon as the turnkey had withdrawn, "I want you to write a letter, at my dictation."

"Very good, Mr. Wild. I shall be happy to serve you any way that lies in my power."

"Bah! Stuff! I would not have troubled you, only I am in such pain myself. I am suffering the tortures of the damned!"

"That is some consolation," thought Jack, who could hear perfectly all that was said.

"Who do you want the letter written to?" asked the Governor, as he placed the paper before him, and dipped the pen in the ink.

"To the Secretary of State!"

"Very good, Mr. Wild. When you are ready, I am waiting."

"Pour yourself out a drop of brandy, and then we will begin!"

With this command the Governor seemed by no means displeased, and he poured out the liquor, first handing the cup to the thief-taker, and then drinking some himself.

Once again he took up the pen, and then Wild said:

"Head the letter 'Newgate!'"

"It is done!"

"Begin thus:

"Most honourable lord:

"This letter comes from the most humble and obedient of all your honourable lordship's humble and obedient servants!"

"Have you done that?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Go on, then:

"The matter upon which I make bold to address your honourable lordship is a most important one, which, it is hoped, will be my excuse for so doing. I have the satisfaction of informing you that, early this morning, I was fortunate enough to re-capture that daring, double-dyed villain, Jack Sheppard, the housebreaker. It was not without receiving many grievous hurts that I succeeded in effecting his capture. But I did succeed, in spite of the personal consequences to myself! The rascal would have escaped, in a boat which he was just pushing off from the shore, if I had not levelled one of my pistols at him, and brought him down. He is wounded, but not dangerously, though he is in a state of great weakness. From this he will shortly recover, and I have to pray that your honourable lordship will order his execution to take place as soon as ever he is well enough for the performance of the ceremony. In the meantime, in order to guard against the possibility of his making another escape, I have placed myself in his cell, where it is my intention to remain until I see him led out for execution. He has burned my house down, and I have sustained grievous bodily injury at his hands; but, if your honourable lordship will attend to the humble petition of your obedient servant, and have him executed as soon as he is strong enough, I will be responsible for his safe keeping in the meantime, and will guarantee that he does not make another escape."

CHAPTER CCCCXXIII.

THE WARRANT FOR THE EXECUTION OF JACK SHEPPARD ARRIVES AT NEWGATE.

THUS far, Mr. Wild.

He paused, and then said:

"Have you got that much, Mr. Noakes?"

"Yes."

"Read it to me, then."

The Governor of Newgate obeyed.

Jonathan listened with the greatest complacency, and then continued:

"I think that will do very well indeed. You can just put my name at the bottom of it."

"Very good, Mr. Wild. It is done."

"Seal it, then, and let it be delivered at once. Let the bearer wait, and, if possible, return with a reply."

"It shall be done."

"Be off at once, then."

This was all the thanks the Governor got for the trouble he had taken.

He hastily left the cell, however, and the precious missive was immediately dispatched.

All this Jack Sheppard had plainly heard, and fully understood.

Jonathan Wild intended that he should do so.

He drank deeply of the brandy that was before him, and waited with impatient silence for the return of the messenger.

He had a long time to wait.

By slow degrees the faint glimmer of light that penetrated into the cell faded away.

Darkness came on rapidly, and soon had hid the thief-taker's victim from his view.

But Jonathan, in defiance of all the rules and regulations of the prison, vociferously demanded a light.

He was supplied with a candle, though the Governor protested against it.

But it was no good.

Once more, then, was the immovable form of Jack Sheppard revealed to the view of his implacable enemy.

The rays of the candle were insufficient to illuminate the whole of the gloomy dungeon, but still it was much better than the absolute darkness which had before prevailed.

At length, worn out by watching and waiting, Jonathan fell off into a doze, to which the silence, the darkness, and his own fatigue and weakness made him the more disposed.

The slight noise made by the insertion of the key into the lock of the cell door was sufficient to arouse him thoroughly, and he looked about him with his eyes wide open.

The next moment the door was flung open on its hinges, and the Governor entered.

In his hand he held an open paper, which was evidently an official communication of some kind.

"What is the reply to my letter?" he asked, furiously.

"Speak! Tell me at once! How has the Secretary of State answered my letter?"

"In the best possible manner that he could have answered it!" returned Mr. Noakes, in a triumphant tone of voice.

"How—how?"

"Why look! Here is the warrant for the execution of——"

Jonathan Wild interrupted him with a shriek before he could pronounce the name.

The Governor started back in surprise, though he was tolerably well used to the thief-taker's pleasant little eccentricities.

But this shriek was truly of such an awful character that it staggered even him.

"For whom, dolt?" roared Wild—"for whom?"

"For Jack Sheppard."

"Ha, ha, ha! At last—at last! Give it to me! Let me look at it!—let me satisfy myself that there is no delusion!"

Jonathan snatched the missive from the hands of the Governor of Newgate as he spoke.

One glance, however, was quite enough to assure him that there was no mistake.

His triumph knew no bounds.

With the warrant still in his hand, he strode across the cell to the rude bench upon which Jack Sheppard lay.

Wild touched his victim on the shoulder rather roughly as he said, or rather shrieked;

"Ha, ha! Who has gained the contest? Look here, Jack—look here, and let your eyes ache at the sight! The Secretary of State has replied to my letter with a greater promptitude than I had expected. Here is the warrant for your execution!"

He waved the document exultingly before the prisoner's face.

"But what date is fixed for the execution, Mr. Wild?" the Governor ventured to ask, after a pause.

"Bring the light here, and let me look!"

Mr. Noakes sprang forward and took the candle off the table himself.

Then he hastened to the thief-taker with it, and held it in such a manner that the light fell upon the warrant.

Jonathan glanced his eye over it.

The contents of such documents were familiar enough to him, and he did not stop to read it, but contented himself with looking for the date.

"Monday!" he cried. "Hurrah! Monday is the day! That will soon be here! What day is it to day?"

"Friday."

"Ha, ha! I thought so! I ought to have said what night is it! Three more nights and two more days, and then—The Secretary has been prompt indeed!"

It seemed very doubtful, however, whether Jack would be well enough so soon.

If not, the execution would take place when he was.

But Jonathan determined to have some conversation with Mr. Snoxall upon the subject.

The thief-taker's elation, consequent upon the arrival of the warrant, lasted for some time, but at length he exhausted himself, and sank down upon a chair again, while he refreshed himself with some more draughts at the brandy bottle.

Can the reader picture to himself what the feelings of Jack Sheppard were?

Powerless to move a muscle, yet he had heard and perfectly understood what had taken place.

He knew he was to be hanged on Monday.

Monday!

In two days' time.

What was to be done?

Was it possible that he was now doomed to meet that ignominious fate which had so long threatened him, but which he had so successfully eluded so far.

He could look for no help from himself.

There was no hope now—no, not the slightest hope of being able to make his escape.

Even had he the strength—which he had not—it would have been impossible.

While Jonathan Wild remained in the cell with him—and from his ferocious, bloodthirsty manner Jack Sheppard felt certain he would be as good as his word—he would not be able to take a single step towards effecting his freedom.

These were terrible reflections, and Jack felt them to be so.

His case, he thought, would not have been so desperate were it not for his state of utter prostration.

And yet, had he been unwounded, he could not conceal the conviction from his mind that he would have been heavily chained, and the least attempt he had made to free himself from the thraldom of his fetters would be noticed by Jonathan Wild.

And so, probably for the very first time in his life, Jack Sheppard fully realised the meaning of the word despair.

Despair of the most awful character which can possibly be conceived took possession of his mind.

Turn in what direction he would, he could not see the feeblest glimmer of hope.

All was dark.

Not only was he helpless, and watched by his implacable foe, but he was without the prospect of anyone else being able to afford the least help to him.

Jack had settled in his own mind that Blueskin and Edgworth Bess had been taken prisoners at the same time as himself.

Such being the case, it was quite useless for him to hope to receive from his faithful ally and coadjutor the slightest assistance.

He doubtless was as zealously guarded as himself.

"It would be out of Blueskin's power to help himself," he thought, "and so it is folly for me to think that he would be able to help me."

Thus, then, was Jack driven to look his ignominious fate sternly in the face.

His mind and spirits were crushed by the thought of the impossibility of an escape.

In a space of time so short that he could count the hours he would take his last look at the world from Tyburn Tree.

Had he possessed the power, he would have writhed upon his rude couch as these agonising thoughts passed through his mind.

In the meanwhile, Jonathan had dropped off into one of his cat-like dozes with which he had indulged himself during the time he was in the cell.

Apparently he was sound asleep; and so he was, but the slightest possible sound would have aroused him in a moment.

His mind was now content.

Had the execution of Jack Sheppard rested wholly and entirely in his own hands, he could not have fixed an earlier date than Monday.

The only doubt he had, was that Jack would not be well enough so soon.

The only point upon which Jonathan was at all uneasy, was that he had secured no intelligence respecting the capture of Blueskin and Edgworth Bess.

And yet he could scarcely bring himself to believe that they had escaped the Thames police, more especially when he recollected how large a reward he had offered them as a stimulant to make the utmost exertions.

And yet he was without the least intelligence whatever.

The capture of Blueskin and Edgworth Bess was secondary only in importance to the capture of Jack Sheppard.

Jonathan, however, firmly resisted the temptation to divert his attention from the prisoner before him.

It was not long to Monday, he told himself, and then he should be quite at liberty.

This prospect was a consoling one, and so, as we have said, the thief-taker dropped off into a doze.

It was not long before Jack Sheppard closed his eyes in sleep as well.

The silence of the place, broken only by the snores of the thief-taker, the darkness dispelled only by the tallow candle which from want of attention gave hardly any illumination at all, and the harassing nature of his thoughts—all these circumstances combined to throw Jack Sheppard into a deep slumber.

It was a slumber very different to Jonathan Wild's, for the report of a pistol would hardly have awakened Jack.

And so the long hours of the night passed by, and morning came at length.

The candle had burned out, and Jonathan was unconscious of it.

When he awoke, the dim daylight was struggling through the grated window of the cell.

His first glance was towards the bench.

When he saw Jack lying there still and motionless as ever, his mind was much relieved.

Feeling some slight gnawing of hunger at his stomach, Wild vociferously called for breakfast.

The man outside the cell entered and promised it should be sent for.

When the breakfast came in, the Governor of the prison entered too, for he was anxious in the extreme that Jack should be kept in safety.

"He is asleep, Mr. Wild," said the Governor, glancing at Jack.

"All right, then! Let him alone. When you see Mr. Snoxall, send him to me."

"Here he is."

And in effect the apothecary entered the cell.

He went up to his patient, and looked at him for some time in silence.

Then, having seen that the bandages had not shifted from their position, he approached the thief-taker.

"Well?" said Wild, inquiringly.

"Not quite well, Mr. Wild," said Snoxall, with a feeble smile—"not quite well, but he is much better."

"Much better, say you?"

"Yes."

"When will he be well?"

"That greatly depends upon circumstances."

"Come now, Mr. Snoxall, you and I ought to understand each other by this time."

The apothecary bowed, and murmured an assent.

"Well, then, you will find it the best day's work you ever did in all your life if you get Jack Sheppard well by Sunday night."

"Why?"

"Why? Because the Secretary of State has issued orders for his execution to take place on Monday."

"Make your mind easy, Mr. Wild; there is really very little the matter with him—weakness is the chief. When he awakes from this sound sleep, a great improvement will be visible, and then all you have got to do is to give him plenty of strengthening things."

"Do you hear, Noakes?" said Wild.

"I do."

"See to it, then!"

"Jack Sheppard overheard the whole of this conversation, though he pretended to be asleep."

The fact was, Mr. Snoxall woke him when moving the clothes to ascertain whether the bandage was in its proper place or not.

CHAPTER CCCCXXIV.

THE SAUCY KATE MAKES HER LAST VOYAGE.

LOUDER and louder grew the wind—higher and higher rose the angry billows.

The thunder rolled with almost ceaseless reverberations, so rapidly did one peal succeed another.

The whole waste of waters was revealed by the continuous flashes of the blue and vivid lightning.

Far as the eye could see, the ocean was covered with a white, yeasty froth, while the wind blew with such unremitting violence that it seemed as though it must of necessity carry all before it.

The Saucy Kate, although every inch of canvas had been taken in, and the masts alone left standing, flew over the water like some bird.

Now down—down deep in the trough of the sea—descending so swiftly that it seemed as though she was about to plunge to the bottom of the ocean, and then up on the top of some high wave, with the water continually breaking over her, went the gallant vessel.

The captain of the Saucy Kate was anxious and alarmed.

All he could do was to stand out to sea, and keep his vessel's head in that direction.

But out at sea the tempest seemed to rage with a thousand times more fury; and so, perhaps it did; but while there was no fear of running on to the coast.

Edgworth Bess was below, in the cabin, faint and ill.

The exciting occurrences which had so recently taken place had proved too much for her.

Blueskin and Ned Cantle both persisted in remaining upon deck, though the captain endeavoured to persuade them to shut themselves up in the cabin.

They had two or three narrow escapes from being washed overboard, and in the end they were compelled to lash themselves to the spars.

Here they awaited the result of the storm.

The Saucy Kate was a strong, sea-worthy craft, and had weathered many a storm before, and rode safely into port; but the one which now raged threatened to test her powers to the utmost.

The man at the wheel resolutely kept the vessel's head in the direction they wished to take.

And so for two hours the storm continued to rage with unabated violence.

One mast had been carried away, and threatened the destruction of the good ship; but the crew were prompt in their actions, and in a short time, by the aid of their axes, the vessel was freed from this dangerous encumbrance.

Then the Saucy Kate righted herself, and once more continued on her way.

"If we can only weather the storm," said the captain, "we shall make a quicker passage to Amsterdam than ever was known before."

"But shall we weather it?"

"I hope so."

Blueskin felt all a landsman's apprehension.

Besides, he wanted to get back to London.

His mind was in a state of feverish excitement.

But how would he have been had he precisely known Jack Sheppard's situation.

He thought he had made the worst of it; but what would have been his feelings had he known that Jonathan Wild had procured a warrant for the execution of his comrade on the following Monday.

It was quite useless to work himself up to such a fever of excitement as he did, but he could not help it.

He was entirely at the mercy of the wind and waves, and he was powerless to control either the one or the other.

Another hour passed.

The Saucy Kate had received many severe injuries, but the storm now showed signs of abatement.

The captain's hopes began to rise.

Suddenly, however, a dreadful cry was raised—a cry which struck terror to the hearts of the boldest of those who heard it—the most terrible cry that can be heard at sea.

It was fire.

"Fire—fire!" shrieked some one, and then the cry was echoed by many lips.

The captain sprang forward.

His cheeks were paler now than they had yet been.

He found the dreadful intelligence only too true.

They had escaped one peril only to fall into another.

By what means the fire had originated, or how long it had been burning none could tell.

But this is not to be wondered at when it is recollected how the attention of everybody had been absorbed in managing the vessel.

Evidently the fire had been burning a long time, for it had taken a firm hold of the interior.

Attention had first been attracted to it by quantities of smoke pouring up the companion-ladder.

Now flames mingled with the smoke, and poured out of the hatchway as out of some huge furnace.

At the first intimation of the fire that was raging below, Blueskin unbound himself from the spar, and rushed towards the hatchway.

It was his intention to have descended, but he shrunk back.

Where the ladder had been was now a pit of fire.

Blueskin uttered a groan.

As a measure of precaution, he had locked Edgworth Bess in the cabin, in order to prevent her from getting into danger by coming on deck.

That precaution threatened to prove her destruction.

In a few words Blueskin made the captain acquainted with the facts of the case.

"Quick, my men!" he cried. "Bring your axes here!"

Half a dozen men sprang forward in obedience to this command, and commenced cutting through the deck, in order to reach the cabin in that manner.

Blueskin saw there was hope yet if they were speedy in their movements, so he seized an axe himself and assisted.

In a few moments a large hole was made through the deck into the cabin.

Blueskin jumped down instantly.

But he found the place was full of suffocating smoke, and he gasped painfully for breath.

He strove to call aloud, but in vain.

Fortunately, he had the presence of mind to sink down upon his hands and knees.

Close to the floor of the cabin the air was comparatively free from smoke, and he could breathe with tolerable freedom.

As soon as he recovered himself sufficiently to do so, he called aloud upon Edgworth Bess.

But he received no reply.

Then he groped about the floor, and in a moment or so found her lying insensible near the door of the cabin.

To raise her in his arms was the work of a second only.

The cabin was no longer so full of smoke as it had been, for the vapour had poured out in immense quantities through the hole in the ceiling.

But the flames began to show themselves, being increased by the draught.

Blueskin called to those above, and held the insensible girl as high up above his head as he could.

Arms were stretched down to take her, and she was quickly lifted on to the deck.

Blueskin followed.

By this time the flames had got terrible hold of the vessel, and no one now could venture to indulge in the hope that the Saucy Kate would be saved.

The boats were immediately called for by the captain.

It was wonderful to see what discipline was preserved on board his little craft.

As orderly as though the men had been on board a man-of-war the boats were lowered.

The Saucy Kate was fitted with only two.

One of these was of good size, and would hold about fourteen persons closely packed.

The other was only just large enough for three.

Edgworth Bess had been half suffocated with the smoke, and had the relief been only a little more tardy than it was, she would have been quite so.

As it was, the keen wind and the waves splashing over her quickly restored her to her senses.

The next thing to do was to escape from the burning ship.

By Blueskin's desire, and the captain's consent, the large boat was to receive the crew, and the small boat Blueskin, Ned Cantle, and Edgworth Bess.

The captain informed them that they were not far from the coast of Holland, and that by daybreak, if they could only continue to keep afloat till then, they would either be able to make the shore, or else be picked up by some other vessel.

There was now no time to be lost.

The captain and his crew got into the large boat, according to arrangement, and our three friends into the small one.

Both boats then cast off.

The Saucy Kate, now all ablaze from stem to stern, seemed to shoot a head of them with lightning-like rapidity.

She was indeed going at a fearful speed before the gale.

The boats, of course, went at a much slower rate.

But they seemed to have escaped one death only to fall victims to another.

In such a storm as that, how was it possible for two such frail boats so heavily loaded to keep afloat.

In an instant, both boats became separated from each other, though it had been their intention to keep together if possible.

But they drifted apart at once.

Far away across the wild desert of water flew the burning ship, casting around it a strange and wonderful radiance.

The large boat, containing the captain and the crew of the Saucy Kate, sank very low down indeed into the water.

It was too heavily laden.

Just as Blueskin made this reflection he perceived in the distance a monstrous wave sweeping towards them.

On it came with the swiftness and stealthiness of a snake.

Blueskin held his breath when he saw it reach the large boat.

How it happened he hardly knew, but in a second the boat and its occupants were engulfed.

The wave had burst immediately above them, and swamped the boat at once.

Not a single trace was left of either.

"That is an awful sight," said Blueskin.

Ned Cantle replied, with a groan:

"It's all over with them—all over with every one! That wave would carry them fathoms down, and would stun them! We shall see them no more!"

Not knowing how soon they might share the fate of their late companions, the three friends sat in the boat in a state of the utmost suspense.

Ned Cantle undertook the navigation of the little vessel, but all he did was to keep her head before the wind.

This was all that could be done.

But the storm was now subsiding rapidly.

This subsidence had been going on for some time, and that huge wave which wrought so much havoc was the last of such size and power.

The surface of the ocean grew calmer each moment, though still it looked vexed and angry.

Ned Cantle had spent much of his life upon the ocean, and he regarded these signs with pleasure.

"Dawn is not far off," he said, "and the tempest is virtually over. The only thing that gives me any anxiety is our situation."

"Where are we?"

"That is just what I want to know. I have no idea whether we are in mid-ocean or whether we are near the coast. We must wait till morning."

Blueskin was occupied almost incessantly in baling the water out of the boat.

Edgworth Bess, looking faint and ill, and ready to die, sat clinging frantically to her seat.

And so the boat flew at a rapid speed over the trackless ocean, while those within it had no idea where they were going; to them all directions seemed alike.

The wind, however, had subsided to a steady though stiff breeze.

The lightning and thunder had ceased, and the huge clouds which had covered the sky like a pall were gradually breaking up and drifting away.

CHAPTER CCCCXXV.

AFTER MANY DANGERS, THE FUGITIVES AT LENGTH REACH AMSTERDAM, AND BLUESKIN SETS OUT ON HIS RETURN TO LONDON.

FAR away now in the distance was the Saucy Kate. Her position, however, was clearly marked, for the fire still raged, and the ruddy flames cast their reflection upon the water.

Those friends of ours who have braved so many dangers and escaped so many perils were now alone on the ocean, with nothing to save them from death but a tiny boat, which threatened every moment to sink beneath the waves.

Fate now seemed wholly set against them.

At that moment, Blueskin's presence in London was most urgently required, and there he was in mid-ocean, with only a very uncertain prospect of reaching the land at all.

But under the most favourable circumstances, it appeared quite impossible for him to reach London in time.

As the wind continued to blow steadily in one direction, Ned Cantle let the boat go before it.

Glancing up at the stars, he made out that they were proceeding east by north.

"Our position is not so bad as it might have been," he said, after informing Blueskin in what direction they were going. "If I have not quite lost my reckoning and the boat continues to keep her course, we shall sight the coast of Holland before to-morrow night."

"There is some consolation in knowing that; but since we embarked we have had nothing but disaster. Give me the land!"

"So say I," rejoined Ned Cantle. "I have tried both, and given each a fair trial, but I say—Give me the land!"

Blueskin now turned his attention to Edgworth Bess, and endeavoured to cheer her drooping spirits.

He found his task a difficult one.

The poor girl was thoroughly prostrated, both physically and mentally.

Even what she had gone through while on board the Saucy Kate was quite sufficient to cause this.

And then her mind was full of the utmost dread and apprehension concerning Jack Sheppard.

A voice seemed to ring in her ears, and say:

"You have seen Jack Sheppard for the last time!"

Then she was cold and wet, for the waves broke over the boat continually, and Blueskin was constantly employed in baling the water out.

Wishing for death, then, and wholly deaf to such consolation as Blueskin could offer her, Edgworth Bess sat upon the seat in the little boat.

By that time the Saucy Kate had vanished.

She had either burnt to the water's edge and sunk, or else drifted out of sight.

And so wearily—most wearily passed away those hours of the night which had to elapse before morning came.

At length, with quite a cry of joy, Ned Cantle pointed out a long streak of greyish light, which indicated that dawn was close at hand.

It also pointed out the east, and Ned found that he had not been mistaken in the course of the vessel.

Gradually day broke, and the faint flush of early morn stole over the foam-tipped crests of the surging billows.

At last the sun rose.

With great eagerness both Blueskin and Ned Cantle strained their eyes in hope of catching sight of land; but as far as they could see there was nothing but water on every side.

Higher and higher rose the sun.

But still no traces of land could be seen, although an eager look-out was kept for it continually.

The wind lulled.

The little boat urged its way but slowly over the waters.

Ned Cantle would not use the oars as he might have done.

He was anxious to husband his strength, in case the time should come when there would be urgent need for it. All three began now to suffer terribly from three evils.

They were hunger, cold, and thirst.

Not a single vessel was in sight.

There seemed to be no aid for them.

Then the wind ceased, and the sea became almost as smooth as a mill-pond.

The little boat now lay motionless upon the ocean.

There was no resource but to use the oars, and unwillingly enough Ned Cantle took them up.

A few long, vigorous sweeps were given, and once more the boat flew rapidly through the water.

There was nothing to steer by now save the sun, and this was soon found to be extremely difficult, for they had no means of ascertaining the correct time.

And so the whole of that day wore away.

It was a long one to our friends, but it was devoid of incident.

Blueskin and Ned Cantle took the oars by turns.

At last the sun went down, and they were still on the deep, apparently as far off the land as ever.

They strained their eyes up to the last in the hope of being able to make out the outlines of some friendly shore.

Deeper despair now filled all their hearts, and they felt inclined to give over making any further exertion.

They were dreadfully fatigued by the labour they had already performed.

Still they might be only a short distance from the shore.

With his whole body aching and stiff, Ned Cantle still continued to pull the oars.

More hours passed.

Edgworth Bess was so fortunate as to fall into a deep though uneasy slumber.

When the stars came out, Ned satisfied himself that they were rather out of their course, and directed the head of the vessel due east.

Taking it in brief turns they continued to row throughout the night, for there was scarcely any wind.

It may be imagined how that dawn was anxiously waited for.

They felt, indeed, that they could not support another day.

Blueskin chafed with impatience at his unfortunate position until he was almost frantic.

But he could not help himself.

There was a horrible foreboding at his heart concerning Jack Sheppard.

He feared that he was in greater peril now than he had ever been during the whole of his long and adventurous career.

But he little thought what were the real facts of the case, and that Jack was counting the last minutes left to him on earth.

That night seemed as though it would never end.

All things, however, must have a termination, and Blueskin was aroused from a long fit of melancholy meditation by hearing his companion say:

"Morning is at hand!"

Blueskin looked up, and then, straight ahead of the boat, he saw a faint light, which indicated the position of the east.

But when it grew fairly light, the hearts of the three fugitives were gladdened with joy.

On the far-off horizon they could just distinguish a long dark streak, which Ned Cantle told them was land.

Now that their destination was within sight, it was wonderful to see with what renewed strength Ned Cantle used the oars.

Sheer fatigue at length compelled him to desist, and then Blueskin took the oars, and rowed as he had never rowed before.

Still the distant land seemed to mock them and recede as they approached.

But this was only their overheated fancy.

The shore when they first caught sight of it was many miles further off than they had thought it was.

It was mid-day before they, fainting and exhausted, reached the land.

Strangely enough, they had arrived at their original destination, namely, Amsterdam.

It was Ned Cantle who communicated this joyful intelligence, for, having visited the place before, he was of course easily able to recognise it.

Considerable interest was attracted to their arrival, and when they touched against the pier our friends found that quite a large crowd had collected.

Anxious inquiries were made respecting their condition, to all of which Ned Cantle replied briefly and truthfully.

The Saucy Kate was well known at Amsterdam, and so was her captain too.

The greatest regret was manifested for her unfortunate loss.

In their cheerful hospitality, the citizens offered the three fugitives every accommodation, but Ned declined it, and led the way to the beer-house of which he had already spoken, and which was kept by the Widow Graacht.

They had not far to go.

As soon as he entered, Ned pronounced the word "Keizer," as he had directed Blueskin to do.

An immediate change in the manners of the landlady became visible, and she conducted them to the best room in the beer-house, which was but a poor one, as rooms go.

"Thus far all is well!" said Ned Cantle.

"Yes," replied Blueskin, "and it is entirely owing to your exertions that such is the case. In your charge I leave this young girl. Treat her carefully, and one day you will reap the advantage of so doing. I cannot stay myself—not even to rest. I must leave for London, but I hope I shall soon return to you!"

"And Jack?" said Edgworth Bess.

"Yes," returned Blueskin, "if it is within my power as a human being, Jack shall return with me! Look!—here are riches. Take them! Ned Cantle here, who I am sure you may trust in all things, will convert these trinkets and precious stones into coin. Go with him wherever he may direct, and as soon as it is possible I will rejoin you!"

While speaking these words, Blueskin placed upon the table the valuables with which he had crammed his pockets.

He retained only a small portion for himself.

All the rest he gave to Ned Cantle, so that, come what would, he thought Edgworth Bess would be saved from actual want.

Blueskin would not stay for either rest or refreshment.

Both of those, he said, he could obtain on board of the vessel that was to take him back to London.

Repeating his injunctions to Ned Cantle to look after the safety of Edgworth Bess, Blueskin bid them both farewell.

"For my sake," she said—"for my sake do all you can! My heart tells me that Jack is in dreadful danger! Hasten to him I beseech, and return with him here to me!"

"I will do so, never fear! I feel confident in my power! I will not fail!"

"You raise my hopes."

"I should be glad to do so. I would fain make you believe that happy days are in store for all of us, and will soon be here."

"I hope so; but as soon as you possibly can you will return here?"

"I will!—Take my word for it!"

"Enough—enough! Farewell! Now that I know you are going I feel much happier than I did!"

"That is good news, then! Until I come back rest yourself as much as you can. It will be no small consolation for you to know that you have nothing to fear from Jonathan Wild!"

The young girl shuddered.

"I never hear his name pronounced," she said, "without feeling a cold chill pass through my veins."

"Be of good heart, he cannot molest you here!"

"Will his villainies never cease?"

"The day cannot be far distant when he will reap a terrible retribution for all his crimes. The sum of his iniquity is almost complete, and the destruction of his house is, I trust, the first step towards his downfall."

"Once more, farewell!"

"Farewell!" said Blueskin. "This is no time for idle conversation. When I get on board, I will endeavour to make up for the fatigue and hardships I have suffered."

With these words, Blueskin left the little beer-house, at the back of the Stadhuis, and directed his steps towards the pier.

Upon arriving here, he learned immediately that a packet would start in less than half an hour.

This was the very thing; and, overjoyed by the prospect of soon seeing London again, Blueskin paid his passage-money and went on board.

Day was fast closing in; but the sky was clear, and there seemed every prospect of a quick and favourable voyage.

CHAPTER CCCCXXVI.

NED CANTLE CONVERTS SOME OF WILD'S PROPERTY INTO GOLD, AND CONDUCTS EDGORTH BESS TO A PLACE OF TEMPORARY SAFETY.

It was wonderful to see the change that took place in Edgorth Bess's manner and appearance after the departure of Blueskin.

Hope had once more gained the ascendancy in her fair young breast.

Her spirits were raised by the prospect that in a short time Jack Sheppard would return, and for evermore be free from the machinations of Jonathan Wild, the villainous thief-taker.

Fortunately, there was no one at hand to whisper in her ear the distressing intelligence that at that very moment, while she was felicitating herself upon his return, Jack Sheppard was seriously wounded and a helpless prisoner in Newgate.

What would have been her despair if she had known that his foes, finding that strong rooms and fetters were powerless to keep him, had given up such means of securing their prisoner, and that, instead, Jonathan Wild sat constantly in the cell along with him, making his escape a matter of utter impossibility.

Well, indeed, was it for her that she was spared such a terrible knowledge.

As it was, she partook of the refreshments which were laid before her with considerable relish, and then laid down to sleep.

Ned Cantle was as thoroughly wore out as herself, and therefore he gladly followed her example.

Neither woke until late the next morning.

Upon descending they partook of breakfast, and then Ned said:

"If you please, miss, we must think about moving!"

"Are we not safe here!"

"Well—yes."

"Then why move?"

"If you must know, miss, this is the reason. You can't tell, no more can I, whether Jonathan Wild did not know we were on board the Saucy Kate."

"Shall I never be free from that man's persecutions?"

"I hope so, miss, but just you listen to me for a minute or two."

"Willingly, for you are the only friend left to protect me now."

"Cheer up, miss! Don't be down-hearted! It's a long lane that hasn't no turning, you know!"

"What were you about to tell me?"

"Just this here. I have heard say, and I do believe it's true, mind you, that Jonathan Wild has agents all over the wide world."

"I know his power is great, but I should doubt that!"

"Well, I don't know for all over the world, miss, but I am pretty nearly certain he has got agents in this here city of Amsterdam. Now, he might cause inquiries to be made, and then it will be recollected that we came on shore in a boat from the Saucy Kate—"

"I see—I see," said Edgorth Bess, interrupting him; "we are not safe here."

"I don't altogether think we are, and therefore I think the best thing we can do will be to make a move to some other place."

"But Blueskin—how will he find us?"

"Oh, don't you trouble yourself about that, miss; I have arranged that along of him."

"Then I have nothing more to say."

"To-day is Sunday," remarked Ned Cantle, "and everybody will be abroad, so that among so many our departure will not be noticed. I know a safe, quiet place where we can go to, and remain until Blueskin returns."

"Let us go, then!"

"In a minute. First of all I must turn some of this swag into cash!"

"But it is Sunday!"

"I know that, but I shall pay a visit to a certain Jew that I am acquainted with, and Jews, you know, keep their Sunday on Saturday."

"Well, go, and return as quickly as you can."

"Depend upon me, miss."

Ned Cantle took away half the valuables which had been left in his charge, and having stowed them carefully away, set forth upon his errand.

He had not far to go.

He found the Israelite at home.

It was a common thing in the last century for people to leave England with stolen goods and come to Amsterdam.

Here they were easily disposed of.

Ned Cantle, however, in years past had had dealings with this Jew.

Instant admission was given him.

Although several years had elapsed since they had last met, the Jew recognised Ned instantly.

His eyes sparkled when he beheld the wealth that was poured out upon the table.

Had it not been for their previous acquaintanceship, Ned would not have got such a good price as he did; but he happened to know how to deal with the old man.

When, therefore, the Jew having carefully taken stock of the whole, said:

"My frent, I vill gif you von tousant thalers (150*l.*) for the lot."

Ned Cantle made no reply, but commenced sweeping the valuables into a heap, preparatory to putting them into his pocket.

"Shtop—shtop!" cried the Jew, when he saw what his customer was about.

Ned paused.

"Ish not von tousant thalers enough?"

"No."

The Jew sighed.

"Trade ish bad."

"Get out, you old vampire! Now, then, how much will you give? Make haste, or I shall be off. There are plenty of others the same trade as yourself in Amsterdam."

"By Moses and Aaron you are right! Competishun is ruining me!"

The old Jew shook his head lugubriously.

Ned began to gather up the precious stones again.

"Shtop—shtop!"

"I can't stop here all day."

"Shtop—shtop, I shay!"

"How much will you give?"

"Von tousant two huntret thalers."

"Is that all?"

"All, shay you?"

"Yes."

"S'help me Abraham, if I give you twelve huntret thalers I shall loshe by you!"

"Bah!—stuff!"

"Only I don't like to loshe an old cushtomer!"

Ned Cantle said no more, but continued to gather the valuables up into a heap.

The old Jew watched him with ravenous eyes.

But he did not speak.

At least, not until Ned was about to put the first handful in his pocket.

Then he cried:

"Shtop—shtop!"

"I sha'n't!" said Ned; "you made a fool of me before." He dropped the handful into his pocket.

"Oh, Moses! I will make it thirteen huntret thalers!" Ned Cantle shook his head.

"The very lowest sum I shall take is fifteen hundred thalers!" he said. "You have two chances to my one; you can either give it or let it alone!"

"I shall be ruin!"

"That's your look-out! Good-bye! I'm off!"

The Jew actually let Ned Cantle get as far as the door. Then he cried out again:

"Shtop—shtop!"

"Will you give the fifteen hundred?"

"Shelp me Esdras—"

"Will you give it?"

"It's too mush!"

"I'm off, then, to find some one else!"

"Come back!" screamed the old Jew, just as Ned crossed the threshold. "You shall have fifteen huntret!"

He said these words with a heavy sigh.

"Why, you old villain, you will make a thousand thalers by the transaction!"

"Oh, monshtrous! I shall loshe!"

"Bah! Now then, down with the cash! If you hesitate, or try to bate me, I shall ask sixteen hundred at once, and not let you have them for less!"

"Oh, Abraham! sixteen huntret!"

"Now then, what do you say?"

"Here you are!"

The Jew began to count out the money.

In the meantime, Blueskin emptied his pockets, and placed the glittering heap upon the table again.

The Jew made several indirect attempts to induce Ned Cantle to take less, but his customer firmly resisted every time.

Shortly afterwards, Ned left the Jew's and went to the beerhouse with the cash in his pocket, representing the very respectable sum of two hundred and twenty-five pounds.

This would suffice to last them for some time to come, and then there was the other half of the valuables still remaining, so that altogether the total amount of the booty carried off from Wild's house by Blueskin represented a very large sum indeed.

Edgworth Bess was anxiously awaiting the arrival of her new-found friend, for she fancied, after what he had told her, that she was in a very insecure place.

"All right, miss!" said Ned, respectfully—"I'll just settle up with the widow, and then we will be off."

"The sooner the better!"

"So say I, miss. I shall be back in a minute."

Ned Cantle at once repaired to the widow Graecht, to whom he paid the reckoning, and, at the same time, informed her of the watchword Blueskin would make use of when he came, and where his (Cantle's) destination now was.

All this being satisfactorily arranged, he returned to the room in which he had left Edgworth Bess waiting.

In another moment, they emerged into the street.

As Ned had told her, it was Sunday, and in spite of her sad thoughts Edgworth Bess could not help looking at the strange scenes around her with feelings of pleasure.

The quaint old city had a holiday appearance.

The canals were crowded with boats.

"You see, miss," said Ned, "nearly everybody here goes everywhere by water. It's easier than walking, I know; but we might be noticed if we took a boat, and so I think, although it is not the most pleasant, that we will walk."

"Yes—yes! Let us walk by all means."

"I thought you would say so when I explained all to you."

"Our object must be to elude observation as much as possible."

"Exactly, miss. We've got a longish way to travel; but still I can take you to a place of safety."

"Never mind the distance," said the poor girl, cheerfully, though she was so weak as to be scarcely able to walk.

But the intolerable dread she had of again falling into the hands of Jonathan Wild endowed her with factitious strength, and enabled her to triumph over the debility which her illness, confinement, and excitement of mind had produced.

In a little while she was compelled to support herself by taking hold of Ned's arm.

The brave fellow cheered her up in his rude way as well as he was able, and endeavoured to take a bright view of the future.

The city of Amsterdam was left behind, but still there seemed to be no signs of the termination of the journey, and so Edgworth Bess had to sit down upon a stone by the roadside and rest herself.

After a while she resumed her journey.

At length, Ned pointed out to her a wood of great extent at a considerable distance in advance.

"That is our destination," he said.

"That wood?"

"Yes. On the borders of it there is a cottage, the occupants of which are well known to me. It is the most retired spot round Amsterdam. Have you not noticed what a long time it is since we saw anybody?"

"Yes—yes! It is a gloomy place."

"It is. You are right there, but you must remember that it is safe."

"That overbalances all other considerations."

Weary and faint almost unto death, Edgworth Bess and her companion at last halted before a cottage which, as Ned Cantle had stated, was built upon the outskirts of the gigantic wood.

CHAPTER CCCCXXVII.

BLUESKIN ARRIVES IN LONDON AT SEVEN O'CLOCK ON THE MORNING OF THE DAY FIXED FOR THE EXECUTION OF JACK SHEPPARD.

BLUESKIN was thoroughly worn out.

He had just strength enough left to pay his passage-money and get on board the London packet, and that was all.

Upon reaching the deck, he sank down at once into a swoon.

There was a medical man on board, and he at once guessed the cause of Blueskin's illness.

He was recovered from his swoon, then cordials in small quantities were administered.

After that, light food was given, and then Blueskin fell into a sound sleep, which lasted many hours.

In the meanwhile, the packet flew over the waters at a rapid speed.

The wind was fair, and the weather charming, and all looked forward to a rapid passage.

The medical man who had attended upon Blueskin, prophesied that when he awoke he would be quite well.

He was right.

After sleeping for nearly eight hours, Blueskin opened his eyes.

A disagreeable sensation of weakness was the only thing that ailed him, and this was nothing more than might be reasonably expected.

A light meal, however, had the effect of putting that right to a very great extent.

At last the events which had recently occurred seemed to be obliterated from Blueskin's mind.

By degrees he recollected all, and then he became feverishly impatient.

The packet was cleaving the waters with unusual swiftness, but our friend thought the progress made was intolerably slow.

And so, chafing and fretting, wondering in what condition he should find affairs as regarded Jack Sheppard when he returned to London, and perpetually inquiring how much further they had to go, and how much longer they would be, the homeward journey was performed.

From the captain Blueskin learned that if the weather continued fair, and all circumstances were as favourable as possible, the earliest time by which he could hope to reach London would be late on Sunday night.

Late on Sunday night! and Monday morning was fixed for the execution of Jack Sheppard.

But Blueskin did not know this.

In all his anticipations concerning the worst that had happened he never imagined that.

Blueskin counted every minute with an impatience which can scarcely be imagined.

BLUESKIN ARRIVES IN LONDON ON THE MORNING APPOINTED FOR JACK SHEPPARD'S EXECUTION.

Every hour seemed as long as a whole day.

At length Sunday evening came.

Blueskin strained his eyes in the hope of catching sight of the land before the darkness of the fast-approaching night hid all things from his view.

But he was disappointed.

Darkness came, but in the far distance he could see nothing but the faint line dividing the ocean from the horizon.

Still he sat and waited.

It was close upon midnight when Blueskin heard some one approaching the spot where he stood.

He turned round.

It was the captain of the packet.

"Well, mynheer," he said, addressing our friend; "your anxiety will soon be over."

No. 89.—BLUESKIN.

"Are we so near the end of this tedious voyage?"

"Tedious do you call it? It is the quickest I have ever made, and I have traded between these two ports for nearly thirty years."

"Well, well—how much longer shall we be? You would not wonder at my impatience if you knew the reason why I wished to reach the shore."

"All right, mynheer. That is your business; not mine."

"How much longer shall we be? Where are we?"

"Look!" said the captain, raising his arm, and pointing across the water. "Do you see that twinkling light there, that looks very much like a star?"

Blueskin shaded his eyes, and looked earnestly in the direction in which the captain pointed.

"Yes—yes! I see it!" he said.

"Do you know what it is?"

"No."

"Well, that is the Nore light."

"We are close to the mouth of the Thames, then?"

"Yes."

"How long will it take you to reach London?"

"Well, it so happens that we have both wind and tide in our favour. I should think we shall do it in six hours."

"That will be at about six o'clock to-morrow morning."

"Yes; or rather this morning, for it is past midnight."

The captain strolled aft again, and Blueskin fixed his eyes upon the beacon-light which had been pointed out to him.

He watched the gradual brightening of the light as they drew closer and closer to it, with unalloyed satisfaction.

At length the lighthouse was passed, and then they were fairly in the Thames.

As the captain had truly said, they had both wind and tide in their favour; and now that he could catch sight of the banks on either side of him, and see them flit past, he fancied their speed was more accelerated than it had been.

Without the occurrence of any particular incident, the vessel worked its way up the Thames.

At last, through the darkness, Blueskin could gradually distinguish objects with which he was familiar.

The captain had guessed the time when the end of his voyage would be reached to a nicety.

When they were near St. Katherine's Docks, Blueskin signified his wish to be rowed ashore in a boat.

To this the captain made no objection, provided the extra money for the accommodation was paid.

This was no obstacle.

Blueskin's motive for wishing to be put ashore may be guessed.

He knew the passengers upon lauding would be subjected to a certain amount of scrutiny, and this it was highly important he should avoid.

Upon reaching the land, Blueskin paused for a moment, reflectively.

Would it be best to go over land or take a boat to London Bridge?

He decided upon the latter course as being the best.

He had not far to go before he found a wherry with a waterman asleep in it.

He woke him up, and the waterman unshipped his oars and pushed off with manifest willingness.

The distance to London Bridge was not very great, and, as the tide was rising, the waterman soon performed the journey.

Giving him a liberal fare, Blueskin sprang out of the boat on to the slippery stone steps leading from the water to the street above.

A sharp rain had begun to fall, and the wind beat it full into our friend's face as he ascended.

Heedless of the weather, however, he hastened up the steps.

Upon gaining the bridge, he paused.

It was quite dark.

He could hear a clock chiming, and listened to hear the hour.

The clock struck seven.

"So late!" he said. "Now, where shall I go to learn any information about Jack?"

It was no trifling thing for Blueskin to make his way about the streets of London.

No doubt there was an active hue and cry after him.

For his own personal danger he cared not; all he was intent upon was to discover what had happened to Jack Sheppard.

He was at a loss to know which would be the best place to go for the purpose.

Presently, however, Blueskin bethought himself of a small public-house in the vicinity of Newgate Market, to which while he was with Jonathan Wild he was a frequent visitor.

The landlord he believed he could fully trust, and have no fears of being betrayed by him.

Here, so close to Newgate as it was, he would surely be able to learn all particulars.

At this moment a hackney-coach went lumbering by, and, believing that he should secure his safety by so doing, Blueskin hailed it, and ordered the jarvey to drive him to Smithfield.

As they approached this locality, Blueskin noticed an unusual concourse of people, who apparently were all hurrying to one point.

For a moment he forgot that it was Monday morning, but as soon as he recollected this he leaned back again, for he knew executions always took place on a Monday, and no week ever went by without some victim being sent to Tyburn Tree.

And here, perhaps, it will be as well for us to caution the reader against falling into an error, as he easily might do.

At the beginning of the last century, executions took place upon quite a different plan to what they do at the present time.

Now, a scaffold is erected in the Old Bailey, outside the gloomy old prison of Newgate.

The condemned culprit is led from his cell through various passages, and up a flight of steps, and then through a door which opens direct upon the scaffold.

But then it was quite different.

For many years past the hour chosen for the execution has been eight o'clock in the morning.

But it used to be twelve, or thereabouts.

The executions did not take place in front of Newgate, but in a lovely country spot out of London, called Tyburn.

It was ten o'clock when the procession started from Newgate, and it was generally mid-day before the ceremony was over.

We have thought fit to make this explanation in order to prevent the reader from falling into an error.

The people Blueskin saw were not waiting for the execution, but to see the procession issue forth from the court-yard.

It never struck our friend that they were waiting to see Jack Sheppard led forth.

Blueskin got down on the opposite side of Smithfield Market, to that upon which the public-house was situated to which he intended to pay a visit.

He approached it circuitously, and noticed with great annoyance that many people were hovering about.

But it was not yet fairly light, so pulling his hat down over his brows, and bending his head, Blueskin entered.

He stepped into a little room, upon the door of which "Private" was printed.

He heard some one call out to him to stop, and to come back; but unheeding, he walked on into the room into which customers were never allowed to penetrate, it being used by the landlord and his family alone.

Scarcely had he entered than a waiter followed.

"Here, sir," he said; "this way, if you please. You must not stop here. 'Tis his a private room!"

Blueskin said nothing, but put half-a-crown into the waiter's hand.

"Go and tell the landlord that an old and particular friend wants to speak to him immediately!"

The waiter retired.

"Directly afterwards the landlord appeared.

Blueskin closed the door carefully.

"Hush!" he said. "Not a word. My life is in danger! You know me?"

He lifted his hat as he spoke, to afford the landlord a good view of his countenance.

"Good gracious!" he exclaimed; "it's Blue——"

"Hush! You must not breathe my name!"

"All right! Sit down! I'll lock the door!"

The landlord did so.

"And now what's the matter?" he asked

"I will tell you. I want to learn all the particulars I can about Jack Sheppard."

The landlord opened his mouth to a preternatural extent, and looked aghast.

Blueskin continued to speak in a rapid whisper.

"I was forced to fly to secure my own safety. I left him wounded on the banks of the Thames."

"Then—then——" gasped the landlord.

"What!"

"Is it possible that you don't know that——"

"What—what? Speak at once—plainly! I have been to Amsterdam, whither I was carried contrary to my in-elination, and I have not been in London an hour, so I know nothing!"

"Oh, goodness!"

"Tell me—tell me at once what has happened? I cannot bear this suspense."

"I will tell you," said the landlord, licking his lips—"I will tell you! Oh lor! To think you did not know it. But I thought it was strange—"

"Will you tell me what became of Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes, I will."

"I mean after I left him on the banks of the Thames."

"Yes—yes! I know! Jonathan Wild!"

"Ha!"

"Jonathan Wild and the men he had with him carried Jack Sheppard, who looked more like a corpse than a living being—"

"Where—where? Carried him where?"

"To Newgate!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXVIII.

BLUESKIN ALTOGETHER DESPAIRS OF SAVING JACK SHEPPARD FROM TYBURN TREE.

BLUESKIN groaned, and wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

"But Jack was not killed?"

"Oh, no, only wounded, and not very badly. It was loss of blood chiefly, after suffering unusual fatigue."

"Yes, yes! Go on! I breathe again now!"

"Oh, do you? Well, the worst has got to come."

"The worst! Go on with your story, then, and relieve me from this state of suspense."

"Calm yourself, and prepare to listen quietly to what I am going to tell you."

"For heaven's sake, go on!"

"I am! Well, he was taken to Newgate quite helpless and insensible, and placed in one of the strong rooms."

"Not a cell?"

"No, I believe not."

"Then he has escaped?"

"Has he? When? I did not hear of it."

"You mock me! I meant, has he escaped?"

"Ah, no! There's no fear of that!"

"How so? He has broken out before!"

"True; but they never took such care of him before as they have done this time."

"How have they managed it?"

"Jonathan Wild did it all."

"All what?"

"Why, he would not have any fetters put upon Jack Sheppard; he said that was only waste of time and trouble."

"What means has he taken, then, to keep him secure?" asked Blueskin, with increased uneasiness and anxiety.

"Why, it's very clever! Jonathan had a chair and a table carried into the strong room, and there he has stayed ever since, watching Jack's every movement!"

Blueskin started to his feet.

"Sit down!" said the landlord—"sit down, and I will tell you the rest."

Mechanically, Blueskin obeyed.

"Well, ever since Jack Sheppard has been in the strong room, Jonathan has sat there. He has not left him even for a moment. So you will see that it was totally impossible for Jack Sheppard, with all his cleverness, to make another escape!"

"What is to be done?"

"Hush! Be calm! I haven't told you all yet."

"What more is there?"

"Why, it's wonderful to me to think why you came here! But you could not have gained such full information from anybody else in London as you could from me."

"How comes it that you know so much?"

"Why, one of the turnkeys, as is some kin to my wife, comes here reg'lar, and he told me all."

"All what?"

"Why, when he—that is, Jonathan Wild, you know—had got Jack safe in the cell, he called for the Governor, and for pen and ink, and then he dictated a letter—for Jonathan's so knocked about he can't do much—"

Blueskin smiled grimly.

"The letter was addressed to the Secretary of State."

"Yes, it was. How did you know that?"

"I guessed it."

"Well, the letter was, as you say, directed to the Secretary of State, and it contained the information that Jack Sheppard was again a prisoner in Newgate, that Jonathan Wild was watching over him, and prayed that a warrant might be sent with all speed, in order that he might be executed."

"And when was that letter sent?"

"On Friday."

"And the reply?"

"The Secretary made no reply, but he returned the warrant by the messenger!"

"Good heavens! why did you not tell me this at once?"

"I have been telling you as fast as I could."

"Why, to-day is Monday!"

"No doubt about that."

"And what day was appointed for the execution?"

"Monday!"

"What, to-day!"

"Yes!"

Blueskin groaned bitterly.

"If I had known," he said; "if I had known! But fate was against me!"

"Didn't you notice a lot of people about on your way hither?"

"I did."

"They are waiting to see Jack Sheppard start!"

"He is lost!"

"There is no hope of saving him, I fear!"

"None—none! Why, it is the eleventh hour! There is not time to do anything!"

"There is not! And such precautions have been taken as have never been taken before!"

"What are they?"

"A new gallows has been erected at Tyburn, where the other one formerly stood; and here at twelve o'clock last night a regiment of soldiers took up their position!"

"A regiment of soldiers?"

"Yes, and all well armed! They have formed a circle round the gallows, and will not allow anyone to approach within a certain distance; and—would you believe it—although it was twelve hours before the time appointed for the execution, an immense crowd of people had gathered there, and the soldiers had a great deal of trouble in taking up their position even then!"

Blueskin paid but little attention to this last speech of the landlord.

His thoughts were busy.

He was trying to think of some means by which Jack could be saved.

But he was baffled.

It seemed impossible.

As impossible as it would be for him to turn day into night.

The disappointments and failures they had lately had, would make the authorities more than ever determined to carry their point, and not be defeated this time.

Every precaution would be taken to insure their object.

How, then, could Blueskin, single handed, hearing the distressful intelligence at the last moment—too late to put into execution any elaborate plan of action—with a price set upon his own head—with the minions of the law upon his track—how was he to hope to turn aside the current of events, and save Jack Sheppard from the awful fate impending over him.

It seemed the extremity of folly to entertain such a thought.

But Blueskin felt that in the face of all this he could not sit quietly down and allow his old comrade to be led forth to death without making at least an effort to save him.

Even if the attempt were ever so impotent, still it should be made.

"What is the time now?" he said, suddenly.

"A quarter past eight."

"What time will the procession start?"

"At ten."

"Then I have an hour and three-quarters before me."

"Just so."

"What can be done in that time?"

"Nothing—at least, nothing towards saving Jack! Blueskin, my friend, you must give up that idea."

"Never—never!"

"But you must! What can you hope to do?"

Blueskin was silent.

"Why," continued the landlord, "even if you had got the whole of the mob on your side that will assemble round Tyburn Tree to-day, they would not be a match for the well-armed, disciplined soldiers, acting under the command of clear-headed officers!"

There was a good deal of sense and truth in what the landlord said, and Blueskin could not avoid admitting it to himself.

"And then," he continued, "I know for certain that the cart itself will be carefully guarded by another band of soldiers, and so you see that, even if you had made every arrangement, which you have not, you would not stand the least chance of effecting a rescue!"

Blueskin covered his face with his hands, and groaned again.

He was beginning to realize more vividly how powerless he was to help his comrade.

He must die!

There seemed to be no help for it.

"Then," continued the landlord, "it is quite out of the question to think Jack Sheppard will be able to do anything himself towards achieving his freedom. Half a hundred eyes at least will be fixed upon him—his every movement will be watched—he will be tightly bound and placed in the cart, from which he could no more escape than you could fly over Smithfield Market!"

Every word the landlord uttered carried conviction with it.

Each one seemed to strike Blueskin a blow upon his heart.

Then the clock that stood in a corner of the room near the door chimed the half-hour.

Blueskin started up at the sound.

"Another quarter of an hour gone!"

"Yes, it is half-past eight now."

Only another hour and a-half remain, and I am idling here doing nothing!"

"There is nothing you can do! It is useless to think of it!"

"But I will do something!"

"What?"

Blueskin sank down again as this pointed question was asked him.

"It is true!" continued the landlord, "you might rush out into the street in an excited state, and so obtain your own capture; but that would do Jack no good, and certainly you none!"

"Can't you propose something?" said Blueskin, after a pause.

"No, I cannot!" was the reply—"I cannot see the faintest ghost of a chance for success, let you try what you will!"

"But I must!"

"Try! For instance, now they are placing the breakfast in the cell—the last breakfast he will eat—then he will be pinioned, and then led to the cart. During the whole of that time he will be, as you know well enough, completely surrounded by officials of some sort or other—he won't be left alone for an instant! Isn't that true?"

"Quite true!"

"Very well, then. What chance has Jack himself got either inside the prison or out?"

"None—none!" moaned Blueskin, dejectedly.

"And what chance have you outside, or anyone else?"

"Then there is no hope?"

"None whatever!"

The clock struck a quarter to nine.

"But I cannot leave him to perish thus!" said Blueskin, starting to his feet. "Surely, that clock is wrong! Another quarter of an hour hasn't gone?"

"Yes there has, though; and, what is more, this clock is nearly ten minutes slow, according to St. Sepulchre's!"

Blueskin felt as if he was going mad.

Let him turn his eyes in whatever direction he would, he could not see the faintest hope.

It seemed as though fortune had deserted them.

Jack was to perish.

The reader can imagine what kind of effect this conviction would have upon Blueskin.

How he reproached himself for allowing Ned Cattle to push off from the shore, leaving Jack in the hands of his foes.

The information he had received was indisputably correct.

In vain he racked his brain to think of some means which even afforded him the slightest chance of success.

There was none.

Jack could not help himself.

Blueskin could not help him.

Was, then, Jonathan Wild, the villainous thief-taker, to accomplish that object upon which he had so set his heart, and so often sworn to perform, in spite of every obstacle?

It looked like it.

And yet, Blueskin thought, it could not be.

He was aroused from the stupor of despair into which he had fallen by hearing the clock strike nine.

"One more hour!"

"Less," said the landlord.

"Have you not been able to think of anything?"

The landlord shook his head slowly.

"I have thought of something——"

"Let me hear it, then, at once!"

"But you will say that it is preposterous!"

"No—no!"

"That it offers no chance of success—that I must be mad to propose such a thing."

"No—no! Let me hear you. I am like a drowning man—ready to catch at any straw!"

"Listen, then, and I will tell you what I thought."

St. Sepulchre's clock chimed a quarter past nine.

CHAPTER CCCXXIX.

RELATES THE MANNER IN WHICH JACK SHEPPARD SPENT SATURDAY IN NEWGATE.

LEAVING the landlord of the inn in Smithfield to communicate his plan to Blueskin, we will return to Jack Sheppard in Newgate.

His frightfully perilous condition should, in good truth, command our earnest and full attention.

As Mr. Snoxall had prophesied, Jack Sheppard, when he awoke from that sound sleep, did not feel like the same man.

Those corporeal faculties of which he had been deprived returned to him, though, of course, only in a faint degree.

Still, he was able to move and speak.

Jonathan Wild took good care that Jack should be supplied with the most nutritious articles of food.

It would have been a bitter disappointment, truly, if his prisoner was not strong enough to be led out to execution on Monday morning.

Jack devoured everything greedily, for he believed that when he was in full possession of his bodily powers, he might see some chance to escape, though at present he could not.

After his first meal he felt very different indeed.

He raised himself up on the bed, and glared fiercely at his foe.

The bullet from Wild's pistol had, in reality, only made a furrow in his flesh, little more than skin deep.

It was the quantity of blood which had poured from the wound that had so thoroughly prostrated him.

So great an effect would not have been produced by it, had he not been so thoroughly exhausted as he was.

But all the exciting occurrences which had taken place on that most eventful night had worn him out.

And so it happened that he was reduced to the condition we have described.

With receiving careful treatment, however, there was no doubt his recovery would be proportionably rapid.

Jonathan Wild saw that his victim's gaze was bent upon him, and he quailed before it.

It was only for a moment, though.

To recover himself, he poured out another glass of brandy from the stone bottle.

"Villain!" said Jack.

The thief-taker took no notice.

"Villain!" said Jack again, in a tone of voice that made Jonathan feel very uncomfortable—"double-dyed villain, even now I defy you!"

"Ha, ha!"

It was a miserable apology for a laugh that issued from Wild.

"You may seek to conceal your confusion by that affectation of mirth, but I can penetrate it! You may think you have at last succeeded in compassing my destruction, but you have not!"

"I have!"

"No you have not, Jonathan Wild! Even at the last moment you will fail, and I tell you so! You may think you have me secure—that I am beyond all human aid, but I tell you you will fail!"

"We shall see on Monday morning!"

"So we shall! You may think at last that you have succeeded in entirely getting the game into your own hands!"

"So I have, Jack!"

"No! although I am here in this strong room, enfeebled by illness and watched over by you!"

"Ha, ha! I am a good nurse, am I not!"

"You mock me, villain, but you shall hear me. notwithstanding!"

"Oh, go on, pray! I am content! Do you know, I rather enjoy a little conversation! I have grown very weary, sitting here so long without anyone to speak to!"

Jack Sheppard affected not to hear this speech, though his gleaming eyes showed how Wild's manner enraged him.

He went on as though he had not been interrupted.

"I say, now that I am here, and now that you have also got in your safe keeping Blueskin and—and Edgworth Bess—"

Jack's voice faltered a little when he pronounced this last name.

Jonathan glared at him in astonishment.

"Eh?" he said.

"Now that you have all three of us prisoners——"

"But I haven't!"

"What?"

"I haven't!"

"Not got Blueskin and Edgworth Bess prisoners as well as myself?"

"Certainly not."

Jack uttered a shout.

"What put that into your head?"

"I thought you had."

"I wish to goodness your thoughts were right. I would give a thousand pounds!"

Jack Sheppard was much surprised by the revelation which had come thus unexpectedly upon him.

He had got the idea firmly fixed in his mind that Blueskin and Edgworth Bess were in close confinement like himself.

He was silent for a moment.

During that brief period of time Wild's thoughts were busy, and he saw a means by which he fancied he could inflict an additional pang upon Jack.

"Well, he said, I never heard the like! Why, you must have forgotten all that happened!"

Jack passed his hand confusedly over his brow, as though he would by that means clear his mental faculties.

"You must have forgotten all!" continued Jonathan.

"When I winged you you were pushing the boat off, were you not?"

"I was."

"Can't you remember what happened after that?"

"No; from the moment of pushing the boat until I woke up and found myself here I remember nothing."

"Oh! ah! I will tell you if you like!"

Jack was silent, and Jonathan was only too glad to interpret that silence as meaning consent.

"Ha! but, Jack, they served you a scurvy trick—a very scurvy trick indeed!"

Jack looked him steadily in the face, as though to ascertain whether the thief-taker was speaking the truth.

"Pretty friends they must be, Jack! You will hardly believe me when I tell you, but it's a fact, nevertheless. When you fell down—shot—half in the water and half out of it—they did not try to lift you into the boat, as they easily might have done, but pushed off without you, abandoning you to your fate, and leaving you to do the best for yourself that you could."

"Liar!" said Jack, fiercely.

"It's the truth!"

"It's a lie!"

"Very well, have your own way; but I would just ask you a question."

Jack disclaimed to say any more.

Jonathan went on placidly.

"The question is this! If your friends had not deserted you in the moment of danger, in the manner I have described, how comes it that you are a prisoner and they are free?"

This was an unanswerable question, and Jack sank down on the bed quite overwhelmed.

This was what he had never expected—never dreamt of.

He could scarcely believe it, and yet he fancied that, for once in a way, Jonathan spoke the truth.

How Wild chuckled when he saw the effect which his words had produced.

He knew full well that that would touch Jack more deeply than anything else.

It seemed strange, Jack thought to himself, that Blueskin should have abandoned him. He could not account for such a thing.

And Edgworth Bess, too.

His brain whirled.

He uttered a groan, and sank still lower on the bed.

Had he not been aware that his mortal enemy was watching his every movement, and rejoicing over every symptom of agony, he would have writhed with anguish, and shrieked aloud.

This was the bitterest draught he had to swallow! To think, after all that he had done, he should be abandoned in the manner he evidently had been.

In a state of mind that fairly baffles all description, Jack remained for some time.

How long he knew not.

Even Jonathan Wild did not know how much he suffered in the time.

At length Jack began to think more calmly; and then the first thing he did was to blame himself for having so soon allowed himself to be influenced by the manner in which Wild had related what had happened.

To a certain extent the facts might be true; but then they were probably distorted, and purposely so in order to cause him to endure as much mental anguish as he could.

Then his former faith in Blueskin returned, and he felt sure that if he had been left there was no hope for it, and that he would strain every nerve to help him.

He grew calmer and calmer, but he made a resolution to hold no further conversation with Jonathan Wild.

And so he laid upon the bed quite still.

Wild fancied he was torturing himself with the thoughts of being deserted, and so he flung out an occasional taunt.

To these Jack listened with the utmost indifference.

In this manner, then, the day wore away, without the occurrence of any particular incident.

The Governor came in once or twice, and so did Mr. Snoxall.

But that was all.

Nothing was said by either of these parties sufficiently important to deserve to be placed before the reader.

And so Saturday night came, and all hopes of Jack being able to make an escape seemed further off than ever.

Jonathan Wild did not seem to be at all tired of his job.

He sat at the table watching as earnestly as he did the very first hour.

Beside this one great purpose, all other things shrank into comparative insignificance.

He had not been out of the cell for a moment even to visit his son, who was lying dangerously hurt in that portion of the prison set aside for the Governor's private use.

He had never been to visit the ruins of his house.

This was the more extraordinary because, as the reader knows very well, there were certain things in connection with his abode which were undreamt of by the authorities, and the discovery of which would have the effect of putting Wild in a very awkward position indeed.

Not having taken one glance at the blazing ruins, he could not tell what secret recesses were disclosed.

The Governor of Newgate, however, here stood his friend.

He went in person, at Jonathan's request, to make an examination, and he returned with a tolerably favourable report.

The roof had fallen in, carrying all the floors with it.

The walls back and front were standing.

The piece of ground upon which the house had stood was deeply buried in the debris of the fire, which was smouldering so late as Saturday night.

The Governor had caused the doors and windows to be boarded over, so as to keep out intruders.

He had also sent to Bow Street, to the inspector there, and caused some police officers to be posted both at the back and the front, so as to keep everybody off.

This was all the more necessary, since there were many people in London—for instance, the whole of the thief-taker's gang—who were fully impressed with the notion that gold and jewels to a very large amount were concealed in the house.

Nothing would have pleased them better than to take advantage of Wild's voluntary imprisonment in Newgate to have gone and poked the rubbish over, in the hope of finding something that would well repay them for the trouble of searching.

But the police officers, being continually on the alert, effectually prevented anything of the sort being done, and Jonathan's myrmidons were forced to keep aloof from a spoil which they considered peculiarly their own.

Such, then, up to Saturday night was the state of affairs in connection with Wild's house.

After that time, some particularly interesting events took place, to which we shall presently direct the reader's attention.

For a little longer, we will confine ourselves to a relation of what happened to Jack Sheppard.

We have said that Saturday night came without the occurrence of any incident of importance.

Jack's mind grew calmer, and he laid himself down to sleep, for so intense a desire of slumber came over him that he found it was impossible to resist.

The reason of this was, Mr. Snoxall had, without his knowledge, caused a tasteless narcotic to be mingled with the last meal he had taken.

Jack ate heartily, and it was after that meal that his mind grew calm and the strong desire for sleep came over him.

He turned his face to the wall, and closed his eyes.

Before he was aware of it he was asleep, and unconscious alike of past, present, and future.

Jonathan dropped off into one of the dozes we have mentioned, and which served him as well as a sound sleep.

And in this manner passed away Saturday night in Newgate.

One more day only had to come and go, and then the time appointed for the execution of Jack Sheppard would arrive.

CHAPTER CCCCXX.

JACK SHEPPARD RESIGNS HIMSELF TO HIS FATE, AND ATTENDS DIVINE SERVICE IN THE CHAPEL.

How long Jack Sheppard's deep slumber would have lasted, had he remained undisturbed, is hard to say.

It seemed, however, that he had only just closed his eyes when he felt some one shaking him by the shoulder and calling aloud.

He woke up at once.

Looking about him, he saw with astonishment that it was already daylight.

At first he could scarcely believe that the night had passed away so quickly.

The sleep had been a deep and sound one.

Almost the first thought which darted into his mind upon awaking was so many more hours of his life had passed away in utter oblivion.

He had one day to live.

His heart ceased to beat and the blood ran cold in his veins when he made these reflections.

Looking up to see by whom he had been awakened and for what purpose, Jack saw Jonathan Wild, Mr. Noakes, Mr. Snoxall and a turnkey:

"Come, Jack, wake up!" said the Governor. "This will be a busy day for you! Rouse yourself and take some breakfast."

Jack sickened at the sight of food, but that was mainly in consequence of the opiate he had taken the night before.

He rose, however, at their bidding, for he felt it was no use to resist them.

He was thankful for some cold water to wash himself with.

He liberally soused himself with it, and when he had done so felt wonderfully better.

The dull, throbbing, aching pain in his head had disappeared.

The sickly feeling passed away, and he sat down to his breakfast with a hungry gnawing at his stomach.

But every mouthful he swallowed seemed to swell in his throat and choke him.

He was thinking over his dreadful position.

Now that the prospect of death was so close at hand, the horror of his situation was more apparent to him.

Twenty-four hours only had to elapse, and then the time would come when he would take his last look at this world.

Twenty-four hours!

What a brief space of time to look forward to.

And gradually there settled upon Jack's heart the horrible conviction that the end of his life was really very close at hand.

He could not hope to escape now.

Without some miracle occurred to save him he must perish.

Jack thought of Edgworth Bess.

Then his heart swelled until he was unable to bear the pain.

Tears sprang into his eyes.

But he controlled this outward symptom of emotion, though it cost him a sore effort.

He did so, however, for Jonathan's eyes were eagerly fixed upon his countenance, as though he would, if possible, penetrate his thoughts.

"You don't seem quite the thing this morning, Jack, my lad?" he said, for the fourth or fifth time.

As before, Jack disdained to reply.

The jeering, bantering tones in which the thief-taker spoke grated horribly upon the prisoner's ears.

"What a luxury it would be to be alone—by myself!" Jack murmured. "What would I not give to be relieved from the company of this fiend in human shape?"

No doubt Jack would freely have given anything he possessed, but nothing on earth would have tempted Wild to leave him.

And so, after all, it was but a poor breakfast that Jack had that morning.

He thought as he looked about him that he felt like one who was about to die.

To die!

Horrible thought!

He stood but on the threshold of existence.

Life had not opened to him, and he had only caught dim glimpses of the future.

And this was to be the end.

Some voice seemed for ever to be shrieking in his ear:

"Jack Sheppard will be hanged on Tyburn Tree to-morrow morning!"

In vain he tried to close his ears against this sound.

In vain he strove to turn his thoughts into another channel.

Louder and louder grew the imaginary voice, which, after all, was but the echo of his own fears.

Condemned to die!

To know so long beforehand just how long he had to live, and no longer.

To be able to say, to-morrow morning at twelve o'clock I shall cease to live.

I shall be dead.

Oh, it must be horrible—most horrible—to have one's fate staring one thus in the face!

More horrible still to know that nothing could possibly avert the awful doom!

On that Sunday morning Jack first knew what it was to have no hope.

His other imprisonments he had made light of.

He had once before been an inmate of the condemned cell.

But he had made light of it.
His breast had been filled with hope.
He had before him the prospect of escape.
But now how different was it!
He was hopeless.

And there was not the slightest chance of his being able to make his escape.

Nor was it possible for anyone to rescue him.

The closest watch and guard would be kept over him until the hangman's noose was round his neck.

And if all these thoughts were not enough to drive him to distraction, there was Jonathan Wild glaring at him, and continually making some triumphant, jeering remark.

Jack had to bite his tongue several times to control the impulse he felt to reply to several of them.

But he had made up his mind to studiously resist being drawn into an altercation of any kind with his persecutor.

Jack gave up his breakfast in despair.

He could not eat, and yet he felt a craving for food.

Shortly afterwards—it was indeed about half-past ten—the Governor and a turnkey entered the cell.

Mr. Noakes glanced from the half-eaten meal to Jonathan Wild.

"Not a very good appetite this morning, eh?" said the Governor.

"Not very," said Wild, in reply, with a horrible chuckle.

"Don't you often find the appetite fall off on Sunday?"

"Oh, very often, Mr. Wild."

"But some die game?"

"Uncommon."

"What do you think of our friend Jack?"

"In what way?"

"As to dying game?"

"Well, I don't know, Mr. Wild. You see, he is one of the crowing sort, Mr. Wild."

"He is."

"And there is one thing I have always noticed with respect to the crowing sort."

"What is that?"

"Why, they make a great display when there's no danger, but when the critical moment arrives——"

"Then——"

"Then, Mr. Wild, I assure you they show the white feather, and invariably die like a snail."

"Do you hear that, Jack?" asked the thief-taker.

But Sheppard remained silent, and looked as though he had not heard what was said.

Of course he understood the motive which prompted this little bit of conversation.

It was done for the purpose of aggravating him.

And although the words they uttered, and which he could not avoid listening to, rankled a reply in his heart, Jack preserved sufficient self-command to prevent any traces of his feelings being seen in his countenance.

The breakfast was removed, and then the Governor said:

"Come, Jack, prepare yourself!"

"For what?" asked Sheppard.

"To go to chapel."

"And pray for your life to be spared!" added Wild, with a derisive laugh.

Jack knew it would be folly to attempt any resistance to this, and so he said:

"I am ready."

"Make yourself look smart, Jack," said the Governor. "The chapel will be crowded with fashionable folks."

Many ladies of quality will be there."

Jack coloured with shame and vexation.

But he could not help himself.

He was destined to be made an exhibition of.

And now several more turnkeys entered the cell, and Mr. Noakes informed Jack that he must prepare to start.

Jack rose to his feet at once.

And now a curious thought entered his mind.

Would Jonathan Wild accompany him to the chapel? he asked himself.

The question was soon answered.

Jonathan also rose to his feet.

The Governor looked at him.

"Are you going to the chapel, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes, I am. Why shouldn't I?" asked the thief-taker.

"Ahem—well, Mr. Wild," stammered the Governor. "If I might speak."

"Go on, curse you!"

"Well, then, you don't look just the article for going to chapel?"

"Oh, don't I?"

"No, you don't."

"And who the devil told you to trouble your head about it? Mind your own business, and I will mind mine! I shall sit in the pew by the side of Jack."

The Governor, of course, did not dare say nay to anything the thief-taker might announce his intention to do, and so he turned to his men, and bullied them for not getting ready to start.

But really the Governor was quite justified in making the remarks he did respecting Wild's appearance.

That worthy was never very particular with respect to his toilette, and we will just remind the reader of the following, which will enable him perhaps to form some idea of the thief-taker's appearance.

In the first place, then, to go back to the night of the fire, Wild had very hastily attired himself, and the effect produced was rather grotesque.

In addition to this, we know how he was knocked about in his endeavour to prevent the escape of the fugitives, and how he was burned and scorched by the fire, and how he was blackened by the smoke.

Then he had had some more adventures, which will be fresh in the recollection of the reader, none of which were calculated to improve his personal appearance, but rather the reverse.

That wound in the throat, too, which he had received at Blueskin's hands, must not be forgotten.

While in the cell watching over Jack no water had ever touched his hands or face, nor had he attempted to smooth his shock of hair.

Altogether, then, we may go so far as to say that he was anything but a creditable specimen of humanity.

It was also only natural that the Governor should make the remark he did.

But Jonathan Wild was in the habit of setting all social proprieties at defiance, and he did so on the present occasion.

Although he had the time and opportunity to make himself look a little more presentable, he declined to do so, and announced his intention of going to the chapel just as he was.

The Governor groaned, but he was so deeply in Wild's power that he could not have denied his request if it had been ten times more extravagant than it was.

And now the procession got itself in readiness to start.

There were three turnkeys, Jack, the Governor, and Jonathan Wild, so that the little party numbered six persons altogether.

True to the purpose he had announced, and which up to the present moment he had carried out to the very letter, Jonathan Wild walked by the side of his prisoner.

In life he would never part from him—no, not for a single moment.

The gloomy corridors of Newgate were threaded in silence.

The only sound that broke upon the stillness was the dull echo which followed the tramp of their feet upon the stone flags.

How familiar the route of the chapel was to Jack.

How vividly, too, was brought back to his mind the recollection of how he had last passed through those passages.

At last the door leading into the chapel was reached.

Jack looked at it; but the spike which he had been at so much pains to break off had been replaced.

The man who stood at this door unlocked and opened it to allow the party to pass through.

That part of the chapel set aside for the accommodation of the prisoners was unoccupied.

But the galleries where spectators were allowed to sit were crowded with fashionably-attired people.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXI.

JONATHAN WILD IS DISCONCERTED BY JACK SHEPPARD'S PROPHECICAL REMARKS.

PLACED as the reader is in full possession of all the circumstances attending Jack Sheppard's extraordinary career, he will have no doubt that the capture of so notorious a character produced an immense amount of excitement in the City of London.

At the time of which we write it was the custom to allow the public to sit in the chapel belonging to the prison, and hear the condemned sermon, as it is called, preached to those trembling wretches who were doomed to suffer for their crimes on the morrow.

On most occasions there was generally a good gathering of spectators, for there were many who delighted to note the differences in the demeanour of those whose term of life was to be cut short.

When any particular malefactor, however, was placed in the pew set aside for such a purpose, then the utmost anxiety was manifested to obtain a seat, and the galleries were crowded to suffocation.

But when it became known that the condemned sermon was to be preached upon Jack Sheppard on the following Sunday, there was such a demand for seats as had never been known before.

All those persons who had the privilege of granting tickets of admission were literally besieged by applications.

Within two hours after the intelligence became known, tickets had been issued to more persons than could possibly be crammed into the space allotted for them.

Of course, those of distinguished rank—and there were many such beneath the roof of Newgate Chapel that Sunday morning—had the preference over those who were not so nobly born.

Only one rule could be followed with respect to the seats, and that was that those persons who entered first would have the best.

In consequence of this, at a very early hour in the morning a large crowd had assembled round the door.

At last, about an hour and a half before service would commence, the doors were opened.

The galleries were filled in a moment.

A large concourse of people was left outside then, and more kept arriving every minute.

That hour and a half in the crowded gallery must have been terribly trying to the patience, but the spectators stood the test bravely.

But there was a great amount of excitement when the door was opened.

Hundreds of eyes were in a moment riveted upon Jack Sheppard, for the curiosity felt by everyone to catch a glimpse of his countenance was something marvellous.

But public attention was very quickly attracted to Jonathan Wild, for the fact of his having shared the cell with the prisoner and his motives for doing so were tolerably well known.

Comments upon the appearance of both the prisoner and the thief-taker passed freely from mouth to mouth.

As might be imagined, Jonathan's extraordinary appearance created a great deal of remark.

The door of the pew was unlocked, and a turnkey entered.

Jack followed next.

After him came Jonathan Wild.

Then three more turnkeys.

The pew was then quite full, and another person could not possibly have been squeezed into it.

Jack shrunk from coming into such close contact with his implacable enemy.

Jonathan noticed it, with a grin, and pressed closer to him, simply because he knew it to be an annoyance.

It was many a day since Jonathan Wild had been seen in a place of worship, and now he winked, and blinked, and looked about him as curiously as an owl.

At last he looked up at the gallery.

Then, when he saw anyone's eyes fixed upon him—particularly if it was a female—he would distort his countenance into a hideous grin, and nod his head on one side as though in token of recognition.

Surely, never before had the public gaze been favoured with such an extraordinary spectacle.

As for Jack, he folded his arms and leaned back in his seat with an assumption of ease that he was very far, indeed, from feeling.

He endeavoured to look as calm and unconcerned as he possibly could, and really succeeded very well.

When the spectators saw his slight, slim, and boyish figure, they could scarcely believe that they were looking upon Jack Sheppard, who had made all the country ring with his exploits.

They could scarcely think it possible that one so slender and delicate looking could have thrice broken out of such a fortress as Newgate was.

The prevailing feeling in the hearts of almost everyone who saw him was sympathy and compassion.

It really did seem hard for one so young and harmless looking to die so soon, and to die, too, such an ignominious death.

Then the attention of the public was directed to another spectacle.

The other prisoners confined in Newgate were marshaled in by the turnkeys and seated in the pews.

In Jack Sheppard's time, and for many years afterwards, Newgate was not exclusively a criminal prison, but debtors also were confined in it.

Even now, one of the best known entrances to the present prison is called the debtors' door.

The debtors then were first brought into the chapel, and put in their proper places.

Then the criminals were brought in.

The turnkeys, and other officials belonging to the prison, except those who were compelled to be on duty, then followed.

A silence of some few minutes succeeded.

Then the chaplain of the prison, or ordinary as he was called, entered.

He was attired in full canonicals like any other clergyman of the established church.

He walked straight up to the reading-desk.

He was tall and stout—almost as tall, and stout, and sleek as his successor, who died so mysteriously in an omnibus the other day.

As he came along the aisle, he wiped his lips in rather an undignified manner with the back of his hand.

The fact was, the gelatinous portions of a meal he had just taken were clinging about his mouth.

In a thick, unctuous voice, and with as rapid an utterance as his scanty breath would permit, he read over the prayers.

But it is not our intention to enter into the details of the service.

Very few, indeed, paid the least attention to the ordinary's words.

The strangers in the gallery came there to see the sight, and not to listen, and so they were not auditors.

Jonathan Wild kept his eyes open and glared about him for a little while.

Then he closed those bleared and bloodshot orbs of vision, to the intense relief of everybody, and dropped off into one of those cat-like dozes we have so often mentioned, and from which the least thing would serve to arouse him.

Jack Sheppard, with his eyes fixed upon vacancy, soon became oblivious of the ordinary's droning voice.

His thoughts were busy and far away.

He was thinking of Blueskin and of Edgworth Bess.

He wondered whether it was possible that he had taken his last look of her in this world.

His fears whispered to him that he had—that he would never see her more, or hear her sweet voice again.

Then something like a groan would come to his lips, which, with a powerful effort, he would subdue into a sob.

Jack's eyes were open.

If he closed them, even for ever so short a time, a terrific sight appeared before him.

That was the triple tree at Tyburn, surrounded by a crowd of eager, curious people, all anxious to feast their eyes upon his death agony.

And so, what with thinking of his comrade, and of her he loved a thousand times better than his own life—what with thinking of his own terrible position and approaching fate—Jack paid very little attention to the service.

And then the turnkeys.

To be sure, they sat still and listened, but it was in a mechanical sort of way.

It had become with them a portion of their duty, and they went through it merely as a piece of routine.

The Governor, as was his custom, leaned back in his seat, closed his eyes, and pretended to listen.

But in reality he was fast asleep.

And so the only persons who remained to pay attention

[STEGGS AT THE HOUSE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.]

were the prisoners, and we are very much afraid that they were too busy looking about them, and thinking of their own affairs to do so.

And then the ordinary commenced the condemned sermon.

He was listened to at first, but soon attention returned and centred upon Jack Sheppard.

At last, to the infinite relief of the latter, the service was concluded.

The debtors and criminal prisoners were first removed, and consigned to their respective cells.

Then Jonathan woke up, and accompanied Jack Sheppard back to the strong room.

"Curse it, Jack!" he said, loud enough for the people in the galleries to hear, "I'm d—d glad that you are going to be tucked up to-morrow, and so are you, I should think, for I am tired of this sort of work, and shall be glad when it's over!"

No. 90.—BLUESKIN.

Jack took no notice of this speech.

The remainder of the day passed drearily enough.

Exposed during the whole of that time to the jeers and insults of Jonathan Wild, Jack's existence was perfect misery.

At length, however, Jonathan wrought him up to such a pitch that he started to his feet, and seemed as though he was about to rush upon him.

But if such had been his intention it was abandoned as soon as formed, and Jack sat down upon his seat again.

"Villain!" he shrieked, in uncontrollable passion. "I would rush upon you and crush the life out of your loathsome carcass, did I not feel that by so doing I should be conferring kindness upon you!"

"Ha, ha! much obliged, I am sure!"

"Jonathan Wild," said Jack, "I would try my best to take your life, even if I had to sacrifice my own to do so, but for one circumstance."

"What is that?"

"You may affect to ridicule and despise my words, but they are nevertheless true! I prophecy—"

"Then you believe you are near death? People near death always prophecy."

"I prophecy," continued Jack, unheeding the interruption, "that you will finish your life upon the gallows!"

Wild started.

"Beware!" he cried furiously.

At that moment there flashed across his mind the prophecy so singularly made by the old woman on the bridge.

Her words seemed to ring in his ears still, and it was through their influence that he called out to Jack to beware.

"Beware of what?" said Sheppard, furiously. "My words will come true—you will swing at Tyburn."

"Ha, ha!"

"You cannot pass it off with a laugh!"

"Don't talk such nonsense, Jack!" returned the thief-taker. "It would be more sensible if I was to prophesy such a thing of you! Ha, ha!"

"Jonathan Wild, I tell you again my words will come true, and not only that, I have a firm and deep-settled conviction that I shall be present in the crowd, and witness your last look upon earth before the rope is put round your neck!"

"Ha, ha!" said Jonathan, but his voice was unnaturally shrill and cracked. "What could be more ridiculous? You witness my execution? Yah, ha! It is folly, I say! It is not likely we shall change places! Ha, ha!"

"Whether or not, you will see my words will come true!" repeated Jack, who said the words, not from any particular conviction of his own concerning their truth, but because he saw they produced an effect upon his persecutor.

It was simply tit-for-tat.

"Wait till to-morrow, Jack! You will see then where your prophecy will be! At twelve o'clock to-morrow you will swing, as surely as the sun will rise to-morrow!"

With a sickening heart, Jack confessed to himself that this was true.

"No power on earth can save you, Jack, and it would be preposterous to suppose that a miracle would happen in your favour. Do you remember, Jack, I swore to hang you? I swore to do it, and I never fail to keep my word. You will hang, and at noon to-morrow! You see I have triumphed!"

Jack was silent.

Evening was coming on, and so once more, with a sigh of weariness, he flung himself upon the wretched bed.

"Can such a horrible thing be really true?" he muttered. "Can this be real? Is this, indeed, the last night which I shall spend upon this earth?"

A voice in his own heart seemed to reply with mournful vehemence:

"Yes—yes—yes!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXXII.

JONATHAN WILD IS THREATENED BY AN UNSUSPECTED AND TERRIBLE DANGER.

AND so passed Sunday night in Newgate.

If the truth must be told, Jonathan Wild felt even more anxious about the morrow than did Jack, Sheppard himself.

All the time he kept asking himself, was it possible he was on the point of consummating those schemes which, in their prosecution, had caused him so much discomfiture and trouble?

Apparently all was well.

That Jack Sheppard would be executed on the morrow seemed as certain as any future event possibly could.

Then, when that was over, and his most formidable enemy removed, what would be easier than for him to seek out Edgworth Bess, and compel her to accede to his demands?

Yes, surely all would be well.

He rubbed his huge, dirt-begrimed hands together in his satisfaction, as he pictured to himself how easily he should succeed in his future plans after Jack Sheppard was out of the way.

Oh yes, the moment of triumph had arrived, and his whole frame thrilled with horrible exultation.

And yet at times there would come over him a strange sensation of doubt and dread, and though he banished the feeling every time it made itself manifest, yet it kept recurring with irrepressible perseverance.

But he would not suffer this to make him at all uncomfortable—that is, he made up his mind to that effect.

Who shall doubt that there is truth in the saying, "Coming events cast their shadows before?"

It was the shadow of coming events which depressed Jonathan Wild at the moment of his anticipated triumph, in spite of all his efforts.

Could he have known what was taking place on that particular evening, he would not have wondered at his feelings.

Events were occurring which he never dreamed of—events that were destined to work a total change in his fortunes and prospects.

Danger was hovering over him.

He was reaching the summit of his success; the crowning hour of his triumph he fancied was at hand. But Wild ought to have known that when the highest point has been reached descent is inevitable.

Leaving, for a short time, Jack Sheppard and his persecutor alone together in that Newgate cell—the former to ponder over his approaching fate, and the latter to glut himself with expected triumph—we will relate what was taking place outside the prison.

The reader, we feel sure, has not forgotten Steggs.

When we last saw him was upon the occasion of his truly miraculous escape from Wild's house.

A strong degree of interest must of necessity attach itself to him and to all his proceedings, from the simple fact of his having in his possession those papers so important to the interests of Edgworth Bess.

It will be remembered that the packet of papers which, at the peril of his life, he had plucked out of the fire, contained not only the will of the real Lord Donnull, and papers necessary to prove the identity of Edgworth Bess, but also a document which comprised a full account of Jonathan Wild's villainies and enormities, so far as they had come under Abel Donnull's notice.

Steggs, however, although in possession of these all-important documents, had never had an opportunity of examining them in any way, and had only a general idea as to their character.

It will be remembered that after his fearful fall from the window, although he had been caught in the stranger's cloak, it was found that he was in a death-like swoon.

Consequently, he was carried off, without delay, to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, close by, where every attention was paid to him.

Upon recovering his senses, the first thing he did was to carry his hand to the breast of his coat, where he had deposited the precious papers.

A sigh of relief issued from his lips when he found they were secure, nor would he suffer anyone to remove his hand from them.

He held them with a grasp of iron.

It was found that the burns he had sustained were merely superficial ones, and not at all dangerous.

The chief ailment was his state of utter prostration;

but this, under the doctor's hands, was soon improved.

Slowly, then, day by day did Steggs improve.

True to his purpose, he kept the papers in his hand both by day and night.

At last—and this was on the Saturday—he was strong enough to sit up and make an examination of them.

He had little guessed their importance, and when he read the statement which Lord Donnull had written with reference to Jonathan Wild, his eyes fairly burned with satisfaction.

He laid down in bed, and strove to think clearly, and to decide upon the course of action which would be best for him to pursue.

He was bewildered.

He was a poor, weak, scarcely living wretch, and Jonathan Wild was in the full plenitude of his power.

How, then, was he to hope to obtain a victory over such an enemy?

The greatest care would be required, otherwise he would be foiled, and then it would be farewell, not only to all hopes of the poor heiress being reinstated in her rights, but also to his own deep and long-cherished hopes of vengeance.

In painful thought the whole of that day and night were spent, and when Sunday morning dawned he was no nearer to a solution of his difficulties than he was before.

It so happened, however, that an accident enabled him to come to a conclusion when careful thought had failed.

In the morning, as was the usual custom, the physicians belonging to the hospital made their tour of the sick wards.

Two of them were talking as they approached the bed upon which Steggs lay. Unconsciously at first he listened to their words, but soon he strained his hearing to the utmost to catch at the sense of what they said.

"I never knew a change to take place so quickly," said the first.

"Nor I. I scarcely think it true."

"There is no doubt about it. Who would have thought of such a thing? My conviction was that the late Government would have retained office for a long time to come."

"And mine."

"No doubt they would have done so, but for the fact of some very questionable and corrupt transactions on the part of the Secretary of State for the Home Department having come to light."

"Do you know their nature?"

"No, I do not, though rumour, of course, is very busy. This, at least, is certain—the Whigs are now in power, and a close inquiry is to be made into the doings of the late Secretary of State."

"It is very sudden."

"Very—very!"

Such was the conversation which Steggs happened to overhear, and the effect it produced upon him was very extraordinary.

He seemed to become quite a new man, and that was because he saw the way out of his difficulties.

He strove to be calm—to think clearly, and, above all, to do nothing rashly.

Steggs's chief difficulty had arisen from the fact of Jonathan Wild having been employed to do some dirty work by the Government which he had learned had just gone out of office.

Under such circumstances, he was quite convinced it would be the height of folly to make any complaints against Jonathan Wild.

As a matter of course they would not be listened to—or, if listened to, would be hushed up as quickly as possible, because of the fear they would have that Jonathan Wild would make some unpleasant disclosures.

But that was all altered now; if a change of the ministry had really taken place, and the late Secretary dismissed in disgrace, all that he had to say would be listened to with the greatest pleasure and attention.

All are ready to kick a man who is going down-hill, and the new Secretary would certainly be an enemy of the old one.

Steggs felt his heart grow light when he thought the matter over from first to last.

"Now I shall have my revenge!" he murmured. "Jonathan Wild, the moment of your downfall is at hand! Hitherto things have prospered with you, but now the tide has turned! Oh, if I were strong and well! Am I not better—am I not stronger already? Yes—yes! I can feel my old strength has come back to me—I am well!"

But the sudden accession of strength which he felt was not real.

It was that factitious strength which excitement so often produces, and which departs as quickly as it comes, leaving a double sense of weakness behind it.

Looking up, Steggs saw that the day was fast closing in.

For a moment he lay quite still.

Then he murmured:

"Yes—yes, I will go! I will dally no longer! How can I tell what will be the consequence of delay? I will go! I will seek out this new Secretary of State at once! In his hands I will deposit this packet of precious papers—to him I will make a full confession of all I know concerning Jonathan Wild! Then we shall see the results! I feel that the hour of vengeance is at hand! Yes, I will go!"

When he had arrived at this determination, Steggs was even stronger than before, or fancied he was, and rose.

No one was at hand to watch him, and his clothes were folded up near the head of the bed.

He attired himself hastily, and, clutching the packet tightly in his hand, crept out of the ward.

A nurse made an attempt to stop him, but he hurried past her and descended the steps.

He was allowed to leave without further attempt at molestation or hindrance.

Upon reaching the open air, he staggered and almost fell.

Recovering himself, he crept slowly onward.

Night was coming on fast.

He had not a penny in his pocket, so it was out of the question for him to hire any conveyance.

Slowly and wearily he made his way along the streets.

It was not, however, until he had gone some distance that he recollected it was Sunday evening.

He paused irresolutely.

On that day no business was transacted, and he feared the Secretary would not see him.

What should he do? Turn back?

No; he made up his mind that at all risks he would go forward, and not give up without making an effort.

On he went again, but more slowly than before.

His intellects were in a confused state, or he would have been conscious that he was ignorant of the Secretary's address.

He had not the remotest idea where he lived.

He was rather at a loss, too, to know where he should obtain the information.

He could think of no better plan than to go direct to the Houses of Parliament; and, accordingly, this was what he did.

After some trouble, he obtained from an official there the Secretary of State's address.

It was Spring Gardens, St. James's Park.

Thither poor Steggs dragged his weary body.

Feeling as though he could not have gone a dozen yards further had his life depended on it, Steggs crept up the steps before a handsome-looking house.

He paused doubtfully, and hesitated to raise the knocker.

He was afraid that the reception he would meet with would be anything but a welcome one.

He was giddy, and sick, and faint, for he had left the hospital long before he was strong and well enough to do so.

For some time he stood upon the steps, not daring to raise the knocker.

At last he summoned up courage enough to give a feeble summons for admission.

It was so feeble that it was disregarded.

Oh, if Jonathan Wild had only have been aware of Steggs's intentions at that moment, how easily could he have crushed him!

As easily as he could have crushed a worm.

But the thief-taker—sitting in the cell with his eyes gloating over Jack Sheppard—gave no heed to the danger that might arise from that quarter.

Such a thing never entered his mind.

He was ignorant even of the fact that a change in the ministry had taken place.

Steggs knocked again, and this time the door was opened.

When the domestic saw what a ragged, scarecrow-looking object stood upon the threshold, he attempted to shut the door again.

Steggs had expected it, so he glided in like a shadow.

"I want to see the Secretary of State!" he said, in a hollow voice.

The lackey looked aghast.

"It is most important!" continued Steggs, clutching the packet of papers tightly. "Let him know at once that I am here!"

The lackey looked all the surprise he felt, and seemed very much in doubt whether to attend to the strange visitor's request or not.

But there was something so earnest and so pleading in the manner in which Steggs looked or spoke, that he felt constrained to comply.

"I will announce to his lordship that you are here," he said, at length; "but I tell you candidly that I don't think he will see you. Besides, it is Sunday."

"I know that!" Steggs gasped.

"If you were to tell me your business, it might be the means of your obtaining an interview."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes. The first question he will ask when I announce you will be—'What does he want?'"

"Tell him, then," said Steggs, "that I want to see him upon an affair of the utmost importance—upon matters connected with the late Secretary of State and Jonathan Wild!"

"The great thief-taker?"

"Yes."

"Then you will be welcome."

"Why—why?"

"It was but the other day that I heard his lordship say that the continued existence of a wretch like Jonathan Wild is a disgrace to the nation at large!"

"Did he say that?"

"Yes, I heard him; and, what was more, he said that he would willingly do all he could to punish such a rascally villain!"

"You can tell him, then," said Steggs, "that I am one of Jonathan Wild's victims—that I barely escaped with my life from his house, which was, as you know, burned to the ground."

"Yes, yes—but you—where have you been since?"

"In the hospital."

"I will tell his lordship. Take my word for it, he will only be too glad to see you!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIII.

STEGGS MAKES A FULL REVELATION OF JONATHAN WILD'S ATROCITIES TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

THE lackey who admitted Steggs had indeed heard the new Secretary of State make some such remarks with reference to Jonathan Wild, and it was lucky for Steggs that he happened to have such a feeling in the matter.

But the fact was, the new Secretary was an upright, conscientious, honourable man, and he detested his predecessor, not only because he belonged to the opposite faction, but because of the mean and dirty actions of which he had been guilty.

It had been whispered to him that the thief-taker and the late Secretary had had some nefarious transactions together, and he felt annoyed to think that one who stood in such a high position as his predecessor, should stoop to make use of so base a tool.

When, therefore, he heard that Steggs was able to disclose something about their dealings together, he gave immediate orders for him to be admitted, although it was Sunday night.

The lackey came into the hall again, where Steggs was waiting, and told him that the Secretary would accord an interview.

With a beating heart, Steggs entered a beautifully-furnished room, which, being only dimly lighted, looked even more magnificent than it really was.

Sitting in an easy chair was a thin, pale, elderly gentleman.

He looked up when Steggs entered, and then he said:

"You have some information to give me about Jonathan Wild?"

Steggs bent his head.

He could not speak, but, tottering forward, placed in the Secretary's hands the packet of papers he had been at so much trouble to obtain and retain possession of.

The Secretary looked at them with surprise; then, perceiving how faint and exhausted Steggs looked, desired him to be seated.

Willingly enough, he sank down into one of the luxuriously-cushioned chairs.

With eager haste, the Secretary opened the parcel.

The reader may imagine his surprise when he became acquainted with its contents.

But the paper in which Abel Donnull had confessed at length the nature of his dealings with Jonathan Wild arrested the whole of his attention.

He read it eagerly from first to last, nor did he raise his eyes until he had done.

Then, without a word, he looked over the other papers.

"Why," he said, at last breaking the silence, "this is a most extraordinary affair!"

"It is, my lord, and I hope I have done right by placing these papers in your hands."

"You have; for I will make it my business to see that justice is done to the injured and oppressed."

"That is all I desire, my lord," replied Steggs, who then entered into an account of the whole of the circumstances connected with Edgworth Bess, Jack Sheppard, and Lord Donnull.

He also made him acquainted with all that had come under his notice during his stay in Wild's house.

As the reader may expect, the disclosures were of a very serious nature.

We have not repeated the statement made by Steggs, because we judged it unnecessary to do so, as all the events must be too well remembered to need repetition.

What he heard had the effect of producing an entire change in the Secretary's mind with respect to the opinions he had entertained of Jack Sheppard, and he was compelled to come to the conclusion that the crimes he had committed had been forced upon him rather than otherwise.

When Steggs had finished his narrative, the Secretary told him to help himself to some wine that was on the table; and, having done so, he leaned his face upon his hand, and gazed into the fire reflectively.

At length, having finished his meditations, he looked up.

"You will swear that all you have told me is the truth?"

"I will, my lord!"

"And what has been your motive in seeking me out and making these revelations?"

"To speak frankly and truly, my lord—because of the many injuries I have received at the hands of Jonathan Wild."

"A good and sufficient reason. Had you given any other, I should not have felt half so sure of your integrity as I do now. But this Jack Sheppard—are you sure that you have not been misinformed concerning him? He has been represented to me in a very different light."

"But that would be through the malice of Jonathan Wild, my lord."

"Perhaps so—perhaps so!"

"You may be sure of it; and sure, as well, that all I have told you concerning Jack Sheppard is the truth."

"I am sorry to hear it!"

"Sorry, my lord?"

"Yes! Are you not aware that he is a condemned prisoner in a cell in Newgate, and that to-morrow morning is appointed for his execution?"

"No, my lord—I did not know it! I have only just come out of the hospital. Jonathan Wild, then, believes the hour of his triumph is at hand."

"In one respect it certainly is!"

"As how, my lord?"

"With respect to Jack Sheppard."

"Must he perish, my lord?"

"I cannot save him. On the clearest evidence he has been found guilty of crimes the penalty of which is death. He has three times broken out of Newgate! There is no help for it! Let his excuses be as great as they may, the sentence pronounced against him must be carried into effect!"

"I have not come here to plead his cause," said Steggs, "but simply to place facts before you in their true light. I have no motive for interesting myself in Jack Sheppard's favour. In my opinion he is a hot-headed fool, and deserves his fate! Had it not been for him I should not have suffered such a world of agony as I have!"

"Well, well—I have nothing to do with that! As for Jonathan Wild, I shall know how to take my measures with respect to him; as for yourself, you will consider yourself as under arrest until the charges you have made have been substantiated."

"I am quite ready and willing to submit myself entirely to your lordship."

"I can expect no more; and these papers—you say you are willing that I should retain possession of them?"

"Certainly, my lord; but I surrender them to you upon the understanding that you will take proper steps to instate this poor girl, who is undoubtedly the heiress, in possession of her property."

"My duty leads me to do so."

"That is all, then, my lord—except that I am very weak and ill, and have nowhere to go to, and—and no money."

"Perhaps it is quite as well that you have not, because it will furnish me with a means of still further testing the extent of your good faith. For the present, you will take up your abode under that roof."

Steggs was only too glad to consent to such an arrangement, being, as it was, in every way advantageous to him.

The Secretary then summoned a domestic, to whom he issued his instructions concerning Steggs, who then left the apartment.

After his departure, the Secretary rested his face in his hand again—a favourite attitude of his whenever he was puzzled or perplexed about anything—and carefully thought over all that had passed during this singular interview.

Having done so, he hastily wrote a letter, and then summoned the domestic again.

"Have that letter sent off with all speed—it is most important!"

The servant bowed and withdrew, and, glancing at the superscription of the letter, saw that it was addressed to the Chief Police Officer in London.

Did Wild think there was such a storm brewing overhead?

Could there possibly be any connection between those gloomy doubts and fears, which we have described as coming over him, and the events which had just taken place?

If there was a connection Wild was ignorant of it, though he certainly had a vague presentiment of coming danger.

But as to the nature of what was going forward he knew nothing.

In reality, his long and successful but criminal career was coming to an end.

Justice at last was taking his case into her hands.

There was no longer a corrupt Secretary of State—the instrument of a still more corrupt Government, who would stand as a shield between him and his enemies.

On the contrary, a man was in power who would do all he could to consign him to the ignominious death he so richly deserved.

The reader can guess at the nature of the communication which was sent by the Secretary to the Chief of Police.

Immediately upon receipt of the missive, the individual last mentioned made all speed to Spring Gardens; and, upon arriving there, was shown at once into the presence of the Secretary.

With the details of what took place between them during this interview we need not trouble the reader.

It will be enough to say that the Secretary related at full length all that Steggs had confided to him.

The Chief of Police at once made up his mind as to what had best be done, and his plans were fully approved of by the Secretary, who gave his sanction that they should be carried out without further delay.

This terminated the conference.

By the time the Secretary reached the street midnight had pealed forth from the thousand-and-one churches in the metropolis.

The Chief of the Police went direct to Bow Street, and within half an hour of his arrival there two of the most responsible officers of the force left it.

They made their way through the silent streets in the direction of Jonathan Wild's abode.

At length they reached the spot upon which the gloomy, ruinous tenement had stood.

We have already stated that some police officers had been stationed here in order to keep off all intruders.

These two officers were well known to the subordinates, and they listened respectfully to what was said.

The next moment, the two police officers stood within the walls of the building.

At that lonely hour they were not afraid that their movements would be watched by any prying eye.

One of them produced from his coat-pocket something which looked almost like a torch.

This he lighted, and by its means a ruddy light was cast upon the ruins.

The spectacle was one of desolation.

These two officers, however, were old hands, and were accustomed to see such sights as lay before them.

The only interest they felt in looking about them arose from the fact that the house belonged to Jonathan Wild.

In a skilful and methodical manner, they first set about making a thorough examination of the debris of the fire, which lay in heaps upon the ground.

This was all patiently and carefully turned over, but without resulting in any particular discovery; for so great was the heat of the fire, that those things which in a general way were incombustible had been reduced to ashes.

While searching about the foundations of the house, they came at length to that which they had particularly come to find, namely, the entrance to the cellar, which Wild, in defiance of the laws, had constructed and christened "Little Newgate."

"Here you are at last!" said one of the officers. "You may depend this is it."

"Oh, yes!" returned the other, "as I told you coming along, I had heard there was such a place, but I never believed it—I always treated it as a joke in fact."

"There seems no doubt about the reality of it now though. You go first, as you have the torch, and I will follow."

Those steps which led down from the iron grating in the passage in Wild's house to the corridor from which the cells opened looked anything but inviting, but the officer descended them unflinchingly with his comrade by his side, rather than following him.

The air in the corridor was close and sickly, but the fresh, cool air rushed down from the opening they had made above, and momentarily improved its quality.

One glance was quite enough to convince the police officers that the information they had received was indeed correct.

On both sides of the corridor strong doors were visible, which, from their strength and general appearance, evidently led into cells.

"What is to be done now, mate?" said the officer who carried the torch. "Shall we go right on and examine the place before us, or look into the cells one by one?"

"Let us begin by going into the cells first. We shall save time by so doing."

"So we shall. You have the tools for opening the doors. Get them ready, and I will hold the light!"

The second officer produced from his pockets a complete set of housebreaking implements, and, selecting those most suitable for the job, commenced an attack upon the roof before him.

It soon yielded before his efforts.

With feelings of greater curiosity than they had experienced for many years, the two police officers pushed open the door. Upon entering, they found a place presenting all the ordinary appearance of a cell, except that the floor of it was much below the level of the passage.

In this cell they found nothing of importance, though their keen, practised eyes easily detected that the cell had been very recently occupied.

There was nothing to be gained from a protracted stay in this place, and so they quitted it.

Crossing over, they went to the door of the cell opposite to the one they had just searched.

This, too, was empty, though, like the other, it furnished traces of occupation.

With the like result, the other cells were searched in succession, until at length the officers stood, as it seemed, at the end of the corridor.

A blank wall was before them, in which there were no signs of a door.

So far, then, their discovery went no further than having found the cells themselves, which was, at any rate, corroborative of the truth of the information given them.

They had also been told that there was a secret door in the wall at the end of the corridor, though very cleverly concealed.

This entirely baffled them for some time; but, having the clue, they searched closely, and were finally rewarded for their trouble.

The spring was discovered, and, being pressed upon, caused the door to fly open.

The often-described corridor lay beyond.

The officers crossed the threshold of the secret door, and stood in the inner passage, with a strange fluttering feeling about their hearts, as though they knew they were on the brink of making some discoveries of tremendous import.

Here, if anywhere, might they expect to find out some of Wild's secrets.

The place had all that appearance.

But the doors of several cells were opened without anything being found within them.

At last they passed before a cell door which has often been mentioned to the reader.

With some difficulty they forced it open.

All within was silent, though the air had a strange, clammy, disagreeable flavour.

The officers felt their hearts heave, but the one who carried the torch held it high above his head, in order that its rays might be thoroughly diffused.

His companion kept close by his side.

In an instant, both at the same time, they distinguished lying on the floor of the cell something which gleamed with a horrible, ghastly whiteness.

They approached hastily, and paused suddenly.

One glance was enough to reveal to them what that ghastly white something was.

It was a human skeleton.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIV.

THE TWO POLICE OFFICERS DISCOVER THE SKELETON OF ABEL DONMULL IN THE CELLS BENEATH WILD'S HOUSE.

It seems strange that the skeleton of a human being should be such a universal object of loathing and abhorrence as it is.

No one can regard it without a shudder, and the eyes are averted by the dreadful sight by what appears to be a peculiar kind of instinct.

Even those old and well-tried police officers, who had been prepared to find something in those cells of a most horrible nature, shrank back when they beheld the ghastly skeleton at their feet.

But it was only on the impulse of the moment that they did so.

Recovering from this natural feeling, they once more advanced, until they were quite close to the dreadful object.

Then stooping down, and holding the torch so that the principal portion of its light fell upon it, the two officers commenced making an examination of the skeleton.

For some moments both looked in silence, but suddenly one spoke.

"It is easy to see how it is we find the skeleton in such a state as this. Look! Do you perceive that the bones are perfectly polished—that not a fragment of flesh or integument adheres to any one of them—and that, in fact, all that remains besides the bones are the cartilages by which the framework is held together? I have seen many a skeleton in my time, but this is not the natural appearance for it to present."

"It is not. I fully agree with you there. I never saw the bones so clean—they look as though they had been scraped with a knife."

"They are as well polished as if they had been; but they have not—they have been scraped by the rats!"

The other officer shuddered.

The idea was a horrible one.

The one who had spoken had expressed himself in tones of deliberate conviction, and he was no doubt perfectly correct.

He continued:

"These cells swarm with rats and all such vermin, and this dead body, lying here as it evidently must have done, would tempt them all to come forth. Then they would have the horrible banquet, nor would they cease until they had picked the bones as clean as you see."

"It is frightful to think of such a thing—horrible in the extreme! Who was the unfortunate person, I wonder?"

"That I hope we shall discover, as well as whether he received his death by violence. Come closer! What is that glittering?"

The officer, as he spoke, pointed to one of the fleshless hands.

"It must be a ring! Yes—that is it!"

"We must have it, then!"

The officer shrank from touching the frightful object;

but it was necessary that they should obtain possession of the ring, and so, overcoming his scruples, he drew it off.

The first thing they then did was to examine it tentatively.

It was a large plain stone, in a very massive gold setting.

Upon it was engraved a crest, or some device of a similar character.

It was quite uninjured.

The rats, in their horrible repast, had eaten all the flesh on the fingers, but left the ring untouched.

"We must take care of this," said one of the officers, after the ring had been examined, and placing the article in his pocket as he spoke. "It will probably enable us to identify the body."

"Very likely. I do not know the crest myself."

"Nor I, but it will be easy to ascertain its owner."

"Oh, yes. Is there anything more?"

"I think not. I cannot see that the rats have spared anything else—all the clothing has been devoured."

"It has disappeared certainly, and the only thing that remains for us to do is to find out whether this man met with a violent death or not."

Holding up the torch, the officers now approached the body more closely.

They began at the feet, examining all the bones carefully, so as to learn whether they had been injured in any way.

Nothing of the kind at all met their view until they reached the head, or, rather, the skull.

To their horror, they found that it had been beaten or battered by some heavy instrument until its appearance even now was fearful to behold.

"Good heavens!" cried one of the officers. "Did you ever see anything so dreadful?"

"Never—never! The skull is completely smashed! What a horrible death!"

"Truly horrible. I wonder who the unfortunate man was?"

"That, I hope, we shall be able to discover ere long."

It will be found out, for you may depend a very great uproar will be made about it."

It is certain we can do no good by remaining here. Let us leave things just as they are, and lock up the cell; we shall then be able to make a proper report."

This was done.

The officers fastened up the door and placed three seals upon it, and then continued their investigations.

Although the officers knew not to what unfortunate being the skeleton belonged, the reader will doubtless have surmised that it was no other than Abel Donmull.

Such, indeed, was the horrible fate which had overtaken that bad, bold man—a fate at which all must shudder, and even some compassion must be felt for him on account of his shocking end, for had it not been for the villainous thief-taker, he would have placed Edgworth Bess in possession of her rights.

But he was not allowed to make even that tardy atonement for his many and awful crimes, and he had fallen a victim to Jonathan Wild's murderous bludgeon.

This was the instrument which had crushed the skull in the manner we have described.

After death, as the officers had correctly surmised, the rats, enticed by the odour, had made their way from Newgate Market and the sewers in prodigious numbers, and then the banquet had commenced, nor had the ravenous creatures ceased until everything eatable had been consumed.

Such was the end, then, of Abel Donmull, the usurper of his brother's title and his niece's inheritance.

The ring he had upon his finger would, of course, serve to identify the body, though it would be hard to prove that Jonathan Wild committed the atrocious deed.

The officers examined all the cells, but they found nothing else of any importance.

They retraced their steps still looking carefully about them, and finally ascended the steps leading into the open air.

But the officers had not discovered that which they hoped to find.

They did not despair, but continued their search among the heaps of ruins.

Many strange things were found, and at last they stumbled over a small tin box.

There was something peculiar in the look of this box. Owing to some unusual conjunction of circumstances, it had escaped all danger from the fire.

It was not even scorched.

It almost seemed as though it had been preserved to answer some particular purpose.

The officers seized it with avidity.

"At last," said one, "we seem to have found what we have been looking for!"

"Let us open the box at once, and see what it contains!"

This was done quickly, by means of the housebreakers' tools they carried.

No sooner was the lid raised than ejaculations of satisfaction burst from the lips of the officers.

The tin box was filled with gold lace of a very superior quality.

The whole quantity contained in the box, for, it was pressed down very tightly, must have been worth a large sum of money.

"Gold lace!" ejaculated the officer who had broken open the box, "the very thing!"

"Right! we will take care of this. Beyond all doubt, it is the gold lace we have been so anxiously on the look out for!"

"Do you mean the lace stolen from Mrs. Stetham's, on Holborn Hill?"

"Of course I do!"

"If it turns out so, Jonathan Wild will find himself in rather an awkward fix!"

"Very! The property was stolen, and rewards have been offered for its recovery, but all in vain, and after all the bother, here we find it among the ruins of the house!"

"It is a clear enough case! We will take this box with us and depart at once! I don't think it will answer our purpose to remain here any longer!"

"Nor I! The other men will still keep guard and prevent any person from entering; and I imagine we have discovered quite enough to enable our chief to proceed in the matter!"

"Oh, ample—ample; and what a glorious thing it is to think that Jonathan Wild has reached the end of his rope at last!"

"I hope he has done so, but don't make too sure! He is a wonderful man, and possesses remarkable talent in extricating himself from any difficulty. We may think we have him secure, but he is very likely to slip through our fingers."

"Well, we shall see! Come on, mate; we will make our chief acquainted with the results of our explorations without further delay."

"It is quite certain that Wild little expects how we are engaged to-night; if he had the faintest suspicion of it we should have had some manifestation of his presence long ere now, depend upon it!"

"You are unquestionably right there. He is watching Jack Sheppard, and so has afforded us an excellent chance of searching the ruins!"

With these words, the officers passed out into the street.

They glanced up at the gloomy prison of Newgate as they passed by it, and thought of Jonathan Wild and his victim.

The grey light of early dawn was in the sky, and people were already assembled in front of the prison, waiting in patience for the hour to arrive which had been appointed for the execution.

Taking no notice of these, they directed their steps towards Bow Street.

Upon arriving here, they made a report to the inspector of their proceedings during the past night.

The ring which had been taken from the finger of the skeleton and the box of gold lace were placed in his hands.

The inspector was of opinion, after he had examined the lace, that it was the same that had been stolen some time back from the premises of Mrs. Stetham, on Holborn Hill, and for which large rewards had been offered without eliciting any information, while the police had altogether failed in their efforts to discover the perpetrators of the daring offence.

And here was the stolen property, or something very much like it, found among the ruins of Wild's house.

The case looked ominous, and the inspector, having received every detail of the affair from his subordinates, set off to the residence of the chief of police.

That functionary was not up, and he had to wait some time before he could see him.

At last, however, when the interview did take place, he was much astonished, and, in company with the inspector, set off to pay a visit to the Secretary of State.

Here a little further delay took place, and when at last the Secretary made his appearance, some hours were consumed in consultation.

They could not at first decide as to the best manner they should deal with Jonathan Wild.

From the disclosures which Steggs had made, the Secretary of State had no difficulty in understanding how the thief-taker had come into possession of the box of gold lace.

It had been stolen by some persons or other, and then brought to Wild, who had probably paid a small sum for it, and was waiting until the rewards had reached a sufficient amount to induce him to assist the owners to recover the property.

This was the usual course, and doubtless the one pursued with respect to the matter in hand, and pending the arrangement for its return the gold lace had been kept at hand on his premises.

It would not do to be too precipitate in dealing with such a man as Jonathan Wild, or the ends of justice would be defeated.

In the first place, it would be necessary to discover the persons by whom the robbery was committed, and, in order that this might be done, instructions were given that a free pardon should be offered to them on condition that they gave evidence against Wild, with regard to his share in the transaction.

All this would have to be done with great secrecy, for should the least whisper of such a thing reach Jonathan Wild's ears, he would take the alarm and get clear off.

The Inspector of Police, however, expressed his conviction that, if a free pardon was offered, he should be able to produce the guilty parties in a couple of hours.

In the event of his being successful in doing this, the persons were to be carried before a magistrate, in order that their depositions might be taken down, and a warrant was then to be issued for the apprehension of the thief-taker.

These arrangements having been made, the inspector and the Chief of the Police took their departure.

The former was as good as his word.

In less than two hours after he had sent out two officers with instructions to offer a free pardon to those persons who had been engaged in the robbery of some gold lace from the shop of Mrs. Stetham, on Holborn Hill, they returned, bringing with them a man and a woman.

The former of these gave his name as Henry Kelly—the latter as Margaret Murphy.

They admitted that they and they only had been concerned in the robbery of the gold lace.

According to instructions, they were taken before a magistrate, and their depositions written down.

These implicated Jonathan Wild to such an extent, that the magistrate, without the least hesitation, issued a warrant empowering his instant apprehension and lodgment in one of his Majesty's gaols.

Armed with this warrant, the inspector withdrew, and thought over the best plan of action for him.

From inquiry, he learned that Jonathan Wild had left the prison of Newgate on his way to Tyburn.

The inspector then took such measures as he imagined were best calculated to secure his apprehension.

What a surprise there was in store for the great thief-taker.

Who would have thought that a warrant should actually be in existence against him?

It seems improbable to a degree.

And yet it was so; and it seemed that, after putting up with voluntary imprisonment, he was now destined to have to submit to an involuntary one.

But we will leave events to take their course.

We will only say that the aspect of affairs now is most peculiar, and the incidents which followed this singular conjunction of events are of a far more singular and exciting character than any which we have yet had an opportunity of placing before our reader.

It will now be our duty to return to the prison of Newgate, and relate what events followed those which we last related as occurring on the Sunday night.

That night passed over without the occurrence of any particular incident.

Jack Sheppard lay all the time upon the miserable bed, while Jonathan Wild still sat in the chair at the table half asleep, and little thinking in what way his enemies were engaged.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXV.

MONDAY MORNING ARRIVES, AND EVERY PREPARATION IS MADE FOR JACK SHEPPARD'S EXECUTION.

It is Monday morning, and let us, before we go any further, take a look around us, and ascertain the exact position of all those persons whose fortunes have made up this most eventful history.

Let us see how they were one and all engaged at this particular period of time.

In the first place, then, there is Blueskin.

He is in the public-house in Smithfield Market, into which he had ventured in quest of information.

He is on the point of learning from the landlord of that public-house the particulars of some scheme by which Jack Sheppard may be benefitted.

Next comes the poor, persecuted Edgworth Bess, with her new-found and faithful friend Ned Cantle.

They are away from the city of Amsterdam.

They have taken up their abode in a little cottage on the borders of a forest, and here they were on Monday morning, wholly ignorant of what was taking place in London.

Their anticipations of the worst never came up to the dreadful reality.

Then there is Steggs, who, having laid a plan for the destruction of his hated foe, is in comfortable enough quarters in the residence of the Secretary of State.

George Wild, too, the bad son of a bad father?

He still lay in that portion of the prison appropriated to the Governor's own use, and suffering horribly from the various hurts he had received, and not very well able to help himself.

Mr. Noakes, the Governor, too, must not be forgotten.

At the earliest dawn he had risen from his bed, for Monday was to be a happy day for him, and he felt that he could not have too much of it.

We come at last to Jack Sheppard.

To have described the feelings of any of the other characters we have mentioned would have been easy.

To describe Jack Sheppard's we feel would be impossible.

We could not even give the barest and most meagre outline of the thoughts that thronged through his throbbing and fevered brain.

As minute after minute passed away, the conviction pressed still more strongly upon his mind that it was the last night he should ever pass on earth.

On the morrow he should take his last look of the sun, and the earth, and all existence.

On the morrow he should bid farewell to life.

He had seen Edgworth Bess for the last time.

Never again would he experience the pleasure of gazing into her lovely countenance.

She had gone—where he knew not; but he should see her no more.

Mournful words!

His heart seemed as though it would break, for, upon further thought, he felt himself compelled to adopt Jonathan's account of the affair.

Blueskin and Ned Cantle had deserted him.

Why he knew not, but they had deserted him; and where they had gone or where they were at that moment he had not the remotest idea.

They were in safety, no doubt; but he was a prisoner—a prisoner condemned to death, and waiting for the moment when he should be led out to execution.

As he lay upon his miserable pallet he watched the dim streaks of day creep into the cell.

Never again was he to behold the same phenomenon, and he watched the gradual illumination of his cell with an interest that surprised himself.

The consciousness was upon him that he was watching it for the last time.

What hope had he of escape?

None—none!

No power on earth could save him.

He was doomed to die, and the time fixed for his ignominious death was close at hand.

He tossed and rolled upon his wretched bed, and would have given way to his emotions much more than he did, had not the baleful, hideous eyes of Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, been fixed upon him.

What a satisfaction it would have been to Jack if he could have known what the police officers were engaged upon at that moment!

He would have gone to death almost without a pang, had he possessed the knowledge that Jonathan Wild, his hated enemy, would speedily follow him to the same scaffold.

But though he uttered his predictions with an air of conviction that was not without producing its due effect upon Jonathan Wild, yet he had no foundation for them.

He did not think he should live to see the villain executed, though he could not help believing that the time would come when he would receive the reward which his demoniac villanies so truly merited.

His heart would have leaped with joy if he had known that a warrant was about to be issued for Wild's apprehension—that retribution would overtake him so soon.

We have said that Jack had fully rendered himself up to despair.

All hope had departed from his breast.

He neither thought he might have a chance of making his escape, nor that an attempt would be made to rescue him while being led to the scaffold.

No, he believed that he should perish; and that, too, before he was many hours older.

Brighter and brighter grew the cell.

One by one the various objects were brought into view, and, finally, fully revealed.

As for Jonathan Wild, he woke up in unusually high spirits.

This proceeded as much from the fact that the day appointed for Jack's execution had at length arrived, as that the termination of his voluntary imprisonment, which had begun to grow terribly tiresome, had come at last.

At a very early hour that morning the inmates of Newgate were astir.

The Governor was the first to rise, and he had quickly roused up all the rest.

The hatred which he felt for Jack Sheppard was his strongest feeling.

It is not to be so much wondered at, because by breaking out of the prison in the manner he had, Jack had brought him into great trouble and difficulty, and more than once he had been threatened with the deprivation of his snug little office.

Hence his dislike to Jack had a reasonable enough foundation.

The only thing was, he pushed it to rather an extreme limit.

It was about six o'clock when Jack Sheppard heard the fastening outside his cell door removed.

He raised himself on one arm, curious to see who it was about to pay him such an early visit.

To his surprise, he saw Mr. Noakes and two turnkeys.

The latter carried in some water, and Jack was bidden to perform his ablutions, and otherwise render himself respectable.

To the astonishment of all, Wild loudly called for water, and then he began to wash himself in truly a furious manner.

After working industriously for about half an hour, he succeeded in making himself, as he considered, look quite charming and fascinating.

He had removed the coating of dirt which had caked itself over his hands and face, and he had adjusted his wig and neckcloth.

Jack washed and dressed himself with scrupulous care.

What a strange feeling it was that held possession of him!

All the time he kept repeating, mentally:

"This is the last time I shall do this—I am about to die!"

When he had finished, the ordinary entered, and, in spite of the rebuffs which Jack gave him, commenced to read some prayers with great unction.

Having gone through this part of his professional duty,

[JACK SHEPPARD IS PINIONED IN THE PRESS-YARD OF NEWGATE.]

he exhorted Jack to confess, but he expended his rhetoric in vain.

Jack turned a deaf ear to all he said.

At last he withdrew, after having first informed Jack that nothing could save him from everlasting torments.

Jack was heartily glad when he had taken his departure, but he was not allowed to remain undisturbed.

Breakfast was next brought in.

It was a tempting, substantial meal, but Jack felt no appetite.

Still, in order to spare himself the taunts of Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes, Jack forced the food down his throat and pretended to enjoy it.

As for the thief-taker, he ate voraciously.

Never had he felt in such good humour with himself and all the world.

Never had he felt so secure and triumphant.

No. 91.—BLUESKIN.

And yet at that moment he stood as it were upon a mine which threatened every moment to explode.

Oh, what a relief it was to Jack when breakfast was over, and yet he had no desire for time to fly, since each instant brought him nearer and nearer to his frightful doom.

After breakfast he was allowed a little peace, but not much, for Jonathan Wild still kept in the cell.

He had made a resolution to do so, and he kept it to the letter.

Jack felt that he could not look in the face of his deadly enemy while thus distorted with triumph, and retain at the same time his own calmness, so he studiously kept his eyes turned in another direction.

Two more hours passed, and then the cell door was again thrown open.

Jonathan Wild immediately rose to his feet and perpetrated a series of profound bows.

Jack, wondering who it could be, looked up and saw that two sheriffs, dressed off in their ridiculous attire, had just entered.

The Governor was behind, the very picture of deference and servility.

Bolind him were the turnkeys.

"Good morning, gentlemen!" said Wild, failing horribly in his attempt to make himself agreeable. "Good morning, gentlemen! I am really pleased to meet you upon the present occasion! I don't like to speak of myself, gentlemen, but you see the plan I have adopted, though contrary to all regulations, has fully answered its purpose."

"It has, Mr. Wild—it has!" replied one of the sheriffs, puffing violently, for the least exercise distressed him; "and I beg to thank you for having taken so much trouble."

"It was a pleasure, my dear Mr. Sheriff—a real pleasure!" answered Wild, hypocritically. "Anything I can do that is of benefit to the public at large is a source of great pleasure to me."

"Your conduct for years past is quite sufficient to prove that!" puffed the sheriff. "Is it not, Brother Potter?" he added, turning to his colleague.

"In that, as in everything else, I perfectly agree with you, my dear sir!" said the under-sheriff, who was one of those men who never venture to have an opinion of their own about anything.

The other sheriff stroked the sides of his waistcoat, probably to assist the digestion of the heavy meal he had just taken, and then he said:

"Mr. Wild, your conduct in this matter is beyond all praise. You have done what Newgate itself could not do—you have kept this rascal in safe custody. I will take care that this great and important service does not go unrewarded. I shall mention it at the first fitting opportunity."

To have seen how Wild grinned and bowed while the sheriff thus spoke was really something worth looking at, only his sycophancy was disgusting.

"Oh, Mr. Sheriff," he said, pretending to be quite overcome, "however can I thank you for what you have just said? I cannot—I really cannot! I feel that I cannot speak after you! What I have done was merely in order that the public at large might be benefited, and the words you have just spoken are a far greater reward than I ever looked for!"

The fat, pompous sheriff was amazingly flattered by this speech, and he smiled upon Wild in the most affable manner conceivable, as he added:

"I will take care, Mr. Wild, that you receive a more substantial reward for your services than mere words!"

"Oh, sir, you are too good!"

"Not at all—not at all! You are a very worthy man, Mr. Wild!"

"And you are an egregious ass!" said Jack Sheppard, addressing the sheriff.

Jack was so disgusted with the scene which was going forward that he could not restrain himself, though, of course, had been wise he would have held his tongue.

An ominous silence followed his words, which were enunciated with great fervency.

"You are an egregious ass!" he repeated; "or you would not allow yourself to be duped in such a barefaced manner by that unparalleled villain."

Jonathan held up his hands in affected dismay.

The sheriff opened his eyes very wide, and puffed out his cheeks to such an extent that they seemed in imminent danger of bursting.

Speech was denied him, but he glared fearfully at Jack, who returned the gaze with a pitying smile upon his lips.

The reader can imagine how disgusted he would be with Jonathan's behaviour.

Wild saw that the sheriff could not speak, but believing that he could both hear and understand, determined to take advantage of the situation if he could.

"Ah, Mr. Sheriff," he said, in the same fawning tones that he had previously employed, "had I given you my opinion of this unhappy young man, I could not have conveyed to you such an idea of the enormity of his depravity as he has done himself in a few words! The man who could call a respectable sheriff of the worshipful City of London an egregious ass would be guilty of any act, no matter how atrocious!"

The sheriff, thus appealed to, took a long silk pocket-handkerchief out of his pocket and gave his eyes some furious dabs with it.

"Alas—alas!" he cried. "Not from my own feelings, but from the contemplation of so much wickedness in one so young, I weep! I weep, and cannot help it!"

"And I!" said the under-sheriff, with a hypocritical snuffle, true to his purpose of taking his cue from his colleague.

"Such tears," said Wild, "do honour to you both as men, and to the whole City of London."

The thief-taker gave a circular sweep with his arm as he spoke, to show how comprehensive he meant to be, and to give increased effect to his words.

The Ordinary of Newgate, who had just entered with an open book in his hand, and crumbs sticking round his mouth—he had stopped longer than the rest at breakfast, he was such an inordinate glutton—now joined in the strain.

He always took good care to be on the best possible terms with the sheriffs, did this ordinary, and he let slip no opportunity of fawning upon and flattering them.

In a puritanical tone of voice, he said:

"Ah, Mr. Sheriff, the state of this young man makes my heart bleed! I pray for him unceasingly, but I fear that, however good the prayers may be which are offered up for so hardened a miscreant, they must fail to produce any effect! Still, I pray for him, Mr. Sheriff—I pray for him!"

"Why," exclaimed Jack, "you are a liar as well as a humbug! You told me, when you left me a little while ago, that I should go to torment, and that you would try your best to send me there!"

"Unhappy young man!" said the ordinary. "Why not learn to speak the truth?—at least attempt it now you are so near death!"

"I do speak the truth, and you know it!" returned Jack, resolutely.

"A hardened sinner!" replied the ordinary—"a hardened sinner! Rarely has it been my lot to contemplate such wickedness!"

"It is fortunate for the credit of humanity that there are not many such examples!" said the sheriff, puffing more violently than ever.

"Ah, gentlemen!" said Wild, "I could relate to you the particulars of such deeds that that young man has committed, to my certain knowledge, that would fairly chill your blood and tie your flesh up in knots—indeed I could!"

"I don't doubt you, Mr. Wild," said the sheriff, "and there is some consolation in knowing that if ever anybody deserved to hang upon Tyburn Tree, he does."

"There is consolation in that," replied the ordinary; "he fully deserves the worst fate that could be awarded to him."

"It is enough to make anyone shudder!" said the sheriff.

"Quite!" said his companion, agitating his fat till it trembled like jelly,— "quite enough!"

"Excuse me for interrupting you, gentlemen," said Mr. Noakes, with great deference—"I really hope you will excuse me!"

"What is the matter?"

"Why, time is going on, you know. In fact, it is quite time we made our preparations and got ready to start."

"We shall be late, I fear," said the sheriff, taking a watch about the size of a turnip from his pocket.

"No, no!" said the governor; "we shall be in time, for every possible arrangement has already been made."

"Proceed, then, Mr. Governor," said the sheriff, "and let us get this unpleasant business over as soon as possible!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXXVI.

IN WHICH JACK SHEPPARD STARTS ON HIS JOURNEY TO TYBURN TREE.

JACK SHEPPARD was so thoroughly disgusted with the conversation in progress, that he refused to listen to any more of it.

The turnkeys, however, after Mr. Noakes had spoken, came towards him and aroused him from his abstraction. "Now then!" they said, "Just follow us, will you?"

The little party which had thronged the strong chamber in which Jack was confined now formed themselves into a kind of procession.

The two sheriffs placed themselves at the head of it, and the Governor followed.

Jonathan Wild sidled up to Jack, and the turnkeys surrounded them both.

In this manner they all left the cell, and traversed the gloomy passages of the prison, until at length they emerged into what is still called the press-yard of Newgate.

It derived its name from a barbarous and inhuman punishment which was inflicted upon those prisoners who refused to plead to their indictment.

If, when the clerk of the arraigns asked them whether they were guilty or not guilty, they refused to answer either one way or the other, they were carried away from the dock to the press-yard.

Here they were laid upon the bare ground, with their arms and legs firmly secured in an extended position by means of strong cords.

Heavy weights, either of iron or stone, were placed upon their bodies, and the weight gradually increased until either death put an end to their frightful sufferings, or until the culprits consented to plead to their indictment.

In the event of the latter, the weights were one by one removed, and the prisoners taken back to the court.

This practice was continued up to the year 1722—two years before the events which we are now describing.

The yard was now used as a place where prisoners were whipped, and where they were pinioned previously to being placed in the cart, though sometimes the pinioning process was performed in the cells.

It had been arranged that Jack Sheppard should be pinioned in the press-yard, and accordingly he was led thither, attended by a numerous escort.

Upon arriving, however, he found that preparations had been made for him.

In addition to the turnkeys, a number of soldiers were present.

They were fully armed, and had received instructions to act the moment when they perceived there was a necessity for them to do so.

Jack Sheppard inhaled the not very fresh air in the press-yard of the prison with sensations of unalloyed pleasure.

At each breath he seemed to imbibe a quantity of life.

He began to feel more himself, and the change which came over him was so remarkable, that it was noticed by all present.

His eyes sparkled, and his cheeks flushed as though he was under the influence of some strong excitement.

Jonathan Wild looked vigilantly about him in order to perceive, if possible, what it was that had produced so remarkable an effect upon Jack.

But there was nothing.

At this moment the throng of persons divided, and Jack, hearing the commotion, instinctively turned his eyes in the direction of the sound.

But it was only to avert them instantly, as though they had been blasted by some horrible sight.

Jonathan Wild noticed that Jack shuddered, and he grinned with delight.

The rich treat that there was in store for him was just beginning to make itself manifest.

No doubt the reader can guess why it was that Jack turned his eyes away so suddenly, and afterwards shuddered.

He had caught sight of the hangman.

The throng had divided in order to allow him the opportunity of approaching the prisoner.

All shrank back quickly, so as to avoid the least contact with this man.

The executioner noticed it with a malicious grin, but otherwise took no notice of an occurrence which could not but have been patent to him.

Suddenly Jack started.

The hangman, with his lounging step, had reached his side, and touched him on the shoulder.

In a chuckling voice, which was most horrible to listen to, he said:

"Come, come—attend to me, please, and let us get this bit of business over as soon as possible!"

Jack shuddered again.

In spite, however, of the proximity of the hangman, he felt much better than he had done for a long time.

It was the fresh air which produced this effect upon him.

Once more did hope revive in his breast.

Once more did the word "escape" suggest itself to his mind.

The strange lethargic feeling which had weighed upon his spirits during his imprisonment to a great extent departed, and he looked about him in the hope of being able to seize upon something which would be of service to him.

Perhaps after all, he told himself, he should be able to escape, if he was only careful and cautious.

He did not feel now that strange sensation which he had for so long experienced, that he was near death.

Instead of it, he seemed to feel a conviction that he should once more triumph over his enemies.

It is hard to say from whence he derived this conviction.

There seemed little room for hope while he stood in the press-yard, surrounded by his foes, and with the executioner touching him on the shoulder.

Just when he felt the hateful touch, Jack had caught sight of a small penknife in Jonathan Wild's pocket.

Of what particular service it would be to him he knew not; yet he felt that it might be useful, and an irresistible longing came over him to take possession of it.

Jonathan's pocket was gaping open, and this was how it happened that Jack caught sight of the knife.

Quick as thought, and without being perceived by anyone, Jack picked Wild's pocket of this knife, and slipped it into his own.

With great cleverness he diverted the attention of his enemies.

When the hangman made the demand we have mentioned, Jack thrust his hands resolutely into his trousers pockets, and refused to remove them in order that he might be pinioned.

He would not have done this had it not been for the knife he had so cleverly obtained possession of.

While he held his hands in his pockets, then, he contrived to open one blade of the knife.

Should he have occasion to make use of it, it would thus come more readily to his hand.

"Come, Mr. Sheppard," said the hangman, "don't be so foolish! You will do yourself no good by resisting. Come—let me do my business without any fuss!"

Jack knew there was nothing to be gained by resistance just then, so he sullenly took his hands out of his pockets, and suffered the hangman to bind his arms behind his back.

When this ceremony was over, Jack thought he would be led straight to the courtyard, where he knew the cart would be waiting which was to take him to Tyburn.

But he was disappointed in this expectation.

At a sign from Mr. Noakes, a turnkey stepped forward. "One moment!" he said. "We have a little ceremony to go through, though it's more a matter of form than aught else."

The little ceremony to which the turnkey alluded consisted of thoroughly searching the condemned man's pockets, in order to make sure that he had no weapon concealed about him.

This turnkey never expected to find anything in Jack's pocket, though he supposed, for form's sake, he must not omit the accustomed duty.

Unconsciously, then, he thrust his hands into Jack's pockets, in order to make sure that nothing was concealed in them.

He thrust his hand into Jack's trousers pocket, and then he uttered a yell.

"Murder!" he cried; and when he withdrew his hand, which he did more swiftly than he put it in, it was found to be dripping with blood.

The shout which was raised after this may be imagined.

Half a dozen turnkeys at once sprang forward; and while some held the prisoner, others drew the knife from his pocket.

As soon as it was held up, Jonathan Wild cried:

"What—that is my knife! How on earth did he get hold of it? I put it into my pocket after I came into the yard here!"

The knife was handed back to Wild; but how Jack had become possessed of it was an inscrutable mystery.

Of course, Jack's pockets were searched even more carefully than before; but nothing else was found.

The incident furnished plenty of food for conversation. Jack could not help being disappointed, and he feigned being even more so than he was, in order thereby to throw his enemies off their guard as much as possible, by inducing in them the belief that the knife was all-essential to some daring plan of escape which he had formed.

As soon as the turnkey talked about searching his pockets, Jack knew that discovery was inevitable, and he was immensely delighted when the officious officer cut his hand so severely.

Probably, as his arms were bound behind him, Jack would not have had an opportunity of making any use of this knife, so its loss was not a matter of such serious moment after all.

In a few minutes all was calm again.

The fat sheriff, with another tremendous exertion of strength, pulled out his enormous watch, declaring, as he did so, that they would be monstrous late if they did not make a move at once.

This was enough.

Mr. Neokes and Jonathan Wild at once bestirred themselves, and the procession took its way to the courtyard.

Here the horse and cart by which the prisoner was to be conveyed to Newgate were waiting.

Here, too, a large number of police officers and soldiers were assembled.

The preparations for the execution of Jack Sheppard had been made upon rather an extensive scale.

This was not only because he had shown himself to be such a daring offender, but in consequence of the rescue of Blueskin, even when at the fatal spot, which had taken place such a short time before.

The authorities had made up their mind that no attempt to rescue Jack Sheppard, no matter how well organised, should be successful.

Every precaution that they could think of had been taken.

Round the gallows itself a body of soldiers had been placed, who surrounded it with a triple line.

This was to keep off intruders, and to prevent anyone from cutting the gallows down again.

Then the cart in which Jack Sheppard was to sit would be closely guarded, not only by police officers, but by soldiers too, so that the mob should be quite powerless.

Although the rain fell quite fast enough to make standing out in the open air uncomfortable, yet the people had assembled in such quantities as had never before been known.

They stood patiently enough, quite heedless of the falling rain, and intent only upon catching sight of the young man who was about to be led forth to die.

Round the prison they were packed so closely that not another person could have found room to stand, and from there they extended in a dense mass to the Half-way House, in High Street, St. Giles's.

The assemblage was marvellous, and no one could recollect seeing such a large number of people collected before.

But, then, Jack Sheppard had achieved a notoriety that was truly universal.

Jack was scarcely surprised when he saw so many officers and soldiers assembled in the courtyard, for he had imagined that every pains would be taken to keep him secure.

He had prepared himself, as he thought, for the scene which he had to go through, but nevertheless, when he caught sight of the rudely-made black coffin that was placed across the cart, he felt his flesh creep and his cheeks blanch.

He was alive, and there he was looking upon the coffin which was to receive his remains.

By a great and sudden effort he shook off the uncomfortable feeling which this reflection produced.

In spite of all, hope still lived in his breast—he still believed he should have some opportunity afforded him of escaping his dreadful doom.

He fancied that he had done Blueskin a great wrong by entertaining for a moment the thought that he had abandoned him.

Ere long he felt sure he should see some manifestation of his presence.

The soldiers and police officers divided, in order to enable Jack and the hangman to reach the cart.

Some steps were placed in a convenient position, and Jack was assisted to ascend them.

The ordinary followed him.

He was, as usual, attired in full canonicals, and he held a large prayer-book open in his hand.

He seated himself by the side of Jack.

The executioner next climbed up in the front of the cart.

He seated himself upon the coffin, and took the reins and the whip in his hands.

So far, then, all was ready; and in another moment the gates leading out into the Old Bailey would have been flung open, when suddenly the discordant voice of Jonathan Wild made itself heard above all other sounds.

"A horse!" he cried. "A horse! I must have a horse! I had forgotten that. The procession must not start without me. For many a day I have sworn to follow him to the gallows, and I will keep my word! I shall be cheated if I do not see him swing!"

There was no horse for Jonathan Wild.

He had been quite overlooked.

Wild was furious; but, finding he could not achieve his object by violence, he calmed himself, and made his way to the carriage in which the sheriffs had already seated themselves, for in those days they had to accompany the criminals to Tyburn.

"Mr. Sheriff!" he said, "you admitted, a little while ago, that—thanks to my exertions—Jack Sheppard had been retained a prisoner in Newgate after thrice breaking out of it!"

The High-sheriff puffed out his cheeks as though about to say something; but, before he could speak, Wild added:

"You are now in greater danger of losing him than ever you were."

"Dear me! how is that, Mr. Wild?"

"Simply thus: no accommodation has been set aside to enable me to accompany the procession to Tyburn, and unless I go the ends of justice will probably be defeated at the last moment, as they were upon a recent occasion!"

"Oh, you must go, Mr. Wild!" said the sheriff—"of course, you must go!"

"But how? I have been entirely forgotten!"

"Get into the carriage along with me."

"Thanks, sir—many thanks! I am sorry, but I must decline the honour! It is necessary that I should be on horseback by the side of the cart, and in readiness to act at a moment's notice!"

"Very well, have a horse, then!"

"But how am I to get one, my dear sir?"

"Oh, you shall have one, never fear! It won't do to run the risk of having all our trouble for nothing. I am much obliged to you, Mr. Wild, for exhibiting so much laudable interest in the affair."

"It is for the sake of the public good alone."

"I know it, Mr. Wild—I know it! There is not the least occasion for you to remind me of it!"

"But a horse, my dear Mr. Sheriff?"

The sheriff put his head out of the window of the coach, and beckoned to Mr. Neokes.

The Governor hurried towards him.

"Have you no more horses?" he said.

"Not one!" was the reply.

"What is to be done? It won't be safe for the procession to go on without Mr. Wild!"

"What do you suggest, sir?" asked the Governor.

"I can't suggest; you must find Mr. Wild a horse from somewhere!"

"It's impossible!"

"Stop!" said Wild. "I know how it can be managed, if Mr. Sheriff has no objection!"

"How—how?"

"I will, with your permission, get into the cart. I can sit on one side of the prisoner, and the ordinary on the other!"

"Very well, Mr. Wild," said the sheriff; "if such a course is suited to you, I have no objections whatever."

"Thanks—thanks! It will suit me admirably! I will run and take my place, and the procession can start at once!"

"Do not be any longer than you can help. We shall be very late as it is!"

"Depend upon me!" said the thief-taker, who hastened off to the cart.

Of course, everyone was surprised when they saw Jonathan Wild climb up in a clumsy manner into the cart.

None could be more astonished than Jack was himself.

He could not imagine what motive Wild could have for such an extraordinary proceeding.

But when Wild came and sat down by the side of him he comprehended in a moment that his purpose was to prevent, if he could, all possible chance of his being able to make his escape.

Still, he wondered at the thief-taker's adopting such an unpleasant means of achieving the end he had in view, for a ride in the condemned cart could not but be disagreeable even to him.

But there he was.

Jack had not much time for reflection.

The busy scene that was going on around him attracted the whole of his attention.

It was strange, but even although he was being led forth, he could not help interesting himself in what was going forward.

He felt, it a relief, too, to look about him, since while doing so he was able to avoid the sinister and triumphant gaze which his persecutor fixed upon him.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD RECEIVES A COMMUNICATION FROM HIS FRIENDS, AND MAKES A DESPERATE ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE.

At a given signal, the huge folding doors which led from the courtyard into the Old Bailey were thrown slowly open.

A continuous sullen roar from the street signified that the opening of the door had been noticed.

Everybody now was on the look-out to catch sight of the prisoner.

From mouth to mouth the intelligence was communicated that the procession was about to start.

Outside those huge folding doors a troop of soldiers had been stationed in order to keep off the mob.

They found their task a difficult one, but they performed it.

At a walking pace the procession emerged.

First came the police officers to clear the way.

Then followed the soldiers.

Then more police, and then the cart.

It was upon this last object that the attention of the people was centred.

Such shouting, swearing, and fighting as there was to catch a glimpse of its occupants was surely never heard before.

But when they caught sight of Jonathan Wild a most unmistakable howl of execration followed.

The thief-taker scowled fearfully when he heard it, and ground his teeth.

The ordinary began to read the prayers, but his voice was quite inaudible among the general din.

Never before had such an assemblage of roughs been seen.

The dregs of the population were indeed there.

Jack naturally shrank a little when he saw so many faces turned towards him, and eyes fixed upon him.

Not only were the streets crowded to excess, but every building which commanded a view of the spot was literally thronged.

Every house-top, every window, was furnished with its crowd of eager gazers.

At the latter, many fashionably-dressed ladies were seated, with spy-glasses, with which they watched even the expression upon the victim's face.

It was only for a moment that Jack allowed the people to be conscious that their eager gazing distressed him.

Directly afterwards he sat there, cool, calm, and composed, with his eyes wandering busily over the huge crowd, seeking for some familiar friendly face.

But all were strange.

Still Jack's mind was busy with the thoughts of escape. That idea was prominently before his mind, and he kept perpetually on the watch, so as to be ready to avail himself in an instant of any chance that offered itself.

When the opportunity came he determined not to be taken unawares.

At a very slow walk indeed the cart went up the Old Bailey towards Snow Hill.

The rear of the procession consisted of soldiers, police officers, the Governor of Newgate, and the carriages containing the sheriffs.

It was easy to see that Jack Sheppard had the popular sympathy on his side.

No offensive demonstrations were made towards him, as there were towards many prisoners when in the fatal cart.

But at Jonathan Wild and the hangman the bitterest taunts were levelled, and occasionally missiles thrown.

As for the thief-taker, he felt he was in a position to despise the public wrath, so, folding his arms, he contented himself with every now and then uttering an angry snarl whenever any more than usually unpleasant cry saluted his ear, or when he was struck by any unsavoury missile.

Down Snow Hill the procession went a little faster, but still it was only at a walk.

In crossing Fleet Ditch—which lay in the valley where Farringdon Street now is—a further delay took place.

After crossing the bridge, came the steep ascent of Holborn Hill, which, in those days, was by far more precipitous than it is now.

Up this they toiled more slowly than ever, for not only was it very difficult for the horses to ascend the hill, but the people here seemed to be more densely packed.

Close to the steps leading up into the graveyard of St. Andrew's Church, they came to a dead stop.

There was generally a halt about this spot, and it was frequently a custom for the friends of prisoners to be here and bid them a last farewell.

Jack knew this, and so he cast a despairing glance around, for he scarcely dared to hope that he should see anyone there who would bid farewell to him.

A keen glance at the faces of those who were assembled near the steps assured him that there was no one there he knew.

To his surprise, however, a young and good-looking girl pushed her way through the crowd—or rather the crowd gave way and allowed her a passage, for she kept saying:

"Stand aside, good people—stand aside! Let me bid him a last good-bye!"

Without exception, the people made way for her, and in another moment she stood beside the cart.

But Jack was astonished that the girl should desire to say farewell to him, for, after a careful inspection of her features, he came to the conclusion that he had never seen her in his life before.

In her hand this girl carried a bouquet of very pretty flowers, and round the stems a piece of white paper had been tied.

As soon as she was at the side of the cart, she said, in tones of great sweetness:

"Good-bye, Jack—good-bye! Say good-bye to me, and take these flowers—take them in remembrance of me, and carry them to the last! Take them—take them!"

Now, Jack Sheppard was never very dull of comprehension, and on the present occasion danger seemed to have sharpened his perceptions.

This young girl, who spoke in such a pleading tone of voice, and who proffered the flowers with so engaging an air, was, he felt certain, an utter stranger to him.

It was not from affection that she offered him the flowers, nor because she wished him to remember her.

Jack concluded at once that the nosegay contained a message of some description or other from his friends.

His arms were secured by his elbows being bound behind his back, which allowed him the partial use of his hands, so he held out his right hand, and the girl gave him the bouquet, taking care at the same time to clasp his fingers round it.

Jack murmured some words of farewell and thanks, and then the cart was set in motion again.

The young girl then became lost in the vast living mass.

The whole incident had occurred with so much rapidity, and occupied so little time, that Jack could hardly believe it was all real.

Yet there was the bunch of flowers in his hand.

There was a mystery connected with them, he felt certain, and it would be necessary to find out what that mystery was, without, at the same time, acquainting Jonathan Wild with it.

But how was this to be done?

How was he to elude the lynx-like gaze which the thief-taker incessantly kept upon him?

If there was anything to be seen, Jonathan would catch sight of it at the same moment as himself.

This was a dilemma, and it might produce serious occurrences.

It might be important to the schemes which his friends had formed that he should immediately acquaint himself with the message which had been sent.

But he could see no means of doing so.

He lifted the nosegay as close to his face as he could, and pretended to smell it.

He fancied there might be something hidden among the flowers, but, although his gaze was keen, he could see nothing.

He let the nosegay fall into his lap again, and took hold of it—listlessly, it appeared—with both hands.

His object was to feel whether the bunch of flowers contained anything.

In doing this, he, of course, removed his fingers from the stems, round which the young girl had been so careful to clasp them.

This circumstance had not escaped Jack's observation.

He thought that very likely the mystery might lie here, and therefore, although he pretended to be so indifferent, yet he was extremely cautious.

Directly he moved his right hand, he saw that there was writing on the paper which was tied round the stems of the flowers.

The very moment he perceived this—before he had time to see what the writing was—he closed his hand over it, and raised the nosegay once more to his face.

Wild had perceived nothing extraordinary in all this.

He had seen a nosegay given to the condemned man many a time—it was, in fact, quite a usual thing, so he thought nothing of Jack receiving one.

In a cooler moment he might perhaps have had his suspicions aroused, but the prospect of his long-looked-for but now rapidly-approaching triumph blinded him to little things which at another time would have attracted his attention.

Slowly the procession continued on its way to Tyburn, but it went too fast for Jack, who was impatient to the last degree to know what the writing consisted of.

But he seemed as far off being able to ascertain as ever, for Wild kept the keenest look-out upon him, and did not allow the least movement to pass unperceived.

Jack felt tolerably certain that if Jonathan Wild read what was written, the plans which his friends had formed would be in imminent danger of being defeated.

Holborn Hill was ascended—Holborn Bars were passed—Lincoln's Inn was close at hand—and yet up to now Jack had not been able to catch even a glimpse of the writing, so frightened was he that it would be seen by Jonathan Wild.

Probably he would have gone all the way to Tyburn in the same state of ignorance, had not chance favoured him in a very remarkable manner.

From the time of their starting, up to the present moment, Jonathan Wild had been saluted by the mob with the most dreadful hisses and yells.

The thief-taker bore them all with stoical indifference.

It was only when he was struck by some missile that he permitted his exasperation to be visible.

Comparatively speaking, very few articles were thrown.

Sometimes a perfect hurricane of miscellaneous articles would fly about the criminal's head—that is, if he happened to be unpopular, or if his crimes had been of so atrocious a character as to call for the general indignation.

On such occasions, bricks, stones, and everything that could be thrown, were hurled at the offender's head.

Sometimes the criminal, by the time he reached Tyburn would be almost stoned to death.

But Jack Sheppard was a public favourite, and it was owing to his presence in the cart that Jonathan escaped so lightly.

The people were afraid of hitting the wrong person.

To this, and this alone, did Jonathan Wild owe his safety.

But just when they were opposite Great Turnstile—which, as all London readers will know very well, leads out of Holborn into Lincoln's Inn Fields—an incident occurred which enabled Jack to make himself acquainted with the words which were written on the piece of paper.

Just opposite Great Turnstile a man was standing who had a deep and undying grudge against Jonathan Wild, and no wonder, for the thief-taker had caused him to stand several hours in the pillory, and to lose both his ears.

This man had an idea that Wild would form a part of the procession, and accordingly had provided himself with a missile which he intended to hurl at him with full force.

It was a mean kind of revenge, of course, but the man thought he should be able to indulge in this bit of vengeance without Jonathan knowing from whose hands the missile had come.

The nice little article with which he had provided himself was a dead dog, which he had taken that morning out of the river Thames.

The dog had been many days in the water, and was in an advanced state of decomposition—indeed, it was a wonder how it held together at all.

This man had privately informed those who stood near him that he intended to favour Jonathan Wild with a taste of it, and as they highly approved of the notion, they did all they could to give the man a fair opportunity of throwing the dead dog at the thief-taker.

All bid him take good aim, but the man had no fear on that score—his whole soul was in what he was about to do.

When he saw that the thief-taker was sitting in the cart with his face turned towards him, his task became all the easier.

When Wild was just opposite to him, and only a few feet off, this man raised the dead dog, and threw it with all his strength.

His aim was marvellously accurate.

Crash it came, full in Wild's face, striking him with such force that the dogs quashed like a rotten egg.

A perfect yell of delight came from the bystanders when they saw how well the man had carried out his intention.

It was a wonder that the blow did not throw Wild over the side of the cart, but, by a miracle almost, he preserved his balance.

This was the opportunity which Jack seized to make himself acquainted with the writing.

While everybody's attention was directed to Wild, and while that individual was busily occupied in looking after himself, Jack moved his hand, and read as follows:

"Escape if you can! If you can put trust in love and hope!"

That was all.

But those few simple words made an immense difference to Jack Sheppard.

He was convinced his friends had not abandoned him, for he had recognised the handwriting at a glance.

It was Blueskin's.

How the words had imprinted themselves in his mind!

"Escape if you can!"

That was the first thing that he was to do.

He must help himself.

This pleased Jack better than having to trust to somebody else.

The epistle was laconic, but there could be no doubt about what was meant.

"Escape if you can!"

Jack resolved to try.

He looked about him.

Everywhere people by thousands and thousands.

That cart in the midst of the immense concourse of people looked like some tiny bark out on the ocean, and the heads of the people undulated in a manner not unlike the waves of the sea.

How was he to escape?

Alas! it seemed impossible.

By this time Wild had cleared himself of the putrid mass by which he had been covered, and he occupied himself with uttering the most diabolical curses that can possibly be imagined.

Jonathan Wild excelled most people at that sort of thing.

It was truly awful to hear him.

Although he had, to a certain extent, cleared himself, yet he was in a dreadful condition.

Jack turned his eyes away from him.

There was certainly no escape in that quarter.

The cart still moved slowly on, and now they were nearly opposite Little Turnstile, also leading, though in a circuitous manner, into Lincoln's Inn Fields.

This place is now tolerably well known, for Weston's Music Hall stands here.

The passage leading into Lincoln's Inn Fields is a very narrow one, and is only used for foot passengers, though at the present moment some improvements are going on in the locality.

It is, however, a narrow passage, down which a horse could not possibly make his way, except at a walk, for it is tortuous as well as narrow.

Jack Sheppard knew London well—very few better.

Another moment would bring him opposite Little Turnstile.

If he could only get down this passage, the officers and police, who were mounted, would not be able to follow him, and there was just a chance that, aided by the crowd, he might make his escape.

It was a desperate scheme, but he immediately made up his mind to try it, for his position was so desperate that he could not possibly make it any worse.

If he did not succeed he should still be able to fall back upon the aid which Blueskin would be able to afford him.

By the time he had made this reflection the cart arrived opposite to Little Turnstile.

The critical moment had arrived.

Uttering a loud scream, which had the effect of completely paralysing everyone—Jonathan Wild included—Jack Sheppard sprang to his feet in the cart.

Then, before any idea could be formed of his intention, or before anyone could recover from the state of confusion into which they had been thrown, Jack Sheppard exclaimed:

"I am innocent, friends all! Help! oh, help me to escape!"

CHAPTER CCCXXXVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD IS RECAPTURED IN LITTLE TURNSTILE, AND REFUSES TO PARTAKE OF THE BOWL OF PUNCH AT THE HALF-WAY HOUSE IN HIGH STREET, ST. GILES'S.

ALMOST before the words had left his lips, and before Jonathan Wild could stretch out his hand to prevent him, Jack Sheppard flung himself headlong from the cart into the road.

The uproar that ensued baffles all description.

Jack had calculated his distance well, and when he sprang from the cart he managed to fall between the wheels and the horses of those officers who were riding by the side of it.

He reached the ground awkwardly, for he could not make use of his hands to save himself.

He was bruised and half stunned, but nevertheless the recollection that his life and liberty depended upon his exertions during the next few moments rose paramount above everything.

How he did it he never could tell, for he was not in full possession of his senses, but he managed in some mysterious manner to roll under the horses and reach the crowd.

Those who stood foremost saw him.

They had witnessed his sudden act, and comprehended all.

A dozen hands were stretched out towards him, and in the space of about a second he was raised to his feet.

A lane was opened for him by the people dividing right and left.

Jack saw the way lay open before him, and he dashed forward with the speed of a hunted hare.

But as he fled he heard above the thousand and one voices that reached his ears from every side the yelling, screaming tones of Jonathan Wild's voice.

"Ten thousand curses!" he heard him say—"fly, all of you! After him, or he will escape! Shoot him! Kill him! Smash him! But do not let him escape!"

Uttering these words, Jonathan Wild jumped out of the cart in quite as furious a manner as Jack had done.

But he alighted on his feet.

By this time it became generally known that something extraordinary had occurred.

The procession came to a complete standstill.

The officers hastily dismounted, and attempted to reach the passage.

But the living lane through which Jack had passed had closed up, and the mass of people placed themselves before the police officers and obstructed their further progress.

Jonathan Wild behaved like a madman.

Addressing the soldiers, he said:

"Cut a path through them! Hew a path and let us go by. He must not escape!"

The soldiers hesitated for about a moment, and then obeyed Wild's orders.

It was only natural that the people should give way before the horses and flashing blades of the soldiers.

However well disposed they might be towards Jack Sheppard, their feelings did not carry them so far as to make them willing to be slain in his defence.

Accordingly, they gave way before the soldiers, who reached the entrance to the narrow passage without having to shed a single drop of blood.

And now let us return to Jack Sheppard.

When he reached the narrow passage, he made sure he was safe, and that he had nothing to do but to run for his life.

But he found himself mistaken.

Away he ran down the passage, making better use of his legs than he had ever done in his life before; but ere he had gone half a dozen yards, a man, who was coming in the opposite direction at as rapid a pace as his own, ran with full force against him.

They met at a corner, so that the one could not see the other in time to avoid a collision.

The passage was so narrow that there was only just room for two to pass.

This chance meeting was a most disastrous thing for Jack.

Such was the force with which they struck each other that both bounded back several paces.

Jack being deprived of the full use of his hands and arms, could not preserve his balance, or save himself while falling.

The consequence was that he fell backwards and struck his head with terrific force against the door-step of a house.

He became instantly insensible.

The man who had unwittingly caused this disaster had fared little better.

He lay on his back looking up to the sky with his intellects in a very confused condition indeed.

Jack's insensibility only lasted a moment.

Perfectly bewildered, and scarcely knowing what had happened, Jack struggled to his feet again.

But he was too late.

The chance was lost.

A trifling extraordinary accident had decided his fate.

The man who was running had come out of a house in Gate Street, and, hearing that the procession was passing by, had run off at full speed in the hope of being able to catch a glimpse of the notorious Jack Sheppard while on his way to execution.

Then occurred the accident we have described.

By the time Jack rose staggering to his feet and unable to see distinctly about him, the soldiers had cleared a path to the mouth of the passage, down which those officers who were on foot could now pass without hindrance.

Headed by Jonathan Wild, they dashed down it.

The next instant they caught sight of Jack Sheppard.

To seize him and hold him in a grasp of iron took Wild but a moment.

He was quickly surrounded by the officers.

At this unhopd-for success Jonathan Wild's joy was unbounded.

In triumph he led the way back to the cart.

He would not release the hold he had taken of Jack, but dragged him along with him.

The police officers brought up the rear.

The soldiers were on guard at the mouth of the passage and when they saw Wild make his appearance with his capture, they formed into a double rank, thus enabling them to reach the cart again without being in any way molested by the mob.

Jack was too badly hurt to be capable of making any resistance.

The blow upon his head was a very severe one, and he seemed to feel the effects of it now even more than he did at first.

In what may be called an unconscious state he was dragged along by Jonathan Wild.

By the aid of many hands he was lifted into the cart again and placed in his former seat.

Jonathan clambered up and sat down beside him as before.

If we were to say that three minutes had elapsed from the time when Jack sprang out of the cart to the time when he was brought back and placed in it, we should exceed the mark.

All that we just related certainly occurred in the incredibly short space of about two minutes and a half, and many never knew what had occurred.

Even the sheriffs in the rear did not know but what the stoppage was one of an ordinary character, for they had been delayed quite as long several times since the commencement of the journey.

Not until afterwards did they learn the astounding intelligence that Jack Sheppard had actually jumped out of the cart and succeeded in running more than half-way down Little Turnstile.

No sooner was he quite sure that Jack Sheppard was really safe in the cart again, than Jonathan Wild, with great presence of mind, gave orders for the procession to continue on its way again.

But he kept a sharper look-out than ever.

He blamed himself for being so much off his guard before as to allow Jack to carry out such an intention, for the thief-taker could not conceal from himself the conviction that, but for the chance accident which had occurred, Jack would probably have got clear off, and he would have been defeated at the moment when he believed success to be most certain.

Upon taking his seat, almost the first thing which Wild noticed was the bunch of flowers which had been given to Jack.

It lay on the bottom of the cart where Jack had dropped it.

Under the present circumstances, the thief-taker was disposed to look upon everything with a suspicious eye, and now he stooped and picked up the nosegay, at the same time blaming himself for the want of caution he had previously displayed.

Of course, when he picked up the bouquet, the first thing he noticed was the writing on the paper.

Jonathan Wild read the words with a savage scowl.

"Escape if you can!" he muttered. "He soon acted upon the hint. He is a brave fellow! It is a thousand pities that he should come to such an end. But it is his own fault. His fate was of his own choosing. He has no one but himself to blame. But if I had had such a spirit to act with me and assist me in my plans, instead of being against me, and continually thwarting my dearest schemes, how much should I not by this time have accomplished! Bah! Let me not think of it! I must take things as they are! He has chosen his own course, and he must pay the penalty due to his folly. Still, he is a brave fellow—a brave fellow! I wish he had been with me, and then he would never have come to this!"

Thus the reader will see that Jack's greatest enemy could not do otherwise than acknowledge his boldness.

Jonathan said he pitied him, but if he did so, it was from interested motives.

Even had Jack joined him in his schemes—but such a thing was impossible—but still, if he had, what would have been Jack's ultimate reward?

Jonathan would have made use of him as his tool until he could have made use of him no longer, and then he would have handed him over to his fate without compunction—simply because he knew too much, and had ceased to be actively useful to him.

Jack was wise and bold.

If he had not possessed both those qualities in a very extraordinary degree, he would not have furnished so much material for the chronicler of actual facts as he has done.

When Jonathan Wild had read all the words written upon the piece of paper, he tossed the nosegay carelessly and contemptuously aside.

Like everything else, when he had done with it, and reaped all the benefit he possibly could, he despised it.

"I shall have more trouble yet, it seems!" he added, to himself. "I must be wary, for if I understand that message rightly, some rescue is in contemplation. Let them try it! They will see then how signally they will fail, and that will afford me matter for satisfaction! They will fail—ha, ha!—fail utterly and completely!"

While these thoughts were passing in rapid succession through the thief-taker's brain, the procession continued its slow, wearisome progress.

Holborn was passed, and St. Giles's was reached.

From time immemorial, all death processions, while on their way to Tyburn, halted before a public-house in High Street, St. Giles's, which public-house was popularly supposed to be half-way between Newgate and the place of execution.

They were rapidly nearing this public-house, near which the people had collected in incredible quantities.

In front of this public-house the procession always stayed for a few moments, in order that the horses might be supplied with water, while those who wished it could have such refreshment as the inn afforded.

Fain would Wild have dispensed with the halt upon the present occasion.

But he was powerless to do this.

Englishmen do not allow a custom to be disregarded very easily.

To all such things they cling with a pertinacity that would be laudable were the cause better.

In obedience then, to this custom, the procession stopped before the inn.

Jonathan Wild could not disguise his alarm.

Here he fancied a rescue would most certainly be attempted.

He doubted even that the soldiers and the officers would be able to cope with so vast a multitude.

As for Jack Sheppard himself, about whom the thief-taker felt so anxious, he sat like one half dead.

By degrees, however, he recovered his consciousness, and by the time the procession halted before the inn he thoroughly comprehended, not only all that had taken place, but all that was then occurring around him.

A dull, heavy feeling was still in his head, and the pain where his head had come in contact with the stone was most excruciating; otherwise, however, he was but little the worse for his adventure.

When he knew where he was, and saw how many people were assembled, he thought, like Jonathan Wild, that a rescue would be attempted, for he could not but be aware of the favourable opportunity for the carrying out of such a scheme the pause in front of the inn afforded.

Eagerly and restlessly his eyes wandered over the immense throng, but he was unable to perceive anything that gave him room to hope.

Jonathan watched his every movement.

He noticed the look of dejection and disappointment which gradually settled upon Jack's countenance, and breathed more freely.

He began to think his apprehensions were unfounded.

But he still kept on his guard.

The landlord of the inn now approached the cart.

He carried in his hands a huge china bowl containing hot punch, the steam from which was plainly visible in the moist atmosphere.

For as long as it had been a custom for the procession to halt there, so long had it been a custom for the landlord of the inn to present a bowl of hot punch to the criminal condemned to die.

Sometimes the poor victim was too overcome by the thoughts of his approaching fate to partake of the smoking beverage.

It more often happened, though, that the bowl of punch was drained to the last dregs, and the criminal taken to Tyburn and executed while in a state of bestial and disgraceful intoxication.

Happily all such abuses are abolished now, but there is still room for great improvement to be made.

[THE EXECUTION OF JACK SHEPPARD AT TYBURN.]

The landlord approached, then, with the huge bowl of steaming punch.

He held it aloft with both hands.

"Drink, Jack Sheppard!" he cried—"drink, and drink deeply, for you are welcome!"

Jack's heart rose against the liquor, but nevertheless he reached out his hands as well as his bonds would permit, and took hold of the bowl.

He did so, because he thought perhaps there was an intention of rescuing him, and in the event of such a thing it would be highly advisable to gain as much time as he could.

He raised the bowl to his lips.

A loud clapping of hands followed.

Angrily he glared about him.

His eyes fell upon the police officers and the soldiers, all well armed, who formed a barrier round the cart—a barrier more formidable and insurmountable than the thickest stone wall—and his heart failed him.

No. 92.—BLUESKIN.

He felt a conviction that any attempt at rescue would only result in utter failure.

An unorganised force would stand not the ghost of a chance against a well-organised one.

The former might have the advantage of numbers, but skill and discipline would more than counterbalance it.

Jack felt there was no hope, and with a sensation of utter loathing he turned away from the bowl, which had almost touched his lips.

"Won't you drink, Jack?" asked the landlord, who hesitated to take back the bowl.

Jack shook his head and made an impatient gesture.

"Why not?"

"He is afraid!" said Wild, with a chuckle.

"Afraid of what?" asked Jack Sheppard, turning towards his foe with an angry sparkle in his eye.

He had not spoken to Wild since the starting of the procession.

"You are white-livered—you have no pluck!" replied the thief-taker, with a sneer—"if you had, you would do as others do!"

"You know better, Jonathan Wild!" said Jack

Then turning to the landlord, he added:

"Here, take the bowl, and grant me the last favour I shall ever ask of you!"

"What is it?" asked the landlord, as he complied with his first request.

"It is, that you keep that bowl and its contents just as they are, and give them to the next person who comes after me!"

"It is a strange request, Jack, but it is granted! Your will is law! But won't you tell me why you ask such a thing?"

"Yes!"

"Then why is it?"

"Because I know who the next person will be!"

"Indeed!"

"It is a fact!"

"And who will it be?"

"It is a secret, but I will tell you!"

"Who—who is it?"

"Jonathan Wild!"

"J—J—Jon—Jonathan Wild?"

"Yes. It seems strange, perhaps, but you will find my words are quite true! The next person who will pass by this place, sitting where I now sit, and condemned to be executed at Tyburn, as I am, will be Jonathan Wild! I repeat it. Keep the punch for him! It will be Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIX.

THE PROCESSION COMES IN SIGHT OF TYBURN TREE, AND JACK SHEPPARD'S HEART IS FILLED WITH DESPAIR.

JACK SHEPPARD spoke these words in a loud and rather excited tone of voice, and when he had finished he looked round to see what notice would be taken by his persecutor.

Jonathan Wild strove hard to be calm.

But the effort was futile.

His hideous physiognomy assumed a yellow, wax-like tint, and his eyes gleamed ferociously.

It was easy enough for anyone to see how hard he was trying to keep down his passion.

Jack's words touched him more nearly than anyone would have believed possible, for, try as he would, Jonathan could not banish from his mind the recollection of the prophecy to which the old woman on the bridge had given utterance with so much wild and impressive vehemence.

Part of her prediction had already been fulfilled, and why should not the remainder?

Jonathan Wild was exceedingly superstitious.

Many a time, as the reader of these pages will remember, had he exhibited signs of this feebleness of mind.

Superstition is just the quality one would expect to see developed to rather a large extent in the mind of such a man as Jonathan Wild.

The idle predictions to which Jack Sheppard had from time to time given utterance had made a deeper impression on his foe than ever he had imagined.

Jack saw that this was a weak point of the thief-taker's, and, as a matter of course, he availed himself of it to the utmost.

It may be, after all, that the true solution of Wild's credulity in this matter was no other than the conviction pressing on his mind that he had committed deeds of the most awful character, and that he fully deserved to receive for them the punishment of death.

In all probability, the thought often occurred to him that he would terminate all his villainies upon the scaffold. Perhaps the dread of such an awful though well-merited fate hung continually over him like a shadow, and when anyone gave bold and decided utterance to that which he feared most, the effect which we have described was produced.

The voice and gestures of Jack Sheppard when he gave the bowl back to the landlord, though excited, were at the same time solemn, and Jonathan felt his flesh crawl, and his blood turn chill in his veins.

He could tell, too, that the life-current faded out of his cheeks, but he could not control this manifestation of emotion.

But he experienced an intense desire to conceal his feelings from all around him.

He could think of nothing better than to laugh it off.

"Ha, ha!" he said, but so unmirthfully that the landlord staggered back and upset some of the boiling punch. "Ha, ha! Jack, don't you think it a good joke? Ah, well, never mind—I forgive you! I don't want to triumph over a fallen foe! Of course you want revenge, and that is the only revenge you can take! It's mean and paltry of you, Jack—but never mind! I forgive you—ha, ha! It's a good joke! Ha, ha!"

Nervously, and with a strange jerking manner, which showed how ill at ease he was, Jonathan spoke these words.

"It's all true," said Jack—"I feel it! I am sure all I have said will come true!"

"D—n you, then, for a lying hound!" said the thief-taker, unable any longer to control himself.

He struck Jack a couple of heavy blows in the face with his clenched fists as he spoke.

"Take that!" he cried savagely. "Take that!"

Jack's hands were tied behind his back, and so he could not defend himself in the least degree.

Jonathan's blows came with full force.

The first staggered him, and the second sent him sprawling at the bottom of the cart.

All that we have described was only imperfectly seen and understood by the vast multitude, whose view was obstructed by the mounted police-officers and soldiers.

Still they could tell that something in the shape of a conflict was going on in the cart, and loud shouts and confusion ensued.

Jonathan Wild's passion was over the moment he saw Jack fall.

He knew full well that what he had done was wholly indefensible.

He assisted to raise Jack to his feet, and re-seated him in the cart.

"Drive on!" he cried. "Why are we staying here such an internal time? Drive on, I tell you!"

There seemed no one in command, or if there was they did not object to Wild's order, for the soldiers and police-officers in advance at once set their horses in motion.

Once again, then, did the procession resume its oft-interrupted course.

The cart was set in motion.

Stunned and bewildered as he was, Jack yet retained sufficient of his senses to look about him.

All hope of a rescue had not abandoned him, and he felt sure a more favourable opportunity than the present would not occur.

No movement, however, to indicate that they had any such intention was made by any of the mob, and, with a bursting heart, Jack looked down at the bottom of the cart.

The immense multitude swayed about in all directions, uttering strange cries, but that was all.

On went the procession at the same snail's pace as before.

Noon was very close at hand, but there were no signs of it in the sky.

The sun had not yet made his appearance, nor did there seem any likelihood of his doing so.

A leaden-coloured cloud covered the whole face of the heavens, from which descended that fine mizzling kind of rain popularly known as "a Scotchman's mist, that will wet an Englishman through to the skin."

It made everything seem very cheerless and miserable.

A steep hill led from the half-way house up to St. Giles's Church, past which the road went.

Up this the cart went at a pace that was tedious in the extreme.

At length the corner of the Oxford Road was gained.

Now they were fairly in the country, for from this spot to Tyburn there were nothing but green fields and gardens surrounding gentlemen's houses.

But the road was broad, and the procession moved forward at a rather quicker pace.

Still it was a slow one.

But at every step they took, Jack's hope of rescue and escape became less and less, and fainter and fainter.

Wearily and listlessly did he look about him.

His head pained him exceedingly.

There was the heavy blow he had received when he fell upon the door-step, and the two Jonathan had given him, besides the fall out of the cart, which had injured him severely.

From all this, it will be seen that his position was far from being a comfortable one, setting aside the fact that he was riding in the condemned cart, and within a mile of Tyburn.

Had it not been for these last circumstances, and the terrible state of mind he was necessarily in, he would have felt with a much greater degree of keenness the pain from the various hurts he had received.

From the time Jonathan had struck him, Jack had not uttered one word.

As for the thief-taker himself, he sat in the cart with his arms folded, and with a dogged expression upon his face.

There was, somehow or other—perhaps in consequence of the words Jack had spoken—a disagreeable, heavy feeling, which he in vain endeavoured to shake off.

The moment—the crowning moment—of his triumph was, he felt sure, close at hand; and yet he did not feel near so comfortable nor so elated and joyous as he always imagined he should feel whenever that moment did arrive.

He felt nervous and uneasy, and the sensation seemed to grow upon him as he approached Tyburn Tree.

Little, however, did Jonathan imagine what kind of turn his fortunes were about to take.

As little, too, did he dream of what was taking place in London at that very moment.

There was a little surprise in store for Jonathan Wild, and one that he would not recover from very easily.

And still the procession kept on its weary way.

Jack ceased to look about him.

He bent his head down, and let his chin rest dejectedly upon his breast, while his eyes were fixed upon the rough planks at the bottom of the cart.

What were his thoughts at that moment?

No pen—no matter how powerful—could give an adequate idea of them at that moment.

We shall not attempt to do so.

We know full well that we should signally fail, and therefore we leave it to the imagination of the reader.

The words, however, which were written on the paper tied round the stems of the flowers of which the nosegay was composed, were continually before his mind.

They implied that Blueskin would save him; but no effort had been made as yet.

Jack could not think that a rescue would be attempted at the foot of the scaffold.

An attempt made at that moment could not do otherwise than result in failure.

Jack was certain there was no hope in that quarter.

Such precautions would be taken to form a barrier round the scaffold that would be impassable even to well-trained troops.

A disorderly multitude would not stand the ghost of a chance.

No; Jack felt that without the rescue was attempted before the procession reached Tyburn, it would be utterly useless.

All around him there were no signs of it.

The mob were more peaceable and quiet than they had hitherto been.

They seemed to be worn out by the exertions they had already made.

The interest of the spectacle was also rapidly increasing, and they strained their eyes eagerly in advance, in order to catch sight of the dreadful triple tree.

The old gallows, with its blackened timbers, to which so many criminals had been suspended, Jack Sheppard had cut down.

But the authorities had promptly erected another on the same spot.

It was the new gibbet that the people were so anxious to see.

It had not yet been made use of, and it seemed as though Jack Sheppard was destined to be the first victim suspended from it.

This was an honour he would gladly have declined.

A rushing, roaring sound was then all that came from the mob at this juncture.

They no longer threw missiles and uttered fierce cries and execrations.

And now, as he gazed down upon the bottom of the cart, Jack fancied he could distinguish the features of the girl he loved so well.

Her delicate and beautiful countenance was in fancy as distinctly visible as if it had been painted there.

It had upon it an expression of great pain and sadness, which afterwards changed to terror and alarm.

All this was but the disordered creation of his brain; still he gazed long and eagerly.

Suddenly, however, he heard a loud, hoarse, prolonged shout.

It came from the people.

Eagerly he looked up, in the hope that the expected rescue was now about to take place.

CHAPTER CCCXXI.

TYBURN IS REACHED AT LAST, AND JACK KETCH COMMENCES HIS TERRIBLE PREPARATIONS.

JACK SHEPPARD looked around.

The people still surrounded the cart, but their gaze was no longer directed towards him.

Their faces were turned in the direction in which they were proceeding.

It was evident that he was no longer the chief object of attraction.

Something else had usurped the popular attention.

Jack sighed.

He was disappointed.

No rescue was about to be attempted—he felt quite sure of that.

Naturally enough, he, too, turned his eyes in the direction in which the people looked.

One glance was sufficient.

Then he averted his eyes.

He understood all in a moment.

Indeed, he blamed himself for not having thought of it before.

The people uttered that shout because at that moment they had caught sight of the triple tree.

It was to this object that all their attention was given.

Jack did not look again.

He was quite satisfied with the hasty glimpse he had had of the three crossbeams.

But he became conscious that the ordinary was reading aloud.

He was reading the burial service.

It was the custom to do this when the cart came in sight of the gallows.

Jack was just conscious that he was speaking, but no more.

The words he uttered fell upon his ear, but they did not penetrate to his understanding.

His thoughts were otherwise engaged.

And now the corner of the Edgware Road was reached.

Tyburn Tree was only a few yards distant.

A strange hush came upon the people.

All were silent.

Round the gallows itself such a crowd of people had assembled as made those which had crowded round Newgate and accompanied the procession sink into insignificance.

But, as before, Jack's eyes roamed in vain over the ocean of faces in search of one that was friendly to him.

All seemed to wear just one expression, and that was curiosity.

Curiosity to see the termination of Jack Sheppard's career.

Heavier and heavier grew his heart.

In all human probability he had but a few minutes more to live.

Would aid come?

Alas! it seemed impossible.

The progress of the cart was slower now than ever.

In spite of all the precautions taken, they could not keep the mob at a distance.

When once they were within the line which the mounted soldiers had for so many hours maintained round the gallows, of course it was another affair.

And Jack, as he watched the slow approach of the cart to this circle, suffered an unparalleled amount of anxiety.

He felt that when he was once within the boundary, all hope of rescue would be over.

The mob could not force a passage through the soldiers. And now that line of soldiers was only a few yards off.

Another moment, and the cart would be within its precincts.

Jack looked around with glaring eyes and parted lips.

On every side were faces—faces innumerable; but all were still—all were occupied in looking at him.

There was not the slightest appearance of a movement.

Despair struggled hard to trample out the last hope that quivered in his heart.

Despair was the victor.

Hope was annihilated.

The cart passed among the soldiers who guarded the scaffold.

They closed around it, hemming it in completely.

Wild drew a long breath at the same moment that a sigh of despair issued from Jack Sheppard's lips.

The dread had all the time been upon him that an attempt would be made to rescue the prisoner.

He had feared it at every step, and when he saw how vast a multitude was assembled round Tyburn Tree, he felt certain that the effort would be made.

Oh, how he congratulated himself upon having had the foresight to suggest such a close guard round the gallows—how he longed to accelerate the pace of the cart—how anxiously he awaited the moment when it would pass through the ranks of the soldiers and be in safety!

Jonathan Wild felt as some captain might feel whose vessel was in immediate danger of destruction, but who can see before him a haven of perfect safety.

Can the reader, then, imagine what a relief it was to the thief-taker when he found the cart actually within the lines?

Now he was safe.

He turned towards Jack, who at this moment seemed to be listening to the ordinary's exhortations.

But Jonathan did not scruple to attract his attention to himself.

He touched Jack on the shoulder.

"Ha, ha! Safe at last, Jack—safe at last! I am more glad than if anyone had given me a thousand pounds this minute! There's no fear of a rescue now! I shall triumph at last! What do you think of your croaking now? You said you should live to see me tucked up, didn't you? Ha, ha! A good joke that! You made a little mistake, though! You ought to have changed the persons! I shall see you tucked up, Jack! Ha, ha!"

To this triumphant speech, Jack Sheppard returned no answer.

The fact of the matter was, the nearness of his fate appalled him.

It stared him full in the face.

Nearer and nearer went the cart, until at length it paused exactly underneath the fatal beam.

Jack gave one look upward, and shuddered.

Jonathan Wild watched him narrowly.

The ordinary continued to read the burial service—to read it over one who was alive.

Considerable confusion prevailed around Tyburn Tree.

It was caused by the sheriffs and other officials taking up their proper positions.

All this occupied some time.

The soldiers had much difficulty in withstanding the pressure of the immense multitude and preserving their line unbroken.

But their numbers, and the position they had taken up, enabled them to perform their arduous duties successfully.

Outside this living wall the people yelled and shouted, screamed and fought.

They were impatient at the delay, and anxious for the performance to commence.

On their part, the sheriffs and other officials were full as anxious as the mob that the ceremony should be concluded, for the usual hour was past.

It was verging upon one o'clock.

As soon as the cart was just under one of the cross-beams of Tyburn Tree, the hangman stopped his horse, and dropping the reins upon his back, crawled into the back part of the cart where Jack Sheppard sat.

There was a hideous and malignant grin upon the countenance of Jack Ketch as he approached the pinioned prisoner.

It was evident that he contemplated the loathsome task he had to perform with feelings of satisfaction.

The ordinary still read the prayers, but Jack Sheppard's whole attention was absorbed by watching every movement that the hangman made.

Jonathan Wild, too, sat still in his seat, with his eyes fixed upon Jack Ketch as though with some kind of fascination.

The hangman was most deliberate in all he did.

While he was thus engaged, the sheriffs were going through the ceremony of handing over the prisoner from their custody, together with the warrant authorising his execution.

Jack Ketch stooped down and raised the lid of the rudely-made coffin.

Then thrusting his hand into the interior, he drew out a piece of rope.

It was long and rather thin, but it was closely woven, and would bear a very heavy weight.

This rope the hangman passed carefully through his hand in order to see that there were no flaws in it.

Then balancing it carefully, he threw one end over the crossbeam overhead.

The feat was a difficult one and was skilfully done, but then, Jack Ketch had had so much practice.

Tying the rope into a running knot, he pulled at one end until the noose was firmly fixed round the crossbeam.

He hung upon the rope once or twice to test its strength, then, apparently satisfied with the result, he turned his attention to other matters.

The people in the crowd had seen these preliminary proceedings gone through many a time, and yet they must have possessed a strange and fearful amount of interest, for they watched them now quite as breathlessly as they could have done upon the first occasion.

In this respect, even Jonathan Wild was no exception.

Such being the case, the reader may perhaps be able to form an idea of the eagerness with which Jack Sheppard gazed upon the scene.

All those horrible and sickening preparations were being made for him.

So intent was he upon what was going forward, that he in a great measure became oblivious of his dreadful position.

But consciousness was brought back to him in a very rude and disagreeable manner.

The executioner, having proceeded so far in his task, now came nearer, and bade Jack Sheppard stand up.

He caught hold of him by the collar of his coat.

Jonathan did the same, and so between them Jack was quickly raised to his feet.

The ordinary, too, rose.

Jack Sheppard could make little or no resistance.

His arms were pinioned.

His brain was confused by the heavy blows he had received, and his mind dulled by the intense horror which he felt.

He was half stupified—half out of his senses.

Before he was aware of it, the thin hard rope insinuated itself round his neck like a snake.

He felt the hangman's fingers about his neck, but he had no longer the power to shrink from the hateful and disgusting touch.

But he shuddered perceptibly.

The crowd was as silent as death.

Not a sound came from the whole of that vast assemblage—all was as silent as though they had been in a desert.

The people seemed even to suspend their breath, so anxious were they not to lose a sight or sound.

Their faculties were wholly bound up in the scene that was enacting before them.

In a few minutes the show would be over.

The Governor and sheriffs also looked on—the former with feelings of triumph and exultation, for he saw that his revenge was at length about to be consummated.

Jack gazed once more upon the ocean of faces.

But their immovability, their steadfastness of expression crushed out all hope, if indeed he had any.

His heart seemed to turn to ice.

He could see that there was not the slightest probability of an attempt to rescue him being made.

He was left to his fate.

He would have to suffer, as many others had before him.

CHAPTER CCCCXLI.

JACK SHEPPARD IS EXECUTED ON TYBURN TREE, AND JONATHAN WILD'S REVENGE IS AT LAST GLUTTED.

JACK KETCH knew how to tie the knot in a systematic manner, and what was more, he knew how to do it in a very short time.

Still, while he was so occupied, he found the opportunity to whisper in Jack Sheppard's ear:

"Sorry for you, my lad!"

Sheppard wondered to hear the hangman pity him—he could not understand it.

However, he made no reply.

He had not the heart to ask the simple question why.

But the hangman spared him the trouble.

"I am sorry for you, Jack, because you will die so hard; you are such a light weight—a very light weight indeed; you will not be heavy enough to strangle yourself; but never mind, when I have drawn the cart away I will hang on to your legs, and then you will soon be out of your misery."

Jack Sheppard quivered with horror as these awful words came upon his ears, uttered as they were in the most commonplace tone in the world.

In the manner in which executions were then performed, it frequently happened that the executioner had to perform the service he had mentioned.

There was no sudden fall to cause instantaneous death—it was a prolonged, painful strangulation.

The victim kicked, and writhed, and struggled, and often the executioner would take hold of the culprit's legs and hang upon them.

The superadded weight of his body had the effect of completing the strangling process.

The heaviest persons of course died easiest.

Now Jack was always a light weight, and what with one thing and another, he had become reduced to a perfect skeleton, so that the hangman's prophecy seemed likely to be fulfilled.

These whispered words escaped the ears of Jonathan Wild.

In another moment the knot was tied, and the executioner was ready.

"Now, Jack," he said, "if you have got anything to say to the people, now's the time to say it—you must be quick though!"

"Yes, Jack," said Wild, exultantly, "say your last say. Ha, ha! I told you this day would come at last, and here it is. Jack, in one more minute you will be dancing upon nothing. I thought you said you were going to see me tucked up! The boot's on the other leg—ha, ha!"

Dejectedly and despairingly Jack Sheppard once more looked around him, but, as before, he could see no hope.

A choking sensation was in his throat. It seemed to him that the rope was already pressing out his life.

He felt no inclination to speak.

And yet he thought he would make an effort.

"Good people, I call upon you all to witness that I am perfectly innocent of the crime for which I am condemned to die. The case was got up against me by Jonathan Wild, and he caused me to be found guilty."

Jack spoke at the top of his lungs, but his voice was weak and wavering, and did not reach beyond the circle of soldiers.

The people who were near could tell he was speaking, but though they strained their hearing to the utmost they could not distinguish what he said.

Every preparation was now made.

The ordinary shut up his book, and made an undignified descent from the cart.

Jonathan prepared to follow.

But he went first up to his victim.

"Good-bye, Jack! I told you what would be the end of your opposition, but you would not believe me. As soon as you are comfortably out of the way, I shall turn my attention to Edgworth Bess. Ha, ha! She will soon forget you, and then she will become Mrs. Wild the Sixth! I shall have no further interruptions from you—all will be plain-sailing now! Good-bye to you!"

The people began to groan and hiss, and Jonathan jumped down out of the cart.

Jack Ketch was ready.

He seized the horse by the bridle, and gave him a sharp cut with the whip.

The cart moved.

Jack felt the boards slipping from beneath his feet, and tried frantically to save himself.

But it was to no purpose.

The cart moved away in spite of him.

In another moment, all that intervened between him and death would have passed away.

He would be dangling in space.

Oh, those awful moments while the cart was drawn away!

Then there was a sudden plunge.

Jack felt the cart go from beneath his feet.

He felt himself fall for a second.

Then he stopped with a jerk that seemed as though it would tear his head from his shoulders.

His windpipe was compressed, and a horrible choking feeling made itself manifest.

He struggled furiously.

All the blood in his body seemed to rush up into his head at once.

So suddenly and fiercely, that he fancied his brain would surely burst in the effort to find some place of escape.

His face grew frightfully distorted, and he writhed in horrible convulsions.

His eyeballs seemed to burn like globes of fire.

Then suddenly, and to the surprise of all present, Jack's struggles ceased.

He hung down straight and motionless, while his body swung slowly to and fro in the faint breeze, turning at the same time from side to side.

It was just at this moment that the executioner came under the gallows.

His intention was to humanely hang on by Jack's legs and put him out of his misery.

But, when he saw him hanging so still and lifeless, he exclaimed, in a voice of astonishment:

"Well, I'm blest! Now, who would have thought of that?"

"Of what?"

It was Jonathan Wild who spoke.

He, too, was beneath the gallows, and standing close by the side of Jack Ketch.

"I say, who would have thought it?"

"Thought what, idiot?"

"That he would have died so easy."

"Is he dead?"

"Oh, never doubt it! That was a skientific knot that I tied, I can tell you! He's dead enough!"

"But I thought he would have struggled longer."

"So did I; and when I saw what a natomy he was, I made sure I should have to pull him down by his legs; but he died uncommon easy!"

Jonathan looked up at the body.

All the signs of a violent death were in the swollen and impurpled countenance.

He turned away satisfied.

Jack Sheppard was no more.

"At last!" Wild muttered—"at last I am free from that young imp of mischief! He's dead now, and it's all over with him!"

But somehow, Wild could not help acknowledging to himself that he did not feel half so elated and overjoyed as he thought he should.

Like a good many people who fancy they shall be supremely happy when something or other is accomplished, he felt disappointed.

He was not half so happy as he thought he should be.

Indeed, a feeling of great depression began to steal over him, but this he strove to banish as much as possible.

He looked up again, but there was the body, dead and limp enough.

Jack was dead.

And Jonathan, in his heart, almost wished he wasn't.

For some time past, the thief-taker had lived in a state of intense excitement.

But now that the object which he had had in view was achieved, the reaction began.

Mr. Noakes rubbed his hands together in his usual sickly fashion.

"Ahem! Mr. Wild!" he said, approaching the thief-taker. "Ahem! It's all over now, I am happy to say!"

"Yes—yes!"

"Dear me, Mr. W., you don't seem at all pleased!"

"Peace, idiot!"

The Governor shrank back a little.

He thought his best policy would be not to irritate the thief-taker while in his present disagreeable mood.

Jonathan clasped his hands behind his back, and paced up and down the open space which the soldiers preserved.

In the meantime, another scene was going on close at hand, which was more important than it would seem to be at a first glance.

After having performed their duties, the sheriffs had returned to their carriages, and now that the execution was all over, they were about to return.

But before they could start, a singular-looking being made his appearance close to the carriage of the high-sheriff.

Where he had come from, or how he had got where he was, no one could tell.

His sudden appearance was most extraordinary.

No doubt he had taken advantage of the time when the attention of everyone was riveted upon Jack to push himself forward.

But there he was, and those who saw him stared as though he had just dropped from the clouds.

And in truth his personal appearance was extraordinary enough to attract immediate attention.

This singular being was dressed in a long, faded brown coat, of the kind that was fashionable in the reign of Queen Anne.

This cloak he had got wrapped closely around him, so that the whole of his body was concealed.

Above the cloak could be seen his head.

Beneath it his feet.

His face was buried deeply in the folds of his cloak, and on his head he wore a tall, foreign-looking, conical-shaped hat, such as might have been worn a couple of centuries before.

In the hat there was one black feather, which stood up rigid, and looking more like a steel ornament than a feather.

It looked as though it had been plucked out of the wing of some bird.

Such was the singular figure that appeared close to the door of the sheriff's carriage.

"Your excellency," he said, in a respectful voice, and making a low bow after almost every word he spoke—"your excellency, I should feel obliged if you would grant me a few minutes' attention."

The fat sheriff seemed rather pleased than otherwise with the title of "excellency," so he bowed his head in what he considered a highly-dignified manner.

The strange-looking individual who had addressed him interpreted his bow as a permission to proceed.

"Your excellency, I am a foreigner—a German—a countryman of your King! I am a chemist, and am making some experiments for his Majesty's pleasure!"

"Step into the carriage, my dear sir," said the sheriff, who was loyal to the backbone, "and then I will talk to you. Did you say you were a countryman of his most gracious Majesty's?"

"Yes, your excellency."

"Then give me your hand. I am delighted to make your acquaintance. Did you say you had the honour of making experiments for his Majesty?"

"I did, your excellency," said the strange-looking man, with another bow; "and only this morning I was in conversation with his Majesty!"

"This morning, did you say?"

"Yes."

"Then let me shake hands with you again!"

The sheriff was immensely delighted.

He was one of those who are always ready to fawn upon those who happen to be in high places.

He was credulous, too, especially where there was anything connected with royalty.

And so he believed, without hesitation, what his singular visitor said to him.

He thought nothing of the strange, dingy cloak and general appearance of poverty, for he knew very well that at that time the Germans hanging about the Court did not cut a very respectable figure.

They had not been in the country long enough for sufficient taxes to be collected to clothe them.

CHAPTER CCCCXLII.

AN EXTRAORDINARY APPLICATION RESPECTING THE DEAD BODY OF JACK SHEPPARD IS MADE TO THE HIGH-SHERIFF BY A GERMAN CHEMIST.

THE sheriff well knew there were plenty of distant relations of the royal family who were no better off than this chemist appeared to be.

Of course, all that sort of thing was soon altered, and at the present day their descendants are fed and clothed with the taxes collected from the English nation.

However, that has nothing to do with our story.

Let it suffice to mention that the sheriff fully believed that the German chemist was just what he said he was.

After shaking hands, the chemist continued:

"I saw his Majesty this morning, and reported the progress I had made in my experiments, with which he expressed himself satisfied."

"Happy man!" sighed the sheriff; "would I could hear him say the same words to me!"

"Wait a moment, your excellency, and then I will tell you what his Majesty said of you!"

"Of me?"

"Yes."

"What—what?"

"In one moment, your excellency—I will tell you in one moment what the King said about you."

"About me?"

"Yes—you are the high-sheriff, are you not?"

"I am that lucky man!"

"I thought so."

"Pray go on!"

"I will, your excellency. When his Majesty had expressed himself satisfied with my labours, he said, 'By the way, there is a young fellow named Sheppard, who is to be executed this morning!'"

"Did his Majesty say that?"

"Those were his very words."

"Do go on!"

"I told his Majesty that he was correct, and then he added, 'You must try your experiments upon him!'"

"Upon me?"

"No—upon Jack Sheppard!"

"Oh!"

"Not you, of course."

"But Jack Sheppard is dead!"

"Yes, there he hangs!"

"How can you perform your experiments, then?"

"Let me whisper to your excellency an important royal secret."

The sheriff eagerly leaned forward to listen.

"I am to perform my experiments upon his dead body!"

The sheriff drew back with great suddenness, and glared in the speaker's face.

"On his dead body?"

"Yes."

"Oh, gracious!"

"But I haven't told you what his Majesty said about yourself!"

"No—no!"

"Then I will do so at once."

"Pray do!"

The sheriff wiped his face with his pocket-handkerchief.

"His Majesty said to me: 'That is a very singular young man, and you must not omit upon any account to perform your experiments upon him. Is not the high-sheriff a Mr. Knobbles?'"

"Did his Majesty say that?"

"Most certainly!"

"Then his royal highness knew my unworthy name?"

"His Majesty knows everything!"

"Oh, ah! yes, of course!"

"The high-sheriff," said his Majesty, "is Mr. Knobbles—he is a true, devoted, and most loyal subject, and I feel the profoundest regard for him."

"Stop, stop!"

The sheriff was completely overcome.

"That's what his Majesty said."

"Did he say any more?"

"Oh yes!"

"What—what?"

"He said, 'Go to High-Sheriff Knobbles, and tell him all, and that it is my desire that the body of Jack Sheppard be given up to you, in order that you may perform your experiments upon it.'"

"Oh dear!"

"That was what he said, your excellency."

"And I am to deliver the body to you?"

"Yes."

"But suppose his friends claimed it?"

"You must not trouble his Majesty about that."

"No, no—certainly not!"

"In order that there should be no mistake about it, his Majesty wrote this note, which he commanded me to deliver to you."

The German chemist produced from under his cloak a folded piece of paper.

The sheriff snatched at it eagerly, and unfolded it.

In a large, straggling, ungainly-looking hand, the following words were written:—

"Deliver the body of Sheppard to bearer.—GEORGE R."

"Is this his Majesty's writing?"

"It is."

"I may keep it?"

"Yes; and you will excuse me for saying that I consider his Majesty's autograph to be reward enough for what you are going to do—very few persons are favoured with it."

"I know that—I know that!" said the sheriff, trembling with joy.

"In return for it, all I want is an order from you to deliver the body of Jack Sheppard to me."

"You shall have it!"

"Here are writing materials," said the German chemist, instantly producing pencil and paper from beneath his cloak. The sheriff took them almost mechanically, and began to write.

The German chemist watched him anxiously.

The sheriff made several mistakes, but at length the document was completed.

He handed it to the German chemist, who received it with a low bow, while a smile of exultation crossed his face.

By this time the procession was ready to start on its return, and the Governor of Newgate came to the sheriff's carriage to know whether he was ready.

The German chemist made a bow.

He held out to the Governor the order he had just received.

Mr. Noakes read it with surprise, and then bent an inquiring glance upon the sheriff, who was, however, entirely absorbed by the King's autograph.

"It's all right!" he said. "On his Majesty's service—all right!"

"The high-sheriff says it's all right," remarked the German chemist, as he prepared to alight from the carriage.

The Governor was rather mystified, but he drew back and allowed the chemist to pass.

"Are you ready to return, Mr. Knobbles?"

"Yes—yes! Back as soon as possible!"

The sheriff was impatient to get back to the City, in order that he might have the delight of exhibiting his Majesty's autograph and repeating what had taken place.

A very triumphant expression appeared upon the face of the German chemist, as he made his way towards the gallows.

There the body of Jack Sheppard still hung, swaying gently to and fro, as before.

Jonathan Wild was still pacing up and down.

The hangman had put a nosebag on his horse, and had seated himself upon the shafts of the cart, where he smoked a short black pipe with great apparent relish.

He was waiting for the hour to expire, at the end of which the body would be cut down, placed in the coffin, and driven back to Newgate.

Jonathan Wild looked more uneasy and uncomfortable than ever.

A presentiment that something strange was about to happen pressed upon him, and increased in intensity every moment.

But what it could be he could not tell.

He wanted to get back to London.

It was while pacing up and down in the restless manner we have described, that his thoughts reverted to his house. He recollected how it had been burned, and wondered whether any of the secrets it contained had been brought to light.

Now that all was over, he blamed himself for having kept with so much persistency in Jack Sheppard's cell.

"I was a fool," he said; "but never mind—I have been successful, and ought not to grumble. I will just wait and see him cut down, and then I shall feel sure that all is right. I shall then trouble myself no further about Jack Sheppard, but make my way back to London with all speed—it is time I was there. It is time I looked to my house, and took such measures as would effectually prevent any disagreeable discoveries from being made. I will go, but I will wait and see him cut down first."

Thus muttering to himself, Jonathan continued his restless pacing up and down.

The German chemist, with the important paper tightly clenched in his right hand, crept to the side of the cart, and stood there, being all the time hidden from Jonathan Wild's view.

Indeed, he avoided the thief-taker with the utmost sedulousness.

Why, will probably be seen in due time.

He was now waiting for Jonathan Wild to go.

In the meanwhile, the procession set out on its return journey.

It was accompanied by some thousands of people.

The execution was over, and there was only the cutting down to see.

This was not a very interesting ceremony, and yet many stayed an hour on purpose to witness it.

Still the crowd perceptibly thinned, and, by the time the hour had elapsed, the crowd was trifling in comparison to what it had been.

Once more, then, when the appointed time arrived, the hangman drew his cart underneath Tyburn Tree.

He was going to "pluck the fruit," as he facetiously termed what he was about to do.

He still smoked his pipe.

When he climbed up into the cart, of course he came into full sight of the mob, and a loud yell instantly followed.

With an indifference, however, that was truly stoical, he proceeded with his task.

He took a knife out of his pocket, and began sawing away at the rope with great deliberation.

But the edge was keen, and the strands of rope were quickly divided.

The last few parted with a sudden snap, and then down fell the body into the cart with a crash that was sickening to hear.

"There he is, then, Mr. Wild!" said Jack Ketch, addressing the thief-taker, who had climbed up the wheel of the cart to have a last look at the body. "Dead enough, isn't he?"

Jonathan did not deign to reply.

With his feet resting on the spokes of the wheel, and his hands clutching the sides of the clumsy vehicle, he took his last look at the countenance of Jack Sheppard.

Very still and very horrible did that slight, slim figure look.

The features were frightfully distorted, so much so as to make recognition a matter of great difficulty.

Wild remained gazing for a moment, and then, jumping down, he made his way back to London at the best of his speed.

He was anxious, now that his pertinacious enemy was disposed of, that he should set his house in order a little.

Jack Ketch lifted up the limp, warm body, and placed it in the coffin, which was much too large for Jack; but, then, it was better so than too small.

It was quite a matter of chance, for the coffins were all made by contract, and they were by no means particular about the fit.

Jack was easily accommodated, and the rude lid hid his remains from the light of day.

CHAPTER CCCCXLIII.

THE LANDLORD OF THE INN IN SMITHFIELD SHOWS BLUESKIN THAT IT IS POSSIBLE FOR JACK SHEPPARD TO BE SAVED FROM DEATH.

MANY of our readers have no doubt surmised that there is some mystery connected with the individual in the long, faded brown cloak, who had called himself a German chemist.

What that mystery is, however, and whether he really was what he professed to be, must remain for the present a secret.

But the reader will not be long kept in suspense.

In order to elucidate the events which we have recently described, it will be necessary to go back a little, and relate the proceedings of other characters in our story.

It will be remembered, then, that Blueskin, having arrived in London on the very morning appointed for Jack Sheppard's execution, and only a few hours before the time fixed for the sentence to be carried into effect, had repaired to an inn in Smithfield Market, the landlord of which had overwhelmed him by communicating the astounding intelligence that Jack was about to be executed.

He showed him, too, how impossible it would be to save him, and convinced him that there was not time to make even an attempt.

Blueskin was crushed and overcome.

While conversing with the landlord, time flew rapidly, but each minute only served to convince Blueskin that he had arrived a few hours too late to be of assistance to his old comrade.

Then the landlord had said that he had thought of something—that he had something to propose, but that it was of such a preposterous nature that Blueskin would never listen to or think of acting upon it.

But Blueskin had seized with avidity upon what the landlord had said, and implored him to be more explicit.

It was just as the clock of St. Sepulchre's Church chimed a quarter past nine that the landlord said:

"Well, Blueskin, I will tell you what I consider is your only hope—your only chance."

"Speak on, then! What is it?"

"It is to obtain possession of Jack's body after he has been executed!"

"What?" said Blueskin, in a voice of horror.

"And when you have got it, try to resuscitate him!"

"Impossible!"

"I knew you would say so."

"And do you think that such a scheme as that holds out the least chance of success?"

"I do, or I should not have proposed it."

"Oh, I am maddened—maddened! It seems such a desperate thing to do!"

"Still, it is a last resort."

"It is. But something shall be tried before that."

"Very good, but if you agree to what I propose and thoroughly hear me out, don't you see that you will be left to try any other desperate speculation you may think of just the same?"

"Well, go on."

"I have not much to say. I believe it is your only chance."

"But do you think that there would be any chance of resuscitating him after the sentence was once carried into effect?"

"Such things have been known."

"Very true."

"And why should not Jack stand as good a chance as anyone else?"

"I know no reason why he should not."

"Very well, then. The whole thing lies in a nutshell."

"How so?"

"Thus—you will say, of course, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the execution proves fatal. Now, you want to know, perhaps, why I think Jack Sheppard will be the one out of the ninety-nine."

"Do you think he will?"

"I feel almost sure of it."

"Why?"

"He is such a light chap. He must weigh a mere nothing."

"He does not weigh much."

"And what with imprisonment and illness, and one thing and another, his frame has been very much reduced."

"It has—it has."

"Very well, then, it is my deliberate conviction that when the cart is drawn from underneath him his own weight will not be sufficient to compress his neck tight enough to cause his death."

"But this is awful."

"I admit that, but nevertheless I consider my hope is well grounded."

"It is—it is; but it makes me shudder."

"It is only natural that it should; however, you can see, from what I have said, that there is a chance, should things come to the worst, that he may be restored to life."

"There is. But what a horrible existence it would be!"

"Not so bad as no existence at all."

"Very true."

"Well, then, that is just how the case stands. You can try your best to save Jack's neck from the hangman's rope, but if you fail, you have still the chance of bringing him back to life again."

"Would that I had been here sooner!"

"There is no time for unavailing regrets."

"Right! We have much to do! But pardon me if I am overcome—I am not myself!"

"I can understand your feelings."

"But stop! There is something else to be considered!"

"What?"

"If we succeed in getting Jack's body, who will revive it?"

"That is no difficulty! You leave that to me!"

"Can you do it?"

"No; but I know a very clever man who can—that is, if it is in mortal power to do so!"

"Who is he?"

"A physician who lives in Long Acre. He is a strange man, and most people think he is a little mad; but that is because he is not understood."

"And this man can do it?"

"If anyone can."

"And will he?"

"Oh yes, if I apply to him!"

"It is a secret, I suppose?"

"What? how he performs his mysterious task?"

"Yes."

"I believe it is."

"He lives in Long Acre, you say?"

"Yes; he keeps a small shop, where drugs and chemicals are sold. This keeps him, and he spends the whole of his time in making experiments. His house is full of apparatus."

"Has he ever revived anyone before?"

The landlord glanced about him uneasily, and then sinking his voice to a whisper, said:

"He has!"

"Who?"

"Never mind that now! I found out the means by accident, I believe."

"And is he to be trusted?"

"Entirely!"

St. Sepulchre's clock chimed a quarter to ten.

"How the time flies!"

"It does whenever there is important business on hand. I confess the thing which gives me the greatest uneasiness is, that I fear that Jonathan Wild and the authorities will not give up the body."

"Ah, I had not thought of that!"

"Nor I till just as I spoke. That will prove a serious obstacle."

"It will indeed! If application is made, Wild's suspicions are sure to be aroused!"

"Well, I shall speak about that to the chemist, or whatever he is. There is time enough for that. I have thought of something else. Wait a moment."

The landlord hastened to the door of the room, and cried out:

"Sarah—Sarah! Come here—I want you."

In reply to this call, a young girl, about nineteen or twenty years of age, entered the room.

"Go and fetch me a nice nosegay of flowers. Make haste—be back here in an instant!"

"I thought that would save time," said the landlord,

[THE GERMAN CHEMIST CARRIES THE BODY OF JACK SHEPPARD TO HIS LABORATORY.]

returning to Blueskin. "While she is gone I can explain."

"What—what is it?"

"It would be well if we could communicate with Jack."

"I would give the world!"

"Good! I will tell you how we shall easily be able to convey a message to him."

"How?"

"Write what you want to say on this slip of paper. It must only be a few words, mind!"

"And how shall you contrive to give it to him unseen?"

"Well, of course you know that it is a custom when anyone is taking a last ride for some friend or relation or sweetheart to stand upon the steps of St. Andrew's Church and give the condemned man a bunch of flowers?"

"Yes, yes—it is nearly always done."

No. 93.—BLUESKIN.

"It is, and now my plan becomes clear. Whatever you write, I shall tie round the stem of the flowers."

"And who will give him the bunch?"

"Sarah."

"But, if the streets are so crowded, how will she get to the church steps?—the procession will start in half an hour."

"Oh, that will be easy enough! She has only to let the people about her know what she intends to do, and they will give her a free passage through them, for all are friendly disposed towards Jack Sheppard."

"It is a poor advantage to take of such a feeling."

"I grant that; but we must do the best we can. Now, what are you going to write?"

Blueskin wrote on the slip of paper:

"Escape if you can! If you can't, put trust in me and hope!"

"That will do capitally!"

At this moment, Sarah, the landlord's daughter, entered, carrying in her hand a large nosegay.

The landlord tied the slip of paper round it very quickly, and while doing so told the girl what he wanted her to do.

She consented gladly and willingly, for Jack Sheppard was a special favourite of hers, and she rejoiced at the prospect of being able to render him a service.

Off she sped at a rapid rate, and was not long in reaching the outskirts of the crowd.

Putting on an anxious look, and assuming a sad tone of voice, she asked to be allowed to pass to the foot of the church steps, in order that she might give the nosegay to her sweetheart, Jack Sheppard.

As the landlord had foretold, the people made way with the greatest willingness, and in less time than anyone would have believed possible, considering the density of the crowd and the distance she had to go.

But she was only just in time.

In a former chapter we have described how she succeeded in giving the nosegay to Jack.

When she had performed her mission, she sank back quietly among the crowd, and returned home with all the speed she could make.

As soon as he had despatched his daughter on this errand, the landlord, addressing himself to Blueskin, said:

"And now, if you will be guided by me and take my advice, you will give up all idea of attempting a rescue."

"Never!"

"Nay, listen to me! Don't throw away the chance you have got! I can assure you the authorities, with your own recent escape before their eyes, have taken such careful precautions that it will be impossible to succeed; the military are out in vast numbers, and the old tree at Tyburn is as well defended as though walled round with brass. Once more I say, take my advice and abandon the thought, for the attempt must result in a failure!"

Blueskin paced the room uneasily.

"I feel inclined to try."

"I know you do, but just think how serious and deplorable it would be if you were to be captured. In the event of it, they would not let you go again, I can promise you that. They were more than a match for Jack Sheppard this time."

"So it seems."

"The cart will be guarded by men who will resist easily whatever attack might be made upon them, and you must not forget that you have not got any organised plan: if you had, it would be different, but still you would fail."

CHAPTER CCCCXLIV.

THE GERMAN CHEMIST UNDERTAKES THE TASK OF RESTORING JACK SHEPPARD TO LIFE.

FOR some moments after the landlord had finished speaking, Blueskin remained silent.

He could not help admitting to himself that the landlord had got on his side both reason and common sense.

The authorities would of course adopt every precaution.

The most probable result that would follow any attempt of his own to rescue Jack Sheppard would be his own capture.

"Don't you see that I am right?" persisted the landlord.

"Why, if I thought there was the ghost of a chance I would help you heart and soul, but there isn't, and you know it."

"I cannot help confessing that I am forced to think so."

"I am glad you are able to look at things in a reasonable light; and now, if you will only be guided by me, you will adopt at once the only means of aiding Jack that lies in your power."

"What is that?"

"I will tell you in a moment. First of all though, as to that letter."

"Do you think your daughter will succeed in delivering it?"

"I have no doubts on that score."

"What about it, then?"

"Why, Jack, when he receives it, will, I think, make up his mind to try his own resources, and not rely upon his friends for aid."

"You mean he will attempt to escape?"

"I think he will take the hint."

"But what chance has he?"

"Not much, I admit, but then, as you know very well, Jack has in his short lifetime done more extraordinary things than that."

"So he has."

"If he can once get among the people he will be right."

"Do you think it possible to leap out of the cart?"

"Well, I don't know that I could do it myself, but I don't believe it would be impossible to Jack Sheppard."

"And the people would befriend him?"

"To the utmost of their power."

"Then I hope he will be able to jump out of the cart."

"So do I, most heartily, and I will lay a hundred to one that he attempts it before he gets half-way."

"I trust he will succeed—I trust he will succeed!"

"We must prepare ourselves for every contingency."

Blueskin shuddered.

"It's no good mincing the matter!" continued the landlord.

"None whatever."

"Come, then, we will repair at once to the dwelling of this German chemist I spoke of. We have scarcely any time to make our arrangements with him. It is quite certain if we linger here any longer it will be too late."

"I am ready—lead the way!"

"Wait a moment; I will just go and fetch my hat, and tell my wife I am going out for an hour or two!"

The landlord left the room.

As soon as the door closed behind him, Blueskin began again to pace the room with rapid and irregular strides.

"What a horrible day is this!" he said. "Little did I dream that I should return to London and find things in such a condition as they are. Oh, this is horrible—most horrible!"

At this moment, the landlord re-entered the room.

"Come!" he said—"be quick!"

Blueskin muffled himself up in his cloak, and drew his hat down over his face in such a manner as almost to defy recognition.

Then he followed the landlord out of the parlour in which this important conference had taken place.

The customers that were crowded into the house when Blueskin arrived had now disappeared.

The landlord noted the fact with a significant smile.

"The procession has started," he said. "I can tell that by the house being so clear."

"Shall we be in time?"

"If we are quick we shall."

They had now emerged into the open air.

A little way off a hackney carriage was standing.

At Blueskin's request, the landlord hailed it, and the pair quickly seated themselves in the cumbrous vehicle.

"Drive to Long Acre!" said the landlord.

It was not so much with a view of saving time that Blueskin had hailed the hackney-coach, but because he was not so likely to be seen and recognised while seated in it as he would be if he ventured to traverse the streets of London on foot.

The driver had to make a considerable detour in order to reach his destination, because of the crowds of people that occupied the road which the procession would take.

But he had a couple of tolerable horses.

At length Long Acre was reached.

The landlord stopped the coach near the corner of Bow Street.

He paid the man his fare, and, in company with Blueskin, continued along the street in the direction of St. Martin's Lane.

He paused at length before a chemist's shop.

"This is the place," he said.

Blueskin looked up, and saw that he was standing before one of the darkest, dirtiest, dingiest houses in all Long Acre.

The shop was fitted with two small windows, with a door in the centre.

All the panes of glass were so thickly encrusted with dirt, that it was impossible to see through them, so that, by the windows alone, it would be impossible to tell what was vended in the shop.

Nor was there any signboard.

Decay and dilapidation were, however, visible on every side.

Blueskin took all this in at a glance.

He had no opportunity for a more minute examination, as the landlord took him by the arm and entered the shop.

This was so dark inside, that it was with difficulty Blueskin made out the various features of it.

Filth and squalor were more and more discernible.

A disagreeable and peculiar smell, arising from the commingled odours of thousands of drugs, assailed their nostrils.

The landlord stamped on the ground with his foot.

Then a door at the back of the shop was opened.

Blueskin heard the sound, and turned his eyes in the direction from which it came; but the shop was so dark, that he could scarcely perceive the dim and shadowy figure of a man.

He advanced to the counter, and then Blueskin saw him more distinctly.

He was a little man, with a dirty, wrinkled, shrivelled face, with long, white hair, and with a black velvet skull-cap drawn round closely over his head.

His countenance presented the appearance which it ever wears when the owner of it has studied deeply.

But his eyes formed his most remarkable feature.

They were very small, but so bright, they seemed to have some illuminating power of their own, and to be capable of perceiving everything.

"What is it?" said the chemist, in a sharp, shrill voice.

"What do you want?"

"I want you!" said the landlord, in a peculiar tone of voice.

The chemist bent forward and peered into his customer's face.

"I know you!" he said. "Come in!—come this way!"

"I will!" said the landlord—"I want to speak to you upon a matter of the utmost importance!"

The old chemist led the way to the little dark room at the back of the shop from which he had emerged.

It was a small apartment, and Blueskin could not help looking about him in surprise and curiosity, for it was piled up and littered with scientific and chemical apparatus of every description.

The chemist placed chairs for his visitors.

"Now!" he said—"be good enough to tell me your business; and be as quick as you can about it, for my time is valuable!"

"I know that!" returned the landlord—"and so I will put my desires into a few words!"

"The fewer the better."

"Then I want you to bring back to life a man who will be hanged at Tyburn at twelve o'clock to-day!"

The chemist, with the utmost coolness imaginable, took out a gigantic silver watch.

"It's half-past eleven," he remarked, laconically.

"There is not much time."

"Very little!"

"Will you undertake the task?"

"I did a service of this kind for you once before, didn't I?"

"You did!" replied the landlord.

Blueskin noticed as he spoke that the landlord's voice faltered.

"You know my terms?"

"Yes."

"Five hundred pounds!"

"They shall be yours," said Blueskin; "and I will pay you half down now, if you will undertake the task!"

"No, no—never mind! I might fail, you know! Pay me in full as soon as I have performed my duty, and that will do."

"Agreed!"

"It is a bargain, then?"

"Yes."

"When will the body be brought here?"

"You must let me explain."

"Do you want me to gain possession of the body for you?"

"Yes."

"That will be extra!"

"You shall be paid."

"Enough; and now for particulars. What is the name of the man who is to be hanged?"

"Jack Sheppard."

"The devil! I ought to have asked more! But never mind, a bargain is a bargain!"

"You will have no room left to complain of my liberality!"

"Very good!"

Blueskin then proceeded to give the chemist some particulars which it was necessary he should know.

For instance, he told him how closely Jack would be guarded by soldiers and police officers, and how Jonathan Wild would probably not take his eyes off him.

When he had done, the chemist said:

"That is sufficient. Leave the rest to me! I have a plan all ready, but I must set about it at once, or I shall not have time to carry it out."

"Very good!"

"I shall claim the body and bring it here as soon as may be, and then I shall commence operations."

"Will you allow me to stay here while you are gone?" said Blueskin. "My friend, the landlord, to whom I am indebted for my introduction to you, will not want to stay, and it will be dangerous for me to be out in the street, and should I be recognised while entering or leaving your house, suspicion would be at once excited."

"You are right. You can remain here if you like."

"And I will go," said the landlord, "for I have matters of my own to attend to."

With these words he bade Blueskin and the chemist farewell, and took his departure.

Blueskin seated himself again.

"You can stay here," said the chemist, "and amuse yourself in the best way you are able. You will be quite safe. I have some preparations to make, and then I shall be ready to start."

"One word."

"What is it?"

The landlord spoke of your having performed a similar service once before."

"Well, and what if I did?"

"Simply this. Were you successful in your attempt to restore animation?"

"Perfectly."

Blueskin drew a sigh of relief.

"And who was the person?"

"The son of the man who has just left."

"Enough! I ought to have guessed it. I recollect Jonathan Wild caused his son to be executed."

"And I brought him back to life."

"Do the same thing for Jack Sheppard, and you shall receive any reward you like to ask for."

The chemist smiled.

"Wait here," he said. "I shall be away no longer than I can help, and if it is possible for anyone to succeed I will bring Jack back with me. I shall lock up the shop, so you will pay no attention, no matter who knocks. Sit here until I return."

With these words the chemist entered his shop.

Blueskin fervently hoped that there would be no need for his services to be called into requisition—that Jack would succeed in making his escape from the cart.

But in this expectation he was disappointed.

CHAPTER CCCCXLV.

THE GERMAN CHEMIST SUCCEEDS IN OBTAINING POSSESSION OF THE BODY OF JACK SHEPPARD.

It is not our intention, nor is it at all necessary, to minutely describe the chemist's preparations.

Let it suffice to say that he was very quick about all he did.

The reader is already acquainted with the details of his very clever scheme, and also with the success which, up to a certain point, attended it.

Considering the short time he had for devising it, he deserves very great credit for his plan.

He had met with an easy dupe in the person of Sheriff Knobbles, and in this, as in several other things, luck favoured him to a very great extent.

With respect to the sheriff, there is, we think, only one circumstance in connection with him with which we need trouble the reader.

Upon reaching London, he hastened at once to exhibit the autograph of the King.

He held the crumpled bit of paper in the air, and made a long speech, which had the effect of raising the curiosity of his hearers to the highest possible pitch.

Then, amid the most breathless eagerness, he slowly unfolded the precious paper.

But when it was fairly spread open an ejaculation of dismay came from his lips, and he staggered back several paces.

The paper was blank.

There were no signs of ink upon it whatever.

The admiring circle to which he had been addressing himself were loud in making anxious inquiries.

But the sheriff looked like one stupefied.

He was quite unable to account for this phenomenon, and he behaved and spoke in such an eccentric way that they came at once to the conclusion that he had gone mad, and that all he had related to them had no foundation whatever in fact, but had been hatched up in his own deluded brain.

It was an additional aggravation to the sheriff to find that he was disbelieved; but his story was such an extraordinary one that the incredulity of his hearers is nothing to be wondered at.

But so it was.

The phenomenon which had so puzzled the sheriff is susceptible of easy explanation.

The German chemist was much too astute to commit himself by forging the King's signature.

Instead, then, of writing on the paper with ink, he used a simple chemical preparation, which exhibited all the appearance of ordinary ink for some time, and then faded away, leaving behind it not a trace of its presence.

So he was quite clear of that transaction, and in no danger of getting into trouble concerning it.

And now, for the last time, we return to Tyburn Tree.

We have described how Jack Sheppard's body was put into the coffin provided for it.

Jonathan had hastened back to London.

Now that Jack was fairly executed, he felt quite relieved upon that point.

The next thing he imagined would be that Jack would be buried in Newgate.

The idea of resuscitation never once entered his mind.

The German chemist watched Jonathan Wild take his departure with feelings of unalloyed satisfaction.

He felt that a great stumbling-block was removed.

Jack Ketch took his seat on the shafts of the cart, and set his horse in motion.

The jolting, clumsy vehicle started on its return journey to London.

The crowd of people had dispersed with extreme rapidity as soon as the cutting down ceremony was over.

A good many followed the cart.

Foremost among them was the German chemist.

He hung on by the board at the back, and none could remove him from his position.

He had to put out more strength, however, than anyone would have imagined he possessed.

Like some wild cat he clung firm, and maintained his hold in spite of all the attempts made to dash him aside.

As the cart moved further and further away from Tyburn the people became scattered, for they sought their own homes.

They had seen all they had to see.

But the chemist still kept his place.

The journey was a tedious one.

At length Bloomsbury Fields was reached.

Drawn up at the corner of a lane, which is now called Montague Street, was a dirty-looking hackney coach.

Just as the cart passed Montague House, a building that occupied part of the site of the present British Museum, the German chemist made his way round from the back to the front of the cart.

Without saying a word to the langman, he stopped the horse.

The crowd had now diminished until it scarcely deserved the name.

There were only a few idle lookers-on upon the strange scene that followed.

Jack Ketch was in a terrible passion when he saw some one had stopped his horse, and he jumped to the ground in a very belligerent manner.

The German chemist, however, walked up to him with such a decided air that he shrank back.

"Hold!" he said. "You must stop here!"

"What for?"

"I want the body of Jack Sheppard!"

"Don't you wish you may get it?"

"I must have it!"

"And I say, don't you wish you may get it? Gee up, Captain!"

"I must have it!" said the chemist.

"Shan't let you, then!"

"But you must!"

"Not without an order from the sheriff, I don't!"

"And will you then?"

"Well—yes!"

"You know very well you dare not refuse! But come, I don't want to be disagreeable! I see no reason why there should be any ill-will between us!"

"Have you got the order?"

"Yes, I have."

"Let me look at it, then!"

"There it is."

The German chemist held up the paper he had obtained from the sheriff.

"That's an order, sure enough; but it's a burning shame!"

"Why?"

"To think I should be done out of my regulars!"

"Your what?"

"Regulars."

"What are they?"

"Why, the torgery, and all the little things he may happen to have in his pockets."

"Oh, I see!"

"Do you?"

"Yes. Just take the order a minute! There! Now, I suppose you wouldn't mind giving up your regulars if you had an equivalent for them?"

"An what?"

"A five-pound note, for instance!"

"A five-pun note! Oh, here you are! Tip us the flimsy, and take the carcass!"

From under that mysterious cloak of his the German chemist produced a five-pound Bank of England note.

"There—that will do!" he said.

"One minute!" added the chemist—"I'm not very strong, you know!"

"You don't look to be!"

"In return for the money I have just given you, I want you to carry the body to that hackney-coach yonder."

"All right! I s'pose you're a doctor?"

"I am."

"Are you going to dissect him?"

"Yes."

"Ah, well! I'm sorry he should go to the doctor's; but, however, business is business!"

"Of course it is!"

While speaking these words, Jack Ketch scrambled up into the cart.

"You don't want the coffin as well, do you?"

"No!"

"Very good! You can have it if you like, but it will be extra!"

"I don't want it."

"Then you sha'n't have it."

Jack Ketch then lifted the lid off the coffin, and those few persons who yet remained around the cart had the unexpected gratification of perceiving the body of Jack hoisted up on to the shoulders of Jack Ketch, and carried by him into the hackney-coach.

When this little ceremony was over, the German chemist got into the carriage as well, and told the driver to go on.

Jack Ketch stood at the corner of the lane, and watched the hackney-coach until a bend in the road hid it from his sight.

"This is a rum start," he said, "blessed if it isn't! But it don't matter a cuss to me, except that I've got the order, and am five pounds richer nor I should be!"

This last reflection contented him, and he resumed his seat on the shafts of the cart and drove on.

Many of the people, when they saw the body of Jack Sheppard transferred to the hackney-coach, also transferred their attention to that vehicle.

They ran after it as fast as their legs could carry them. The hackney-coach did not seem to be going fast, and yet the people, one after another, dropped back and ceased to run after it.

Away the coach went in a perfectly straight line, and by the time it reached the open country there was not one individual in pursuit.

Jack Ketch had placed the body of Jack Sheppard rather roughly on the front seat in the coach.

The chemist at first took no notice of its presence, but knelt up on the cushions that covered the hind seat.

In the back of the coach there was a little window covered with a pad, which could be raised at pleasure by those within.

The chemist raised this pad, and pressed his face close to the little pane of glass.

He was enabled to see all down the road.

A smile crossed his withered countenance whenever he saw a person drop back and give up the pursuit.

It soon became evident that the coach was driven towards the open country at a tolerably swift rate, in order to get rid of all followers.

As we have said, then, the old chemist at last had the satisfaction of perceiving the last man give up the chase.

He removed his face from the pane of glass, and sat down.

The body of Jack Sheppard had been shaken off the seat by the jolting motion, and now lay at the bottom of the vehicle.

The chemist stooped and picked him up with an ease which showed that he possessed thrice the amount of strength that he appeared to do.

He placed him in a convenient position on the opposite seat, and having done so, he muttered:

"I fancy I shall succeed this time, for life does not seem to be extinct."

Then, looking out of the window, he saw that they were travelling rapidly along the high-road.

The driver had evidently received his instructions as to what he should do.

After going some distance further, he turned off down a narrow lane.

It was an unfrequented one.

From the time they turned the corner to the time when they pulled up they did not catch sight of a single living creature.

The coach stopped somewhat suddenly in this lane.

The driver got down off the box, and opened the door.

The chemist alighted and closed the door again, leaving Jack Sheppard the sole inmate of the interior of the coach.

CHAPTER CCCXLVI.

THE GERMAN CHEMIST HAS THE BODY OF JACK SHEPPARD CARRIED INTO THE LABORATORY.

"Be as quick as you can," said the German chemist, addressing himself to the driver of the hackney-coach; "the sooner we get back the better."

"All right, sir!"

The coach had been drawn up close to a pond which was by the side of the lane.

It was a good large sheet of clear water, and was not fenced off in any way.

The driver then seized his horse by the bridle, and very deliberately backed the hackney-coach into the pool.

Then from under his seat on the box he produced a large soft brush and a tin can, as well as some dry rags.

With the aid of the can, the brush, and the water, he set to work with great diligence to clean the vehicle.

The alteration thus effected was incredible.

From a worn-out, dirty-looking hackney-coach, it was gradually transformed into a neat and almost new private carriage.

In fact, the vehicle had been disguised by having dirt of all kinds splashed upon it.

All that we are now describing had been prearranged by the chemist, and formed part of his plan.

The man worked with good will.

The dirt upon the carriage was easily removed.

Then with his rags he polished it up until it looked like new.

When he had finished, no one would have dreamed that it was the same carriage.

But he had not yet done.

He next turned his attention to the horse and harness, and effected almost as great a change in these.

The object of all these proceedings must be obvious to the reader.

It was to destroy all clue as to what became of Jack Sheppard, and to prevent any identification of himself with what had taken place.

It must be conceded that the means taken were well calculated to effect the end in view.

At last the carriage and horse were shorn of their disguise, and presented their ordinary and proper appearance.

The vehicle was drawn into its proper position in the lane.

Then the driver took off the long white duffel coat, with its innumerable capes, in which he had been enveloped, and appeared dressed in a suit of dark livery.

His hat he put under the box, from which receptacle he produced another with gold lace round it.

The transformation was complete.

"Are you all ready, Ludwig?" said the chemist.

"Quite ready."

"Drive on, then."

The German chemist once more entered the carriage, while Ludwig, as he had called the driver, drove on.

He continued along the lane in the same direction.

But if any person had observed the equipage enter the lane, and then have seen it emerge, they would never have believed it was the same.

In a little while the carriage reached the Great North Road leading from London.

Along this they proceeded in the direction of the metropolis.

It was beginning to grow dusk.

The events which we have lately described of necessity occupied a great deal of time, and the chemist felt sure that it would be quite dark by the time he reached his own residence in Long Acre.

It now became necessary for him to make some changes in his own attire.

In the first place, he took off his very peculiar-looking conical hat.

He rolled this up into as small a compass as he could, and put it into his pocket.

Then he divested himself of his cloak.

It was a very large one.

He carefully enveloped the body of Jack Sheppard in it.

Not long after he had effected this alteration, the carriage stopped before his own door.

The chemist glanced up and down the street.

It was dark, but yet the hour was not late enough to cause it to be deserted.

Grasping a key in one hand, the chemist took up the body of Jack Sheppard and flung it over his shoulder.

As though the weight had been nothing, the chemist walked from the door of the carriage to the door of his own house.

The driver descended from his seat, closed the carriage door, and reseating himself, drove off.

The chemist thrust the key into the lock of the shop door, and was inside his own house in an instant.

He locked the door behind him.

Then crossing the shop, he entered the room at the back.

Blueskin sprang forward.

His countenance was careworn and anxious.

What anxiety he had suffered during the many hours he had been left alone in the chemist's gloomy habitation, the reader may perhaps be able to imagine.

To him each minute had seemed an hour.

Anxiously he listened to every sound, in the hope that it was the chemist returning.

But the day faded and night came.

What could be the reason of his absence he could not think.

He was worked up to the utmost pitch when he heard the welcome sound which indicated the arrival of the chemist.

"Well," he said, eagerly—"what success?"

"The best!"

The chemist staggered forward with his burden.

Blueskin looked upon it with a strange, shuddering sensation.

"Is—is—that——"

"That's it," said the chemist.

As he spoke, he placed the body in an arm-chair.

Blueskin felt as though changed to stone.

He could not move or speak.

"We must have a light before we can do any good," said the German chemist, in the same matter-of-fact, unconcerned tone which he would have made use of had he been talking about some ordinary every-day affair—"we must have a light."

He glided across the dark room, and ignited a large swinging lamp which hung from the ceiling.

The light was dim at first, but it soon became brilliant enough to illuminate every corner of the room.

With a kind of fascination, Blueskin's eyes were fixed upon the body of Jack Sheppard.

It was but little that he could see, however, for the cloak was wrapped entirely round it.

Still the outlines could be traced, and it was easy to imagine the rest.

With a coolness and ease which presented a very remarkable contrast to Blueskin's manner, the chemist approached the chair.

He turned back the cloak, and then the body was disclosed seated in the chair in a huddled-up posture.

Blueskin shuddered again, and averted his eyes in horror.

The countenance was horribly distorted and discoloured. It was, in fact, a dusky black, while the tongue, swollen to thrice its usual size, protruded from the purple lips.

And the eyes!

! Their expression was too terrible for us to describe.

With a great effort Blueskin mastered his emotions.

In a broken voice he said:

"And is this Jack?—is this what they have made of him?"

"It is!"

"Is there any hope?"

"Of his recovery?"

"Yes."

"I think I may with safety say there is; but I must be speedy, though!"

As he spoke, the German chemist rang a bell.

A young, pale-faced man, and evidently a countryman of his own, obeyed the summons.

Blueskin started, for he had been under the impression that he had the house all to himself.

The chemist addressed this young man in German.

"Is the warm bath ready, Karl?"

"Quite, sir; it has been waiting for some time."

"Very good. And all the other preparations are made?"

"All, sir."

"Carry the patient with you, and place him in the bath. Keep him in ten minutes, then come to me and let me know the result."

The young man did not attempt to carry Jack, but, in quite as unconcerned a manner as his master, went to the chair and wheeled it out of the room.

The door closed behind him.

"And you think there is a chance of his being restored to life?"

"I do."

"I trust I shall not be disappointed."

"I would not build too much upon the hope, then, for these are but doubtful affairs at the best. Still, I have succeeded when there has been less chance of doing so than on the present occasion."

"Then there is some consolation to be derived from that?"

"Yes."

"And now that you have put me at ease upon this point, allay my curiosity by informing me how it was you managed to gain possession of the body."

"I see no reason why I should keep that information from you."

"Pray tell me, then! I am chiefly anxious to know how you dealt with Jonathan Wild."

"It so happened, then, that I had no trouble with him, for as soon as ever the execution was over he seemed anxious to get back to London. He waited to see the body cut down and put into the cart, and then he hurried away."

"That was fortunate for you."

"Very!"

The German chemist then gave a brief account of all that he had done.

We need not repeat his words, because the reader is already acquainted with the substance of what he said.

Blueskin was filled with admiration when his strange companion fully unfolded the details of the clever scheme he had so quickly elaborated, and which had been crowned with such unequivocal success.

Just as he had finished, there came a faint tap-tap at the door.

"Enter!" said the chemist, in German.

The pale-faced assistant made his appearance.

"The patient has been ten minutes in the warm bath," he said.

"And the result—is it favourable?"

The assistant shook his head.

"My presence is needed!"

Then, turning to Blueskin, the chemist said:

"Will you remain here? You can accompany me if you like, or stay here, just as you please."

"I will accompany you, then."

"It will not be a pleasant sight."

"I know that, but while I am with you, observing all that is going on, I shall not feel so much suspense."

"Come, then, for every moment is of value."

The assistant held open the door to allow Blueskin and his master to pass.

Our old friend looked about him with the greatest curiosity, and yet he felt more like a man in a dream than aught else.

He could scarcely bring himself to believe in the reality of what was going forward.

So continuous had been the succession of events that he had been unable to recover from the first shock which the intelligence caused him.

And now, as he followed that strange being, the German chemist, along a dimly-lighted passage, he found himself asking the question, "Can all this be real?"

Well might he ask such a question under such circumstances, and with two such extraordinary beings as the German chemist and his assistant in company with him.

All seemed unreal.

The passage seemed to lead in the direction of the back of the premises.

At length a door was pushed open.

Blueskin crossed the threshold quickly, for he was impatient to see what was beyond.

It was a large, well-lighted chamber.

The atmosphere in it seemed loaded with oppressive odours, which had at first an almost overpowering effect upon anyone who entered.

Blueskin was susceptible to its influence, but the curiosity he felt with respect to the fate of Jack Sheppard so absorbed him that he quickly forgot all about it.

His state was critical in the extreme.

The German chemist had expressed a certain amount of confidence in the result, but then he might be deceived.

At any rate, it was doubtful whether Jack Sheppard would or would not recover.

CHAPTER CCCCLVII.

THE EXPERIMENTS OF THE GERMAN CHEMIST ARE CROWNED WITH A SUCCESSFUL TERMINATION.

THE chamber which Blueskin entered was fitted up as a laboratory.

Apparatus of every conceivable description was piled up on all sides—things which Blueskin had never seen before, and the use of which he could not conjecture.

Upon these curious articles, however, he bestowed much less attention than he would have done upon almost any other occasion.

The one subject which occupied his mind, to the exclusion of all others, was the fate of Jack Sheppard.

He had to make use of some caution in following the German chemist through the maze of crucibles and alembics with which the chamber was strewn.

His strange guide led the way to the furthest extremity of the room.

Upon approaching it, Blueskin saw a large bath, almost as large as an Egyptian sarcophagus.

Underneath this was a fire, upon an iron grating. The coals were spread evenly upon it, and the grating was so constructed that it could be raised or lowered at pleasure.

By this means the amount of heat could be regulated to a nicety.

It was with a strange, undefinable sensation that Blueskin followed the German chemist to the side of this bath.

He did so, and looked in.

The bath was about three parts filled with water.

At the upper end there was a large thermometer, the base of which was immersed in the water.

The chemist gave one glance at Jack Sheppard, and then went towards this instrument, in order to ascertain the precise temperature which the water had reached.

As may be readily supposed, Blueskin's chief attention was given to his comrade.

Jack lay upon his back in the bath.

There were no more signs of life about him than there were at first.

The only difference was that the features were not quite so discoloured and distorted.

Having noted the precise temperature of the water, the chemist took from his assistant, who had held it in readiness, a peculiar-looking tube.

It was made of wood, and was in shape more like a conch shell than ought else.

The larger end of this instrument the chemist carefully placed just over Jack's heart.

Then, holding up his hand for silence, the chemist placed the small end to his ear and listened.

That was an anxious moment to Blueskin.

The chemist listened for a long, long time.

Blueskin noticed that his eyes were all the while turned in one direction.

He looked to see what it was at which the chemist was gazing.

He saw that it was a clock, the face of which was let into the wall.

This Blueskin had not noticed until now.

Having listened for a certain time, the chemist raised his head.

"What is the result?" Blueskin asked.

"There is no pulsation at the heart as yet."

"But will there be?"

"I hope so, though there are no signs at present. This instrument is a sound magnifier, and by the aid of it I could distinguish the feeblest fluttering about the organ of life."

He made a sign to his assistant while he spoke.

"The temperature must be raised at least ten degrees," he said. "We shall see what results that will produce."

The assistant, by the aid of some simple mechanism, raised the grating upon which the burning coals were laid until it was only about six inches from the bottom of the bath.

All fixed their eyes upon the thermometer.

We have said it was on a large scale, and no doubt it registered the heat with great precision.

The tube containing the mercury was of great thickness, and the mercury itself was coloured red.

By this means, its rise in the tube could be more readily distinguished.

The tube was placed upon a piece of bright polished metal, upon which the degrees were marked.

Each degree was divided and subdivided into quarters.

The mercury rose in the tube with rapidity.

"A little lower," said the chemist, "or the heat will be raised above the ten degrees."

The assistant lowered the grating in an instant, and the rapid ascent of the mercury was checked.

At last, the required point of temperature was reached.

The water was kept at this heat for several minutes.

Then the chemist took the tube and listened again.

This time, Blueskin watched him with greater anxiousness than before.

But the inscrutable face of the German chemist afforded no index as to the state of affairs.

At length he raised his head.

This time, Blueskin was too much affected to speak.

"There is no pulsation!" said the chemist, slowly.

"Consequently, no hope!"

"I do not say that!" he answered, quickly—"I have succeeded in far more desperate cases than this. I always make use of the mildest remedies first."

"And they have failed!"

"The bath has—at least, I can raise the temperature five degrees; let us try that!" he added to his assistant.

The grating was slightly elevated.

"I dare not raise the temperature beyond that point, or it will scald him."

This seemed a desperate remedy.

At least, Blueskin thought so, and wondered to himself what others the chemist practised.

The required point was reached.

The chemist listened again.

Then raised his head.

"This is no good!" he said—"I must resort to more powerful means at once, or we shall fail altogether!"

"No—no!"

"I fear so! Such a warmth as that ought to have restored animation!"

Blueskin wrung his hands.

The German chemist turned to his assistant.

"Where is the other apparatus?"

"All is in readiness."

"That is well! Lift him from the bath, wrap him in a blanket, and lay him at full length upon the dissecting-table!"

The assistant set about obeying his instructions.

"The dissecting-table?" said Blueskin. "Surely you—"

"No—no! Be under no apprehension! I ought, however, to tell you that, if the means I am about to try should fail, there will be an end to all hope!"

"But it will succeed?"

"I hope so!"

"Only hope?"

"I cannot say more. I was of opinion that the hot bath would be sufficient, and that there would be no need for me to resort to such means as I am now about to try."

At this moment, the assistant carried the body of Jack Sheppard, wrapped in blankets, and placed it upon a long stone-topped table in the laboratory, which was used for the purpose of making experiments in dissection.

The German chemist followed his attendant.

The body was quickly placed at full length upon the table.

With a choking sensation in his throat, Blueskin gazed upon the remains of the youth for whom he had felt so strong an affection.

The German chemist was as cool and collected now as he was at the first, although he knew that everything depended upon this second experiment.

Blueskin trembled and shook like a leaf in a storm.

The pale-faced assistant, too, seemed to look upon all the proceedings as a matter of business.

Still, though he was so calm and quiet, he was deeply interested in all that was going forward, for he had been too long in his present situation not to feel the greatest possible interest in the success of all chemical experiments.

Blueskin forgot that the two men by the side of whom he stood were used to handling the human body after death.

With what suspenseful eagerness Blueskin watched all the rest of the chemist's movements the reader will be able to imagine.

He could not understand all that was done.

Both the chemist and his assistant were for several moments busily engaged in moving and placing various articles.

One of these was so singular in its appearance as to attract a great deal of Blueskin's attention.

It was a large glass cylinder, supported on two upright pieces of wood, and furnished with a handle, by means of which the cylinder could be made to revolve with great rapidity.

Blueskin had never seen anything resembling it in his life before, and therefore could not tell that it was an electrical machine.

At the time of which we write, electricity had not reached the perfection it now has. Then it was in its infancy.

Electrical machines were scarcely known even to the votaries of the science.

It is, however, a fact that about the period at which the action of our tale takes place, the Germans paid particular attention to this attractive science.

As a matter of course, this application had the effect of causing them to make many discoveries in advance of others.

For the German chemist electricity had a remarkable fascination.

He made some experiments with it which had produced some surprising results; but, like many other discoverers of important secrets, he kept his knowledge to himself, and made use of it for his own purposes.

He placed his apparatus all in order, and then, when all things were in readiness, he set his attendant to turn the handle.

The cylinder soon revolved with great velocity.

Blueskin thought he observed everything narrowly, but he grew confused until he saw the German chemist with something in his hand which looked like a piece of thick brass wire.

With this he touched Jack Sheppard.

A sudden contraction of the whole body was the result, and then, with an unearthly yell upon his lips, Jack Sheppard sprang up to a sitting posture.

Although prepared for his restoration to life, Blueskin did not think it would take place in so startling and horrible a manner.

Without exactly thinking anything about it, he had fancied that the return to life would be gradual.

As it was, it was as sudden as its extinction.

"That is over!" said the chemist, as he dropped the piece of brass wire.

The assistant ceased turning the handle.

The cry which came from Jack Sheppard's lips was such a one as had never assailed Blueskin's ears before, and such as he fondly hoped would never assail them again.

Immediately after uttering this cry, Jack Sheppard fell backwards on the stone slab, as though entirely bereft of life.

So suddenly did this happen, and so soon was it over, that Blueskin could almost have fancied it was imagination merely, and that the body which was now so still had never moved.

The ejaculation of the chemist was one of great satisfaction, for towards the last he had grown very doubtful about the issue of his experiment.

Blueskin turned towards him.

"What—what was that?" he said.

His very lips were white as he asked the question.

"I have succeeded!"

"Is it possible?"

"It is true."

"And that cry?"

"Was his return to life."

"And he is really alive once more?"

"As much as you yourself are."

Blueskin wept like a child.

"He is in a kind of swoon now," said the chemist; "but from that I can recover him, and the rest of my task will be easy."

He turned to his assistant, and added:

"Remove the apparatus, and carry him again to the bath."

This was done.

In a state of perfect insensibility Jack Sheppard was replaced in the bath.

Its temperature had now much diminished, and the chemist gave instructions for it to be gradually raised.

More fuel was placed upon the grating, and the water soon acquired an augmented heat.

At the expiration of about ten minutes a gentle sigh came from Jack Sheppard's lips.

He opened his eyes then, and gazed wonderingly about him.

"Is this death?" he said.

The voice in which he spoke was a hollow murmur.

CHAPTER CCCCXVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD IS ONCE MORE RESTORED TO LIFE AND ANIMATION.

"AM I dead?" asked Jack Sheppard, as his eyes rolled wonderingly over the strange objects by which he was surrounded.

"You are not dead," said the German chemist, advancing, and at the same time motioning for Blueskin to keep out of Jack Sheppard's sight, lest the sudden and unexpected recognition should be too much for him.

"You are not dead?"

"Is this a dream?"

"Yes, if you like to think so. Above all things, keep still. Do not move, and it will be better if you do not speak."

Jack Sheppard closed his eyes and became perfectly still.

It was evident that he was endeavouring to recollect what had happened last.

The German chemist whispered to Blueskin:

"It will be better for you to keep out of his sight for a moment or so. The sudden sight of you may prove too much for him."

Blueskin obeyed.

A shudder swept over Jack's frame, and then he opened his eyes.

A wild, scared look was on his face.

"I—I—I have been—"

"Never mind that just at present," said the German chemist, with quiet firmness. "I require the whole of your attention. We will talk about all other matters presently."

Jack's mind was in as feeble a state as his body, and he suffered himself to be ruled without opposition.

By the assistance of the German chemist and the young man he was lifted from the bath, rolled up in blankets, and carried to a bed-room.

Here every preparation had been made.

Wrapped in the blankets just as he was, Jack Sheppard was placed in the bed.

The German chemist again addressed him.

"Speak," he said, "and, as you value your life, speak truthfully. Do you feel inclined to sleep?"

"I do—I do! My eyelids seem like lead!"

"Give way to the feeling, then, as much as you can. When you wake up it will be time for you to think."

The last words reached Jack's ears in an indistinct manner.

In another moment he was sound asleep.

"You will watch him, Carl," said the chemist to his assistant.

"I will."

"And should there be cause, you will summon me."

"Yes, sir."

The chemist went towards the door.

On the threshold stood Blueskin, his countenance wearing a mingled expression of hope and fear.

The chemist placed his finger on his lip, and then beckoned to Blueskin to enter.

His gesture was willingly obeyed.

"He sleeps," said the chemist, in a whisper. "Look at him, but speak not."

He led Blueskin to the side of the bed.

It could be seen at a glance that Jack was sleeping calmly and quietly.

Blueskin gazed upon him with moistened eyes.

He could scarcely believe his old comrade was restored to him.

Doubtless he would have stood gazing for a considerable length of time, but the chemist drew him gently away.

They descended the stairs and entered the room at the back of the shop.

From a small cupboard the chemist produced some choice spirits, and desired Blueskin to drink.

Our old friend was nothing loth, for what he had gone through was almost too much for him.

"You see I have been successful," said the chemist, after a pause.

"You have, and my heart is once more at ease. What will be Wild's feelings when he finds he has, after all, been balked of his revenge!"

"Were I in your place, I should carefully keep all such knowledge from him. That, however, remains for you and your comrade to consider."

"Yes, yes!"

"By to-morrow I fancy there will not be much the matter with him."

"Will he recover so soon?"

"I think so."

[JACK SHEPPARD ATTENDS HIS OWN FUNERAL.]

"You take a load off my heart."

"If you will take my advice, you will put off till to-morrow any further consultation. You will be calmer and better, and by the look of your eyes I can tell you are sadly in need of rest."

"I am—I am! It is a long time since I had any sleep."

"Go, then—go at once! You can sleep in peace. You have nothing whatever to fear from your foes."

"I believe you, and I trust you."

"You will not be betrayed."

"I feel convinced of that."

The old chemist rang a bell, and bade the servant who appeared in answer to the summons to show Blueskin to a bed-room.

As he had said, a long time had elapsed since Blueskin had taken any rest, and he felt the want of sleep severely.

No. 94.—BLUESKIN.

He had every confidence in the old chemist's good faith, and he threw himself down upon the bed with a feeling of comfort which he had for a long time been a stranger to.

But ere he closed his eyes in slumber, although he was so very, very weary, his thoughts reverted to Edgworth Bess and her new-found friend Ned Cantle.

He wondered in what circumstances they were placed. Upon this point he could, of course, come to no conclusion whatever.

But had he given himself up to the wildest speculations, he would never have made any approach to the truth.

As soon as we can, it is our intention to return to the heroine of our story, and relate how her evil fortune followed her across the ocean to a foreign land.

For the present, however, we would wish to devote our attention to Jack Sheppard.

It was late the next morning when Blueskin awoke, and although he had slumbered so many hours, yet it seemed to him as though he had only just closed his eyes and opened them again.

His first inquiry was concerning Jack Sheppard.

"He has recovered more rapidly than I could possibly have imagined," replied the chemist. "He has just woke up. In a little while you shall see him. Remain here while I go and visit him. I have here in this bottle a cordial of most rare virtues; it is, indeed, the essence of life itself—the true elixir vite. You shall see the wonderful effects that will follow its administration."

So saying the chemist left the room, after having first invited Blueskin to partake of the breakfast that was spread upon the table.

He was absent for some time.

As soon as he returned Blueskin started to his feet.

The chemist, with a smile, motioned to him to reseal himself.

"He is asleep again," he said, "and must not be disturbed. This sleep is doing him more good than all the drugs in the world possibly could. When he wakes we shall see a wonderful improvement."

Many hours passed—long hours they seemed to Blueskin, who sat watching and waiting in that gloomy little room behind the shop.

Towards afternoon Blueskin was startled by hearing the door open.

He turned round quickly, and then uttered a cry.

It was Jack Sheppard who had entered.

Blueskin, as soon as he recovered from his surprise, sprang from his chair and grasped him by the hand.

Jack was ghastly pale.

He seemed weak and feeble, too, and it was but a faint smile that came to his lips.

Round his neck was an ominous dark mark.

The mark where the hangman's rope had been.

"Thank heaven!" said Blueskin, "you are once more restored to life, and the villainous thief-taker is defeated!"

"Thank you, my faithful friend," said Jack, sinking into a chair. "Had it not been for your aid I should by this time have been with the dead! But first of all—speak—tell me—where is Edgworth Bess?"

"All in good time, Jack! I have much to tell you!"

"And I the same; but tell me about her first, and then you can tell all other events in their natural order."

Blueskin felt that it would be wisest for him to indulge Jack in this wish.

The consequences of too much anxiety or suspense would probably be very serious.

Accordingly, as briefly as he could, he explained the circumstance of his apparent desertion of him (Jack), and removed from his mind any doubts that might have lingered there concerning it.

This done, he proceeded to relate the whole of their adventures on the river and the ocean, up to the point where we left them in Amsterdam.

"Then she is there still?" said Jack.

"Yes; and Ned Cantle is with her to shield her from all harm!"

"That takes a heavy load off my mind, Blueskin. And now as to yourself, and what happened to you after your arrival in London. How came I here? Who are those strange men?"

"I will tell you all, Jack, from first to last, and then you will fully understand everything."

"It will be the best."

Blueskin then related all those strange circumstances which have already been placed at full length before the reader.

"Wonderful!" said Jack, when he had finished. "And I have been so close to death?"

"You have indeed!"

"I shall always shudder now when I think upon the past!"

"Pho—pho! the keenness of the recollection will, of course, wear off in time."

"I fear not!"

"Do not talk about that."

"But I cannot banish it from my thoughts!"

"You must try."

"But the awful moment when the cart was drawn from under my feet is ever before me! It was terrible! But how is it that life was not extinguished?"

"I cannot tell."

"I ask, because I remember now what Jack Ketch said to me!"

"Said to you?"

"Yes; he told me I should die hard! That I was not heavy enough to draw the rope sufficiently tight around my neck to strangle me!"

"Horrible! Did he say that to you?"

"Yes; and more!"

"What?"

"He said, as I should die so hard, he would hold on by my legs, and so put me out of my misery!"

It was Blueskin's turn to shudder now.

"I thought of his words when I felt the cart moving. Oh, the agony of that moment! I tried with all my might to cling to the cart with my feet to stop the slow but sure progress of the vehicle!"

"Do not think of it."

"There is not much more to tell you. Although I made these unavailing efforts to keep the cart from sliding away from under me, I still recollected the hangman's words. I made up my mind not to struggle!"

"Not to struggle?"

"No; but to remain perfectly still, for then I thought I should miss the little attentions which he had promised to pay me!"

"I see."

"Accordingly I made the effort. But when I descended with that fearful jerk I forgot my resolution. It seemed as though my head had been torn off! I struggled furiously. But, even in that awful moment, I recollected my intention! I strove to keep still! I strove to stiffen my limbs! I succeeded—I am sure that I succeeded—but after I had done so I became unconscious of everything!"

"It is an awful thing to talk about!"

"It is; and still more awful to endure!"

"Right! After ceasing your struggles, do you recollect anything?"

"Nothing except a sharp pain which shot through me with the swiftness of a lightning's flash. I cried out, and started up."

"And what then?"

"I recollect nothing until I awoke in the bath."

"And the rest you can remember?"

"Oh, yes."

At this moment there came a faint tap-tap at the door.

"Who is there?" asked Blueskin.

There was no reply, but the door was slowly opened.

The German chemist entered, and closed the door behind him.

When he looked round, our two friends saw that there was an anxious, uneasy expression upon his countenance, as though something amiss had happened.

CHAPTER CCCCXLIX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SWEAR TO BE REVENGED UPON JONATHAN WILD.

BORN Blueskin and Jack Sheppard turned round and gazed inquiringly into the countenance of the German chemist.

"You have bad news," they said.

"Not particularly bad," was the reply.

"What is it, then?"

"Why, I find my little adventure with the sheriff has raised quite a commotion. They thought at first he was mad, but it was soon found that the order which he had written had been made use of, and that the body had been carried off, no one knows where."

"Indeed! Then I guess your fear, and the cause of your uneasiness."

"What is it?"

"Your fear that suspicion will be raised as to what has become of the body."

"Right!"

"What is to be done?"

"That, I think, we had better consider about."

"With all my heart!"

"In the first place, then," said the German chemist, "I ought to tell you that the popular impression is that Jack's body has been claimed by some of his friends for private interment. Consequently a look-out is being kept upon all the grave-yards."

"That is very awkward."

"Very, indeed, for, you see, if he is not buried, great curiosity will be felt upon the matter, and the subject would keep alive for some time, as such ruptures always do!"

"What is to be done?"

"What can you propose?"

"I don't know."

"We can't bury him."

"I should strongly object to such a proceeding," said Jack.

"Of course you would."

"But if Jack is not buried," said Blueskin, "you think the whole affair will become the town's talk?"

"Yes; an inquiry would undoubtedly be set on foot, and that inquiry might result in a discovery of the resuscitation."

"I had not thought of this difficulty."

"Nor had I taken it into my calculations. In fact, I should not have thought about it at all had not circumstances pressed it upon me."

"It is very serious, and at the same time it is very fortunate that you should have acquired the intelligence."

The chemist smiled.

"That is true, and I had the information from a sure source."

"But," said Jack, "what will be the best thing for me to do?"

"I cannot tell."

"Shall I escape at once?"

"Perhaps that would be best."

"I don't think so," said Blueskin.

"But what else can be done?"

"I don't know. Something better than that."

The chemist reflected for an instant.

"It seems to me," he said, "that the best thing would be to bury Jack Sheppard."

"Unquestionably, only the worst of it is such a thing is impossible."

"I don't know that."

"Do you mean it would be the best plan to cause the impression to be felt that Jack was buried?"

"I do."

"Then you would have a mock funeral?"

"There could be nothing better."

"The only objection I can see is as to how such a thing could be managed?"

"Do you mean," said Jack Sheppard, "that you would bury some one else, and make the people believe it was me?"

"Well, not exactly that," returned the German chemist.

"I apprehend an empty coffin would answer the purpose quite as well as a full one."

"Of course it would!"

"You must see at once that if we could only induce the people to believe that Jack Sheppard was buried, there would be an end of all trouble."

"And I should be much safer from detection!" said Jack.

"Certainly you would."

"It's an object well worth striving for, and I hope it will be accomplished."

"So do I; and if we set our wits to work, I can't help thinking that we must succeed."

"We have been successful so far!" said Blueskin, "and in comparison with what we have done, this seems a very simple affair."

"It does, and yet its simplicity makes it difficult!" said the chemist.

"How so?"

"Why, we must contrive the mock funeral in such a manner, that there must be no doubt raised as to the fact that it is Jack Sheppard who is buried."

"I confess I can't see my way very clear at present. If we can get over this, the rest will be easy enough."

"It appears to me," said Jack, after a long pause, "that it could be done in this manner."

"How, how?"

"In the first place, can you procure an empty coffin?"

"Oh, yes! I've got one in the house."

"Eh?"

"I've got one in the house!"

"That's rather a strange article of furniture, is it not?"

"Well, one might consider it so!" said the chemist, coolly, "but the fact is, I have generally one or two by me."

"For such purposes as the present?"

"Oh, no, I never thought of a mock burial before! I keep them for my subjects after I have dissected them."

"Oh, yes, I understand!" said Jack, with a shudder.

He could not help thinking what a narrow escape he had had from some doctor's scalpel.

"Don't let that trouble you, then!" added the chemist.

"I can provide a coffin. And now tell us what you were going to propose?"

"Nothing more than this. What is there to prevent all three of us going to the nearest church, and represent ourselves as the surviving relations and friends of the deceased Jack Sheppard?"

"All three?"

"Yes! Why not? What I propose is practical, is it not?"

"Quite so!"

"Very well! Let us go to the vicar with the coffin, and ask him to bury it."

"He would refuse!"

"You don't know; and if he did he would be sure to speak of the application, and then the people would be impressed with the idea that I am dead."

"You are quite right Jack," said the chemist.

"That is what we want to do, is it not?"

"Yes, if we can only make the people believe you are dead all will be well."

"Then let us pay a visit to some parsonage at once. You don't know—we might succeed in getting him to bury the coffin!"

"We might! But do you still think of going yourself?"

"Yes! Why shouldn't I?"

"But are you strong enough?"

"Yes—quite!"

"But, Jack!" said Blueskin, "don't you think you will be running a very great, and very unnecessary risk?"

"No. Not any more than I shall be obliged to run! I can disguise myself, and on such an errand as that, who would think of looking for me?"

"Well, no one, I should think, without they raised the lid of the coffin, and looked inside!"

"Very well, then! I think that settles the matter at once, and I shall do what very few people have ever done."

"What is that?"

"Attend my own funeral!"

"It is a strange idea, Jack, but you were always full of them."

"I think it is a very good one," said the chemist. "I can furnish him with a disguise, and I really do think that we cannot do better than try to carry out his plan."

"I am agreed, then," said Blueskin, to whom these last words had been addressed.

"The matter is settled, then?"

"Yes, quite."

"I am glad of that."

"No doubt. I will go now and make the necessary arrangements. In the meantime, you can converse at your ease."

With these words the chemist left the apartment.

"This is a strange whim of yours, Jack," said Blueskin.

"It is, I own, but I shall have to leave this house some time or other, and what better opportunity could be afforded than the present?"

"Perhaps none."

"There could be none better, and, as I said before, the risk will be trifling to a degree, for who would dream that I should set out upon such an errand?"

"No one at all, and I fancy yours is the only mind that such an idea could ever have entered into."

Jack smiled.

"I want now," he said, "as we shall have a few moments to ourselves, to talk of the subject which is nearest my heart."

"What about it, Jack?"

"Well, when I leave this house, of course, I should never think of returning to it."

"What would you do?—where would you go?"

"That is just what I want to talk about."

"But do you think you are strong enough to bear any exertion?"

"With such an object as I have in view, I could endure any amount."

"You must not rely too much upon your strength yet, Jack. You may fancy yourself stronger than you are."

"No—no."

"Tell me, then, what you want to do. I could hazard a guess."

"No doubt a correct one. I propose that as soon as we have settled matters with the chemist, we make immediate preparations to leave England."

"I consent to that."

"So far, then, all is well. Of course you understand that we make our way at once to that place where you say Edgworth Bess is to be found?"

"Certainly!"

"Then, when we are all united, we can hold a full and proper consultation as to what had best be done for the future."

"With all my heart! And Jonathan Wild?"

"I shall not forget him, you may feel assured of that!"

A malignant look came over Jack's face.

"I feel sure you will not forget him, nor shall I."

"I prophesied many a time that I should live to see the last of him, and I feel sure of it now!"

"We will yet make him regret what he has done."

"We will, Blueskin. Give me your hand."

"Here it is! What do you want?"

Jack Sheppard grasped the hand that was stretched out to him.

"I want you to take an oath!"

"To what?"

"That, when we have seen Edgworth Bess righted, you will join with me, body and soul, and use all your efforts towards the accomplishment of one object!"

"And that object—?"

"The overthrow of Jonathan Wild! I want you to swear that you will aid me to have my revenge upon him!"

"I swear that willingly! I intended to be revenged myself!"

"Then we shall both be working to one end."

"We shall. And what shall be your revenge?"

"To put the officers of justice on his track—to hunt him down ourselves, and never rest until—"

"Until when?"

"Until his body swings from one of the cross-beams of Tyburn Tree!"

"You could not have devised a more suitable revenge! If I could see him hang at Tyburn, I should feel that we were quits."

"And I, too, then! I should be even with him for what he has made me suffer. It would be retribution, indeed, to bring him to that gallows to which he has been the means of bringing so many innocent persons!"

"When we have righted the poor heiress—"

"Then, Blueskin, we will live for one object, and one object alone, and that is—the destruction of Jonathan Wild! We will never pause or tire until we have succeeded in bringing him to Tyburn!"

"Jack Sheppard—I swear to devote myself, body and soul, to the accomplishment of this purpose—the destruction of Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER CCCCL.

JACK SHEPPARD ATTENDS HIS OWN FUNERAL IN SAINT MARTIN'S CHURCHYARD.

THERE could be little doubt that the vow thus made would be faithfully kept.

We shall see, however, in the progress of the tale, what kind of success attended their efforts.

Before they had time to utter another syllable, the door was opened, and the German chemist made his appearance.

"What success?"

"All is ready."

"Is it late enough to start?"

"Quite, I think."

"And my disguise?" said Jack.

"It is here."

The chemist as he spoke handed to Jack Sheppard a long and ample cloak, and a steeple-crowned hat.

"Wrap the cloak closely around you," he said, "and draw the hat down tightly over your brows, and you will be well enough disguised to escape recognition."

The cloak was one that had been long out of fashion. Still it would not make the wearer look conspicuous.

It completely enveloped Jack Sheppard's form, and effectually precluded all possibility of anyone succeeding in recognising his person.

Then the hat was one with a very broad brim, and this had the effect of casting a shadow over his countenance.

"You will do, Jack," said Blueskin. "I should not be afraid of anyone recognising you now—that is, of course, provided they had no suspicion of your being alive."

"And if they had," said the chemist, "it would be difficult—very difficult."

"Do you think so?"

"I do, and I will tell you why. Jack is disguised without appearing to be so."

"So he is."

"And people would imagine he would be careful to make himself look as different as possible. Now, they would never dream he would go out with a cloak and hat on as an ordinary individual would."

"You are right," said Blueskin; "and when I want to disguise myself again I shall bear in mind what you have just said."

"The hint may prove of value."

"I am sure it will."

"Did you say all was ready?" asked Jack.

"Yes."

"And I am waiting. Don't you think we had better start at once?"

"Decidedly."

The chemist led the way to the private door at the side of the shop.

Opposite this a carriage was drawn up.

It was the same one that had been used on a former occasion, and Ludwig was seated on the box.

"Cross over quickly and seat yourselves," said the chemist, "and yet do so in a manner that will betray neither hurry nor confusion."

Our friends obeyed.

In another instant all were seated, and Ludwig set the carriage in motion.

The vehicle contained, besides its living inmates, a coffin.

This ghastly object was rendered still more ghastly by being enveloped in a black cloth.

"What church have you made your mind up to go to?"

"St. Martin's."

"In St. Martin's Lane?"

"Yes."

"That is very close."

"I know that."

"Why do you choose that?"

"Because I know by repute that the rector is a charitable, kind man, and one who would be likely to perform such a service as that which we are now about to ask of him."

"Then let us make the attempt by all means."

"If we fail we can but go elsewhere."

"True."

The distance from the chemist's shop in Long Acre to St. Martin's church was very short.

At that time, the residence of the rector was near the church.

"Who will make the application to him?" said Jack.

"I will," said the chemist.

"I shall never be able to pay you for all that you have done in my behalf!"

"We will speak of that presently. Here we are."

The carriage stopped.

The old chemist alighted, and went towards the house.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard kept themselves well back in the carriage, so as to avoid as much as possible the notice of any casual passers-by.

But the hour was too late for many pedestrians to be abroad.

At the time of which we write, it was not safe to walk about London streets after nightfall.

Let us follow the old chemist.

He ascended the steps leading to the residence, and tapped at the door.

He was an adept at deception of every description was that old chemist.

It seemed to be a part of his nature.

By the contraction of a few muscles, he greatly altered the general appearance of his countenance.

Then with his hands he brought forward his beard and whiskers, so that the quantity of hair upon his face seemed nearly doubled.

In a usual way, he brushed the whiskers flat back; but, now that they were brought forward, the difference it made to his face was really striking.

By the time he had done this, his summons at the door was attended to.

Upon stating his wish to see the rector he was at once desired to enter, and then afterwards was ushered into a plainly-furnished room.

He had scarcely seated himself and considered what he should say, when the door was opened and the rector entered the room.

The chemist rose and made a low salutation, which the minister returned, at the same time desiring his visitor to be seated.

He was a fine, handsome, venerable man was the rector.

He was full of the milk of human kindness.

He had been imposed upon many a time through the goodness of his heart, and now he stood a fair chance of being imposed upon again.

The chemist assumed a doleful, lugubrious expression of countenance.

"Reverend sir," he said, "I come to ask your advice and help upon a very serious matter."

"I shall be glad to assist you to the utmost of my power," said the rector, in a gentle voice.

"Thanks, sir—many thanks!" said the chemist, in a voice which well corresponded with the countenance he had put on. "I have heard that you are always willing to assist those who come to you afflicted in mind and spirit."

"I hope I am," said the rector. "It is my duty."

"But how few there are that perform their duty as you do, reverend sir."

The rector was not insensible to flattery, and so, with a benign smile, he said:

"Go on, my good man, tell me what I can do for you!"

"I will come to the point at once, reverend sir, because, by so doing, I shall trespass less upon your valuable time."

"Proceed, I am all attention."

"Of course, then, reverend sir, you must be aware that a notorious malefactor named John Sheppard was executed at Tyburn yesterday?"

"I have heard of that occurrence."

"It may be, then, reverend sir, that you have also heard that the body of the culprit, after his execution, was obtained by his friends in a surreptitious and underhand manner?"

"I have heard of that too."

"It is about that matter that I wish to speak to you, reverend sir."

"But how can I serve you?"

"I will tell you. I have no doubt you think it was very wrong for anyone to obtain the body in such a manner."

"I am sure of it, for it was a fraud."

"But, reverend sir, when you hear the particulars you may perhaps look upon the act with a lenient eye. You must remember that, bad and evil as this young man was, he had relatives and friends who could not but feel the deepest grief for his awful and untimely fate."

"Of course—of course!"

"They might feel the greatest abhorrence for the crimes of which he had been found guilty; but, at the same time, they would not be able to stifle the love which it was only natural they should feel for him."

"Very true."

"They felt that he deserved his death—they considered that it was forfeited to his country—but they wished that his punishment should end with his death."

"End with his death? I do not understand you!"

"Permit me to explain. They wished to prevent any indignity from being wreaked upon his lifeless remains."

"What indignity do you mean?"

"Being hacked to pieces by the surgeon's knife, or hung up on a gibbet."

"I comprehend now, though I confess at first I did not." "Well, sir, you will be at no loss to understand that his friends would naturally shrink from this."

"Oh yes—yes!"

"And that they would do all they could to save him from such a fate."

"As you say, it would only be natural for them to do so."

"I am glad to obtain such an admission from you, and now I will go further, and tell you that, by adopting a clever scheme, Jack Sheppard's friends obtained possession of his dead body, and so saved it from further desecration."

"I have heard that by fraud they obtained possession of it."

"I grant it was a fraud, but do you not think the means in this case justified the end?"

The rector hesitated, and then said:

"What has all this to do with me? What service is it that you desire me to perform?"

"I am almost afraid to ask it, reverend sir."

"Nay, speak freely!"

"Well, sir, I will. Outside your house there is a hackney-coach. It contains a coffin, in which the body of Jack Sheppard has been placed; and it also contains his two only friends. Can you guess the favour that I came here to ask?"

"I would rather hear your request."

"Then I will be bold to make it."

"Do so!"

"I wish you to perform the burial rites over his body!"

"I cannot!"

"Nay—nay, sir, do not refuse!"

"I regret to do so—believe me I do—but my duty is clear before me. It is more than I dare do! I should call down upon myself the censure of my ecclesiastical superiors!"

"I am sorry to hear that, reverend sir!" said the chemist, humbly—"I hoped—"

"But I dare not do what you require!"

"Then I will press you no further."

"Could I do such a thing, I would most willingly!"

"I will go, then, sir!" said the chemist, preparing to take his departure—"and yet—"

"Yet what?"

"Could you, reverend sir, give me your advice?"

"Upon what point?"

"As I have told you, we have the body in the coach—how can we dispose of it? Will you assist us in this matter?—we wish to give his remains Christian burial!"

"I cannot assist you!"

"But can you tell us what we can do with the body?"

"Bury it!"

"But where, reverend sir?"

The rector was silent.

"I don't know where!" he said, at length.

"Reverend sir—!"

"Well?"

"I am very troublesome! But suppose, now, that we were to carry the coffin into your churchyard, and bury it—you would not interfere with us, would you?"

"I cannot give you my permission!"

"But you will just say nothing about it, will you not, reverend sir? You will not inform anyone of our intention?"

"I will not!"

"Nor cause us to be interrupted?"

"No!"

"Many thanks then, sir, for you have taken a heavy load off my heart! I was sorely troubled to know what to do with the dead body!"

"I know—I know! But, still, I cannot give you my permission! I am not bound to know what you are going to do!"

"I understand you, reverend sir; and I wish I had something more to offer you than mere thanks!"

"I require nothing more," said the rector, meekly.

CHAPTER CCCCLI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD GET ON BOARD THE DUTCH VESSEL OFF GREENWICH.

THE German chemist now hastened to take his departure. He had achieved his object, and wanted to be off.

He had managed things adroitly.

The rector watched him enter the hackney-coach, and then he withdrew.

In a few words the chemist made our friends aware of the success which had attended his efforts.

He directed the coachman to drive round to a certain portion of the wall that then surrounded the graveyard.

It was a dark place that they chose.

The coffin was easily raised by their joint efforts, and placed on the other side of the wall.

The chemist and our two friends scrambled after it.

The hackney-coach lumbered off, and was speedily lost in the darkness.

"All has gone most admirably," said the chemist. "I could never have anticipated such success. All we have now got to do is to bury the coffin with as much speed as possible and be off. After this all the world will believe that Jack Sheppard has ceased to exist."

"Instead of which, he has taken a fresh lease of existence," said Blueskin, in a cheerful tone.

"But how are we to dig a grave? We are not provided with any instruments."

"Never mind! I know where the sexton keeps his tools! Wait a moment, and I will soon get what you require."

With these words the chemist hurried off, and then returned with a spade.

Choosing as retired a portion of the graveyard as they could find, they began their task.

Blueskin took the spade, and worked with right good will, so that in a little while he had made quite a deep excavation.

"I have chosen a portion of the graveyard which can be overlooked by anyone standing at the upper windows in the rector's house," said the chemist, with a chuckle. "He will then see that all is fair and square."

"So he will."

Blueskin still continued at his task.

"Make a deep grave," said the chemist. "It won't do to have the coffin too near the surface."

"Lend me the spade," said Jack Sheppard. "I may as well have a hand in digging my grave. It is not everyone who has the opportunity."

"You must have a light heart to speak jestingly upon such a subject," said the chemist; "but you had better leave your comrade to do the work. Take my advice, and husband your strength as much as you can."

"And so say I," added Blueskin. "I can dig the grave, if you will leave me alone for a little while."

Blueskin resumed his work.

In a very short time the grave was pronounced by the German chemist to be quite deep enough.

Blueskin gladly desisted, and, resting himself on his spade, wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Now, then, to bury myself!" said Jack.

As he spoke, he took hold of the handle at one end of the coffin, while the chemist did the like with the one at the other end.

They then raised it easily, and lowered it into the grave.

It reached the bottom of the grave with a strange rattling sound.

"Dust to dust—ashes to ashes—and all that sort of thing, you know!" said Jack, sprinkling some earth upon the coffin.

"You seem to enjoy the joke," said the chemist.

"I do most heartily enjoy it! I think how deceived Jonathan Wild will be; and when he sees me again it will give him a bit of a turn, I rather think!"

"It will, depend upon it."

"He will think it is my spirit come to haunt him; and if he does, the thought will drive him nearly mad, for he is terribly frightened of ghosts and spirits, and such-like."

"Even that would be a revenge."

"It would."

While speaking, Blueskin began to shovel the earth very quickly into the grave.

His task did not occupy much time, and in a little while the hole was completely filled up.

"And now," said the chemist, "may I ask what is the next step you intend to take?"

"To leave England."

"A wise resolution."

"We have made up our minds to get on board some vessel to-night, if we could."

"The sooner the better; and I would not advise you to come back until the matter has quite blown over."

"We will not, for we have much to do."

"Then with this I think our little transaction terminates."

"It does," said Jack Sheppard; "and I shall ever feel grateful to you for saving me from death!"

"And I, too," said Blueskin. "You have performed your contract—indeed, you have exceeded it! The sum you ask shall be yours, and something more besides. You will find I am liberal."

The eyes of the German chemist sparkled with pleasure.

He was fond of gold, and was not particular what he did to obtain it.

But he did not love money with a miser's love.

On the contrary, that gold which he only obtained by the greatest hazard and risk, he squandered freely in the purchase of different apparatus and chemicals for the prosecution of his experiments.

And so he was glad to hear that Blueskin intended to behave to him with liberality.

"I have no gold, or very little," said Blueskin, "but I have money's worth. All you will have to do will be to take care how you effect the exchange. The articles I took from one of Jonathan Wild's secret hoards."

As he spoke, Blueskin produced the greater portion of the valuables he had with him, and gave them to the German chemist.

They were worth at the very least a thousand pounds.

The chemist was quite overcome by the liberality which was shown him.

"I will do my best at any time to serve you," he said, cringing. "And now, where was it you intended to go?"

"To get on board a boat that would take us to Amsterdam."

"Enter that carriage, then, and instruct the driver where to take you."

"And you?"

"I am close home, and will go there on foot."

"Enough. I am much obliged to you, and I accept your offer with many thanks. I will reward the coachman for his trouble."

"This way, then. I will show you where he is."

Under the guidance of the German chemist, our two friends left the churchyard.

At the corner of one of the numerous courts with which at that time the church of St. Martin was surrounded was the carriage which had brought them there.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard entered the vehicle.

The German chemist closed the door and bade them farewell.

The driver was instructed to make his way to Greenwich.

He turned round, and the horses started off at a rapid pace.

"I think we may safely say," remarked Jack Sheppard, "that we have just bidden farewell to the most extraordinary individual it has ever been our fate to encounter."

"I am sure of it," replied Blueskin; "but we have much to be thankful to him for!"

Jack shuddered slightly as he said:

"Yes, for without him I should now be with the dead."

"You had a narrow escape, Jack! But it's a disagreeable subject, and for the future do not let us refer to it."

"With all my heart! I am quite ready to bury all recollection of it along with the empty coffin."

"Do so, then. We cannot do better than keep the whole affair as secret as we can."

"Yes; and, Blueskin—"

"What?"

"There is—Edgworth Bess—"

"What of her?"

"She—she need know nothing—"

"I would not for the world breathe to her a word of what has occurred! She may perhaps hear of it, but that you cannot help; but I shall never breathe a word about it in her presence."

"Thanks—thanks! I would fain keep from her any such dreadful knowledge."

"Let us drop the subject, Jack. I know for some time to come our thoughts will be recurring to what has happened, but we will not encourage them, and in a little while recollection will grow faint."

"Never with me—never with me!"

"Pho—pho! I tell you it will! What need is there to think of it? Rather consider that you have achieved a triumph over Jonathan Wild."

"A signal one."

"You have, and that hint about playing your own ghost might be advantageously improved upon."

"In what manner?"

"I should like him to suffer mental as well as bodily torment, and who knows what terror and agony he might suffer when he found that your ghost was haunting him?"

"That would be a glorious revenge, if the imposition could be maintained!"

"It would—it would! Jonathan would know what it was to suffer then."

"And now, Blueskin, what shall we do when we reach Greenwich?"

"Why, as soon as we can, we will get on board a vessel bound for Amsterdam."

"Shall we find one there?"

"I should think we should. I mentioned Greenwich because I thought we should not be likely to be so watched, or in such danger of being seen, as at London Bridge."

"Right—right!"

In such-like conversation as this the two friends filled up their time until the carriage reached Greenwich.

By the time they reached their destination, it was just beginning to grow light.

It was a miserably cold winter's morning, and there was little fear that there would be many people about to observe them.

The first thing they did upon their arrival was to dismiss the carriage, after having first given the driver a liberal sum for his trouble.

The two friends then set off in quest of a boat.

But at that early hour no one seemed to be astir.

They went down to the pier, and there, to their joy, they saw a waterman returning with his little vessel.

Our friends hailed him.

They then learned that there was a boat lying at anchor a little way down the river which was bound for the port of Amsterdam.

It would be under weigh at sunrise.

This was not far off, but still the waterman said that he could reach the vessel in time to put them on board.

They accordingly agreed that he should do so.

Fortune appeared to be favouring them, for they felt that they had not been seen in Greenwich by a single individual.

The air was very cold on the water, and our friends shivered.

They were chilled to the bone.

The tide was running out, and so the little skiff in which they sat made good progress down the river.

"There she is!" said the waterman, pointing to a vessel some distance ahead. "She will weigh anchor soon."

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard both directed their eyes towards the vessel in which they were to take passage.

It was a small but lumbering Dutch craft.

This was so much the better, for of course they would have preferred a foreign to an English vessel.

In about two more minutes they were alongside.

Upon hearing that they were passengers to Amsterdam, our friends were at once desired to come on board.

They paid the waterman his fare and did so.

The requisite preliminaries having been gone through, and having learned that the vessel would start in less than a quarter of an hour longer, our two friends went below.

Both were tired and weary, and they looked forward with great pleasure to the prospect of obtaining a few hours' rest.

The sleeping accommodation on board the Dutch vessel was not very comfortable and extensive, but such as it was Jack and Blueskin welcomed it eagerly.

They laid down to rest, and before they closed their eyes a peculiar motion of the vessel let them know that their journey had commenced.

A sensation of security came over them, such as they had not for a long time felt.

For awhile they were out of danger, and with this conviction before their minds, they sank off into a deep slumber.

CHAPTER CCCCLII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD AT LENGTH REACH AMSTERDAM.

BLUESKIN and Jack Sheppard were both utterly exhausted, and in consequence they slept long and heavily.

When they awoke, they made their way up on deck and discovered it was evening.

They were completely out of sight of land.

Around them as far as they could see was nothing but the expanse of waters.

After the oppressive atmosphere below, the air on deck was very delightful.

It braced their nerves, and they looked about them with feelings of calmness and content.

But the progress of the boat was too slow for the impatience of Jack Sheppard.

He was burning to reach Amsterdam, and to be once more in the society of Edgworth Bess.

But many hours would have to elapse before the vessel could reach the shore, and how those hours were to be whiled away he knew not.

He had had sleep enough to last him for some time, and felt too full of energy and life to close his eyes in slumber.

There was but one subject that he could converse upon, and that grew wearisome by repetition.

They paced the deck together until the shades of evening deepened.

On one portion of the deck some of the sailors were assembled.

They were laughing, talking, smoking, and drinking, and altogether they looked as happy and comfortable as human beings possibly could.

In their pacing up and down, Blueskin and Jack passed them several times.

They were talking, and on one occasion our friends paused near them.

One of the sailors was engaged in the favourite occupation of spinning a yarn.

But when Jack and Blueskin paused near them, he stopped, and desired our friends to sit down.

They consented willingly, because by so doing they should pass away the time.

In listening to a yarn, they thought they should be better able to forget their own reflections.

"I was just beginning a yarn to my messmates," said one of the sailors, "and you are just in time to hear it. It's a good yarn, though I say so myself, but you will admit I am right when you have heard it."

"Go on, messmate."

"I am a-going on, if you will let me; but I mean to spin this here yarn in a proper fashion, and if anybody interrupts me, why you'll have to finish the yarn yourselves, for I won't."

"I'll give the first that interrupts you a taste of this marlinspike!"

This seemed sufficient for the sailor, after a few turns of his quid, placed it in his cheek for the present, and spoke as follows:

"Well, messmates all, you must know that once upon a time, when I was a young man, I shipped on board a craft that was bound for the Arctic Regions.

"I didn't care much about the voyage, but I could get nothing better, and I had been a long time without a berth, so I went.

"The first part of the voyage was right enough. The clothes were warm, the rations good, and the grog plenty. There wasn't much work, either, for there was more hands on board than were necessary to work the ship.

"I ought to tell you that we were bound on a regular wild-geese chase, and that was, to discover the North Pole. Some wise-headed land-lubbers said that the North Pole was land, and others said it was water. Of course one of them was bound to be right, and just as likely one as the other; but such an important thing as that must be found out, and so off we went.

"For my part, I could not see what it mattered whether it was one or t'other, but, as I told you at first, all went well, and I found no call to grumble.

"At last we fairly reached the Arctic Regions.

"We stopped at the island of Disco for water and provisions.

"Scarcely, however, had we left this island than our troubles and misfortunes began.

"In the first place, a fog settled upon us. Ah, messmates, you should have seen that fog! I never had any idea of such a thing before.

"However, the fog settled upon us, and grew so dense that you could not see anything without it was within an inch of your nose. If you looked down, you could not see your own body, so you may guess it was no easy job to steer—in fact, the captain knew it, was impossible, so he gave orders for us to cast anchor.

"But this was impossible. The bottom of the ocean was nothing but soft blue clay. The anchor sank into it up to the stock, but it would hold no more than it would hold in water, and we drifted along just the same as ever.

"That was no go, and so away we went before a slight breeze, which seemed to blow the fog upon us instead of dispersing it.

"It was an awful time that. There we could feel the ship in motion, and could not form the least notion of what was ahead.

"We knew we were in Baffin's Bay, but there was not much comfort in knowing that, for I daresay you know Baffin's Bay is as full of icebergs as the Thames is of vessels, and just at the time I speak of they always drift south.

"This was the great trouble, for we could not tell how soon we might come in contact with one of them.

"I s'pose you've never seen an iceberg, messmates? Well, if you haven't, I can't describe one to you. An iceberg is a great mountain of ice and snow, running up into all manner of queer shapes, and as big round some of them as the Isle of Man and the Isle of Wight both rolled into one, and so high in some places that the tops were always in the clouds.

"You may guess, messmates, that these here wouldn't be very nice craft to come yawning down upon you. If you happened to go up against one it would smash the ship just like an egg against a brick wall.

"Well, on went the ship before the wind, and we couldn't hinder her, and the further we went the denser was the fog, and we were every moment expecting to bump up against one of the icebergs I've mentioned, and we all wondered how it was we had escaped so long, for before the fog came on we had seen plenty in the distance.

"Things was in this state when I heard the captain hailing. I found he had just hit upon the notion that the fog was not so dense at the masthead as it was upon deck, for if you looked round you or down, you couldn't see, but if you looked up, you could see the stars twinkling overhead.

"When he made this discovery it gave the captain a new idea, so he ordered me up to the masthead to keep a look-out, 'for,' said he, 'I fancy you will be able to see an iceberg from there.'

"Of course there was no disputing the captain's orders, though at the time I wished he had chosen some one else for the duty, for it was no very agreeable thing to climb up to the masthead when you could not see a bit what you were about.

"Afterwards, however, I had good cause to feel grateful, as you shall hear.

"I hitched up my breeches and turned my quid; then I said 'Ay, ay, sir!' to the captain, and up I went.

"I was an old salt then, and so the fog didn't make very much difference to me in making my way up the rigging.

"I found, however, that the higher I got the less dense the fog became, so it seemed after all as though I should be able to see an iceberg in time to call out to those below to steer clear of it.

"I became conscious, though, that the cold rapidly increased, and the fog seemed to settle down upon you, and turn into hoar frost, so that in a little time I was powdered over with white from head to foot.

"This was very peculiar, and if I had been in those latitudes before I should have known what it meant, but as I hadn't I didn't.

"Up I went, then, and at last reached the masthead.

"Oh, lor! the recollection of that moment quite gives me a turn even now! I wonder how it was I didn't let go my hold, and drop down to the deck again.

"The air was comparatively clear, and the fog little more than a mist, through which near objects could be seen without the slightest difficulty.

"To my horror, then, I saw on the larboard bow a huge iceberg.

"I knew what it was in a moment, and a kind of cry escaped my lips.

"It was bearing down upon us with great rapidity.

"A collision was inevitable—the vessel could not possibly escape.

"About the result of that collision there could be no doubt—the vessel would be dashed to pieces.

"I knew this—it flashed into my mind in a moment.

"From the partial glimpse which I obtained, I fancied the iceberg was of enormous size. That part nearest to me was a long level plain covered with snow, while the higher portions rose up suddenly around it.

"We had drifted on, unconscious of our danger, until it was too late for us to save ourselves.

"I gave myself and everybody else in the vessel up for lost.

"Escape seemed impossible, and I knew that a collision was certain.

"Down into the sea I should go, along with the fragments of ice and the splinters of the ship, and the intense coldness of the water would put an end to life.

"All at once, however, and just as the ship was about to strike, a hope darted into my mind that I might escape.

"Uttering loud cries of alarm, I scrambled along the crossrees until I reached the extremity.

"The iceberg was now alarmingly close.

"The level portion of which I have spoken was a little lower than the crossrees. It was covered with snow, and I thought if I leaped forward with all my might, I should be able to alight upon this level plain.

"The snow that was upon it would break the force of the fall, and I should receive little injury.

"There was no time for reflection. I might say, just as soon as the thought entered my head I jumped.

"At the very moment I left the crossrees the ship struck.

"The sound was one that I shall never forget.

"What happened afterwards I know not. I came down upon the iceberg with great force, and I lay quite still just where I had fallen without the least sense or motion.

"I suppose I shall never know how long I had laid in that state of insensibility! It must have been a long time—several hours at least.

"When I awoke, the first thing I experienced was a sensation of awful cold. I could not stir.

"By an effort, however, I scrambled to my feet.

"I looked about me.

"The heavy fog which had been the cause of so much disaster had quite faded away—there was not so much as a mist even on the surface of the ocean.

"It was morning, and the sun was shining brightly out of a sky in which there was not a cloud to be seen.

"But as yet he was low down on the horizon, and his beams, though bright, did not possess much warmth.

"I thought, of course, about the ship.

"My memory at first was rather confused, and I had some difficulty in recollecting what had occurred.

"Suddenly, however, everything came back to me.

"I rushed to the edge of the iceberg—to that side against which the ship had struck.

"I paused on the very verge.

"I looked down.

"Below me was a precipice as smooth as glass itself.

"Its base was just washed by the waves, which came plashing up against it with a pleasant sound.

"But the ship?"

"Far and wide I looked about me, but not the faintest traces of the gallant vessel could I see.

"She had disappeared as completely as though she had never been.

"For some time I stood motionless, for I was almost stupified with horror.

"My companions were all gone—all dead.

[THE POLICE OFFICERS ATTEMPT TO CAPTURE JONATHAN WILD.]

"I was the only one left out of so many souls—I was the only one.

"For what purpose was I saved?

"Was it in order that I might relate the dreadful story of the vessel's loss, or had I been saved from sudden death to perish by slow degrees?

"I shuddered when I thought of this, and retreated a few paces.

"I began now to think upon my dreadful and singular position, and to wonder what would be my ultimate fate.

"I looked around me, but I was unable to perceive the least signs of land, or of a vessel—nothing met my gaze but the sea, the surface of which was broken up by numberless fragments of floating ice.

"I was alone on an iceberg.

CHAPTER CCCCLIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN ARRIVE TOO LATE AT AMSTERDAM.

"ALONE and on an iceberg! What a singular position for anyone to be placed in! Alone in the centre of an Arctic sea.

"The more I thought upon my position, the more hopeless and despondent did I feel.

"How was I to escape? How was I to preserve my life?

"I was out of the track which vessels generally took—I was on a sea which, from the danger of its navigation, was rarely visited.

"It seemed that I had been saved to perish by that most frightful death, starvation.

"I was completely overcome as I made these reflections.

tions; and so I sat down on the snow and fairly wept. At that moment I felt like a child, and I acted like one.

"I am not one, however, to be easily cast down, and whatever self-reliance I had I now summoned to my assistance.

"I rose up, and resolved to make an examination of the place upon which I had been so strangely cast.

"The level portion of which I have spoken was of considerable extent; but I soon made an examination of it, which convinced me that it possessed no peculiar features.

"This level plain was bounded on three sides by high, jagged pieces of ice, which rose upward in many strange and fanciful shapes.

"The three smooth, slippery sides did not offer the least facilities for an ascent. I made, however, several attempts to reach the higher portions, but I failed every time, and at last I was obliged to give up the attempt in despair.

"The fourth side was open to the sea, so that it was only a portion of the vast expanse of waters of which I could obtain a view.

"I might drift past land or a hundred vessels on the other side, and be none the wiser.

"This made me determine to make some more attempts to reach the higher parts, from which I felt certain a good view could be had.

"I was very, very cold. Fortunately for me, however, the clothing I had on was especially adapted for the climate, but for this I must have perished of cold alone.

"The exercise which I had taken sent a kind of warmth through my frame, and the sun every moment increased in power.

"There was nothing left for me to do but to turn the whole of my attention to climbing upward, but I could not see how the feat was to be performed.

"I went round and round several times trying to find the place that seemed easiest to climb, but all were difficult.

"I was obliged at last to choose the lowest place.

"But this was high up above my head, and was quite out of my reach.

"Still I had hope, for I had sailed in the South Seas, and had seen the Indians there climb up tall trees with trunks as smooth as the ice before me.

"The method they adopted was to cut holes in the trunk with a kind of hatchet or tomahawk.

"Into these holes they placed their hands and feet, and so on until they reached the top.

"I had no axe, it is true, but I had a strong knife, so I took this out of my pocket, and, after a great deal of labour, managed to cut two holes in the ice at a proper height, and at a convenient distance from each other.

"Into the lower hole I put my foot, and into the upper one my hand.

"In this manner I hung, and chipped another hole, into which I placed my foot, and so on until the higher portion of the iceberg was within reach of my hand.

"I took hold of it firmly, and drew myself up without much trouble, and then lay down panting and exhausted.

"But I soon got on my feet again, for I was impatient and anxious to see what was going on around me.

"I looked about.

"I found I could command a much more extensive view than formerly.

"I could see over about three-fourths of the horizon.

"I strained my eyes to the utmost, and looked, in slow succession, over every portion of the expanse spread out before me.

"But I could see nothing more than I could from the platform below.

"There was not a vessel in sight, nor were there any signs of land.

"It was, indeed, foolish of me to think of finding a ship, for I knew well I was in a latitude which vessels rarely reached.

"Turning about, I found that the higher portions of the iceberg still hid a great deal of the horizon from my view.

"But I fancied, from the appearance of the rude blocks of ice around me, that I should be able to scramble over them, and work my way round.

"As soon as I thought about this, I set to work to try whether I could do it.

"The way was very rough, and I had several falls, but none of them were very severe ones.

"I got up on my feet again, and continued on my way.

"At last I got round to that part of the iceberg which was opposite to the side upon which I had alighted when I took my frantic leap from the vessel.

"My hope, however, that from this point I should be able to obtain a glimpse of land was defeated.

"There was nothing but water to be seen.

"Well, messmates, when I made this discovery I can tell you I was almost ready to jump into the sea with despair.

"There I was, in a prison—a strange one, it is true, but yet a prison, and one from which there was no chance of release.

"Still, I had some hope—the iceberg was in motion. A glance up at the sun let me know that it was drifting in a southerly direction.

"If this motion was maintained I should eventually reach the land, or else enter those seas in which vessels are frequently found.

"But in the meantime I might perish either by cold or hunger, for I had neither fire nor food.

"I shivered and shuddered at the thought, and my hopes sunk again.

"A little while afterwards I looked round about me, for the appearance of the iceberg was so singular and so very different to anything I had ever seen before, that I felt as though I could never grow tired of gazing at it.

"Suddenly I perceived a small dark object on a distant projection of the berg.

"Its darkness showed out in remarkable contrast to the masses of snow surrounding it, and made the object much more conspicuous than it otherwise would have been.

"My curiosity was immediately attracted to this dark object, and I resolved to get closer, and so obtain a better view.

"It was a wise resolution to take, for by keeping my body in motion I was better able to withstand the cold.

"I could feel that I was already numbed, and discovered, too, that this part of the iceberg was much colder than the rest, because it had a north-easterly aspect.

"I scrambled along towards the projection on which the dark object rested. Of the object itself, however, I soon lost sight, for it was above me, and the masses of ice hid it from my view.

"I was rather surprised to find a kind of rude path, which seemed to lead up to the projection, and by continuing along it I was able to ascend with much greater ease than I could possibly have anticipated.

"At length I reached the top, and emerged upon a small platform.

"The moment I did so I uttered a cry, and it was a thousand wonders I did not fall headlong backwards down the steep path I had climbed.

"But I recovered my balance, and then, with wide-open mouth and eyes, stood gazing at the dark object.

"I was no longer in doubt as to what it was. It was fully revealed to me—

"The body of a man!

"That was what the dark object was—the body of a man!

"You can guess, messmates, how I should feel after making such a discovery as that. I had thought of it being all manner of things, but I never thought of it being that.

"After a time, I became more like myself, so I approached still nearer.

"Something seemed to tell me from the first that this man was dead, and now I found it was so.

"He was dead, and must have been so very long, though the intense cold had, in a very remarkable manner, preserved him, so that he looked as though he had been dead for a short time only.

"But I had been told how cold would preserve dead bodies, and this was a good instance of it.

"Going closer still, I saw that the man was a countryman of my own, and that he was of the same profession as myself—namely, a sailor.

"This interested me more than ever.

"I was shocked to perceive that the body did not possess a single ounce of flesh.

"There was skin and bone and some of the harder muscles left, but that was all.

"Such a horrible sight as that I had never seen before, and I hoped I never should.

"There could be only one way of accounting for his presence on the iceberg. He had been cast upon it in the same manner as I had been, and being unable to find food or fuel, he had perished—perished miserably, out of the sight of all his fellow-creatures.

"As I made these reflections, my heart swelled till I thought it would burst, and I threw myself down on the snow and wept and groaned.

" 'This will be my fate,' I said to myself—'this will be my fate! My companions are happy, for they are past trouble, while I am here, unable to resist the slow approach of a horrible and dreadful death!'

"At last I was exhausted by the violence of my own emotions, and I rose to my feet.

"There, in a strange sitting posture, was the dead body of the sailor.

"His arms were hanging down idly by his side, and his face, which wore a sorrowful expression, was turned seaward.

"I looked at once in the direction of that unconscious gaze, but there was nothing to be seen but the gently-heaving sea.

"But as I gazed, I became conscious of something which I did not know before.

"The place upon which I stood commanded a more expansive view than any other upon which I had yet set my foot.

"There was but a small portion of the horizon hidden from me, and that was in the north, the direction from which the iceberg was slowly but surely drifting, and in which I did not care to look.

"I have said that the iceberg was moving. It glided through the water with a motion as gentle and regular as the best ship on the ocean, and if it continued on its way I must reach land.

"But its progress was very, very slow—at least, it seemed to me to be. I was many hundreds of miles from any portion of the habitable globe, and though I might at last reach some friendly shore, yet it became a very nice question as to whether I should be able to support my life until that time arrived.

"In honest truth there seemed little hope of such a thing. In the first place, the cold was awful, and in the second, I was already faint for want of food.

"How then was I to sustain existence for several days—perhaps weeks?

"I must inevitably perish with hunger, as it was evident my predecessor had done.

"It was an awful thing, but there was my fate before me. I could see to what I should come at last.

" 'Perhaps,' said I, unconsciously, 'some other human being may be cast upon this mountain of ice, and then he will behold two victims.'

"As the sun sank I felt the cold rapidly increasing, and I dreaded that before dawn I should be frozen to death.

"I had no incentive to move about, for I was really too tired and exhausted to stir a step, and the pangs of hunger were almost more than I could endure.

"I sat down on the snow beside my dead comrade, and looked out upon the ocean as he had done up to the last moment of his life.

"Presently I saw coming towards me a huge flock of birds. They were high in the air, and were making their way southward.

"They were large white birds, and the flapping of their wings was the first thing which attracted my attention, for I was sitting with my back turned in the direction from which they had come.

"They seemed to hover over the iceberg, I thought—it was quite certain their onward progress was not continued.

"I sat half-dreaming, wondering why this should be, when I was surprised to find the birds gradually settling down, until at last many parts of the iceberg were literally covered with them."

birds away from the place where I sat, as though they knew I was an enemy.

"It was the approach of night, which no doubt made the birds settle upon the iceberg, for there was no other resting-place anywhere visible.

"They were tired, no doubt, with a long flight over the ocean, and wished to rest until the morrow, when they would resume their journey.

"Oh, how eagerly I wished for one of them, so hungry as I was! but I was forced to confess that I had no means of catching one of them.

"By slow degrees night came on.

"I occupied my thoughts incessantly in the endeavour to devise some means of capturing some of these birds, but I could think of nothing better than waiting until the middle of the night, until they were sound asleep, when I should be able to steal upon them and capture them.

"And so I waited patiently until night came.

"Slowly and cautiously I then descended from my post of observation.

"The birds were scattered everywhere over the iceberg, generally in flocks from fifty to a hundred in number.

"These were pressed as closely against each other as it was possible for them to be, no doubt for the warmth which would be thus produced.

"With the greatest caution, I stole to one of the largest flocks I could see.

"The birds made no movement, and did not in any way appear to notice my approach.

"This did not surprise me, because I was aware that birds slept heavily.

"At length they were within my reach.

"Before making my attack, I had had time to consider what I should do, and though I was sorely tempted by hunger, I firmly adhered to my intention, which was this:

"I determined to catch and kill as many as I could while I had the opportunity.

"I put out my hand and took hold of one.

"It struggled desperately, and flapped its wings and uttered shrill screams.

"But they were quickly cut short, for I wrung its neck.

"Another and another followed, until at length I had quite a heap lying at my feet, and then I was unable to withstand the cravings of my stomach any longer.

"Like a wild beast, I seized upon the still palpitating animal, and commenced to devour it.

"I ate voraciously; and then, completely worn out, I crept into a little nook and fell asleep.

"I did not awake until the sun shone into my eyes, and then I looked about me confusedly, for I could not at first recollect where I was.

"Remembrance of the past very soon returned to me, however, and then I attempted to rise.

"I found this for a long time impossible, for my limbs were rigid with cold.

"In the end, I did succeed in gaining my feet; and then I ran about as well as I could to restore the circulation of my blood.

"In a little time I could move my limbs freely; and a kind of glow overspread my whole frame.

"I should have thought my adventure with the birds a dream, for now there was not one to be seen, but the pile of dead which lay on the snow a little way off convinced me of the reality of the past.

"The sight of the food seemed to cause an appetite, and I hastened towards the birds and devoured a great portion of another, raw as it was, for I banished the thought of cooking, knowing full well that it was impossible to obtain a fire.

"When I had made this repast, I placed all the dead birds in the nook in which I had slept.

"I looked upon them as a treasure.

"Then, with a sinking heart, I once more climbed to that upper platform upon which the dead body of the sailor sat in so singular an attitude.

"I hoped—and yet I did not dare to hope—that I should see in the distance some indication of land, or of a passing vessel.

"Anxiously I looked; and though I had, as I imagined, schooled myself to bear disappointment, a groan came from my lips when I found that there was nothing to be seen but the wide ocean.

"We were still in the Arctic Regions, though I felt convinced the iceberg was many miles south of the spot

CHAPTER CCCCLIV.

THE SAILOR'S EXTRAORDINARY NARRATIVE IS CONTINUED

"SOME kind of instinct seemed to guide these strang-where the collision had taken place between it and our vessel.

"If the motion continued, surely I thought all would be well, for had I not sufficient food to last me for a considerable period.

"I ought not to despair, dreadful and solitary as was my position.

"I turned round, and my eyes again fell upon the dead and frozen body of the sailor.

"Ah!" I said to myself, 'I have much to be thankful for! He perished for want of food; but I possess the means to live. Such a fate as his—though I at first feared it—will not be mine.'

"But my felicitations did not long continue, for my thoughts took a new turn.

"Perhaps this man supported existence upon this iceberg for a length of time—perhaps he, too, found food as I have done, and yet he perished.

"This reflection, which seemed so probable, completely cast me down.

"I felt a strong desire to learn some particulars concerning this dead sailor, but how was I to obtain any information? If I spoke, those frozen lips were incapable of returning me any reply.

"How, then, was I to learn that which I so much longed to know?

"I fancied, after awhile, that he must have left some record behind him, but I could see nothing. Overcoming my first feelings of repugnance, I searched in his pockets, but I could not find writing materials of any kind.

"That hope, then, was destroyed.

"Raising my head, I perceived upon the smooth piece of ice against which his back reclined the indications of some rudely-traced characters.

"I looked more closely, and found that I was right. Some words had evidently been roughly engraved upon the ice.

"Here, then, was promise of an occupation—here was something to do—something to pass away the long and tedious hours which otherwise would have driven me frantic.

"I would set myself to work to decipher these rude characters. I am not much of a scholar, and the task would be all the more difficult on that very account.

"Still I had hope of success, for the letters, though badly formed, were large.

"I removed the snow which had settled in some of them, and after a long while, managed to make out these words. I recollect them perfectly—indeed I shall never forget them, not to the day of my death—they are deep in my memory, and I learned them little by little.

"The words were these. You will find they are not complete, for in places the letters had become effaced, and I could only guess at what they were:—

"Swam from the good ship Nautilus, after she foundered with all hands on board, on to this iceberg. I have been here a long, long while. I have, lost count of time, and cannot tell how long. It seems to me years. For a time I subsisted on birds, which from time to time settled on the iceberg, and which I killed when they were asleep at night, but after a time they ceased to come, and, (Then there was something which I could not make out, and then) 'Starved to death by slow degrees!' (another break) 'No food—no food of any kind—I have eaten nothing for four or five days! I am weak—I cannot—'

"That was all—the rest I could not make out.

"I should tell you that the first words of this inscription were deeply cut into the ice, as though with a firm hand, but the others only seemed to be scratched upon the glassy surface, as though the poor wretch did not possess strength enough to use the knife for this purpose.

"Messmates, can you form any idea of the effect which this had upon me? I was ten thousand times more miserable and downcast than before.

"My forebodings were all realised. He had protracted a miserable existence, as I appeared to have a chance of doing, and there was the result. He had avoided death for a long while, but it had come at last.

"I wept again, and could not help giving vent to my feelings in that childish manner.

"Oh! the solitude of that iceberg was something awful, and the silence seemed to weigh me down. As far as ever I could see, and that was for many miles, I could not perceive a single living thing, and there was no sound save the heaving of the sea against the base of the mass of ice, and that was so far below me that I could scarcely hear it.

"It was as though I was alone in the world.

"I sat down and buried my face in my hands.

"How long I continued in this position I know not, but at length, half frozen by the cold, I got up, and a scream came from my lips.

"I happened to look across the sea, and there I saw a vessel under full sail.

"But it was at an enormous distance—so far off, indeed, that scarce anyone but a seaman could have told what it was.

"I knew, and shrieked again and again. I called for help frantically, and waved my arms in the air, until exhaustion compelled me to desist.

"It was not until then that I remembered how foolishly I had acted, for at such a distance scarcely any sound would have been audible.

"Nor would my form be seen. The iceberg would, for its size was immense, but in comparison with the huge mass my body would have appeared as the tiniest speck.

"How, then, was I to attract attention to my melancholy and forlorn situation?

"I could not tell.

"If I did not do something that could be seen by those on board they would not come near the iceberg, for no vessel ventures closer than they are compelled, for they are dangerous neighbours.

"In hoping to see a ship, I had not thought of this before. I should be shunned by every craft.

"Quite worn out, I watched with straining eyes the course of the distant vessel. It seemed to be making its way towards me, and I soon found that if it continued in its present course it would pass by.

"Nearer and nearer it came, but at last night came on, and then it was hidden from my sight.

"I was frantic.

"When I last saw the vessel, she was comparatively close, and I feared in the morning by the time day dawned she would have passed me.

"Throughout the whole of that night I never once closed my eyes, but sat with them fixed upon the spot where I had last seen the ship.

"The darkness was most intense, and I could only see for a few yards before me.

"At last the morning, which I had so ardently wished for, came.

"I started quickly to my feet.

"Gradually and gradually distant objects became revealed to my ardent gaze.

"I looked around in every direction.

"But not the least trace of the vessel could I see—she had vanished as utterly and completely as though she had never been.

"In vain I turned my gaze in every direction. I could see nothing of her, and where she had gone to seemed a mystery. I could not make it out.

"I expected to see something of it, even if the iceberg had been passed.

"But no—nothing of the kind. I was once more alone on an iceberg—alone on the ocean.

"I felt as though I could gladly leap off some projection into the sea, and so terminate my life at once, but hope again found an abiding-place in my heart.

"The motion of the iceberg was increased in swiftness, and the position of the sun told me that it was still drifting in a southerly direction.

"I again descended to the place where I had stowed the birds, and made another hearty meal, after which, feeling better both in body and mind, I determined to climb up some portion of the iceberg from which a view to the north could be obtained, in order to find whether I could not see something of the ship receding in the distance."

CHAPTER CCCCLV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD MAKE A SAD DISCOVERY ON THE BORDERS OF THE LITTLE WOOD.

"ANYTHING involving occupation was pleasing to me, so I at once set about carrying out this last resolve

"I climbed up, and soon reached a place which exactly suited me.

"Placing my back against a mass of ice that was behind me, I looked northward.

"What I beheld much surprised me, so different was it from what I had expected.

"In the first place, I ought to tell you that I could see nothing of the ship.

"I soon satisfied myself that she was nowhere in sight.

"But I was astonished to find that the sea to the northward was dotted all over with icebergs.

"The one upon which I stood was in advance of all the rest.

"The remainder came following in irregular order, and stretched to the north as far as ever I could see.

"They were of all sizes and all shapes.

"But of all the rest, one particularly attracted my attention.

"It was of enormous size—so gigantic, indeed, that it made all the others, even the one I was upon, seem insignificant and small.

"It was the hugest mass of ice I had ever seen or heard of.

"It was very close to the one upon which I stood, and immediately behind it.

"Its shape was irregular, as all icebergs are. It was like a number of mountains all crowded together without attention to order.

"The many strange shapes and colours which it assumed attracted a great deal of my attention, and I looked at it for some time.

"After awhile—I cannot tell just when—I became cognizant of a very alarming circumstance.

"At first I had refused to credit my own senses, but I was soon forced into belief of what I saw.

"The huge iceberg was rapidly coming nearer.

"I almost held my breath, for as I looked I could see the intervening distance rapidly diminish.

"How this could be, or why, I could not for the life of me make out, but it was nevertheless a fact.

"The huge iceberg was drifting with a swifter motion than the one which I may almost call mine.

"Whether this was attributable to its great width, which caught the breeze which came from the north, or whether it was attributable to something else I was unable to decide.

"But to my excited fancy its speed seemed to increase and increase.

"I knew it was no uncommon thing for two icebergs to dash violently against each other and crumble to fragments.

"A collision now seemed inevitable and imminent.

"The iceberg upon which I was seemed to move more and more slowly, until at last it ceased to move at all.

"The other came on swifter than ever.

"I shrank back against the ice, and found myself making a furious effort to accelerate the motion of the huge mass.

"But all my efforts were mocked at.

"This was a danger I had not thought of—that I should be menaced by such a peril had never occurred to me.

"All other dangers sank into insignificance before this one.

"What was I to do to secure my safety?

"I knew not, and continued to gaze with a kind of fascination upon the approaching mass.

"It was coming with more swiftness—I felt assured it was not my fancy that made me think so.

"I was unable to move from where I stood—indeed, I never once thought of it, and I should have been no safer, perhaps, even if I had changed my position.

"Death was before me—death was staring me in the face, and I had no means of saving myself.

"At last, with a sound which I shall never forget, the icebergs came into collision.

"What happened afterwards I cannot tell. I felt that I was hurled to a distance, and a horrible, crashing splitting sound was in my ears.

"When I recovered myself I found I was clinging to a small piece of ice—that was, small in comparison to the two huge masses of which I have spoken.

"I was on a fragment of one of the icebergs—I do not know which—that was about an acre in extent "Of the two icebergs only a multitude of fragments, such as the one I was upon, remained.

"These were dotted all over the ocean to an immense distance, and were continually striking against each other and disappearing.

"I was soaking wet, which proved I had been immersed; and how far I was from the place where the collision took place would have been very hard to say.

"The sea was in a state of terrible commotion, owing to the disturbance the falling masses had caused, and the piece I was on rolled and pitched in a manner that made me think I was about to be hurled into the sea.

"But by degrees the sea calmed down, and again I drifted in a southerly direction.

"I was, however, much worse off than before, for I had no provisions, and there was great danger that so small a piece of ice would overturn or dissolve into minute fragments.

"But I was doomed to be menaced by a danger of a very different description to any which I had anticipated.

"I was startled by hearing a low, growling sound, which, as I heard it, seemed to turn me to stone.

"I should have told you the small piece of ice upon which I was happened to be of peculiar shape.

"It rose up in the centre into a projection, so that I could not see to the other side, although the piece of ice was so small.

"It was from behind me that the growling sound came, and I quickly turned my gaze in that direction, and then I saw coming towards me a huge polar bear.

"I felt then that I had reached the end of my escapes.

"Many tales had I heard told about these animals, and I looked upon the one which was approaching with the utmost horror.

"Its appearance was well calculated to excite such a feeling, for the creature seemed to be on the verge of starvation.

"Its bones were almost through the skin, and its eyes were red and bloodshot, and glared upon me in a manner I can convey no idea of by mere description.

"It was quite certain that the animal rendered bold by the pangs of hunger, intended to attack me; and how was I to defend myself?

"The creature came on slowly and stealthfully, and how was I to avoid it? Once caught in its embrace my fate would be sealed.

"It may seem strange to you, messmates, that a bear should be upon an iceberg, but those who travel in those regions will tell you that such a thing is common enough. In the winter, when the sea is frozen all over, the bears continually prow over it, and when in the spring the pieces become detached, they drift off with them, and are carried out to sea.

"Such was the case in the present instance. The bear had been upon the large iceberg, and no doubt had been a long time without food.

"How it happened that we should be both upon the same piece of ice I cannot tell you, but so it was, and I found the circumstance a disagreeable one.

"I had my knife, and that was the only weapon I possessed; but how could I hope to cope with a bear with such an instrument?

"I could use it only in close quarters, and in close quarters I should perish by the hug which the bear would give me.

"I endeavoured to frighten the dreadful animal and scare it away, but my efforts only seemed to have the effect of enraging him, and so I discontinued them.

"I grasped my knife in my hand, and determined to sell my life dearly. I could not retreat without I chose to take refuge in the sea, and that was only preferring one death to another.

"I grew desperate.

"The bear continued to make its stealthful advance.

"I endeavoured to show a bold front, for I had heard that the most ferocious wild beasts will not attack a man who faces them and deliberately awaits their approach.

"However true that might be in a general way, I found that it would not do for a hungry polar bear. The hungry, clumsy creature continued its advance towards me, and licked its lips in anticipation of the meal it was about to take.

"I had never seen a bear before, and didn't know anything about their powers of mischief beyond mere hearsay.

"I had received terrific accounts, and felt already that my race was run.

"To my surprise the bear now rose upon its two hind feet, and came towards me in that manner.

"Its fore paws were extended as though eager to seize and hold me in that close and fatal embrace.

"I shuddered, but, rendered desperate by my situation, and feeling that I could not make my peril greater than it was, I resolved to begin the attack.

"The attack was inevitable, and by being the one to commence I might in that way gain an advantage, which I otherwise could not.

"Accordingly, instead of waiting for the bear, I walked forwards as firmly and deliberately as the nature of the ice and snow beneath my feet would permit.

"The bear, perceiving this alteration in my demeanour, paused, as it seemed to me, irresolutely.

"I determined to take advantage of that moment.

"Knife in hand, I rushed forward.

"I reached my adversary in a second, and inflicted, with the rapidity of lightning, three fierce stabs in as near the region of the heart as possible.

"The blood spurted out at each blow, and so quick and sudden was I that the wounds were inflicted before the beast had time to recover from the astonishment which this sudden attack had doubtless caused it.

"I drew out the knife, and, rendered bold by my success, prepared to inflict a fourth wound, but suddenly I felt the bears huge paws close around me and hug me tightly.

"Still, I held the knife with the point turned towards the creature's heart, and so the more he squeezed the deeper the knife penetrated.

"But this seemed to be unheeded, and the pressure was increased until my bones cracked again, and every bit of breath seemed driven out of my body.

"I felt that I could not sustain such a violent pressure, and then I became unconscious.

"When I recovered myself, I found I was lying by the side of the bear.

"The voracious animal was quite dead.

"The wounds which I had been lucky enough to inflict were fatal ones; and, after I fainted, the pressure of the paws must have relaxed, and the animal had fallen back dead.

"I felt terribly bruised and hurt, and every breath I drew gave me acute pain, which made me think I had received some severe internal injury.

"I crept towards my antagonist, in order to ascertain whether life was indeed extinct.

"The body was quite warm, and the blood was still flowing, which showed at once that my insensibility had not lasted for a very long time.

"The bear was nevertheless quite dead. All animation had departed; and so this encounter, which was at first fraught with so much danger, in the end turned out to my advantage.

"But I had had a very narrow escape of my life; though, as you shall hear, my perils were not over yet.

"Finding the bear was quite dead, I now occupied myself in considering how I could reap the most benefit from the transaction.

"I resolved to strip off his skin, and to use it to wrap myself up in; I should then be in a position to withstand the inclemency of the weather.

"The flesh I would eat; and so I had provisions for a length of time.

"The presence of the bear on that particular piece of ice was, however, a great puzzle to me, and I determined to climb up and look over on to the other side.

"I did so, and found the ice sloped gently down to the sea.

"Very likely the violence of the collision had hurled the bear into the water, and he had swam towards that piece of ice on to which he would be able to get with very little difficulty indeed."

CHAPTER CCCCLVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPARD MEET WITH A BITTER DISAPPOINTMENT.

"FEELING that this was doubtless the true solution of the affair, I crept down again, and, as I told you I intended to do, I stripped off the skin of the bear.

"When I had done this, I ate some of the flesh, which was quite the reverse of palatable.

"By this time night had come, and so I wrapped myself up in the bearskin. It was warmer than I could possibly have expected, and in a little while I was sound asleep.

"I slept till a late hour the next morning, and probably should have slept much longer than I did, but I was suddenly awakened by a terrific crash.

"I started up instantly.

"The sea was violently agitated, and I discovered with alarm that at least half of the piece of ice had disappeared.

"It was the crash of the collision which had woke me.

"The piece that was left was now very small indeed, and of a sugar-loaf sort of shape. For its size, its height was very disproportionate.

"The upper portion, too, nodded about in a manner that excited in my breast the liveliest apprehension; and first one side of the base would sink beneath the waves, and then the other.

"Indeed, I soon found that the fragment of ice was in danger of overturning.

"Had I known then as much as I know now, I should have been certain of it.

"I have seen fragments of ice gradually broken away about the base, until the upper portion has overbalanced, and turned the fragment bottom upwards.

"This is what I momentarily expected, and my expectations were realised.

"With a sudden lurch, the piece of ice turned topsyturvy.

"I clung frantically to a jutting point, but the ice slipped from my hold, and I found myself plunged in the sea.

"I rose to the surface and struck out instantly, for I could swim well.

"I saw a piece of ice floating near me, and I swam towards it.

"After many trials, I succeeded in climbing on to it, and then I stood up, and shook the water from my garments as well as I could.

"My position was now very much worse than it had been hitherto.

"I had lost all that I had gained with so much pains—my stock of birds, my bear-skin, and the carcass of the animal itself.

"I no longer possessed any protection against the weather, nor a particle of food.

"My clothes, too, being so wet, put me to very great inconvenience, for they were cold, and clung closely to me.

"The piece of ice was a mere fragment, and did not seem at all capable of bearing my weight.

"That it would carry me far I did not think for one instant, for, as I approached the southern latitude, it melted gradually away.

"Had the block been large it would perhaps have withstood the warmth, or at any rate would not have melted away so as to disable me from floating upon it.

"I now looked about me and saw a ship in the distance, but I felt too miserable and wretched to hail it, or make any signal. The ship was, however, at an immense distance.

"Ships now frequently came in sight, and those that were near I endeavoured to attract the attention of, but it was in vain—none saw me, or, at least, none paid any attention to me.

"I quickly became almost unable to move in the least degree.

"Contrary to my expectations, the piece of ice continued to sustain me in a very satisfactory manner, and that for a long period.

"So many ships had passed me that at last I seemed to pay no attention to them, and turned my eyes constantly in search of land.

"After many days' suffering I at last had the joy of perceiving land in the distance.

"Feverishly I watched it, and observed with joy that the block of ice drifted in the coveted direction.

"But the motion was slow—dreadfully so.

"The prospect of being saved infused new strength into my limbs, and I succeeded at last in paddling the water with my hands, by which means I caused the block of ice to advance with greater rapidity.

"I need not spin this yarn any longer, messmates, for the best part of it is over, and it is time I was done. I did not think it would take so long when I began telling it. It will do now if I make a long story short by saying that I in the end reached the shore, though, as may be expected, I was in a dreadfully exhausted condition.

"Fortunately for me, I got ashore within a short distance of a Danish settlement, by the inhabitants of which I was received with great kindness and attention.

"By their care I quickly recovered, and when I was well enough to do so, I told them my strange story.

"After that I got a passage on a homeward-bound vessel, and then, though you will scarcely believe it, shipped on board another ship bound for the Polar Regions.

"What befel me on that occasion I can't tell you now; but mayhap, messmates, upon some other occasion I will spin you a yarn about that too."

With these words the sailor ceased, and he and his comrades, rising to their feet, resumed their ordinary duties.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard listened to his extraordinary narrative with feelings of great interest.

The events described were of a character such as had never befallen them—of a character, indeed, that they had never before heard of.

Gladly enough would they have pressed him to continue the recital of his adventures.

The yarn had served to while away the long silent hours of the night, and now a faint flush of light in the east betokened the coming of the new day.

The first rays of the rising sun showed our friends that they were within sight of land.

In a little while—a few hours at most—their journey would be over.

To their impatient spirits the progress of the vessel appeared to be inordinately slow, and the very shore seemed to recede as they approached it.

Jack's heart fluttered terribly with suspense.

After so long a separation, and after the occurrence of so many strange events, he was at last to meet Edgworth Bess.

A strange thrill of delight would shoot through his frame, and then would be quickly succeeded by a feeling of sadness and depression.

The poet has written—"Coming events cast their shadows before;" and it certainly seemed as though Jack had some presentiment of what was in store for him in the future.

Without knowing why, his heart swelled and his throat ached, as though overcome by pent-up grief which was struggling to find a vent.

Blueskin tried hard to persuade him that all this arose merely from his anxiety to rejoin the object of his affections.

Jack Sheppard, however, was filled with the dread of something having happened that would have the effect of overturning his happiness.

With his breast torn by these conflicting emotions—at one time filled with joy, and at another cast down by despair—the remainder of the voyage was performed.

Our two friends stood at the prow of the vessel, and kept their eyes fixed constantly upon the shore.

Gradually the long dark line which had first indicated land resolved itself into confused shapes, and those in their turn resolved themselves into the buildings near the beach.

The time from the moment when they first caught sight of land until the boat reached the pier seemed to our friends to be equal in length to the whole of the voyage.

At last, however, the boat was moored alongside the pier.

The first persons who leaped from the boat were our friends Jack and Blueskin.

At the landing-place a large crowd of persons was assembled, and, eluding observation as much as possible, they made their way towards the town.

In his impatience Jack would have proceeded at a running pace, but Blueskin checked him.

"You must be cautious! If you are not, suspicion may be excited, and then the worst will follow."

Jack had great difficulty in controlling his impatience, but yet he was not so entirely carried away as to be deaf to Blueskin's words.

He heard them, and he knew the importance of avoiding all suspicion, and he at once moderated his speed.

"You are right," he said; "and now about this inn where you say you left her. Is it far from here?"

"Not very far."

"Are you sure you can find it?"

"Oh yes! Although I was only in Amsterdam a little while, I took good notice of all around me, and there is no fear of my missing my way."

In a few minutes Blueskin paused before the little inn that was kept by the Widow Graacht.

He led Jack into the interior, and then pronounced the password which had been given him by Ned Cantle.

"Those you want are not here," said the old woman.

"Not here!" ejaculated Jack Sheppard, in a voice of the deepest disappointment.

"I scarcely expected they would be. When did they leave?"

"On Sunday morning."

"Have you heard from them since?"

"No."

"But you can tell us where they are."

"Oh yes; they are in a cottage, which is built upon the borders of a wood!"

"Is it far from here?"

"Half a day's journey if you travel on foot, and Ned Cantle left word that you were not to think of proceeding in any other manner."

"We will obey him. But where is this wood?"

"It would be impossible to direct you to it."

"What is to be done?"

"I have a boy here—my son. He knows the place well, and will guide you to it in safety. He knows every inch of the ground."

"He shall be well rewarded for his trouble!"

"Thanks, sir—thanks. He will soon be ready. But you had better take some refreshment, for the way is lonely, and you will have no opportunity of getting anything on the road."

Our friends were not troubled with much appetite, but they took the hint, and ordered some refreshment, of which they sparingly partook.

In about half an hour the widow entered the room.

She was followed by as singular a specimen of humanity as our friends had ever beheld.

"Come forward, Lubeck!" she said.

The elfish-looking boy who answered to the name of Lubeck stepped forward as he was bidden.

He was much deformed, and looked like some gnome from the bowels of the earth; such a creature as German authors love to describe in their wild legendary stories, and their artists to delineate.

His face had an evil, treacherous look, and our friends were consequently far from prepossessed in his favour.

But they had confidence in the landlady.

"You mustn't mind my poor boy's looks," she said, as if she read his thoughts. "He can't help being as he is, and he will guide you faithfully."

"I do not doubt it," said Blueskin, "and I can promise him a liberal reward for his trouble."

The boy's eyes gleamed as he heard these words, and he said, in an unearthly, guttural voice:

"I am ready!"

Blueskin and Jack both started instantly to their feet.

"So are we!" they cried.

They settled with the landlady, and then took their departure.

Their strange guide led them through many back streets in the poorest quarter of Amsterdam.

At last, however, the city was left behind, and they commenced that long journey across the flat, open country, which we have already described when Ned Cantle and Edgworth Bess took the same route.

Like her, they had to rest several times, for the journey was a very fatiguing one.

There was no splendid scenery to distract the attention and so make the walk less tedious.

At last, however, they came in sight of the wood we have previously mentioned, and then the elfin boy Lubeck raised one of his disproportioned arms, and pointed towards it.

"There is the wood," he said. "Behold our destination! The hut to which I am taking you, and in which your friends now are, is on the borders of it, and we shall soon be there."

CHAPTER CCCCLVII.

JONATHAN WILD ENTERS HIS RUINED HOUSE AND MEETS WITH A SURPRISE.

ONCE again let us revert to the proceedings of that bold, bad man, Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker.

What we have to relate concerning him is of the most interesting character, and cannot fail to arrest the attention of the reader.

Although we have been for such a long time occupied with other matters, it will be remembered that when we last heard of him was on the occasion of Jack Sheppard's execution.

After he had seen the body of his detested adversary placed in the rude coffin, and the lid shut down upon it, he believed, and reasonably too, that all further trouble was at end so far as he was concerned.

Accordingly he had left the cart, and had made his way to London.

Of late he had totally neglected his own affairs, and he knew full well that they required immediate attention.

In order that his pet scheme should be carried out, we have seen how he voluntarily confined himself to Jack's cell, and that too, at a time when his presence was most needed abroad.

"Yes—yes!" he muttered, as he strode rapidly along the road, "now that that little affair is over, I must turn my attention to other things. My house! Ten thousand curses on them for having destroyed it as they have! How can I tell what secrets the ravages of the fire may have revealed, and how can I tell by what prying eyes they have been seen? Curses—curses!"

Jonathan Wild clenched his teeth tightly together, and hastened on.

But he could not control himself, and so he went on muttering as before, for he fancied this was a relief to his thoughts.

"There are secrets, such as would bring me—even me—to the gallows—to Tyburn Tree, should they be discovered and made known. I have run a risk—a frightful risk; but I must make up for it as well as I can by being extra careful!"

He was silent again, and this time for a long period.

"How is it," he said, with snarling accents—"how is it I don't feel half so happy—half so overjoyed as I thought I should? and yet—yet—why shouldn't I? Jack Sheppard is hanged! I have accomplished my purpose! What I swore to do I have performed! Why, then, do I feel so strangely? I am not half so happy as I thought I should be! Why hasn't it made me happy?"

He stamped angrily on the ground, as he asked himself this question.

It was quite true.

He was not so rejoiced as he always imagined he should be.

In fact, he was not happy at all. He was in a state of feverish excitement, and his heart trembled with a dread of he knew not what.

"What feeling is this which comes over me?" he broke forth. "What is the meaning of it? What does it portend? Is something going to happen? No—no, that is foolish! All is well—of course all is well—all must be very well!"

But although he spoke thus, Wild could not persuade himself that all was indeed well.

He dreaded something vaguely, but what he knew not.

Wild was superstitious, and such a sensation as we have described coming over him would produce a great effect.

He trembled and shook, and even his very lips turned white.

Yet he could find no specific or sufficient cause to which he could attribute this alarm.

"I am a fool," he cried, "to give way to such feelings! It is my long sojourn in the cell which has been the cause of this. It is a sort of weakness which has come over me.

In a little while it will wear off—of course it will wear off! That is the cause. I will think about it no longer. I will turn my thoughts in quite a different direction!"

This was a wise resolution, but unfortunately for his own peace of mind, Jonathan Wild found himself unable to keep it.

The nameless dread of he knew not what hung over him, and would make itself manifest in spite of all his efforts.

The nearer he got to London, indeed, the more did this feeling seem to increase.

It would almost seem as though some portion of his inner nature was conscious that some misfortune was about to happen.

Jonathan Wild kept on, though all the way he was continually employed in muttering to himself.

"What can be wrong?" he asked himself, for about the thousandth time. "What is there for me to dread? Nothing, nothing—of course there is nothing; and I am a fool? Have I not seen Jack Sheppard dangling at the end of a rope—have I not seen him cut down, and his carcass put into the coffin? Of course I have, so that is all right! And what else is there—what else is there, I say?"

The question was asked fiercely, but no one replied to it.

"All is easy now—all is very easy! First of all, I will put my house in order, and see that all is right in that quarter, and take such measures as will prevent any disagreeable discoveries from being made. Then, when I have done that, how easy will be the rest, now that that son of the devil Jack Sheppard is for ever out of my way!"

Wild grew easier.

"That is the proper view to take of things; and my health is not quite what I should wish it to be, and that will account for the rest. I shall soon be better. One bold stroke is all that I have to make, and then I shall be at rest. I feel that I want rest, and then I shall have it. Surely fortune favours me to the utmost. I have wealth, and when I have achieved my grand aim, I will quit this active life and live in peace!"

Jonathan Wild was fast reasoning himself into a more comfortable state of mind.

By the time he reached London, he was comparatively calm, though now he blamed himself for having given way to his feelings in the way he had.

The finishing touch was put to his composure when he entered a public-house and called for a pint of brandy.

The landlord was rather surprised to receive such an order, but he put the fiery liquor before his customer in a pewter measure.

Jonathan threw down a piece of money to pay for it, and the landlord said:

"Water, Mr. Wild?"

"No, curse you, there's water enough in it already!"

The thief-taker raised the brandy to his lips as he spoke, and drank at least half of it off at a draught.

The landlord stared, and handed Wild his change, but he did not venture to make any remark, for he knew that his customer's temper was not to be depended upon.

Wild drank the brandy and sallied out into the open air.

"Ha!" he said, "that's better. I feel new life in me. It is wonderful what a difference a little drop of brandy always makes to me! I feel equal now to any emergency!"

The thief-taker strode through the streets, going straight in the direction of his own house.

He made up his mind to see that all was right in that quarter before he thought of anything else.

At last he reached Newgate Street.

He crossed over to the pavement opposite to his own dwelling; and then, placing his back against a door, he took a minute survey of his premises, and noted the extent of the destruction which had been wrought by the fire.

He soon found that little more than the shell of the building remained.

The walls were standing, but the windows were all gone, and the roof had wholly disappeared.

The thief-taker uttered a volley of curses when he saw the wreck before him, for he knew what a many valuable articles he had secreted in various parts of the house, and which had doubtless been now destroyed by the fire, or else stolen from the ruins.

It was some satisfaction, however, for him to perceive how carefully the lower windows and doorway were boarded over so as to prevent impertinent intrusion.

"I owe the Governor some thanks for that!" he said. "He really rendered me important service in this matter! I will not forget him for it!"

Jonathan looked across and saw a police officer near the doorway.

"All is well!" he said, as soon as he caught sight of him—"all is well, and I have nothing to fear! No discovery has been made, and I will soon put things all right! I sha'n't care then!"

Jonathan Wild crossed over the street.

As he did so—it was very strange—but he experienced a degree of reluctance for which he could not account.

He was half inclined to give up his project once; and No. 96.—BLUESKIN.

then, with a curse upon the return of his former weakness, he determined to master the feeling and proceed.

The police officer recognised Wild, and saluted him.

"So you have come back, Mr. Wild, at last!" he said—"I have had a weary time of it!"

"Never mind! I will make that all right with you!" said the thief-taker, assuming as gentle a tone of voice as he possibly could—"have you been disturbed?"

"Not at all, Mr. Wild!"

"I am glad to hear that! I will relieve you of your duty shortly! I wish to enter!"

"All right, Mr. Wild!"

The front door of the thief-taker's house had been secured with a padlock and chain.

The key of the former the officer drew from his pocket, and, inserting it into the keyhole, released the chain.

The door now opened to a touch.

"Shall I enter with you, Mr. Wild?"

"No—no! You have had a long watch of it! I will take care of the place for awhile. Here—take this, and get yourself something to drink."

"Thanks, Mr. Wild—many thanks!"

The police officer touched his hat and withdrew.

The thief-taker gently pushed open the door of his abode and glided in like a ghost.

He closed the door behind him instantly, and then, in a half-defensive attitude, he stood gazing eagerly about him.

The walls of the different apartments on the ground floor were only partially destroyed, and were standing in many places.

Jonathan gazed suspiciously about him, for the same feeling of dread again attacked him.

But he could see nothing; and the silence of the very grave itself prevailed in that ruined dwelling.

"I am getting a fool!" he said—"an arrant fool! I tremble and start, and fear a thousand dangers for which there is no foundation! I am weak! That is it—that must be it—or I should never feel as I do now!"

Wild trembled like a leaf.

His teeth chattered, and his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets.

The day was fast coming to a close, and in that gloomy house darkness appeared already to have commenced her reign. Confusing shadows lay here and there upon the ground, and the corners were filled with dim black masses of nothingness.

"I must be quick!" Wild said, at length—"I must be quick, and do what I have to do, or night will come upon me, and I should require a light, which would betray me!"

But still he did not move, and his limbs shook more violently than ever.

He glared around him apprehensively, and almost dreaded to see Jack Sheppard advance towards him.

The ghastly, horrible, distorted face which he had beheld when he looked into the cart was still vividly before his mental vision.

A faint noise struck upon his ear.

He started violently, and a cry of alarm came from his lips.

"Help!—help!" he cried. "What is that?"

His heart beat violently, and he gasped for breath in his painful attempt to listen intently.

But the noise, whatever it was, ceased as quickly as it arose, and the same tomb-like silence filled the house.

And yet what a miserable prey he was to a thousand fears!

That was some portion of his punishment which, although he knew it not, was about to begin.

By one of those efforts which Jonathan Wild was above all men capable of making, he recovered his composure.

"Why should I be terrified?" he said, in a whisper. "Is this fear? Have I turned coward? No—no! I am unnerved a little—that is all—that is all! I am close to the street! I am all right enough! It was some trifling noise unworthy of notice! I am calm now! Let me begin! The sooner I get done the better it will be!"

With these words Jonathan Wild stepped along the passage of his ruined house.

It was his intention to proceed to the entrance to the cells, in the first place in order to ascertain whether the entrance had been laid open, and in the second to descend into their subterranean depths.

Accordingly he made his way in that direction. Gloomy and dark as the place was, he could find his way without difficulty.

"It will soon be over!" he said. "I will carefully conceal all traces of what has been! All must be destroyed, then I shall feel myself safe, and shall not care what happens, but until then, I —,"

He ceased suddenly.

There was a rapid rush of footsteps, and the next moment Jonathan Wild was held tightly in the grasp of several men.

CHAPTER CCCCXVIII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS FIND IT NO EASY TASK TO CAPTURE JONATHAN WILD.

In a former chapter we have stated that a warrant for the apprehension of Jonathan Wild had been placed in the hands of an experienced officer, and that, as soon as he received it, he at once made inquiries relative to the whereabouts of Jonathan Wild, and learned that he had accompanied the procession to Tyburn.

This police officer knew Jonathan Wild well, and therefore was aware that it would not be the easiest matter in the world to capture him.

A desperate resistance might be absolutely counted upon.

The police officer, too, had a certain amount of dread of Wild's powers, which he imagined to be much greater than they really were.

But past circumstances would easily account for the presence in his breast of such a feeling.

Under these circumstances, then, he felt that the only chance of success he had lay in taking his enemy at a disadvantage.

Now this was to be done was a question that demanded and received his immediate attention.

He bestowed a considerable period of time in anxious thought, but without arriving at any definite result.

He wanted to arrange some plan by which he could take Wild by surprise, so that he and his men could pounce upon their prey suddenly, and, before he recovered himself, make him securely a prisoner.

For a long time he was baffled as to the means by which this could be done.

At last he bethought himself of Wild's house, and then his eyes sparkled.

"I have it at last!" he ejaculated. "Almost the first thing he will do will be to return to his house. I will hide myself and my comrades among the ruins; we shall then be able to take him by surprise without fail. He would never dream of our being there! I will try the experiment, and if he does not come, I can do something else to-morrow!"

The officer carried out his plan.

He called his men about him, and took up his quarters in Wild's house.

It was the easiest thing in the world for him to gain admittance, for, it will be remembered, it was a police officer who kept guard, and he was let into the secret of what was going to take place.

We have seen already how well he carried out his task.

Jonathan Wild's suspicions were not in the least degree excited by him.

Was it the dim shadow of this danger which cast its influence upon the thief-taker?

It seemed as though he was warned of what was about to happen.

Disregarding these premonitions, however, he had persisted in going forward.

The police officers were concealed behind a wall, and as soon as the thief-taker came in sight they sprang out upon him.

"You are my prisoner, Jonathan Wild!" said the chief police officer. "It is useless to resist, for you are trapped, and cannot escape! Surrender, then, at discretion!"

For about a second Jonathan Wild seemed as though turned to stone, standing just in the same attitude as when the officers had seized him.

It took that period of time for him to recover from the shock, but it also sufficed to enable him to comprehend the full and utmost extent of his danger.

He was equal to the emergency.

Now that the danger which had been impending over him took a definite and tangible shape, he lost all that irresolution which had characterised his previous movements.

"What?" he said, in a voice that made the whole place ring again.

"You are my prisoner!"

"Upon what charge?"

"Receiving stolen goods."

"Bah!"

"And other things connected with discoveries which have been made among the ruins of and beneath your house."

Jonathan uttered a yell of dismay.

These words let him know that he had to fear the worst.

Knowing as he did the full extent of his own guilt, he imagined that the officers had found out more than they really had.

His was a guilty conscience, and it needed no accuser. The charge of receiving stolen property was, he felt convinced, a mere ruse to obtain possession of his body.

Once imprisoned, other charges would be brought against him.

"Game's up!" he said.

"It is," said the police officer in command, and you will see the advisability of giving in without making a fuss."

"Never!" cried Wild, with startling loudness.

At the same moment, by a tremendous and sudden exercise of strength, he freed himself from the grasp of the men, who had been thrown off their guard to some extent by his pacific demeanour.

But he was only free for a minute or two.

The men recovered themselves, it might be said, immediately, and rushed at him again.

"Beware!" shouted the chief—"beware, Jonathan Wild!—my orders are to capture you dead or alive!"

Wild made no reply.

He had a slight advantage, and he made the most of it.

He drew a pistol from his belt and fired it, but he took no aim, and the bullet struck harmlessly against the blackened wall beyond.

Grasping the weapon tightly in his hand, however, he laid about him with right good will.

But it was wrested from his grasp.

Still he continued to struggle, and he now appeared to gain fresh strength each moment.

Seizing the chief police officer by the collar, he struck him heavily with his clenched fist.

At the third blow he released his hold upon his throat and the officer fell groaning to the ground.

One enemy being thus disposed of, it follows that he had one less to contend with.

He served another in a similar way, and then Wild saw that three only remained.

These, however, were shouting loudly for additional assistance, and Wild felt that unless he overcame his enemies speedily, all chance of escape would be lost.

Therefore he summoned to his aid all the energies which he possessed, and the attack which he made upon his three assailants could not be withstood.

Jonathan succeeded in getting one arm at liberty.

It was his right.

With the rapidity of lightning, he drew his heavy hanger and dealt most furious sweeping blows with it, so that his foes fell before him like reeds.

The last bit the dust just as the front door was dashed open.

A single glance showed the thief-taker that a large and fresh party of officers were outside, or rather in the act of rushing in.

His heart sank a little as he reflected that the house was probably surrounded at all points.

But Jonathan was not the man to give up hopes of escape upon such grounds as these.

His eye happened to alight upon a piece of timber which projected from the wall, and which he fancied he could reach, if he gave a vigorous leap.

No sooner did the thought occur to him than he gave an upward spring.

His fingers clasped the blackened beam, and then, by an exercise of strength and agility, which no one would have believed him to possess, and which probably were only called forth by the urgency of the occasion, the thief-taker drew himself up.

The top of a wall was now within his reach, and on to this he sprang with a swiftness that was truly surprising.

In the twinkling of an eye he seemed to have gained his present situation.

Still he could not see how he was to escape.

What he had done was merely upon the prompting of the moment, and not from deliberation.

He was conscious only of one feeling, and that was to get as far away from his foes as he possibly could.

The darkness was in his favour, for during the last few moments night had deepened quickly.

Still the fresh body of officers which had entered caught sight of Jonathan's dim figure perched on the wall.

"Surrender!" cried some one. "Surrender this instant, or I fire!"

These words only seemed to stimulate Jonathan to fresh exertions, and hazing a frightful leap, he clung to another beam of wood which was burned almost through.

It cracked most ominously beneath his feet, and a rush of blood came before the thief-taker's eyes as he believed he was about to fall.

But the wood sustained his weight, and he gained a point a little higher up.

To those below he seemed to be climbing up the face of the wall, and many held their breaths, for they expected each moment that he would fall headlong to the ground.

The officer who had threatened to fire was as good as his word.

As soon as he saw that Wild paid no sort of attention to his words, he raised his pistol rapidly, and aiming as well as he could at the dusky form above him, pulled the trigger.

The report rang out clearly and sharply, and some fragments of masonry which had been dislodged from their position by the concussion of the air came tumbling about their ears.

Jonathan felt something like a sharp stroke with a stick.

He knew what it was, for he had been shot at more than once.

It almost threw him off his balance, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that he saved himself.

The bullet had struck the back of his neck, but had bounded off without inflicting much injury.

Still the shot was well aimed, for it was within a few inches of his brain.

Wild got up higher still, and his form was almost invisible to those below.

"Follow him, my men—follow him! Don't let the villain escape!" cried the chief police officer, who at this moment partially recovered from the effects of the stunning blows in the face which Wild had given him.

The officers looked irresolute for a moment, and then one of them sprang up and caught hold of the beam in the same manner as the thief-taker had done.

From here he gained the wall.

He was quickly followed by several others, and they scrambled up the almost bare walls like so many wild cats.

But Wild had severely tried the strength of the ruins, and now, without a moment's notice, the wall gave way and precipitated the officers to the earth.

The fragments of masonry and their bodies as well fell upon their comrades below.

A loud, mocking laugh came from above.

Wild had observed the discomfiture of his foes, and continued to climb upwards with rapidity.

He was beginning to hope that after all he should get off.

The confusion below was something terrific.

Not only were the officers injured who had fallen, but those who were below had been more seriously injured still, and there was scarcely one out of their whole number who had escaped without a bruise of some sort.

But this defeat only made them all the more determined to achieve their purpose; and having scrambled to their feet, they looked about them for their foe.

A hideous, screeching laugh greeted them, and then something came crashing down.

They all drew back, but only some escaped.

A huge beam of wood had been hurled down from above.

Again came the hideous, yelling laugh.

Looking upward, they could just see the form of the thief-taker about on a level with the roof of the adjacent house.

"This way," cried the officer in command—"this way! I was a fool not to think of it before. Let us hasten to the next house—we shall then gain the roof in no time!"

A disorderly shout was the result, and then as many as were able to do so followed their chief into the street.

They experienced some delay in gaining admission to the next house, but upon explaining their errand they were allowed to ascend.

But altogether, so much time had been lost, that the officers feared Jonathan Wild would have too good a start of them to be overtaken.

In spite of this, however, they pressed forward with as much speed as they could.

CHAPTER CCCCLX.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES SOME FRANTIC EFFORTS TO ESCAPE FROM THE POLICE OFFICERS.

AFTER incurring a thousand and one perils—after missing a full several times by the merest chance in the world—Jonathan Wild reached the roof of the adjoining house.

What must have been the feelings of that bold, bad man on this eventful night!

What must he have thought of this sudden reverse of fortune? He who had for so long kept like a bloodhound on the trail of others, was at last a fugitive himself!

Now he was being hunted for his life, as he had hunted many and many a poor creature.

To escape, he was obliged to run the most awful risks; and, after all, it seemed very doubtful whether he would be able to get wholly free.

It was an appropriate retribution to overtake him.

What could be more fitting than that he who had hunted so many should come at last to be hunted himself?

Perhaps Jonathan Wild did not feel the reverse of fortune so keenly as one might imagine, although it had assailed him in the very hour of his success, at the time when he imagined he should be freed from all further trouble.

On his way back from Tyburn, he was congratulating himself—despite the uneasiness of his mind—upon the fruition of his plans.

In planning his future operations, he little dreamed that in so short a space of time, instead of being able to effect his purpose, he should be a fugitive, with all the police force at his back.

And yet he could not have wholly blinded himself to such a contingency.

He must have been aware that such a thing was likely to take place at some time or other.

Therefore—when the first shock of his astonishment was over—when he saw how things stood—he fully realised his position, and knew what he had to expect.

Nevertheless, coming upon him as it did at the moment of his triumph, or when he thought the way was plain and clear before him, it must have been a deep and bitter disappointment.

It was a disappointment; and as he sprang from beam to beam and from wall to wall, like some hunted animal, such awful curses came from his lips as would have appalled the heart of even the most hardened.

It is a wonder that the very walls did not fall upon him and crush him.

He called down the most awful maledictions upon the heads of his pursuers.

What pleasure it would have given him if he could have killed them all at one blow!

He made this reflection when he reached the top of his house.

As the thought was passing through his mind, he happened to seize hold of a beam which was very loose.

Indeed, it is a wonder his weight did not pull it from its setting. Such would have been the case had the strain been continued, but Wild let go and clung to the wall.

But the looseness of the beam furnished him with an idea.

He had been wishing for the destruction of his foes, and now the means of inflicting serious, if not fatal, injuries upon them were within his reach.

He fixed himself upon the wall above as firmly as he could, and set to work to disengage the beam from its position.

While so employed he heard the fall of the wall.

At this sound his heart rejoiced.

Some of his enemies had come to grief, as their groans and cries fully proved.

This encouraged him in his task.

He looked down.

He could see nothing, for the interior of his house was as dark as a well.

Darkness had even settled upon the house-tops.

He was deprived of the satisfaction which it would have given him could he but have seen the exact amount of injury which had been done.

In less than a moment the beam was loose enough to be removed.

He balanced it for a moment, and then let go.

Down it fell with a crash that gladdened his ears to listen to, and then shouts and cries followed, which was proof enough that it had wrought the effect upon the police officers below which he hoped and expected it would.

So overjoyed was he at this double triumph—for so he considered it—that he could not avoid giving vent to his exultation in that hideous, unmirthful laugh which had so plainly reached the ears of the officers.

Although he had triumphed, Jonathan Wild did not lose sight of the necessity which existed for promptitude of action.

Fain would he have lingered and feasted his ears with the cries which came from below, but the gratification would be too dearly purchased at the price he would be obliged to pay for it.

Reluctantly then, as we may say, he crawled on to the roof of the house adjoining his own.

Where he should go to—where he should fly for refuge and safety, he had no idea.

In the hour of his prosperity he had not troubled himself to bind many friends to him; on the contrary, he had used the power which had been vested in him in a manner that had created enemies by thousands.

Of late, he had received plenty of proof that he was not by any means a popular favourite; and if any proof had been wanted of this, the behaviour of the mob that morning, as he rode in the cart with Jack Sheppard on the way to Tyburn, would have been sufficient.

On the contrary, he was an object of general dislike.

The people did not scruple to show their aversion for him even when he was in a position of power; and, when they once found he was falling, every hand would be raised against him to strike him to the earth.

Jonathan Wild felt all this as, at the hazard of his neck, he crawled over the slippery tiles, and curses against the whole human race issued from his lips.

He felt that he hated every one who lived, from oldest to youngest—he hated them more bitterly than even he himself was hated.

There was something else in Wild's favour besides the darkness of the night.

He was perfectly familiar with all that was around him—he knew the roof of every house, and the people who lived beneath.

He passed rapidly from roof to roof, without attempting to pause.

"I must get further off," he said; "to attempt to enter any of these houses would be dangerous to a degree. The street is doubtless closely watched, and I should be pounced upon the moment I emerged. No—no! I must go further—further!"

Muttering these words, and mingling all he said with blasphemous curses, he crawled steadily onward, clinging to the tiles with a grasp of surprising tightness.

But, in the course of his long and adventurous career, Jonathan Wild often had occasion to pass at a rapid speed over the tops of houses when he was in pursuit of any desperate character, and by so doing he had gained a certain amount of practice which at the present juncture did him good service.

From time to time he looked back, and presently he saw the reflection of a ruddy light.

The police officers had gained the roofs, and had furnished themselves with torches, in order that they might see better to hunt the fugitive.

Jonathan ground his teeth with rage.

The sight of the officers caused him to redouble his speed.

The loud shouts and cries which came from the rear made him fancy that they were gaining upon him, but this was not the case, and it was only his excited fancy which made him think so.

At last he reached that part of Newgate Street where Wagwick Lane branches off at a right angle.

The turning was narrow, but in his exhausted state Wild felt that it would be foolish to risk a jump.

It would not do to remain there, however, and so he turned off down the street, going in the direction of Newgate Market.

In a little while he reached the place where, of course, the houses ceased.

What was he to do now?

His enemies were close behind him and pressing forward eagerly.

If he hesitated they would come up with him.

He crept to the very verge of the abyss and looked down.

Below him, but as it seemed at a frightful depth, was the top of the stone archway which forms one of the entrances to the market.

Could he but reach the archway, his position would of course be much improved, since then he would have an opportunity of reaching the ground.

But this seemed an utter impossibility.

The loud report of a pistol came upon his ears at this moment, and made him aware that he was seen.

The bullet whistled past his ear in very uncomfortable proximity.

This was an inducement to him to try any desperate expedient he might be able to think of.

He could see dimly the top of the stone archway below him.

It was broad, and he fancied he might be able to alight upon it.

At any rate he must make the effort. He had but two alternatives, either to fall into the hands of his foes, or to run the risk of getting down.

The latter was preferable, though it seemed certain death.

Cautiously Jonathan Wild lowered himself over the abyss, and hung down at the full length of his arms, his weight being sustained by the tight grasp which he kept upon the parapet with his hands.

Then he looked down.

The top of the stone arch was just below him.

It was exactly upon his feet.

But if he dropped upon it, should he be able to maintain his balance?

Would he not be more likely to rebound, and be unable to save himself from falling into the street below?

That seemed most probable.

He felt about for something to take hold of, supporting his weight by one hand only.

He was fortunate enough to encounter a small projection in the brickwork of the house.

He did not know whether it would be sufficient to sustain his weight, but nevertheless he grasped it tightly, and let go his hold upon the parapet.

He was now much nearer to the archway than he had been, and no longer hesitated about letting go his hold, though it was fraught with the utmost danger.

His heart turned sick when he let go, but almost before he had time to experience the sensation, he felt himself fall with tremendous force upon the stonework.

As he had from the first expected, the force with which he fell caused him to rebound.

He struggled desperately, and made frantic efforts to take hold.

But the smooth stonework eluded his fingers—they could not close upon it.

He felt he was falling.

He was on the balance.

He made another furious effort, and succeeded in hooking his leg, near the knee, over the stonework.

How convulsively he exercised those muscles!

But he was saved.

He hung down head foremost, and there was nothing to save him from falling except the hold which he had happened to take with that one leg.

He endeavoured to raise himself, and get into a less dangerous position.

For a long time he was unsuccessful, but at last he got astride over the archway.

He crouched down on the stones as close as he could, and embraced it convulsively, for a gleam of light came from above.

He turned his head and looked up.

The police officers were standing on the parapet of the house, waving their torches and endeavouring to peer into the abyss.

"There he is—there he is!" said a loud voice.

"Where—where?"

"I can just see him on the top of the archway over New-gate Market!"

"How could he have got there?"

"D—d if I know! There he is!"

"Fire at him—fire—fire!"

The police officers did not need twice telling.

CHAPTER CCCCLX.

THE POLICE OFFICERS CONTINUE THEIR HUNT AFTER JONATHAN WILD.

THEY could all see the dusky figure lying on the rather lighter-coloured stonework, and aiming their pistols they fired.

It was an irregular dropping volley, and the report of so many fire-arms raised strange reverberations in the neighbourhood.

"He's down! he's down!" was the next cry. "He's hit!"

The first part of this speech was correct, the latter was not.

As soon as he found that he was seen, Jonathan gave up the attempt to conceal himself upon the stonework.

At the risk of his neck, he moved and began to scramble down.

Could he but reach the iron gates all would be well, because they would afford him many a hand and foot hold.

But he was destined not to do so.

His hand slipped, and he fell heavily to the ground.

He reached the pavement with a dull crash, which the officers on the house-top heard plainly enough.

It was this that made them cry out, "He's down!"—and naturally enough they imagined that the thief-taker had been wounded.

It so happened, however, that not one of the bullets had touched him, which is not very remarkable, considering the darkness of the night, and consequently the difficulty of taking anything like an accurate aim.

The force of the fall knocked all the breath out of Wild's body, and for a moment or two he laid just where he had fallen quite senseless and apparently dead.

Soon, however, signs of life manifested themselves.

With the first sensations of returning animation, Jonathan Wild recollected his peril, and he endeavoured to rise to his feet.

He was terribly bruised, but he believed no bones were broken.

In a little while he found this to be correct, and he stood at his full height, gasping painfully for breath.

He was much hurt, but he bore the pain with the stoicism of an Indian when he was sure his bones were entire.

It was necessary, however, that he should take speedy steps to escape, or the officers would be upon him, for, upon looking up once more, he saw that they had abandoned the roof.

They had one and all hastened to descend when they found that the fugitive had fallen from the archway into the street.

But they had too much respect for their own persons to attempt to follow by the route he had taken.

Finding how still he lay, they believed there was no need for such great speed, though for all that, they lost no time in getting down into the street.

They entered one of the houses close at hand, which happened to have a window opening upon the tiles.

To descend the stairs and pass out of the front door took, of course, but a very little while.

Still it was long enough for Wild to recover from his state of unconsciousness, to rise to his feet, and to look about him for some place of concealment, for he felt that his powers were not equal to running a race.

His pursuers would easily overtake him.

He was afraid to enter the market, lest he should encounter anyone, and if they once heard he was within the enclosure it would be quickly converted into a kind of trap, for nothing would be easier than to surround it at every point of exit.

There was a doorway nearly apposite—it was a large, old-fashioned one, and he fancied he might conceal himself within it.

He could see no better hiding-place, so he crossed over and squeezed himself up in one corner.

"They will never think I have hidden here," he said.

"They will pass by without searching."

The doorway in which Wild took refuge on this occasion was very old fashioned—such a one as would be sought for in vain at the present day.

It projected into the street like a porch, and there were seats in it, and a little window at each side.

Through one of these little windows Jonathan Wild peeped.

He saw the officers, torches in hand, sally forth from the house from the top of which Wild made such a perilous descent.

They ran in a moment to the spot where he had fallen, and their astonishment was unbounded when they found that he had disappeared.

It looked like magic, and one of the officers said:

“He must have the devil to aid him!”

“Pho, pho! He must be somewhere close at hand! After such a fall as that he cannot have got far away. Search about quickly and well! You will find that he has crawled into some corner or other!”

It was the commanding officer who spoke.

“Oh, if I could but take that man’s life,” groaned Wild, “I should feel content!”

In obedience to the commands which they had just received, the officers dispersed themselves, and, holding their torches low down on the ground, commenced a rigid examination of every corner.

Wild felt that if he continued where he was he was as good as captured already.

But where could he go? How could he improve his position?

A faint noise attracted his attention.

He knew in an instant what it was.

Some one was removing the fastening, and was about to open the door close to which he stood.

He almost held his breath, and then a bold plan of action at once suggested itself to his mind.

He pressed himself close against the door.

As soon as the latch was raised he glided in like a spectre, and closed the door behind him.

It was a girl who opened the door.

Wild saw that at a glance.

Before she could give vent to the scream which was trembling on her lips, the thief-taker dashed his hand violently before her mouth, and stifled it.

“Silence!” he said, in a hoarse whisper—“silence! If you utter a sound I’ll twist your head off!”

The girl dropped down in the passage as though shot.

She was so terrified that she swooned outright.

“What’s the matter?” said a voice.

The door of a room was opened, and a man projected his head into the passage.

The darkness confused him, and he could not see Wild.

But the thief-taker could see this man, for a faint light came through the partially-opened door.

“What’s the matter?” said the voice again. “What is it?”

Wild was afraid that this man would push his inquiries further, so he took a pistol from his belt, and, grasping it by the barrel, struck the man a violent blow on the head with it.

He fell heavily half in and half out of the room.

Wild kicked him until he was within, and then he closed the door.

He was afraid that an alarm would be raised by these summary proceedings, and he listened intently.

But all within the house was still.

Finding this to be the case, Wild hastened to the front door again.

He ran his hand over it hastily, and felt the key, which he turned at once.

A roaring sound came from the street, as though there were many people in it.

“I must be quick!” he said—“quick—quick! This will be no place for me! I must be off! When or where shall I find a refuge from my enemies?”

Wild was suffering excruciating pain, and he was so bruised that he could scarcely move.

The danger of remaining where he was, however, was imminent, and so, despite his agony, he crept along the passage in the hope of finding some means of exit.

A dozen steps took him to the stairs.

There were underground kitchens to the house, and Wild felt inclined to descend the stairs which led to them.

He leaned over the bannisters, and looked down.

He abandoned this project in an instant, for he saw a stream of light, and caught a glimpse of somebody ascend.

“But if I don’t think something’s going on above,” said this person. “I’ll go and see, at any rate!”

It was an old woman who spoke, and Wild saw she carried a candle, which apparently had only just been lighted, for the illumination was feeble, and threatened every moment to become extinct altogether.

She was shading the light with her hand, so that nearly all the beams fell full upon her countenance.

“Curse the hag!” Wild muttered. “I must stop her, or she will go peeping and prying about, and I shall have my foes at my heels directly!”

How to stop the old woman without creating an alarm was a problem.

She was rapidly nearing the top of the stairs, and Wild had not decided what he should do, when, all at once, his foot caught against a mat.

This gave him an idea, and furnished him with a means of getting rid of the old woman.

To pick up this mat, which was a large oakum one, took Wild about a second.

Poising it in the air, he leaned over the bannisters and flung it with full force against the old woman.

Her flickering candle was extinguished in a moment, and being herself thrown off her balance, she fell backwards down the stairs with a grand crash.

“That will do!” said Wild.

All was profoundly still when the old woman reached the bottom of the stairs.

No doubt she had fainted either from the effects of her fall or from terror—most likely from both causes combined.

Wild was satisfied that she was silent, and he stood for a moment deliberating what he should do next.

Should he go upstairs or down?

Bang, bang, bang!

Jonathan started each time.

Some one was at the front door knocking for admittance, and with a vigour, too, that would quickly call the attention of any persons who might happen to be in the house.

Wild uttered a volley of curses.

Of course those clamoring for admission could be no other than his foes.

By some means or other they must have tracked him to that house.

Without pausing to recollect that he had left no clue by which they could follow him, Wild sprang rapidly up the staircase.

He reached the first landing in an incredibly short space of time.

The terrific knocking still continued.

Wild wondered it did not rouse all the inmates of the dwelling, for it threatened to split the door from top to bottom.

Several doors opened from this landing, but he could not make up his mind to enter any one of the rooms into which they led.

But he perceived a window which looked out upon the back of the premises.

He pressed his face against the little latticed panes and looked out.

The roofs of some out-buildings were beyond, and he fancied he might escape by crawling along them.

No sooner did he think of this than he opened the window silently and slipped out.

He closed it after him as well as he could, for he was desirous not to leave any trace of the route he had taken if he could possibly avoid doing so.

He closed the window, then, but he could not fasten it. This was immaterial.

Wild looked down.

A few feet below him was a large water tank, one half of which was covered with lead.

On to this he dropped without difficulty, for the distance was insignificant.

Beyond was some kind of out-building, and beyond that a wall.

Jonathan Wild was not in very good condition for such work, but the exigency of his position compelled him to summon all his energies.

The out-building was passed in safety, and he got on to the wall beyond.

There further progress seemed impossible.

Below him was a small yard, and on the opposite side of it was the back of the house.

"I will descend," muttered the thief-taker, "and if I can only enter that house, and leave it unperceived, I fancy I shall have destroyed all clue. Then I shall be able to rest—to rest!"

CHAPTER CCCCLXI.

NED CANTLE AND EDGORTH BESS ARE BESIEGED IN THE COTTAGE BY BANDITTI.

EVENTS crowd upon us.

Now that the chief actors in our story are so widely separated from each other, it of course follows that we are obliged to describe in rotation the different accidents which befall them.

It becomes necessary now that we should direct our attention to the fortunes of Edgworth Bess.

"Poor girl! she seemed to be the sport of a malignant destiny, for now, when she thought that for a time her troubles and persecutions would be over, they continued with unremitting severity.

So many incidents have been described since we last parted with her and her new friend Ned Cantle, that we feel it may be necessary to remind the reader that when we left them was after their long and tiresome journey from the city of Amsterdam.

They had been walking for many hours, and Edgworth Bess was quite worn out.

She had been compelled to rest by the wayside many, many times.

At length, however, Ned Cantle raised his arm and pointed to a small cottage on the borders of a wood, which was just visible in the distance, and as he did so he communicated the welcome intelligence that they were within view of their destination.

This news cheered the fair traveller's drooping spirits, and infused fresh strength into her exhausted frame.

Now that the end of her journey was in sight, it was an encouragement to proceed, because every step she took she could see brought her nearer and nearer to a place of refuge.

In his rough way, Ned Cantle cheered and encouraged her as well as he could.

Without the occurrence of any incident that is worth while for us to relate, the little cottage was reached.

But when she gained the threshold, Edgworth Bess felt as though she must sink to the ground, so greatly was she fatigued.

The cottage door was opened by a woman, whose personal appearance by no means prepossessed our heroine in her favour.

But she recognised Ned Cantle instantly, and a rapid sign was exchanged between them.

In a hoarse, grating voice the woman then desired them to enter, saying at the same time that they were welcome.

But Edgworth Bess disliked the tones of her voice, even more than she disliked the configuration of her countenance.

It was a large, flat, bloated-looking face, with an ugly apology for a nose stuck in the centre of it, and two small fiery-looking eyes.

She was tall and stout, and had a generally masculine appearance.

Her arms, which were bare almost to the shoulder, were very red, and were good specimens of the development of muscle.

She looked strong enough to fell an ox at one blow.

A general appearance of untidiness and dirt, however, was conspicuous, not only in her person, but in her attire, and in the cottage and its contents as well.

Indeed, it did not promise to be a very comfortable place to sojourn in, but Edgworth Bess consoled herself with the reflection, that if it was not comfortable it was safe.

She felt at last that she was beyond the power of Jonathan Wild, and that was almost all she cared for.

In a few words Ned Cantle explained to the woman the nature of his wishes, and as he had confidently expected, she immediately assented to their wish to take up their abode in the cottage for a little while.

A promise of liberal payment for her trouble had the effect of putting the woman in excellent humour, and she prepared a meal, which, if not so savoury as might be desired, was nevertheless welcome enough to the hungry travellers.

While they were discussing it, the door of the cottage was opened, and a man entered.

Ned Cantle recognised him in a moment, and a friendly greeting took place between them.

It was the husband of the woman who had entered, and so far as an unpleasant exterior was concerned they were an excellent pair.

He was a burly-looking man with large limbs.

His face was almost buried in hair.

His nose stood out from it, and was of a glowing red colour, while his forehead was so low as almost to be undistinguishable.

Like the woman, his eyes were red and fiery-looking.

Edgworth Bess gave one glance at the new comer, and then averted her eyes in disgust.

She could not conceal a slight shudder, although she tried hard to repress it, for the people, however sinister in appearance, were, she thought, disposed to be friendly towards her, and she could not afford to make them foes.

The man was willing enough to oblige Ned Cantle, and repeated the permission given by his wife, only he added, they could take up their quarters there as long as they liked, provided they paid well for it.

All this was very satisfactory, but still Edgworth Bess could not subdue the aversion which had sprung up in her mind on the contrary—in spite of her efforts it seemed to increase.

She pressed them to allow her to retire, and her request was at once attended to.

She was shown into a comfortable apartment.

She shivered as she threw herself upon the rude bed, and it was a long, long time indeed before sleep visited her eyelids.

But at last, thoroughly and entirely wearied out, she sank off to sleep, nor did she awake until the day was much advanced.

Ned Cantle and the occupier of the cottage sat conversing together until a late hour.

In the course of that conversation, Ned Cantle gave a partial account of the circumstances which had thrown him into the company of Edgworth Bess.

The man's eyes gleamed when Ned told him that he had with him more money than he should require to pay if he stayed there a twelvemonth.

At the same time he added, that in all probability their stay would be short—only a day or two, for Ned Cantle knew nothing of the state of affairs in England, and expected that Blueskin and Jack Sheppard would arrive in a day or two.

At last they retired; nor did they rise the next morning until a late hour.

After breakfast the man announced his intention of going out, and Ned Cantle started up to accompany him.

But Edgworth Bess felt such a horror of being left alone in the cottage along with the old woman, that she begged most earnestly that he would not leave her.

Ned Cantle seemed rather loth to give up his projected expedition; but he did so, and remained with Edgworth Bess.

The cottager set out alone.

That day and the next passed away smoothly enough.

On the morning following, Edgworth Bess ventured out alone.

She was longing for the appearance of her two protectors, and wondered what had caused them to be so late.

While at some distance from the cottage, she saw the cottager joined by three men on the borders of the wood.

Edgworth Bess shuddered as she beheld them, so repulsive and hideous was their appearance.

The four men conversed earnestly together, and pointed several times towards the hut; from which Edgworth Bess justly surmised that it formed the subject of their conversation.

At last they all disappeared among the trees.

Edgworth Bess had watched them throughout the whole of their conference, but they were so intently occupied that they did not see her.

When they were gone, she hastened to Ned Cantle, and told him all that she had seen.

The intelligence disturbed him; but he concealed as well as he could the apprehensions which filled his breast, for several circumstances had come under his own observation which had roused his suspicions.

He was careful, however, not to alarm Edgworth Bess, for it might turn out that his suspicions had no foundation.

He resolved, however, to keep a keen look-out upon everything.

Nothing was seen of the cottager during the whole of the day; and towards evening, when it was beginning to grow dusk, Ned urged Edgworth Bess to allow him to go upon a kind of reconnoitring expedition, with a view to ascertain whether they had any grounds for being afraid or not.

Reluctantly, Bess gave her permission.

Ned departed, but he was not long away.

When he returned, he found that the old woman had left the cottage during his absence.

At a glance, Edgworth Bess saw that Ned's countenance wore an anxious, uneasy expression, and she instantly feared the worst results would happen.

Ned, however, tried to cheer her spirits.

But he recollected that he had spoken somewhat incautiously about the amount of money he had in his possession, and that the cottager became greatly interested.

Ned knew him well, for their acquaintance had been of long standing.

He was aware that, although he professed to be a woodman, he in reality obtained his livelihood in a predatory manner, and in defiance of the laws.

But Ned trusted to that honour which is popularly supposed to exist between thieves.

Ned Cantle's suspicions were well founded.

Had he been so lucky as to have possessed a knowledge of the precise state of affairs, he would then and there have beat a retreat, and never have rested until he was far away.

But, with only his suspicions, it would have been unwise in the extreme to leave a place which had up to the present afforded them safe shelter, and might continue to do so.

The cottager would have been all right had he been ignorant that Ned Cantle carried with him such a large sum of money.

But the moment he possessed that knowledge he was a changed man.

He was in league with a gang of banditti, too, who infested the forest, and he was bound under a solemn oath to make his leader acquainted with the particulars of every chance of obtaining a good booty.

These banditti, with whom we are destined to become better acquainted ere long, had a secret hiding-place in the forest.

To this the cottager had repaired, and there had made a disclosure to his leader of the fact that a man and a girl had temporarily taken up their abode in his cottage, who possessed between them a large sum of money.

An attack was at once resolved on, and the night which followed the morning when Edgworth Bess saw the four men in consultation was fixed upon for the achievement of their purpose.

With these few words of explanation, we will return to our friends in the hut.

Finding that night was coming on, and that neither the man nor his wife made their appearance, Ned Cantle closed the door, and barricaded it as well as he was able.

His heart misgave him strangely, and he felt that something dreadful was about to happen.

Having secured the door, he went with Edgworth Bess to the upper storey of the house.

There were two rooms—one back and one front.

The latter commanded a view of the open country before the cottage.

The former looked on to the forest.

Ned Cantle stationed Edgworth Bess at the front window, and told her to be careful to conceal herself from the observation of anyone without, but, at the same time, to maintain a vigilant watch, and bade her call him in a moment if she saw anything peculiar or suspicious.

This done, he made his way to the back window.

By adopting this measure, he fancied he should ascertain whether or not his suspicions were justly founded, and also be prepared should any attack be made upon them.

The darkness was confusing, and Ned found that he could see but little.

Still, as he gazed down upon the ground, he fancied he could perceive shadowy figures gliding about.

The window was a latticed casement, and he determined to open it quietly to the extent of a couple of inches or so.

He would then be able to hear.

He did so.

He opened the window without making the least sound; but the moment he did so, the murmur of voices came upon his ears.

The voices were faint, and the speakers were evidently trying to speak as quietly as they could.

Ned strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, in the hope of being able to make out what was said.

But an occasional word spoken in a higher key, or with more emphasis than the rest, was all that reached him.

CHAPTER CCCCLXII.

THE BANDITTI MAKE AN ATTACK UPON THE COTTAGE, AND NED CANTLE MEETS WITH A MISFORTUNE.

This was an unsatisfactory state of things, for he was quite as badly off as before.

That the banditti meditated making an attack upon the hut was tolerably certain, but in what manner that attack would be made was more than Ned could tell.

Failing in his attempt to hear what was said, he next endeavoured to count the number of the banditti; but the darkness of the night and the manner in which they flitted about made this a difficult operation, for he was likely to fall into the error of counting them twice over.

After repeated trials, he became convinced that their number could not be less than seven.

This would be rather long odds for one man to contend against, who had no better place to stand a siege than a cottage composed of the fraillest materials.

And besides, the probability was that these seven men were not the whole of the force.

"I have no one to blame for this but myself," said Ned. "Had it not been for my stupidity in letting him know that I had a great deal of money, we should have been unmolested. It is all my own fault, and I deserve to be punished for my folly."

Ned Cantle reproached himself bitterly, but really it was an act of thoughtlessness such as almost anyone placed as he was would have been guilty of.

"It's no good!" he said. "I can't contend against such a gang as that. It's madness to think of such a thing. Seven to one is too long odds. However, I will not surrender easily. I will keep them at bay as long as I can, and perhaps I may keep them off until assistance arrives."

This was a forlorn hope, but Ned could console himself with no better.

He felt sure, however, that there was no more to be learned by remaining where he was, so he stole on tiptoe into the front room.

"Hush!" he said, in an impressive whisper.

Edgworth Bess was seated near the window, gazing anxiously out into the darkness.

But upon the entrance of Ned Cantle she started to her feet.

"What is amiss?" she said. "Tell me all; it will be better than leaving me to guess at it! I shall be sure to picture worse than the reality!"

"I will tell you," said Ned Cantle, "for you are brave, and ought to be made acquainted with your position. I must, then, admit that we are in a situation of extreme peril. At least seven men are collected at the back of the hut. They are conversing together, and no doubt intend to make an attack upon us!"

"Are they Wild's men?"

"Oh no!"

"Thank heaven for that!"

"They are German banditti."

"What can be their motive for the attack?—what have we done?"

"Why, we possess money, and they love it; and they have made up their minds to wrest it from us by main force."

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD DISCOVER THE COTTAGE IN RUINS.]

"Alas—alas!"

"Do not despair! If they should make an attack upon us—and I can scarcely doubt it—I will keep them at bay as long as I have power to do so."

"But what chance can you have against so many?"

"Very little, I am afraid."

"Then why resist?"

"We might as well do so as surrender. If we are conquered, they can but plunder us after all."

"But they will be exasperated."

"I cannot help that. Blueskin and Jack Sheppard would both be angry if I allowed myself to be robbed without making an effort to defend myself."

"Would they were here!" moaned Edgworth Bess.

"And so say I," rejoined Ned Cattle, heartily; "but if you will believe me, I expect their arrival every moment;

No. 97.—BLUESKIN.

and if I can only keep these wretches off till they do come, all will be well!"

"Do you think that there is any likelihood of their appearing before morning?"

"I do. They ought to have been here before this."

"Then there is hope?"

"Oh yes!—believe me, there is!"

Edgworth Bess was silent for a moment, and then she said:

"Tell me, Ned, and tell me truly—do the money and valuables you have about you represent a large amount?"

"Yes; much more than either Jack or Blueskin could afford or would be willing to lose."

"If it had not been so much —"

"What?"

"I should have advised you to conciliate these men."

"It would have been useless. They would never have been satisfied until they had wrested every penny from us."

"I hear nothing of them."

"No, nor I."

"Is not that strange?"

"I don't know what to make of it. Let us descend into the lower portion of the hut. It is just possible that we may then be able to learn something more."

Edgworth Bess willingly accompanied Ned Cantle, for she did not like to be alone and in darkness.

Upon reaching the lower room they listened.

No sound, however, of any alarming character came upon their ears.

A fresh thought occurred to Edgworth Bess.

Turning towards Ned, she exclaimed:

"I do not know whether you can inform me upon this point, but I am anxious to have it set at rest."

"What point?"

"The money and jewels in your possession. Blueskin gave them to you, did he not?"

"Yes."

"Do you know whence he procured them?"

"I do."

"Tell me then?" said Bess, anxiously.

"There's no harm in doing so that I see. If you must know, he took them out of old Jonathan Wild's house, and—"

Ned was interrupted by a cry of despair, which came from the lips of his listener.

Clasping her hands over her face, she burst into a flood of bitter tears.

Ned Cantle was puzzled, and as he gazed upon her his looks plainly expressed it.

He was rather alarmed at the violence of her grief, and was at a loss to know how he could soothe her.

"What has grieved you thus?" he said. "What have I done?"

"I understand all!" moaned Edgworth Bess. "I can comprehend the attack that is now about to be made. Had I known before what you have just told me I could almost have predicted it, or at any rate some similar misfortune!"

Ned Cantle looked at Edgworth Bess with the utmost astonishment, and well he might, for what she said was quite enigmatical to him.

"Explain yourself," he said, at length.

In a voice that was broken by sobs and choked by tears, she said:

"The curse of blood is on it—the curse of blood is on it! That money is accursed! We have had Jonathan Wild's money before, and it has always been the means of bringing us into difficulties. It is fate! While we have his gold, we shall have nothing but misery and misfortune—nothing—nothing! I can understand our suffering on the ocean now!"

Ned Cantle shook his head.

Like most men of his class, he was superstitious, but still he felt that he could not subscribe to such a belief as that.

But as for Edgworth Bess, she was completely overcome, and sank down into a chair, sobbing as though her very heart would break.

Poor girl! her thoughts were travelling back to the past.

She remembered each occasion when her friends happened to possess any of the thief-taker's ill-gotten wealth.

Above all, she remembered that morning when the first dissident words which had ever passed between herself and Jack Sheppard had been uttered—every incident connected with that parting came freshly upon her mind, and it was not strange that she should give way to her grief as she did.

Certainly, it would almost seem as though Wild's gold had some sort of a spell upon it, for whenever they had it in their possession, as she had said, some deep misfortune came upon them.

But in the present instance, when they were menaced by so horrible a danger, it was clearly to Wild's gold that the cause was to be traced.

That, and that alone, by exciting the cupidity of the man who occupied the hut, had brought the banditti down upon them.

Ned Cantle hardly knew how to console Edgworth Bess, and so he turned away and left her to herself, which was, perhaps, the most prudent course of action he could have adopted.

Let him have tried as he would, his efforts would not have been attended with the slightest amount of success.

Instead of wasting his time, he made his way towards the door of the hut, in the hope of being able to hear something that would enable him to form an idea of what they were about.

But ere he could reach it, he heard some one knock loudly upon it, and then a voice said:

"Open—open! Zounds! is the door to be closed against the owner of the place? Open—open, I say!"

Ned recognised the voice, but he made no attempt to open the door.

It was the old man who spoke, the individual to whom was most clearly to be attributed the present disagreeable aspect of affairs.

No doubt the banditti thought that by adopting this scheme they should be able to gain an entrance to the cottage without any difficulty, and then the inmates of it would be completely at their mercy.

But now that his suspicions were so fully roused as they were, it was not likely that Ned would suffer himself to be deceived by so shallow a device.

The old man knocked again.

Ned still took no notice.

After this a silence followed.

No doubt the banditti were holding a consultation.

Edgworth Bess had heard the knocking at the door, and the sound had caused her to look up, and almost to forget her grief, for she was a prey to the liveliest terror.

Ned Cantle was cool and collected, as indeed he always was when the hour of danger was at hand.

He had satisfied himself that all his weapons were in good order, and he knew he could do no more towards barricading the door than he had done already, and so he awaited the attack that would, he felt convinced, ere long be made.

"They must be a set of shrinking, cowardly wretches," he said, "or they would not linger as they do! What have they got to linger for?—why don't they begin at once?"

Ned Cantle was impatient for the worst to come, and yet somehow, as he stood there in suspense, a strange fluttering feeling came over his heart, such as he had never before felt in the whole course of his existence.

What it meant he could not tell.

It was not fear, he was quite sure of that.

Did it portend something?

His position was a perilous one, for how was he to cope with such a superior force?

It seemed nothing but madness to resist.

But he was buoyed up by the hope that ere that night had passed away, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard would make their appearance; and, indeed, had it not been for the probability of their arrival in time to rescue, he might not have made any resistance.

As the reader knows full well, his hope was destined to be destroyed.

It was impossible for either Blueskin or Jack Sheppard to succour him in any way.

CHAPTER CCCCLXIII.

NED CANTLE IS SHOT, AND EDGWORTH BESS IS MADE A PRISONER BY THE GERMAN BANDITTI.

"THEY are suspicious—it is easy enough to see that!" said some one, in a growling voice. "They are suspicious, and there's no knowing now how much trouble we shall have!"

These words were spoken by the captain of the forest banditti, and were addressed to the cottager after his unsuccessful attempt to gain an entrance.

He was a singular-looking individual.

A striped handkerchief was bound in a very peculiar manner over his brows and head, and tied in a large knot behind.

Over his shoulder he wore a belt, to which a ponderous sword was attached, while round his waist was another belt, in which were stuck two of the largest and clumsiest-looking pistols that had ever been manufactured.

The lower part of his countenance was covered with shaggy hair, and though his attire was rather shabby and very much the worse for wear, yet he had altogether a very ferocious and sinister look.

His face was bronzed, and bore the marks of many a serious wound.

The men under his control were a lot of bloodthirsty-looking villains, and were clad in every possible variety of costume.

It was clear that the discovery that the inmates of the cottage we fully upon their guard was a disagreeable one for them to make.

It would have suited them much better if they could have gained a stealthy admission to the hut, and taken their victims completely at unawares.

But now there was no hope of that, for, obtuse as the mental faculties of the German banditti might be, yet they could not but feel certain that Ned Cantle suspected something wrong was going on.

"It is no fault of mine!" said the woodman, in rather a surly tone. "When I left, all seemed right enough. I can't imagine what can have happened to raise their suspicions!"

"But they are raised, are they not?" said the chief.

"It isn't my fault!"

"Did I say it was?"

The woodman was silent, and the bandit chief stroked his beard and looked doubly ferocious.

"Never mind!" he muttered; "we will soon put an end to this job! We shall have a little trouble, I daresay, but most likely their boldness proceeded from the fact that they knew they had only one man to contend against.

They numbered altogether, including the woodman and the chief, about a dozen men, and it did not seem as though the enterprise before them would present many difficulties to being carried out.

The men were anxious, too, for the woodman had given them to understand that Ned Cantle carried a large sum with him.

It was an opportunity such as the banditti had not had for a long time past.

Several of them went to the back of the hut, and returned with a large piece of wood, which was evidently the trunk of some young tree.

This they intended to use as a battering-ram.

Considering the stoutness of this piece of timber and the number of men who carried it in connection with the frailness of the door which was to be destroyed, they seemed to have every chance of success.

Raising it in their arms in the required position, they made their way towards the door.

Arriving opposite to it, they, at a sign from their chief, ran forward with full force.

The blow was a severe one, but, owing to the admirable manner in which Ned Cantle had contrived to barricade the door, it only shook a little in its frame.

Ned heard these men coming, but he was not able to see what they were about.

As soon as the door received that tremendous blow, however, he raised both his pistols, and fired them in rapid succession.

The bullets passed clean through the door, and did fearful execution among the banditti who carried the trunk of the tree, two of whom fell to the earth lifeless.

This infuriated the chieftain to no slight extent.

Scarcely had the echoes of Ned Cantle's pistols died away than he drew the two formidable weapons we have mentioned from his belt, and fired through the door.

Ned had expected some such reply as this, and he had taken good care to remove himself out of danger.

The bullets from the bandit chieftain's pistols buried themselves harmlessly in the opposite wall of the hut.

Once more the bandits raised the trunk of the tree, having first removed the dead bodies of their comrades from their path.

They rushed forward with greater impetuosity than before.

But the door withstood this second blow, although it shook terribly.

The chief occupied himself in loading his pistols ready for future use.

Some startling German oaths came rattling from his lips when he saw that the second attempt was unsuccessful.

Ned Cantle fired again, but this time his shots were ineffective.

The chief returned them, and then said:

"Now, my lads, don't hold back—don't hold back! Forward! Down with the cottage!—level it with the earth!"

But his brave companions still persisted in holding back, and one of them ventured to mutter:

"They are fiends inside! It is not a man! Two of our comrades have fallen already, and who can tell who may be the next?"

Bang! came another shot through the door, for Ned had heard the bandits talking, and had fired in the direction of the sound.

Another fell to the earth.

This made things look rather serious, and the chief again poured out a string of oaths.

"Let us burn them out!" said the man who had before spoken—"let us roast them out of it, and see how they will like that! Roast them out!"

"Yes—yes!" said all, with one consent—"roast them out!"

The chief stroked his beard grimly.

The means proposed were the best he could think of, for by adopting them he should be able to effect his purpose with a greater amount of certainty, and with less danger to life and limb.

"Yes—that's it!" he cried. "We'll roast them! When they feel the fire, they will come out fast enough, I'll warrant you!"

This was quite enough for the men.

They dispersed themselves hurriedly, and quickly collected a large quantity of faggots that would burn with great fierceness when once ignited.

Ned Cantle heard them at work outside and fired through the door in regular succession.

But the banditti were careful enough to keep out of the way of the shots.

As soon as a sufficiently large quantity of wood had been heaped up outside the door, it was set light to.

It blazed up instantly.

The first intimation Ned received of what the banditti were about was the smoke which quickly began to roll into the cottage.

He knew then in an instant what had been done.

Soon he began to feel the heat of the burning wood, and the door began to be consumed.

The hut, however, was chiefly composed of wood, and owing to the direction of the wind, the flames spread, and with much greater rapidity than the banditti had expected.

In less than five minutes the whole of the building was one mass of flame.

Edgworth Bess screamed with terror, as she looked about her and saw how she was menaced with a frightful death.

The banditti had scarcely intended in the first instance to burn the hut to the ground, but now the flames had made such progress, all hope of saving the building was at an end.

Ned Cantle preserved his coolness in a most admirable manner.

The door fell in with a tremendous crash, and when it did so, he caught sight of the swarthy forms and faces of the banditti.

In an instant he levelled his pistols and fired.

Great confusion was the result, and then another pistol was fired by the captain of the gang.

It was a chance aim, but it struck Ned Cantle in the throat.

A piercing shriek burst from the lips of Edgworth Bess, when she saw her only defender fall.

She sprang towards him in an instant, and raised his head.

The blood poured from the wound in his throat in immense quantities.

The flames roared, the wood crackled, and the banditti shouted.

But Edgworth Bess heeded neither the one nor the other, the whole of her attention was absorbed by Ned Cantle's desperate condition.

The gallant fellow strove hard to speak.

But his voice failed him.

He could not articulate a word.

No words of ours can do anything like justice to Edgworth Bess's despair.

But before another moment had elapsed Ned Cantle's head fell back.

He no longer had the power to hold it up.

Edgworth Bess was frantic.

In accents of the wildest despair and grief, she called upon him to look up and speak to her.

But her appeals were altogether in vain.

The interior of the cottage was rendered by the flames as light as noonday, and the poor girl could see everything with the greatest distinctness.

She noted the changing appearance of Ned Cantle's countenance, and she feared that what she beheld foretold the rapid approach of death.

She heard the banditti shouting without, but she paid not the least attention to their cries.

Her only friend—the only person who had either the power or the will to defend her—was dying, and dying for her sake!

Hotter and hotter—stifling and more stifling grew the air within the hut.

Higher and higher mounted the flames—fiercely and more fiercely they burned.

The interior of the hut was like a furnace.

The poor girl felt the hot air blistering her cheeks, she felt that her lips were parched, that her tongue was cleaving to the roof of her mouth.

But all she felt concerned about was that the form of Ned Cantle was rapidly stiffening into death.

His eyes were beginning to assume a glassy look—they had already lost all power of expression.

She was sure that he was dying—that he was almost dead; at any rate, he was insensible to what was going on around him.

What was to become of her?

She would either perish in those leaping, fiery flames, or she would fall unprotected and unresistingly into the hands of the marauders who had been the cause of all this havoc.

A mist came before her eyes.

The form of Ned Cantle seemed to be sinking down—down so deep, and yet it remained constantly and clearly in sight.

The poor girl's senses were leaving her.

Dimly, very dimly, she fancied she heard the roar of voices, and the rush of footsteps.

Then she felt herself raised in the air—as it seemed to her, by some supernatural agency.

Afterwards she felt herself borne swiftly along.

Then she felt herself scorched by an intense heat.

This was so real—so much more vivid than the rest, that she was restored to consciousness.

She gave one hasty glance around.

That glance told her that she had been by some means or other carried out of the burning hut.

The fresh, cool night air blew gratefully upon her blistered cheeks, and she revived still more.

By whom had she been rescued?

Some one was carrying her—she knew not whom.

But by an effort she opened her eyes and looked up, and as she did so, a wild scream burst from her lips, and she lapsed into a state of utter unconsciousness.

The hideous face of the bandit chief was within a few inches of her own.

CHAPTER CCCCLXIV.

GIVES SOME INFORMATION CONCERNING THE PROCEEDINGS OF WILD JUNIOR.

NEVER had the good old city of London been in such a state of commotion as it was during the week which succeeded the execution of Jack Sheppard.

And truly, the events which had occurred were of a character well calculated to raise the popular excitement to its highest pitch.

In the first place there was the execution of Jack Sheppard himself.

That alone was quite enough to cause an uproar, considering the many escapes he had made and the daring feats he had performed.

But, then, in addition, there were the extraordinary incidents which had occurred at the foot of Tyburn Tree.

They were of an unparalleled character.

The story of how the sheriff had been imposed upon by an oddly-dressed little man was spread abroad of course with many exaggerations.

In those days the means for the rapid transmission of correct intelligence did not exist.

Most reports were propagated by word of mouth only, and, as everyone knows, a story never loses anything by telling.

The wretched apologies for newspapers which were then published—resembling the broadsides of a later date more than ought else—could not be depended upon for accurate information.

It was sure to be some garbled account that they contained, for journalism was then in its infancy.

Some flaring accounts were given; we can assure the reader.

The story about the little man with the odd-looking hat, who obtained possession of the dead body of Jack Sheppard and carried it off, was so strange a one that it could not fail to awake the keenest interest in every breast.

The mystery of the paper the sheriff had received, and from which all traces of writing had disappeared, was elucidated by coming to the conclusion that the devil was at the bottom of the whole transaction.

Many were indeed firmly of opinion that the little old man was no other than the evil one in disguise, who had come to carry off the body of his victim, so impatient was he to obtain possession of him.

Monstrous as this story was, it found many believers, and would have found still more, had not the rector of St. Martin's Church communicated the intelligence which he possessed.

That at once put an end to the idea that there was anything supernatural in the matter.

He communicated to the authorities the particulars of his singular interview with the little old man, and it was soon found that the description he gave of this character corresponded in all material particulars to that given by Sheriff Knobbles.

This established the fact that some such personage existed.

From what the rector stated, it seemed this singular being was some friend of Jack's, or of Jack's relations rather, and had adopted this scheme to obtain possession of the body.

There were many who were under the impression that Jack was not properly dead and buried, but now their suspicions were allayed, for the rector had stated that application had been made to him for permission to bury the body in St. Martin's Churchyard.

He also stated just what our old friend the German chemist wished him to state—namely, that the felon's relatives, now that they had got the body, were quite at a loss to know what to do with it.

Confidentially he informed the authorities that he had gone up to his room after refusing the request that had been made to him, and upon looking out of window he had seen some dark figures digging in the churchyard.

This seemed to set the whole matter at rest.

It was at once and very naturally concluded that Jack Sheppard had been buried in St. Martin's Churchyard; and the authorities, feeling that they had had bother and trouble enough with him already, thought that they could not do better than to allow him to remain there in peace.

In all probability this case of Jack Sheppard's would have been more looked into, had it not happened at the particular time it did.

But public attention was just then divided, and well it might be.

It caused a shock of astonishment to a great many persons when they found that Jonathan Wild, the celebrated thief-taker, was being sought after by the police-officers.

At first it was disbelieved that a warrant had been issued for his apprehension, but it was soon found that it was true enough, and that Jonathan Wild was a fugitive, compelled to fly for his life.

Fortune had changed with him indeed.

From being the pursuer he had become the pursued.

The account of the thief-taker's perilous and wonderful adventures in the ruins of his own house was devour d with the utmost avidity, and everybody looked out anxiously for fresh tidings.

It was this which had the effect of distracting the attention of the people at large, and which prevented them from dwelling upon the details of Jack Sheppard's execution.

We can safely say that upon no person in London was such an effect produced as there was upon Mr. Noakes, the Governor of Newgate, when he learned that a warrant was in force against Wild.

He trembled, and broke out all over in a cold perspiration.

His conscience accused him, and he quaked with fear, lest he should be the next.

He had been mixed up in a great many of Wild's proceedings, and he felt that the disclosure of his complicity in them would cost him his situation, if not his life.

Indeed, so greatly alarmed was he that he felt strongly tempted to resign his situation, and leave the country while he was able to do so.

But the governorship of Newgate was such a comfortable post that he felt he should not like to give it up without more pressure was applied, and so he resolved to stay and face the matter out, for he thought he was perhaps after all frightening himself with a shadow.

He had confidence in Wild's resources, and doubted not that he would eventually get the better of his foes.

So after several hours' reflection, Mr. Noakes got himself into a more comfortable state of mind.

But can the reader imagine the effect which the intelligence of his father's danger would have upon Wild junior?

It will be remembered that this worthy son of a worthy parent had been seriously injured in his attempt to detain Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, and in making his escape from the burning house.

For some time it was doubtful whether he would recover; but Wild junior was destined to die a different death, and so he got better.

When he heard about his father he jumped upright in bed with astonishment.

He never said a word, but, after glaring wildly about for a moment or so, fell back.

He had not swooned.

As soon as he was alone he muttered:

"D—n me, if I didn't think the guv'nor would get in for it some day or other! I always thought it! He is such a d—d fool! What shall I do? His game's up, I feel assured of that! It's all over with him! He's going down—he's sinking, and if I don't look d—d sharp after myself I shall sink with him! That will never do, though! Let me think. How can I turn this to my advantage?"

George Wild set his brain to work.

He had the inventive faculty largely developed, and it was not long before he made up his mind what to do.

"Curse these wounds!" he said. "I am afraid they will interfere with me greatly. Never mind, they might be worse! I really think I am well enough. I will try it, anyhow. If I am not quick, I shall lose the chance!"

Wild junior at once set about getting out of bed and attiring himself.

This he found to be no easy task, but he accomplished it nevertheless.

He was very weak, and his wounds and burns pained him excessively.

He felt, however, that it was necessary for him to make an effort, or else he would be involved in the destruction that had descended upon his parent.

Wild junior had decided what to do.

It gave Mr. Noakes a bit of a turn when he saw him coming downstairs, but when Wild junior announced his intention of leaving the house, he was exceedingly well pleased.

He was glad of the prospect of getting rid of him.

Before going, however, Wild junior went into the governor's private office.

He took up a pen and dipped it in the ink.

Then, producing a pocket-book, he rummaged among its contents until he found a small piece of folded paper.

He chuckled as he unfolded it and smoothed it out upon the desk.

"Ha, ha! I thought it would come to this some day or other! Oh, I'm a clever chap—very clever! I am always on the look-out for a rainy day! Now, if I had not taken the trouble to obtain this slip of paper, I should have been done for. As it is, my fortune's made. I shall go abroad and live like a gentleman!"

Wild junior dipped his pen in the ink again.

The piece of paper which he had taken from his pocket-book was a blank check.

How he had obtained it none knew but himself.

"I wonder what would be a safe amount?" he muttered. "I must be careful! If I ask for too much I shall get into trouble—perhaps be found out! But then it won't do to ask for too little!"

Wild junior hesitated, and dipped his pen into the ink again.

"I'll try twenty-five," he muttered. "Yes, I'll try twenty-five. I should think there would be that much, and a very nice sum indeed. Yes, it shall be twenty-five!"

He filled up the check as follows:—

"Pay G. Jidlow (my son) twenty-five thousand pounds.

"NATHAN JIDLOW."

"Nathan Jidlow!" said Wild junior, as he put a bit of a flourish under the signature—"Nathan Jidlow! What a rum name it does look to be sure! Whoever would think that Jonathan Wild could be spelled out of Nathan Jidlow by simply shifting the letters? Ah! the guv'nor's clever in his way—oh, yes, decidedly clever—but he's a d—d fool by the side of me!"

With this very diffident remark, George Wild carefully blotted the check.

He then held it up and examined it carefully.

"All right!" he said, after a pause. "All right! There's no mistake about that! It could not look more genuine! Ah! what a good thing it was now that I should fill up my spare time by practising to write like the guv'nor—it's come in useful! How clever I must have been, too, to find out what bank he put his money into, and that the account was opened in the name of Nathan Jidlow, and not Jonathan Wild! Ah! that was a glorious discovery, and when I made it I felt I could not rest until I had got a blank check. I knew it must come in useful some day or other, and the day has come!"

Satisfied that all was quite right, Wild junior put the check into his pocket-book again and prepared to start.

"Twenty-five thousand pounds!" he muttered, as he went along the street in the direction of the bank. "A swinging sum that, and no gammon! Now, I must be careful in the extreme not to excite suspicion!"

George Wild was quite right.

Jonathan had taken the precaution to provide against a rainy day, by depositing in a bank a very large sum of money.

It was done in the name of Nathan Jidlow—a name formed, it will be found, by the transposition of the letters in his own name.

This was an additional security.

He fancied he had kept this a secret from everybody, but, as we have seen, his son somehow or other managed to find it out.

He did not know how much there was in the bank to Jonathan Wild's credit, but he believed it was something over twenty-five thousand pounds.

This was a handsome sum, and he would be satisfied if he could obtain possession of it.

His father might then—to use George's own words—"take his luck."

There was one precaution which Wild had taken that militated against him, and turned in his son's favour.

The money deposited he had made up his mind not to touch until compelled by adverse circumstances to do so.

He was afraid he might find it impossible to go to the bank himself, and so certain did he feel about keeping the whole affair a profound secret, that he left instructions that when a check was presented the cash was to be given to the bearer without hesitation or delay.

By adopting this plan Wild thought he was making himself quite secure, for as he would never apply for the money except upon an emergency, it might have been awkward if the bankers had refused to hand over the money to anyone but the depositor.

And so we see Wild suffered for his own cleverness.

Wild junior was not acquainted with this interesting fact, and he entered the bank with considerable trepidation.

With an assumption of great ease and confidence, he deliberately took out his pocket-book and handed the check to the clerk.

He was somewhat alarmed when he saw the clerk, after glancing at the check, carry it into a private office that was divided from the bank by a half-glass partition.

Wild junior fixed his eyes apprehensively upon the door through which the clerk had passed.

After the lapse of about a minute, which seemed an age to George, an elderly gentleman with a bald head emerged, and came towards that portion of the counter at which he was standing.

"You say you are Mr. Jidlow's son?" said the elderly gentleman.

"Yes, sir," returned George, calmly.

"All right! How will you take it—gold or notes?"

"Notes."

"Very good. Please to write your name on the back of the check, and then all will be right."

George Wild was so excited that he could scarcely hold a pen.

But, mustering up his courage, he wrote "George Jidlow" on the back of the check, and ten minutes afterwards left the bank with a roll of notes in his pocket, amounting to the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds!

CHAPTER CCCCLXV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD START OFF IN QUEST OF EDGORTH BESS.

HAVING glanced in succession at the various characters in this narrative, it now becomes our duty to revert to the proceedings of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

Alas! a sad discovery awaited them at that ruined hut on the borders of the forest!

The reader will remember that, under the guidance of the deformed son of the Widow Graacht, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had travelled from Amsterdam, and when we saw them last they had arrived at a spot from which a view of the forest could be obtained.

Towards this they now proceeded at a quickened pace.

Upon closer approach, however, they perceived a cloud of smoke rising, apparently, from the ground.

Jack Sheppard was the first to perceive it, for all the way he was on the look-out to catch sight of the cottage containing Edgorth Bess.

He remembered their last parting, and reflected that, since then, they had been allowed no opportunity of having an explanation with each other.

Now that the moment was, as he believed, at hand, he trembled violently, and wondered how she would receive him.

With these thoughts passing through his mind, he kept a sharp look-out before him, and caught sight of the wreaths of smoke.

"Look, Blueskin!" he said. "What is that yonder?"

What can be the meaning of that smoke?" Blueskin looked, but he could give his companion no information; and yet, as he gazed, he felt his heart sink within him.

He turned round towards their elfish-looking guide.

But he shook his head, and this was the only reply they could elicit.

Whether he meant that he did not understand the question put to him, or whether he did not know what the smoke meant, was rather hard to say.

Both Blueskin and Jack, without knowing exactly why, were much depressed in spirits.

Nevertheless, they advanced even more quickly than before, and seemed altogether unconscious of fatigue.

When within a short distance of the wood, the elf-like boy uttered a strange cry, and rushed forward.

Our friends followed him.

They more than suspected something was amiss.

The boy bounded on before them at a speed of which they would have believed him incapable.

In spite of all their efforts they could not overtake him, nor would he attend to any of their demands to pause.

When he stopped, it was near the spot from which the smoke ascended.

He glared around him in evident dismay, and then he cried, in his peculiar guttural voice:

"Here was the cottage——"

"Here?" thundered Jack.

"Yes."

"Then, where is it now?"

The boy shook his head.

Jack Sheppard clasped his hands over his eyes.

"Again disappointed!" he murmured. "Shall I ever see her again?"

Blueskin turned towards the guide.

"Tell me again!" he exclaimed. "Are you sure this is the place where the cottage stood?"

"Yes, yes—quite sure!"

"What can have happened? What can have reduced it to ashes? Can you tell us?"

The boy shook his head.

Jack Sheppard gazed sadly upon the smouldering ruins that alone served to mark the spot where the cottage had stood.

What could have happened to Edgorth Bess now?"

He never suspected the true state of affairs, nor anything half so terrible.

Not so much as a wall was left to show that the ruins were those of a human habitation.

"The conflagration has been recent," said Blueskin.

"This fire, probably, has not been burning many hours."

"But where is Edgorth Bess?"

"There I am puzzled."

"She is lost!"

"Nay, do not give way either to despair or grief! You must not forget that she was under the immediate protection of Ned Cantle, in whom I have every confidence."

"But the fire?"

"May be the result of an accident."

Jack shook his head.

Somehow, although he wished to do so, he could not bring himself to believe that this was the true cause.

"If so," Blueskin continued, "Ned would remove her to some place of safety."

"But he would be here to tell us where they had gone."

"Perhaps he has not had time."

"My heart is heavy, Blueskin. I am afraid there is bad news in store for us."

"I fear so too."

"How are we to find out what has occurred? Tell me what is the best thing we can do! I had looked forward to this moment for so long! I had counted so much upon this meeting—that—that——"

"You feel yourself incapable of anything like clear thought."

"I do—I do!"

"And I don't wonder at it!"

"But you, Blueskin—you will try and think?"

"I will!"

Just as Blueskin spoke, the boy, who had been searching about, uttered a cry which had the effect of immediately attracting our friends' attention.

"Here—here!" he cried, in a hoarse voice.

Blueskin and Jack hastened towards him.

He was pointing down at some object which was half buried by the debris of the fire.

It looked like a human form.

Our friends at once set about the task of removing the rubbish; and, when they had done so, they found that their suspicions were well founded.

It was a human form.

Badly burned and scorched, though, it was; and it had almost lost all signs of humanity.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Blueskin, suddenly—"it is—and yet, it cannot be—yes—yes, it is Ned Cantle!"

Blueskin was right.

It was the body of Ned Cantle they had discovered.

Jack Sheppard bent forward, and a groan came from his lips.

"What are we to think of this?" he said.

"I am perfectly bewildered! I know not what to think!"

As he spoke, Blueskin stooped down in order to make a closer examination of Ned Cantle's body.

The result of this was that he saw the ghastly-looking wound which the pistol-bullet had inflicted in Ned's neck.

"There has been foul play here!" he said, as he perceived it. "But to whom to attribute it I know not!"

"Jonathan Wild! It is his work!"

"I can scarcely think that," said Blueskin, doubtfully.

"Oh yes, it is that villain's work! He has spies everywhere! He must have seen her! He has slain Ned Cantle, the poor girl is once more in his power, and all that we have done has been done in vain!"

Jack Sheppard's grief was dreadful to witness.

Blueskin could not help thinking that the thief-taker was at the bottom of this outrage, simply because he could not think of anyone else who would have the least motive to be guilty of it.

And yet, if he believed this, he felt that he should be compelled to give Jonathan Wild credit for more cleverness than he believed him to possess.

Could he but have fixed the deed upon anyone else, Blueskin would have dismissed from his mind all idea that Jonathan Wild had anything to do with it.

But he could not think of anyone whose purpose it could serve to slay Ned Cantle, carry off Edgworth Bess, and burn down the hut in which she had taken refuge.

"His pockets have been turned inside out!" he said at length, addressing his companion.

But Jack paid no attention to his words.

He was wholly absorbed by his deep grief, and was past heeding any trivial circumstances.

In his own mind he felt convinced that Edgworth Bess was once more in Jonathan Wild's power, and such being the case, his position was much worse than it was before.

He would not be able to return to London now without running the greatest risk.

But the thought which gave him the greatest anguish was that Jonathan Wild would inform Edgworth Bess that he (Jack) had been strangled at Tyburn.

He would give the world to keep that knowledge from her, for if she was to know it, he felt that he would rather the information should come from the lips of anyone than from those of his enemy the thief-taker.

That would be horrible.

The appearance of the place was what might be expected from Jonathan Wild. Indeed, everything seemed to point to the fact that he, and he only, had been guilty of the deed.

Where was Edgworth Bess now?

Perhaps, Jack thought, on her way to England, in the safe custody either of the thief-taker himself or some of his myrmidons.

While Jack Sheppard was suffering himself to be the prey of these agonising feelings, Blueskin was bending over the body of Ned Cantle.

He deeply regretted his untimely fate, and although he had known him but for a short time, yet Ned had shown himself to be a stanch, sincere friend.

Blueskin was already deeply indebted to him, and had hoped that they should be companions together in those bright days which he hoped and anticipated were not far off.

But that hope was defeated.

Ned Cantle was a corpse.

Beyond question, he had received his death-wound in defending poor Edgworth Bess from her enemies.

Not until he had fallen would the persecuted girl be in the hands of her foes.

Blueskin put his hand upon the body, and found it was quite warm.

There was nothing surprising in this, for the ashes and rubbish with which he had been partially covered, would have more than sufficed to keep up the temperature of his body.

As a kind of forlorn hope, however, Blueskin placed his hand over his friend's breast, and as he did so he fancied he could detect a faint fluttering movement.

Directly he was sensible of it, he called out:

"Jack—Jack! He lives—he lives!"

"Who?" asked Sheppard, absently.

"Why, Ned Cantle, to be sure!"

"Does he?"

"I hope and believe so. If he does, we shall be able to learn what has happened, and to what extent our suspicions are justified."

Hearing these words, Jack came closer to the prostrate body.

"Water—water!" cried Blueskin. "Fetch some water! If we sprinkle some of that upon him, and pour a little of this brandy down his throat, he will probably be restored to consciousness."

The deformed boy, understanding that water was required, led the way to a well at the back of where the hut had stood, and from which the inhabitants procured their supply of this necessary fluid.

Jack brought some in a pail.

A portion was cast upon Ned Cantle's face, and the strong shudder which ran through his frame proved clearly enough that life was not yet extinct.

Blueskin had provided himself with some brandy, and he cautiously poured a little down Ned Cantle's throat.

It was swallowed, though with great difficulty.

Then Blueskin had the satisfaction of seeing him open his eyes.

He shuddered again.

Blueskin bent over him.

"Do you know me?" he said.

Ned nodded.

"Too late—too late!" he murmured faintly.

"I know that, but speak—tell us—where is Edgworth Bess?"

"Alas—alas!"

"Where is she?"

"Gone—carried off!"

Jack groaned.

This he imagined was confirmation of his fears.

"Where—by whom?" asked Blueskin. "How came you shot? Who burnt the cottage down?"

Ned Cantle made several efforts to speak.

But he could not.

A gasping noise came from his throat.

He gazed into Blueskin's eyes with a peculiar meaning. Our friend understood he wished to be raised up.

He lifted his head.

Then, after another effort, Ned spoke.

"Ger-Ger-man banditti!" he said, gasping at every syllable. "Edgworth Bess—carried off—into—forest—there, there!"

CHAPTER CCCCLXVI.

JONATHAN WILD RUNS SOME AWFUL RISKS, AND HAS A PECULIAR ADVENTURE.

It is high time that we took a peep at the proceedings of Jonathan Wild, who was last left in such a truly fearful position.

From the top of the wall Wild looked down into the yard many feet below him, and felt how pleased he should be if he could only reach it.

There was a house beyond the yard, and if he could but enter that and leave it unperceived, he would succeed in destroying all clue.

After that, he told himself, he should be able to rest.

Oh, how pleasantly that simple little word sounded in the ears of the thief-taker!

What a pleasure it would be if he could only lie down and repose his weary limbs!

He felt spent with the exertions he had already made, and was quite certain that he could not continue them.

The injuries he had sustained in falling from the top of the arch into the street were truly fearful, and no one save the possessor of that iron frame could have put up with them as he did.

Still he suffered excruciating pain, and every time he drew his breath fresh agony was inflicted.

Although no bones were broken, he was terribly bruised and shaken.

Not a single limb in his body had escaped.

Strong as his inclination was to descend, Wild looked doubtfully when he saw how far the yard was below him.

After his last experience, he was not exactly in the humour to risk another fall.

And yet he had no other choice.

He must either descend or remain where he was and fall into the hands of his foes.

He could not tell how soon they would be upon his track.

He shuddered.

"It is a frightful depth!" he muttered, "and yet—" curses on them—I must descend! Let me see if there is anything I can grasp by which I can assist myself!"

The thief-taker crawled further along the wall.

Coming presently to an angle of it, he looked down.

A cry of joy almost escaped his lips when he caught sight of a water-butt.

This was more than he had hoped for.

Without another moment's delay, he lowered himself down, and found that his arms were long enough to enable his feet to rest on the edge of the butt.

Having gained this position, his further progress was easy enough, and in less than a moment he was standing in the yard, which was an enclosed place having an area of about half a dozen yards.

Now that he was down, Wild could see much better about him, and almost the first object upon which his eyes rested was a door.

He glided quickly towards it.

He placed his ear against the panel and listened.

But though he strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, he could not distinguish the faintest sound that would indicate the presence of anyone on the other side of it.

So far all was well, and with a trembling hand he raised the latch and pushed open the door to the extent of about a couple of inches.

Finding no notice was taken of this, he felt himself emboldened to enter.

He opened the door swiftly, entered, and closed it after him, almost without causing a sound.

The passage of the house into which he had intruded was profoundly dark.

No one seemed to be about, and the thief-taker, after a brief pause, ventured to advance.

A faint reflected light fell full upon the various objects before he had taken many steps, though from what source it proceeded he could not tell.

In all probability his eyes were becoming accustomed to the darkness.

At length he perceived a fanlight over the front door, and through this came a feeble light.

This was a guide to him in his progress.

He rested his hand on the balusters of the staircase that led to the upper portion of the house.

But the silence of the grave continued to prevail.

So silent was it, that Wild felt it would be some relief to him to whisper his thoughts.

"I am lucky," he said—"very lucky! Surely all is well now! This place is silent. No one is about. The front door is only a few paces distant. I can hear nothing of my foes. Perhaps I have already eluded them. At all events, when I have passed out of that door into the street, all clue will be lost. Oh, curse these pains—they seem as though they would pull me to the ground!"

Jonathan was really suffering extreme pain, for the injuries he had received seemed to tell upon him more and more.

He clutched the banisters tightly for support, and then feeling a little stronger, he strode towards the front door.

But even here, although he was, as he thought, so near to freedom, his caution did not desert him.

Upon placing his ear against the panel, he caught the sound of a footstep in the street.

Perhaps it was that of some chance pedestrian; but still, if it was, it would be good policy of him to wait until he had passed by, because if no one saw him leave that house, the better it would be for him, as his chief object was to leave no clue behind by which he could be followed.

He listened to the footstep.

"Curses on him!" exclaimed Wild, suddenly—"he is coming nearer. Yes, yes—he is coming nearer!"

There could be no doubt about it.

The footstep was certainly approaching, for as Wild listened, it sounded plainer and plainer in his ears.

"It is some one coming to this house!" said the thief-taker, in accents of alarm. "Can it be possible that anything so unlucky is about to happen? No, no! And yet, yes—he comes!"

Wild could no longer cheat himself into the belief that the footstep he heard was not rapidly approaching the house.

It was a man's step.

He could tell that by the confident, decided manner in which the foot was placed upon the ground.

He heard the man ascend the steps, and pause just outside the door.

Wild felt himself become bathed in perspiration.

Was he after all about to be discovered?

The person outside did not knock.

After a little while, Jonathan heard a key thrust rather impatiently into the keyhole.

"He is coming in—now what shall I do?" asked the thief-taker.

While he asked himself the question, he recovered his composure, and decided upon the course of action he would pursue.

Like a shadow he stole along the hall until he came to the foot of a flight of stairs.

Up these he went backwards, one at a time.

The thief-taker thought that in all probability the new comer would enter one of the rooms on the ground floor before he ascended the stairs.

If so, all would be well.

He had only to remain where he was for a few minutes, and then when silence reigned again to descend, creep along the passage, open the door, and be off.

"The door is only on the latch, then!" murmured the thief-taker, as the new comer entered.

The man closed the door behind him with a bang.

The sound caused Wild to start violently.

But his heart sank when he heard him begin to bolt and otherwise secure the door.

This man was evidently the last one to come in, and he was making all secure before he retired to rest.

Wild mounted a step or two higher.

Having fastened the door, the man came blundering along the passage.

The thief-taker now began to wonder whether the man would enter one of the rooms on the ground floor as he fancied he would.

Suppose he ascended the stairs, how then?

Wild had not thought of that, and he fairly held his breath with suspense.

Almost instinctively, as it seemed, the thief-taker, as the man approached the bottom of the staircase, went up higher and higher.

In another moment his worst fears were confirmed, and he cursed himself for having adopted the plan he had.

Now that it was too late, he saw clearly enough that he had made a mistake.

He ought to have entered one of the rooms on the ground floor.

Or even if he had stood behind the door, with his back pressed closely against the wall, he would have escaped detection.

If he had done this, how easy it would have been for him to have slipped out!

It was no good, however, to vex himself with thinking about that.

All his attention was required in taking measures to elude the observation of this man.

As we have said, the further he advanced along the passage, the higher Wild went up the stairs.

Whatever lingering doubts he might have had concerning the man's destination were now dispelled.

He began to ascend the staircase.

The most horrible imprecations rose to the thief-taker's lips, but he did not dare to utter them.

Oh, how delighted he would have been if he could have in some way compassed this man's destruction!

He felt almost like some wild animal thirsting for blood.

He was obliged to conquer the inclination, because he could not think of any means by which he could slay this man without running the risk of creating an alarm.

Up the stairs he went—not backwards now as he had done before, but forwards, so as to make the best of his way with the smallest possible amount of noise.

He had got the start, and maintained it easily.

Jonathan Wild thought he could not do better than continue to mount the stairs, allowing the man to follow him, and not pause until the man had entered one of the rooms.

The reason Wild did this was because he feared to open one of the doors, lest he should find the room occupied by some one.

[JONATHAN WILD IS MENACED WITH A FRESH DANGER.]

An immediate discovery would be the result.

Accordingly Wild felt himself driven higher and higher up the stairs.

The man did not pause on any of the landings, but continued to make his ascent at one regular speed, as though he knew he had a certain height to go, and that it was best done deliberately.

Oh, the state of mind in which the thief-taker was at this moment!

Just when he had felt himself on the very verge of completing his escape from the officers.

Just when he was congratulating himself that all was well—that he had thrown his pursuers off the track, and that he should be able to obtain that rest of which he felt so badly in want, the entrance of this man had spoiled all.

If he had been just a little bit earlier, or just a little bit later, all would have been right enough.

Jonathan could not help making these reflections, and yet they aggravated him almost beyond endurance.

No. 98.—BLUESKIN.

But all was to no purpose.

Up the stairs the man came, and Wild was compelled to ascend before him.

The attic region was now very close at hand.

Things would have to come to a crisis soon, if a change was not made.

Wild began to grow desperate.

Every moment that was thus wasted was of the utmost consequence to him.

The police officers would extend their researches, and he might be tracked to the house in which he now was before he could leave it.

If cursing could have killed anyone, the man who was mounting on the stairs would have been a dead man long ago.

But curses were impotent.

Only one more flight of stairs remained, and up these Wild went.

These stairs only led to the garrets.

It was just possible that the man might pause on the landing below.

Jonathan was only able to retain this hope for about a minute.

In the same dogged, deliberate manner as before, the man continued his ascent, so now it was quite clear the topmost story of the house was his destination.

Wild could scarcely have believed that it was possible for him to be so trapped.

At last he found he could go no higher.

He must either stand and face the matter out, or take refuge in one of the attics.

The latter was the course Wild resolved upon.

He felt that it was folly for him to hesitate about which door he should open.

It was a perfect matter of chance, and he might just as well take one as the other.

Stretching out his hand, he felt for the latch of the door nearest to him, and raising it, stepped into the ~~chamber~~ beyond.

A faint cry of alarm and astonishment saluted his ears as soon as he closed the door behind him.

Jonathan had not expected to find the attic tenanted, and when he found it was, the discovery gave him a bit of a shock.

Before he could do more than just notice that a woman was sitting down by the fire engaged in sewing, the door was opened, and the man who had caused Wild all this difficulty by following him up the stairs entered.

"Hullo!" he said roughly. "What's the meaning of this? Who the devil are you?"

The last part of the speech was addressed to Wild.

The woman uttered a faint scream, and started to her feet.

Nothing would have given the thief-taker so much joy as to have slaughtered these two persons on the spot.

But it would not do just then to give way too much to his feelings.

He must dissemble.

Ever fertile in invention, and ever ready to see the best way out of a difficulty, the thief-taker decided instantly what he should say and how he should act.

The man who had entered had seized him rather roughly by the collar of his coat, as he made the inquiry we have recorded.

But Jonathan made no attempt to shake it off.

In quite a calm voice he said:

"If you won't excite yourself, I will tell you how you can earn a large sum of money."

CHAPTER CCCCLXVII.

FOLLOWS THE FALLEN FORTUNES OF JONATHAN WILD.

THE contrast between these two men was really quite remarkable.

The man who had just entered was in a state of furious excitement.

Jonathan Wild was perfectly calm.

He did not move a muscle while he uttered the words with which the last chapter concluded.

It was only an assumption of calmness, however—nothing would have given him greater pleasure than to have strangled the man upon the spot.

But it was necessary to dissemble.

He felt that upon this new comer depended his life and liberty. If he could win him over to his interests, well and good; but if he failed, and the man raised an alarm, his fate would be sealed, for the officers would be quickly upon him.

After Jonathan had spoken, the man stood perfectly still, glaring at him as though he did not comprehend what had been said.

Perceiving this, Jonathan repeated his words:

"You can earn a large sum of money in a very little while," he said, "if you will be silent and obey my instructions."

"What do you want me to do?"

As he spoke, the man released the hold which he had taken upon the collar of Wild's coat.

The thief-taker immediately put his hand into his pocket and drew out a handful of gold.

Pressing it into the man's hand eagerly and quickly, he continued in the same calm even tone:

"Take that as an earnest—as a small portion of the amount you will earn."

The man looked surprised, as well he might, for he could not conceive what service he could render to anyone that would be worth even as much money as he had already received.

The woman, too, whose countenance at first bore an expression of alarm, came a step nearer, and gazed upon what was going forward in speechless amazement.

"Now," said Wild, "what I want you to do is to hide me somewhere, and if anyone comes to inquire whether you have seen a person answering to my description, you must answer No!"

The man whistled.

"Oh!" he said, "I see it all now plain enough—the grabs are after you."

Wild nodded.

"It is so," he said; "but if you feel inclined, you can assist me to escape, and put a good sum into your pocket at the same time."

"Well, I don't mind if I do," said the man; "but first of all, I should like to have a look at your face; I fancy I know your voice, but I cannot recollect who you are."

"Never mind the light," said Wild, more hastily than he had yet spoken. "There is no time to lose. First of all show me a hiding-place; if you don't, you will lose the chance of earning the money I have promised."

A miserable little oil lamp was burning on the chimney-piece.

The wick wanted trimming badly, and it scarcely served to light the wall close to which it stood.

While Wild was speaking, the man strode hastily across the room and took it up.

Trimming the wick with his fingers, he hastened back to the spot upon which Wild stood.

He held the lamp aloft, so that its principal rays fell upon the countenance of the thief-taker.

"Jonathan Wild!" exclaimed the man, in the utmost astonishment. "I thought I knew your voice. You don't mean to say the grabs are after you?"

Jonathan Wild had the greatest difficulty in subduing his passion. He was ready to bite his tongue off, so angry was he, to think he should have told the man what he had.

But it was in vain to regret; the words he had spoken could not be recalled.

"Come, come," he said, "are you willing to assist me? Yes or no? Delay will be fatal to me—every moment I expect to hear the officers upon the stairs."

"And a good job too," said the man. "Here, take your money—I would not aid you to escape for a thousand times as much as you possess. Do you remember George Wood?"

"Never mind George Wood," said Wild. "Think again; you will find that it will answer your purpose best to accept my offer."

"George Wood was my wife's brother," said the man, fiercely; "you did not know that, Jonathan Wild. You know well you gave false evidence against him, and had him executed at Tyburn last year."

Wild uttered a growl.

He felt strongly tempted to rush forward and with one blow put an end to this man's life; but his position was so truly desperate that he felt he dared not do so.

As he had said, he expected to hear every moment the officers on the stairs, and after the delay that had already taken place, he felt certain that his only chance of escape was to win this man over to his interests.

This seemed no easy task, for immediately after having spoken, the man placed his back against the door, and taking a formidable clasp-knife from his pocket, said:

"Jonathan Wild, you will remain here until the officers arrive. The day of vengeance has come at last! I thought it would come, but I never dreamt that you, who had hunted so many poor fellows about, would come at last to be hunted yourself. You are my prisoner, Jonathan Wild, and if you escape, it will be after you have killed me!"

The thief-taker began to despair of effecting his purpose.

Bruised as he was from head to foot, and suffering the most acute bodily pain, as well as being thoroughly exhausted by the exertions he had been compelled to make to save himself from capture, he felt himself unequal to a struggle with this man, who was much superior to him in height and weight.

Convinced that all was lost without this man secreted him somewhere, Jonathan Wild still continued his efforts.

Sharper means he felt convinced must be resorted to.

Before the man could guess what he was about to do, Wild sprang across the room to where the woman was standing.

She seemed ready to die with fright.

Wild seized her roughly by the hair, and thrusting the muzzle of a pistol with still greater roughness into her ear, he turned towards the man and said:

"If you come a step nearer to me I will fire. Now, then, will you aid me to escape? If you refuse, at that very moment your wife breathes her last!"

The man appeared quite overcome by this sudden proceeding; he had never expected it, and he stood with his back to the door, wondering what he should do.

That Jonathan Wild would not hesitate to keep his word he felt certain.

One glance at his bloodshot eyes and ferocious countenance was proof that he would be guilty of any atrocity. The man hesitated and lowered his knife.

As for the woman, she was so overcome by the horror of her position that she uttered a low cry and fainted.

Jonathan Wild still retained his savage grasp upon her hair, and by this means prevented her from falling to the ground.

"Now," said the thief-taker with a grin, "will you accept my terms? If you refuse, you will be the murderer of your wife, not me—recollect that."

What reply the man would have made is hard to say, but at that moment the trampling of many footsteps on the stairs and the hum of voices came plainly to the ears of the thief-taker.

"Curse you!" he cried savagely, "it is too late; but for your folly, I might have been saved. Take that for your pains!"

Uttering these words, Jonathan released his hold of the woman's hair, and rushing forward with the pistol still in his hand, he struck the man a violent blow on the head with it.

He dropped down as though shot, for he was not prepared for this sudden attack, his attention being directed to the noise upon the stairs.

There was a key sticking in the lock of the door, and perceiving this, Jonathan turned it quickly.

Having done this, he turned round and looked about him.

"What shall I do now?" he said, "Curse these fools, what trouble they might have saved! I am now no better off than I was at first—not so well, indeed, for I had more strength then than I have now."

The thief-taker was in truth terribly exhausted, and he dashed the perspiration impatiently from his brow.

"They are coming up!" he continued, "They will soon be here! How can I escape? There is no place where I can conceal myself; I should be discovered in a moment! How can I escape?"

He advanced to the centre of the room, and as he did so, perceived in one corner of the ceiling a trap-door, such as might be found in almost every house in London, to enable persons to escape in case of fire.

"That is the only way," said Wild, as he looked upon it. "The roofs! Yes, that is my only chance—I must once more take to the roofs!"

This trap-door was indeed the only outlet from the attic, and reluctant as he was, Jonathan was compelled to avail himself of it.

Just under this trap-door was a chest of drawers.

To mount upon these took Wild but a moment, and then he found that he could without difficulty reach the opening above.

He doubted, however, whether he should have strength enough to draw himself up.

While he hesitated, he heard the officers reach the attic door.

They tried to open it, but finding it was fast, knocked loudly and impatiently upon it.

That knocking seemed to infuse fresh strength into Wild's limbs.

By one sudden effort he drew himself up through the trap-door.

He was now in the open space between the tiles and the ceiling of the attic.

Replacing quickly the trap-door he had removed, Wild stood upon it, and raising his arms, felt about him for the one above.

He had considerable difficulty in removing this second trap-door, which was fitted into the roof itself.

The bolts were so rusted into their sockets that he could scarcely withdraw them.

When at length he succeeded in doing this, he had to raise the trap-door itself, and this was almost more than his strength could accomplish, for on the outer side the trap-door was covered with lead.

A sudden crash, telling him that the attic door had been forced open, and the certainty that in another moment his foes would be upon him, endowed him with the strength of desperation.

With one sudden push, he removed the trap-door, and scrambled out upon the tiles.

Panting violently for breath, and with a deadly feeling of faintness about his heart, Jonathan Wild crawled slowly up the sloping roof.

Oh, how he cursed his evil fate!

His previous adventures on that eventful night had sickened him of the roofs.

In spite of all his efforts, he had never been able to reach the street unperceived.

Could he but do this, he felt that all would be well.

Reaching the highest portion of the roof, he slowly let himself down on the other side, but ere he had gone a yard he heard his foes emerging from the trap-door.

"It is all over!" he gasped; "it is all over! I may as well give in now, and let them take me. I cannot escape! In another moment they will be here!"

While muttering these words, he still continued his efforts to slip down the roof, and just as he had finished he caught sight of an attic window at no great distance. Despairing of making his escape, and yet anxious to prolong his capture as long as possible, Jonathan made a rush towards this attic window, and reached it before the officers gained the summit of the roof.

Fortunately a stack of chimneys concealed him from their view, and with nervous haste he set about unfastening this window.

To do this was an easy enough task, and had he been less agitated than he was at that moment he would have opened the window in half the time he did.

As it was, however, he managed to creep into the attic unperceived.

He would have given much if he could have recruited his strength by a few moments' rest, but that was impossible.

Hastening across the attic, which fortunately for him was vacant, he reached the door.

He passed through it, and closed it after him quickly.

He now found himself at the head of a flight of stairs, and leant over the bannisters and listened.

But all was perfectly silent.

The inhabitants had doubtless hours ago retired to rest.

With a silent and yet rapid tread Jonathan descended the stairs.

The next flight was carpeted, and so he was able to descend without fear of creating an alarm.

All now depended upon his speed.

He had succeeded much better than he could have anticipated, and could he but reach the front door and gain the street he would have one more chance for his life.

The house was as silent as though it was uninhabited, and in a very few minutes he reached the passage leading to the front door.

He paused upon the mat at the bottom of the stairs and listened.

To his joy, he was unable to hear the officers descending, which was what he fully expected.

Perhaps they had continued along the roof; perhaps even the attic window had escaped their notice.

Hope once more entered his heart.

Only one obstacle stood between himself and the open air.

That was the front door.

To undo the fastenings would be very easy, and then he would be at liberty.

CHAPTER CCCCLXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD SUCCEEDS IN ELUDING HIS FOES, AND RUSHES AGAIN INTO THE LION'S MOUTH.

HALF a dozen steps took Jonathan Wild to the front door.

One by one he removed the bolts and the massive chain that was placed across it.

All that remained was to turn the key in the lock, and this he did as slowly as possible.

Despite his care, however, a sharp snap followed, which sounded to him almost like the report of a pistol.

It was his fears that had exaggerated the sound.

Reassured by the silence which followed, he turned the handle and opened the door cautiously to the extent of about a couple of inches.

He peeped out.

The street was quite deserted.

He listened, but no footfall betokened the approach of any chance pedestrian.

Rendered bold not only by this but also by the silence which prevailed in the interior of the house, Jonathan Wild opened the door a little wider and glided out into the street.

But before he could look about him, or decide which direction he should take, a loud whistle sounded in his ears, and the next moment he felt himself seized by some one with an iron grasp.

With a cry of despair he wrenched his head round, and saw that it was a police officer who had seized him.

Another whistle sounded not far off, and then came a hasty rush of many footsteps.

"Give in, Wild!" said the officer who had captured him; "don't attempt to resist; you cannot possibly escape; give in quietly—you have caused us trouble enough already."

The thief-taker uttered a growl such as one might expect to come from the throat of some wild beast upon finding itself in the toils of the hunter.

But he did not take the officer's advice.

So far from it, he commenced a desperate struggle.

Seizing the officer by the throat with great suddenness, he threw him off his balance, and he fell heavily to the ground.

His head came into violent contact with the kerbstone, and then Wild felt the officer's grasp relax.

Without waiting for more, he scrambled to his feet and darted off just as a body of police officers came round the corner.

The loud shout which they gave at once let him know that he was seen.

Although so fearfully exhausted, Jonathan Wild would not succumb.

He felt that it was foolish of him to attempt to outrun the officers.

The chase could only terminate by his capture.

But, for all that, he bounded onward at a speed that was really surprising.

He turned swiftly round the first corner he came to, and then round the next.

For an instant his pursuers were out of sight, but this was no advantage to him, for he could see no place that would afford him shelter.

One thing greatly in his favour was, that he was intimately acquainted with every court and alley in that portion of London.

In former times, when he had been the pursuer, he had often known a fugitive double upon him and escape, and he hoped that he might be successful in doing so.

He would have been almost certain to succeed had he not been in such a dreadful state of weakness; but now he felt at every step as though he could not possibly take another.

He bounded on, turning and winding at every few yards, and yet pursuing one general direction.

Suddenly, as he turned a corner into a street he heard the clatter of a horse's hoofs, and looking up he saw a horseman approaching at a steady trot.

Jonathan uttered a cry of satisfaction.

Rushing forward, he seized the horse by the bridle and brought him to a standstill with so much suddenness that the rider, who was unprepared, was almost thrown out of the saddle.

Perceiving that he had lost his balance, Jonathan seized the leg nearest him, and by a slight effort succeeded in hurling him to the ground.

The rider lay motionless in the road, but before Wild could mount the officers were in sight.

They guessed in a moment what he was about, and rushed forward with redoubled speed.

But they were too late to detain him.

Springing into the saddle, Jonathan turned the horse's head round and struck him fiercely with his heels in the flanks.

It was a high-spirited animal, and unused to such treatment.

It snorted and gave a sudden bound forward, but Wild was an accomplished horseman, and sat as firm as a rock.

By every means in his power he urged the horse onward, but there was no necessity for him to do so, for the creature galloped on at the top of its speed.

In a second, as it seemed, the officers were left behind, and then Jonathan directed his course eastward, but he would not permit the horse to abate its speed; he knew well enough that the officers would not be long in providing themselves with horses, and the pursuit would be begun again with fresh vigour.

"The further he got off the better."

So exultant was he at this unexpected deliverance from a position of so much peril that he could not refrain from shouting aloud.

The frightful sounds which came from his throat terrified the horse exceedingly, and panting and trembling, it flew onwards at a speed that was absolutely terrific.

Wild forgot now all the perils and hardships he had undergone; he was only conscious of the delightful fact that he had escaped, and that every moment was taking him further and further out of the reach of his pursuers.

In a little while London was left behind and the open country gained.

From time to time the thief-taker turned his head and looked back, but upon no occasion did he see the least signs of his pursuers.

"Escaped!" he said to himself. "Yes, I have escaped! I am free now, and if I was only a little stronger—if I was not in such frightful pain—I would quickly take such steps as would make my capture impossible."

After galloping for nearly an hour without hearing or seeing anything of his foes, Wild paused.

He felt that for the time he was safe.

He had left no trail behind him by which he could be tracked, and he had reached a place which he fully believed would afford him safe shelter for a considerable length of time.

He had paused in Plaistow Marshes.

At the present day this place is rarely visited, and a hundred and fifty years ago more rarely still, and the extent of the marshes was three times greater than it is now.

The soft oozy ground was thickly overgrown with osiers and that species of vegetation which thrives in a swampy soil.

It was not a very pleasant place in which to take up his quarters, but Jonathan Wild did not mind that—he only bore in mind the fact that it was safe.

Dismounting, he led his horse to a place where the vegetation was thickest and rankest.

Here he paused, and having secured the horse, he took his knife from his pocket and cut down a large quantity of osiers.

These he placed upon the wet, soft ground, crossing them over and over until he had made quite a pile.

Upon the top of this he flung himself, and lay profoundly still.

Day was just beginning to dawn, but Jonathan had little fear of being disturbed.

Weeks and weeks might elapse before anyone visited that dismal spot, and he only intended to remain there for a few hours in order that he might obtain the rest of which he stood so much in need, and determine upon his future proceedings.

He would have given anything if he could have closed his eyes and then and there gone to sleep, but the horrible pain occasioned by the fall he had had made it impossible.

He tossed about and tried in vain to find a comfortable position.

Oh, the agony he suffered then! It was, however, but a foretaste of what was to come.

Could he but have seen into the future, he would have ceased all further efforts and put an end to his existence.

At last, about sunrise Jonathan sank off to sleep.

For several hours his slumber was profound; he was unconscious of everything.

His mind was rested before his body, and his brain began actively to work.

Dreams of the most fearful character occupied his mind.

The whole proceedings of the past night were in imagination begun again, and so vivid was the vision that Jonathan Wild felt all those terrible sensations to which he had formerly been a victim.

With a start and a scream he awoke.

For some moments he gazed about him in astonishment.

He could not recollect what had happened, nor imagine where he was.

Soon, however, all came back to him, and then a perfect storm of imprecations came from his lips.

He ceased when he became a little calmer.

He was surprised to find that night was so close at hand, and it was some time before he could bring himself to believe that he had slept a whole day.

He was afforded much pleasure by discovering that his pains were by no means so acute as they had been, though when he moved some of his limbs the agony was almost more than he could bear.

Still he was better, and that imparted a feeling of great satisfaction to him.

He laid down again upon the osiers and strove to think clearly over his position, and to decide what would be the best course for him to adopt.

"And this is the end of all!" he murmured. "Foiled at the last moment—foiled when I had succeeded—when I had triumphed over every obstacle—when my future course was as clear before me as it was easy. There no longer existed any difficulty in the way of carrying out my plans—all had gone well; and then to be foiled in a manner I least expected!"

The thief-taker was silent for some minutes.

No doubt it was a bitter reflection for him to make.

The reader will remember how on his walk back from Tyburn he had felicitated himself upon the fruition of all his schemes, and then this sudden and unexpected reverse had come upon him.

"It was well," he said, "that I had the forethought to provide against such a contingency as the present. I must for ever abandon all thoughts of accomplishing the one grand scheme of my existence. I must give my whole attention to escaping from my enemies.

"I will leave England, but before I go it will be necessary for me to obtain possession of that wealth which I have so cleverly sequestered, and which will enable me to live in affluence in some foreign land.

"Yes; that will be the end of my career. I had hoped for a better termination, but it is not to be. I will be satisfied, for it might be worse."

From these words it will be seen that Jonathan was fast resigning himself to his fate. He was, in fact, making a virtue of necessity.

As he had truly said, it would require the whole of his thoughts and energies to escape from his foes.

The authorities had resolved to use every effort to capture him and bring him to justice, for it was felt that it would be monstrous for such crimes as Wild had committed to go unpunished.

Had Jonathan then and there set about leaving the country, there is very little doubt he would have been successful, but he felt that he could not go until he had obtained that sum of money which he had deposited in the bank in the name of Nathan Jidlow.

He fancied he would have but little difficulty in doing this.

Of course he would have to be very cautious.

His first step would be to return to London unperceived, and there disguise himself in such a manner as to escape detection.

Then, according to the arrangements which he had made at the time when he deposited the money, he would be able to go over in person, or he could obtain the money by sending a messenger with the check.

Which of the courses he adopted would depend on circumstances.

Jonathan made up his mind, however, that he would leave his present place of concealment, and make his way by a circuitous route to London, and when he arrived there he imagined it would be time enough for him to consider what to do next.

CHAPTER CCCCLXIX.

THE POLICE OFFICERS DRIVE JONATHAN WILD FROM HIS PLACE OF REFUGE.

HAVING come to this conclusion, Jonathan Wild rose to his feet.

He made his way to the stunted tree to which he had secured his horse, and having untied him, led him by the bridle through the marshes to the open ground.

The walk was not a long one, still it tried Wild's powers to the utmost.

He could scarcely believe that he was so weak, and when he reached firm ground he was so exhausted as to be unable to mount his steed.

The injuries he had received in his terrific fall from the top of the archway began to make themselves more severely felt than ever.

Some of his joints he could not move at all, and every time he drew a longer breath than usual, the agony was almost more than he could bear.

This showed that he had received internal as well as external injuries.

Clutching the saddle with both hands, he rested his head against it.

He was so utterly overpowered that he could not move. Had his enemies been at hand, his capture now would have been easy enough.

Jonathan remained for some time in this position.

By degrees the frightful feeling of lassitude which had come over him to some extent passed away.

At length, raising his head, he looked about him for some mound or slight elevation upon which he could stand, and by this means more readily mount his horse.

But as far as he could see the ground presented one uniform dead level.

Looking piercingly about him, he at length espied at no great distance the trunk of a tree lying in a horizontal position upon the ground.

Towards this he led his horse, and having brought him alongside of it, he after several efforts managed to seat himself in the saddle.

"Thank heaven," he murmured to himself, as he gathered the reins in his hand, "that is over! Now I am once more mounted I don't care, but I am weaker than ever I imagined myself to be. I fancy now I shall have to put off my journey to London until I am stronger and better; but I shall see—I shall see!"

Uttering these words, Jonathan urged his horse forward.

But he soon found the motion, easy as it was, caused great pain, so that before he had gone many yards he was compelled to reduce his horse's speed to a walk.

The feeling of exhaustion, which he hoped would pass away, rapidly increased, and several times he had a narrow escape from falling to the earth.

"I must halt somewhere," he said to himself. "I must look out for some lonely, unfrequented place, where I can stay with safety. It would be the height of folly for me to proceed to London while I am in this condition.

"In this part of the country, I shall surely find some inn, with little or no trade, where I can take up my quarters for a few days. I have money, and I shall be able to pay them liberally for their trouble. That must be it. I must be careful, though, where I stop."

Jonathan Wild felt better, and even stronger, after having determined to rest for a brief period.

Guiding his horse across a large meadow, he came at length to a little gate, which he opened and passed through.

This led him into a narrow winding lane, both sides of which were fringed by a low hedge.

At a slow walk, he continued along this lane for a considerable distance without seeing the least signs of a human habitation.

He came at length to a place where another lane intersected the one he was travelling, at right angles, and at one of the corners formed by the junction of these roads stood a small old-fashioned-looking inn.

This was just the place Wild had desired to find.

The country around was flat, and as far as he could see there was not a single dwelling.

Coming closer, he saw that there was suspended in front of the inn a truss of straw, which signified that there was accommodation both for horse and rider.

Jonathan stopped before the front door, and he had scarcely done so when the landlord and a bandy-legged old man whom he took to be the ostler made their appearance.

In this out-of-the-way place, Wild had little fear of being known; still, as a precautionary measure, he disguised his voice when he spoke.

It was what would be considered a light night, but still the darkness was great enough to prevent anyone observing him closely.

The landlord and the ostler saw that there was a man on horseback, and that was about all they could make out.

"Can I put up here for a few days?" said Wild. "I have been thrown from my horse and bruised and shaken a bit. A day or two's rest will put me right, if I can have it."

Of course the landlord was willing and able to accommodate his customer.

He brightened up and looked quite brisk when he heard Wild speak, for trade was slack at the inn; being in such a lonely spot, it was very rarely that so good a customer stopped before the door.

"Help me to alight," said Wild, "for I feel so stiff, that I can hardly move a limb. Be careful," he added, "for I am badly bruised."

Not without some trouble he was lifted from his horse. The pain caused by this process was most excruciating, but Wild bore it like a martyr.

When he reached his feet, however, he could not suppress a loud and startling groan.

"Dear me!" said the landlord, "you must be very bad, sir—you have given me quite a turn. Hadn't I better send for a doctor?"

"No, no; a doctor would do me no good; rest is the only thing that I require!" said Wild, quickly.

"Very good, sir!" returned the landlord, "you know best of course. Lean upon my arm and I will lead you indoors. Jim, take the gentleman's horse to the stable."

The ostler obeyed, and Jonathan Wild, leaning heavily upon the landlord's arm, passed into the inn.

He was glad to seat himself in an arm chair.

"There!" he said, "let me be now a bit to recover myself."

"I will get your bed-room ready, sir," said the landlord.

"Would you like anything before you retire to rest?"

Wild reflected.

He had no appetite, and still less inclination to eat, and yet he remembered that very many hours had elapsed since he had partaken of either food or drink, and he was well aware that without these natural wants were attended to, his weakness would increase rather than otherwise.

This decided him, and he ordered the landlord to bring in a supper.

Of this he partook heartily, and then, after having drank a quantity of brandy, that quite startled the landlord, he retired to rest.

Upon gaining the room, Wild bolted the door.

There was no lock upon it, and in order to make it more secure, he drew his sword and lodged it in a peculiar manner under one of the panels.

This done, he flung himself upon the bed dressed as he was, and in consequence of his deep potations and extreme fatigue was soon asleep.

In this inn Wild remained several days without the occurrence of any event of a particular or alarming character.

He rapidly grew stronger and better, thus proving that he was right when he said it was only rest that he required.

During his stay in this quiet place he had an excellent opportunity of reviewing his position, and calculating the chances which he had of ultimate escape.

It was, however, with a deep sigh that he admitted to himself that he must henceforth abandon those schemes for his aggrandisement which had of late occupied so much of his attention.

There was little to inspire him either with hope or confidence.

The only consolation he could find was in the thought that if he had failed in so many things, he had succeeded in wreaking his vengeance upon Jack Sheppard.

Jonathan took good care to keep himself out of sight.

There was only the landlord who saw him, and it was evident from his manner that he had not the slightest suspicion as to the identity of his customer.

It was on the evening of the fifth day when Wild—feeling stronger, in less pain, and in better spirits than he had been since his arrival—was sitting at the window of his room, which commanded a view over the country in the direction of London.

While looking out listlessly he chanced to perceive in the distance some huge, dim, moving object.

A glance was sufficient to show him that this was a troop of mounted police.

Upon making the discovery he started to his feet, and opening the window, strained his eyes to the utmost, in order to watch the movements of those who his heart told him were his enemies.

It was beginning to grow dark, and objects in the distance looked dim and indistinct; still he saw, or fancied he saw that these horsemen were mounted police officers, and that they were approaching the inn.

As may be expected, this discovery filled him with the utmost alarm.

"What shall I do?" was the first question that presented itself to his mind. "Will it be better for me to remain where I am? The landlord has no suspicion, and I may be perfectly safe. If I leave the inn I shall most certainly be seen."

It was not for long, however, that he suffered himself to be puzzled. That fertility of invention for which he was so remarkable had not deserted him, and he quickly determined how he should act.

Putting on his hat, he opened the door of his room and descended the stairs.

In the passage he met the landlord, and in a voice that was perfectly calm, Wild said:

"I am just going to look at my horse. It is very likely that I shall leave to-morrow, for I feel myself almost well now."

"You will find him all right, sir," said the landlord.

"I have no doubt of that," replied Wild; "only, having nothing else to do, I thought I would go and look at him."

"Certainly, sir, you are quite welcome. Shall I go with you?"

"No; I can find my way myself readily enough," said Wild.

With these words on his lips he passed out of the back door of the inn, and crossed the yard.

The ostler was leaning against the stable door, smoking a pipe, and upon seeing Wild approach, he touched his hat and stood aside.

Wild stopped, and said with great abruptness:

"Do you want to earn a guinea?"

The question was one which probably had never been addressed to the ostler before, for he looked at Wild with great astonishment.

"Of course you want a guinea!" said Wild, without giving the ostler time to reply. "And I will tell you how to earn one in less than five minutes. First of all, put the saddle and bridle on my horse."

This was an order that the ostler fully understood, and he obeyed with alacrity.

"So far so good," said Wild. "And now the only thing you have to do, is to go to the front of the inn and look if you can see any mounted men approaching. Be quick and bring word back to me, and when you have done that you will have earned the guinea."

The ostler looked surprised, as well he might, but nevertheless he shuffled off across the yard to the front of the inn.

He was only absent for about a moment.

Wild determined to be prepared for the worst.

All his pistols he knew were carefully loaded, and in readiness for immediate use.

He led the horse to the door of the stable, and by the time he had done this the ostler returned.

"Well?" said Wild.

"There's some horsemen coming along the lane, for certain," replied the ostler.

"Are they far away?"

"They be just by Sykes's farm, sir."

"How far is that?" asked the thief-taker, impatiently.

"But little more than half a mile, sir."

"Are they so close?"

"They are a good deal closer by this time, sir; they were by Sykes's farm when I stood at the front."

"And they are coming towards the inn?"

"Yes."

"Here's your guinea, then—you have earned it! Now help me to mount."

The ostler obeyed.

"Is there any back way out of the yard?" was the thief-taker's next question.

"No, sir. There is but one way, and that is under the arch yonder."

The ostler pointed, as he spoke, to the archway that led from the yard to the front of the inn.

Wild uttered an oath.

Looking round him, however, he saw that the yard was only divided from a meadow by a wooden fence.

It was a good height, but Wild resolved to run the risk of leaping it.

It was better to do that than to attempt to pass under the archway, because if he did he would be seen by the officers the instant he emerged.

If he could only succeed in clearing this fence, he stood a chance of getting away unperceived—or, at any rate, he would have a good start of his pursuers.

The ostler shook his head when he saw Wild back his horse and then prepare to leap over the fence.

Evidently he believed that the thing was impossible.

But the horse was a good one, and full of spirit.

Wild struck him fiercely with his spurs, and with a snort of pain the noble creature flew forward, and, giving one tremendous bound, jumped clean over the fence.

Wild preserved his seat with great skill, although the horse descended with quite a sharp shock.

Just as the horse leaped, there was a loud shout which came from many throats, and then a party of police officers, some twenty in number, dashed under the arch.

They were just in time to see Wild disappear.

With cries of vexation, they turned their horses' heads round again, and started off in pursuit.

But by the time they gained the meadow, Wild was a long way off, and they could only just distinguish a dark, shadowy mass flitting rapidly over the open country.

CHAPTER CCCLXX.

JONATHAN WILD OUTRUNS THE OFFICERS, AND OBTAINS A CAPITAL DISGUISE.

WHEN the whole of the events connected with the attempt to capture Wild became known, a universal feeling of horror and detestation was excited in the breasts of everyone.

As for the police officers, they were in a state of the greatest exasperation.

The losses and injuries that Wild had caused were very great.

Several men were dead, and many others sorely wounded.

Never before had such a desperate resistance been made. But the authorities determined not to be discouraged, and to use every effort to bring the daring offender to justice.

We have already stated that Wild was the object of popular dislike, and these events which had just occurred increased the feeling tenfold.

Large rewards were offered by the Government for his apprehension, to which other sums were added by private individuals, among them Lord Ingestre, who had neither forgiven nor forgotten Wild's behaviour in connection with the diamond necklace.

The gentleman who Wild had so violently deprived of his horse and hurled into the roadway, was killed upon the spot, in consequence of his head having come into violent contact with a large stone.

When Wild galloped off in the manner already related, the officers soon lost all trace of him.

On the following morning, however, a large body of police officers assembled upon the spot where Wild had been last seen.

They then separated into troops and dispersed themselves over the country, searching in every direction for the fugitive.

But though they made numberless inquiries, they failed to elicit any information, for it will be remembered that Wild neither saw nor spoke to anyone during his rapid flight.

It was one of these detachments that Wild saw approaching the inn.

The officer in command had no idea that Wild had taken up his quarters in that particular inn, but it was the only house for miles round, and he led his men towards it for the purpose of obtaining a brief rest, and also to elicit what information he could from the landlord.

Seeing the gateway which led from the front of the inn to the stables, the officers trotted under it without hesitation.

Just as they entered, however, they caught sight of Wild leaping over the fence, and so they uttered that loud cry which made the fugitive aware that he had been seen by his enemies.

When the police officers saw what a good start Wild had got they did not despair of capturing him.

All that was requisite for them to do was to keep him in sight.

This promised to be difficult, for Wild's figure became more and more indistinct each moment, although the officers urged their horses forward by whip and spur.

But the animals were tired.

They had travelled many miles without rest or food, and consequently were not equal to a long and rapid gallop.

Here Wild had the advantage, for his horse, which was one of great mettle, had had several days' entire rest and plenty of good corn, so that he flew onward over the level ground almost with the rapidity of a racehorse.

Wild chuckled with satisfaction when he saw how rapidly he was gaining on his foes.

He urged his horse onward by every means he could think of, for he knew that his safety depended upon his getting out of sight of the officers before they were joined by a fresh party.

The night was dark, for the sky was entirely covered by dark clouds, and the wind made that low, moaning sound which is so often heard before rain.

All this was in the thief-taker's favour, and hope took firm possession of his heart.

Presently he paused.

He was on a piece of slightly-elevated ground, and he looked back in the direction he had just come.

But his earnest gaze failed to detect the slightest signs of the officers.

"One more escape!" he said, as he urged his horse on again. "I have fairly distanced them. But I must be very cautious now! No doubt they are trying their utmost to effect my capture, but they will fail! I will follow out my original intention. I will make my way to London, disguise myself, obtain the large sum of money which I have deposited in the bank and then leave England for ever!"

Little did Wild think that he was making this frightfully perilous journey to London for nothing.

Little did he dream that his delectable son had been beforehand with him, and had drawn out to within a few pounds all the money which he had placed in the bank under the name of Nathan Jidlow.

Had anyone told him that this had been done, he would have refused to credit it, so firmly persuaded was he that no one but himself knew anything of the transaction.

And so Jonathan Wild ran into the lion's mouth.

By the loneliest road he could think of he made his way to London.

He took every precaution to avoid being seen.

It was close upon daylight when Jonathan stopped in a narrow street leading out of the Kent Road.

He had reached this point of his journey without seeing or hearing anything of the officers, and without, as he firmly believed, having attracted the notice of anyone.

No one was stirring in that little by-street at this early hour.

The house before which he halted was one that differed in no way from those adjoining it.

All the inmates had apparently retired to rest, for there was no light at any of the windows.

It was a small shop, but the shutters were all closed. Jonathan Wild, however, alighted from his horse, and pulled a bell, the handle of which was almost concealed in the door-post.

He rang it twice and then waited patiently.

After the lapse of a few minutes, a little wicket in the door itself was opened and a face appeared at the aperture.

"Let me in!" said Wild, as soon as this face appeared—"let me in, I say! You know better than to refuse!"

The man who had opened the wicket no sooner heard the thief-taker's voice than he uttered a groan.

"Be quick!" said Wild. "I cannot stay here all day. Let me in at once, or it will be the worse for you!"

With another groan the man withdrew his face from the wicket, and set to work removing the fastenings of the door.

Then he opened it, and wild pushed his way in, dragging his horse in with him.

"Now shut the door, Jack Powell!" he cried, "and be quick about it!"

It was clear that Jonathan possessed some sort of power over this man, for he obeyed him, though as it seemed reluctantly.

The door was closed and fastened, and then Wild said:

"You know me, Jack?"

"I do, Mr. Wild," was the reply.

The words were followed by another groan.

"You must serve me!" said the thief-taker. "I am in need of such service as you can render. If you aid me, and you can do so easily, I will agree to hold you free with respect to the past; but if you refuse, you know that I can, by uttering half a dozen words, have you arrested, condemned, and executed at Tyburn!"

The man trembled, and his teeth chattered as he said:

"Don't talk about that, Mr. Wild—please don't!"

"I don't intend to do so, only I thought it would be necessary to remind you of it. I am in a little difficulty now—to you it may seem a serious one, but I shall get through it all right. You must not fall into the mistake of supposing that my power is at an end; I am still free to make an accusation. You know it can be done anonymously, and I am the only person who can do it. You are also aware that if the accusation is made, the proofs will be found, and a host of witnesses will come forward immediately."

"I know all about that, Mr. Wild!" said the man, in more abject tones than before. "You need not remind me of anything; and I only wish that I could forget all about it, even for half an hour; but I cannot—the recollection is always before me, even when I am asleep."

"That is no fault of mine!" growled Wild, "and I cannot help it. The only service I could render you would be to put you out of your misery, and I suppose you don't want me to do that?"

"No, no!"

"Wretched as you are, or as you would make believe you are, you would prefer to live a little longer?"

"Ye—yes, Mr. Wild!"

"Do as I require, and you will have nothing to fear from me."

"I will, Mr. Wild. I shall be very glad to assist you in any way I can."

"Bah!—stuff! You know better!"

Jack Powell made a gesture of dissent.

"If I didn't possess the knowledge I do of that very ugly transaction of yours," continued the thief-taker, "I know the sort of service you would render me—you would call in the officers, and try your best to get a share of the reward, which you know is offered for my apprehension."

Jack Powell looked down on the floor, and was silent for a moment, and then he said:

"If you won't believe in my willingness to do you a good turn, Mr. Wild, just say what it is that I am to do, and I will do it."

"That is all right, Jack. I hope I shall be able to trust you—you will find it worth your while, and so long as you don't betray me, my lips will be sealed as regards that little affair at —"

"You need not say anything more about it, Mr. Wild," said Jack Powell, in an imploring voice. "Let us change the subject."

"With all my heart!"

"What do you want, Mr. Wild?"

"I want a disguise—a good one. I know you can furnish me with it."

"I can, and will, Mr. Wild!"

"Set about finding me one at once, then, for the sooner I am off the better."

"Come this way, Mr. Wild, and you shall have what you require. Perhaps you won't mind holding the light?"

Wild took the candle which the other carried.

The shop occupied by Powell was one where second-hand clothing of all descriptions was sold, and many miscellaneous things besides.

In was hung round with garments of every conceivable description, and they were piled up on shelves or stored under the counter.

"What disguise would you like, Mr. Wild?" said Powell.

"I could fit you out in any way you pleased, from a cressing-sweeper to an officer in a cavalry uniform."

Wild paused reflectively for a moment, and then said:

"I should not look well in a soldier's uniform, I fancy. Could you disguise me as a Quaker?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild. I have some garments that will fit you exactly. They are a little the worse for wear—not much; though I suppose that don't matter?"

"Not a bit—not a bit! Let me see them."

Powell rummaged among a heap of clothes such as were worn by the Quakers at the beginning of the last century.

Wild nodded, and said:

"That will do!"

"Will you put them on now, Mr. Wild?"

"Of course!"

"Go into this back room, then, and while you are changing your clothes, I will look about for a hat."

"Very good!"

Powell led the thief-taker into a room at the back of the shop, and having lighted the lamp that stood on the table, he returned to the shop.

Wild was not long in changing his apparel, and as soon as he had finished he walked into the shop.

The change in his appearance was very great, for he was an adept at disguising himself.

When he put on the hat, which was excessively low in the crown and disproportionately wide in the brim, the transformation was wonderful.

Wild looked like a respectable middle-aged Quaker in rather poor circumstances.

"Shall I do, Powell?" he said.

"You are changed wonderfully, Mr. Wild!"

"I am glad of it. But fetch me some water and a cork."

Powell did so, and then Wild washed his face thoroughly.

"You had better have a fresh wig, Mr. Wild."

"Have you got one?"

"Oh yes!"

Wild said nothing, but immediately pulled his own wig off and threw it down.

Powell handed the thief-taker a box containing wigs of all kinds.

Wild tried several, and at length decided upon one which met with his entire approval.

In colour it was brown, and the hair was very long and very straight.

He put this on, and then, taking the cork, burnt it a little in the flame of the candle, and by its aid slightly darkened his eyebrows.

Then he put on the hat.

The alteration in his appearance was even more startling than before.

His hideous and remarkable physiognomy he could not change, but by tying a scarf round his neck and by pulling the broad-brimmed hat over his eyes he was able to conceal a great portion of it.

He was now in readiness to start; but first of all he felt it would be necessary to say a few menacing words to Jack Powell, although that individual had manifested the utmost willingness to assist him.

Wild grasped him rather roughly by the arm.

"I am going to London, Jack—to London! Mark that!"

"Yes."

"I am going dressed as you see me now. I shall act my part well—never fear! And now I warn you, if I am recognised I shall know that it is you who has put the officers on the scent; and whether they capture me or not, I will forward a full disclosure of what took place on the twenty-second of May, three years ago, to the proper quarter, and then you know what will follow."

[EDGORTH BESS IS DRAGGED THROUGH THE FOREST BY THE BANDITS.]

"Don't threaten me, Mr. Wild—don't threaten me! I know you can put my head in the halter any moment you like, and so it's to my interest not to betray you."

"Of course it is; and I am pleased to see that you look upon things in such a sensible way. But the reward is great, Jack, and I know you are not very well off. Now, don't be tempted by it, however large the reward may be. You may get it, of course, but it will cost you dear!"

"I should have to pay for it with my life, Mr. Wild, and so I should not think of it!"

"Very good! That is all I desire; and to show you that I can be grateful for a service rendered—although I could compel you to do what I liked for nothing—I will pay you for what you have done to-night. Take that!"

Wild gave him a large sum of money.

No. 99.—BLUESKIN.

It was received with many protestations of gratitude, to which, however, he paid little attention.

"Listen to me," he said, interrupting him. "Open the door, go outside, and look well up and down the street. If there is anyone about, come back and tell me; if not, remain where you are, and I will follow."

Powell nodded, and passed out into the street.

Wild's horse had stood quietly enough in the shop, though at times it looked around as if half frightened, but it was tired, and glad to rest.

Jonathan waited a moment, and then led his horse out.

Powell stood near the door.

"Is there anyone about?" said the thief-taker.

"No one, Mr. Wild."

"Good-bye, then, I am off; and beware! If you attempt to betray me you know the consequences!"

The thief-taker did not wait to hear what Powell said in reply, but, touching his horse slightly with the spur, rode off at a sharp trot.

"Fortune favours me!" he muttered, "and all promises go well. I never expected such a capital disguise as this. I know I can play my part to admiration. No one saw me arrive; no one has seen me depart except Powell, and I have little fear that he will betray me."

CHAPTER CCCCXXI.

JONATHAN WILD DISCOVERS HIS LOSS, AND IS CAPTURED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS IN THE INN YARD.

At a steady rate, as befitted the character he had assumed, Jonathan Wild made his way towards London.

It was morning, but as yet few people were astir.

He had plenty of time before him, for at least five hours would have to elapse before he could gain admittance to the bank.

How he was going to occupy those five hours he scarcely knew.

He thought once of putting up his horse at some roadside inn and proceeding to London on foot, but then he was fearful lest he should be recognised, in which case his horse would be of great service to him.

He drew in the rein, and allowed his horse to go only at a quiet walk; still, if he went no faster, it would not take him more than an hour to reach the city.

On his way the thief-taker had plenty of occupation for his thoughts.

He calculated over and over again the chances he had of ultimate escape.

He was satisfied that his prospect was good.

As he drew nearer to the metropolis the streets became more filled with people, and many cast curious glances at the mounted Quaker; but beyond this no notice was taken of him.

At length, at about six o'clock in the morning, he reached Fenchurch Street.

It was in this street that the bank was situated in which he had deposited the money.

How to pass the four hours which intervened between then and the time for opening the bank he scarcely knew, but at last he determined to put up his horse in some contiguous thoroughfare, and take a private room at the same inn.

This was certainly the best thing he could have decided upon doing.

In the next street there was a public-house, with livery stables adjoining, and, after giving one glance at the whole of the premises, Jonathan resolved to stay there.

He gave his horse into the charge of the ostler, entered the inn, and ordered a private room.

The principals of the establishment were not astir, and Jonathan was waited on by a girl who seemed as though she had been up all night.

He was ushered into a room on the upper floor, where he sat down with a bottle of brandy before him.

In this manner he managed to pass the time pleasantly and comfortably enough, though it hung very heavily upon his hands for all that.

The brandy he drank produced no other effect than a kind of nervous excitement, and he strode rapidly up and down the room, for he found it impossible to sit still.

"I will go to the bank myself," he murmured for about the hundredth time. "Yes, I will go myself—I have made up my mind to that. There may be some risk, and yet I think not much. At any rate, I can't think the risk greater than it would be to send some one else for the money. At the bank, no one suspects my identity. My disguise has answered my purpose so far, and while they have no suspicion as to who I am, I think I need not feel afraid."

This, then, was the course adopted by Jonathan Wild. As soon as over ten o'clock came, he sallied forth, leaving word that he should return in a few minutes, and giving instructions for his horse to be got ready for his use.

During the last half-hour of his stay, he had improved himself in making various little alterations and improvements in his disguise.

It was now much better and effective than it had been before.

No one would have thought of looking for Jonathan Wild in such a garb as that, in a character so very dissimilar to his own.

With his hands clasped behind his back, and with his head bent forward in a meditative way, his eyes constantly fixed upon the ground, and with a slight shuffle in his walk, the thief-taker left the inn, and turned the corner into Fenchurch Street.

He paused when he reached the bank, and took a piece of paper from his pocket, which he affected to consult.

To have seen him, one would have thought he was some countryman, in doubt whether he was at his proper destination.

Wild's motive for doing this was to have the opportunity of glancing around him, to observe whether any of his foes were lurking about.

But he saw nothing to excite his apprehension, and, with a feeling of greater confidence about his heart than he had yet had, he ascended the steps and entered the bank.

Going up to the counter, Wild took a blank check from his pocket-book, and asked the clerk for a pen.

One was given to him, and in a great, sprawling, shaky handwriting, he filled up the check for twenty-four thousand pounds.

He knew he had more in the bank than that, but he did not wish to draw all out, as that might have attracted suspicion.

It might be useful, too, he thought, to continue to have his account open there.

The balance left was not very great, and the amount for which he had filled up the check was as much as was necessary for his purpose.

With every confidence, Wild handed the check to the clerk, little suspecting what would be the result.

He watched the young man take the check to another portion of the bank—he saw him reach down a huge book and open it at a particular place; then the clerk started with surprise, looked at the check, then at the book again.

Wild was watching him with the utmost intentness—not the least movement that he made escaped his notice, and he wondered what was amiss.

His uneasiness increased when he saw the clerk go to another of his companions, show him the check, and then lead him to the book.

A whispered conference now ensued, and then one of them, taking up the book, followed the other into the private office.

Jonathan's alarm grew greater.

He dreaded something, and yet he knew not what.

His fears were awakened, and yet they took no tangible shape. He was strongly inclined to beat a precipitate retreat; but he conquered this inclination, and with his very lips white he glared at the half-glass door through which the two clerks had passed, and his suspense was awful.

It did not continue long, however.

Suddenly the door was opened and one of the clerks appeared.

He came to Wild and said:

"Be good enough to follow me into the private room—the manager wishes to speak with you."

Jonathan felt his heart turn cold within him, and his knees smote against each other, yet he could not refuse to do as he had been requested.

Filled with dread, fearing that something terrible was about to happen, he followed the young man into the private room.

The manager held the check in his hand, and, turning to the thief-taker, said:

"Did you present this check?"

"Yea, I did," said Wild, capitably imitating a Quaker's voice and manner.

"And are you Mr. Nathan Jidlow?"

"Yea, such is the name by which I am known."

"Well; it is very strange that you should present this check. No such sum as twenty-four thousand pounds remains to your credit in this bank, and you must have known it. What was your object in presenting this check?"

Wild glared at the manager with parted lips.

Had a thunderbolt fallen at his feet he could not have been more astonished.

The expression of his face was frightful to behold, and the manager evidently thought so, for he pushed his chair closer to the wall.

"What?" screamed Wild, presently recovering his voice, and altogether forgetting the character he had assumed. "What!—no such sum? Say that again—I don't understand you!"

Foam gathered on the thief-taker's lips, and his excitement was so terrible that those who witnessed it feared that he was about to fall into a fit.

The manager was so terrified that he could not command his voice.

"Speak!" yelled Wild, in a voice that echoed through the whole building, and clutching the edge of the table nervously. "Speak!—say that again!"

"I said," stammered the manager, "that there was no such sum as twenty-four thousand pounds to your credit in this bank, and added that you must have been aware of it."

Wild gasped for breath, and then sank into a chair.

All his strength seemed to have deserted him, and he trembled like a leaf.

At a sign from the manager, one of the clerks left the room, and almost immediately afterwards returned, bringing with him an oblong slip of paper.

It was the check which Wild junior had presented.

"Give Mr. Jidlow that," said the manager, addressing the clerk.

The check was placed in Wild's hands, but for some time he was too stupefied and overcome to look at it.

When he did, the whole truth burst upon him at once.

A volley of the most awful imprecations that were ever uttered by a human being came from his lips, and terminated in a yell of such a frightful character that the manager tried hard to force his chair through the wall.

"And—and," gasped Wild, "this check was presented?"

"Certainly!"

"When?"

"You will see the date upon the check."

"And you cashed it?"

"Most certainly."

Wild broke out into another storm of curses.

"That check is a forgery, then?" said the manager.

"It is a base, villanous forgery!"

"I am sorry for that, Mr. Jidlow, but the fault is in a great measure your own."

"How so?—how so?"

"When you deposited this money, you made a stipulation that whenever a check was presented, even for the whole amount, it was to be cashed at once without hesitation. These were your terms, and we of course agreed to them."

Wild groaned.

"In the ordinary course of business, this would not have happened. Upon receiving a check for so large an amount, representing as it did, within a few pounds, the amount of your deposit, we should not have parted with the money until we had communicated with you and ascertained that it was correct."

Wild groaned again.

"I know—I know,—that is quite right; it is my fault."

"What do you wish done, Mr. Jidlow? I shall be happy to assist you in any way that you may desire!"

"You can do nothing," said the thief-taker, "except let me go. It is no good for me to stay. Let me go!"

Trembling and shaking, and looking at least ten years older than when he entered the bank, Jonathan Wild rose to his feet, and passed out of the office into the street like a man in a dream.

Mechanically he directed his steps towards the public-house at which he had left his horse.

"Lost—lost!" he murmured. "May my bitterest curse fall upon the head of the villain who has robbed me of all, and in such a manner! Aliter all I had done for him, too, and his promises to be faithful! Idiot that I was! I believed him, and placed great confidence in him! And now this is the result! I might have known it—I might have known it! He has been a curse to me from the hour he was born! Those papers which so mysteriously disappeared, I felt sure he had purloined, but yet I could not fix the deed upon him. How he could have learned that I had money deposited in that bank and under that name, and how he could have arrived so nearly to the exact amount, is more than I can comprehend—it puzzles me completely!"

Never in all his life had Jonathan Wild been so downcast as he was at this moment.

This was the second instalment of his punishment—there were many more yet to come.

What he should do now, Wild knew not.

All the plans which he had laid were overturned—all his hopes of escape and the prospect of happiness in another land were destroyed.

By degrees his disappointment and grief abated, and another feeling took their place.

That was revenge.

"I will have vengeance upon him!" he muttered savagely. "I will have a full, deep, and deadly vengeance! He has forgotten that he is my son, and I will forget it! I will hunt him to the death! He shall not live to enjoy the money which he has so basely robbed me of! He shall die!"

Wild paused a moment, and then continued:

"I will follow out my original intention of leaving England with all speed, for doubtless he has already left the country. Then I will devote myself entirely to revenge, and I will not rest till I have satisfied it."

The prospect of having revenge upon his son seemed to console Wild greatly.

Just as he had reached this point in his reflections, he reached the inn.

He had almost forgotten that he had assumed the character of a Quaker, but luckily he remembered it.

He turned into the stable-yard, and, going up to the ostler, said:

"Friend, is my nag ready?"

"Here you are, sir! Jim, bring out the gentleman's horse!"

Wild turned towards the stable.

The door was opened, but instead of his horse being led forth, a body of police officers appeared, and they at once rushed towards him.

"Betrayed!" said Wild, and as he uttered the words, he turned round to fly.

But a cry of despair came quickly to his lips.

Another body of police officers formed a barrier across the entrance to the stable-yard.

He was trapped, and there was no hope of escape.

The police officers, who numbered twenty at the very least, quickly closed round him.

Wild made a desperate resistance, but it was a vain one.

It was impossible for him or anyone else to contend successfully against such a superior force.

In the twinkling of an eye he was disarmed, and held tightly by many hands.

Jonathan Wild was at last a prisoner.

CHAPTER CCCCXXII.

EDGORTH BESS MAKES A FRANTIC ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM THE BANDITTI.

LET us now return to poor Edgorth Bess, whose perilous situation demands the whole of our attention.

She was in the power of the banditti.

It was not long before the chief and his followers became aware that some injury must have been inflicted upon Ned Cantle, for the discharge of the pistols from within entirely ceased.

They set up a kind of a cheer when they found this to be the case.

"It is all right now, my lads!" said the bandit chief. "We shall have no further trouble. You must be quick, though, and fetch the bodies out of the hut, or they will be consumed—not that that matters, only they have the money about them."

The chief set the example of rushing forward and removing from before the half-burnt door the faggots that they had piled up against it.

When that was done, the lower portion of the door was red-hot.

One blow demolished it, and at length the way into the hut was clear before them.

It looked a perilous feat to venture into that blazing cottage, for the flames had taken firm hold of every part, and the roof seemed each instant as though it would fall in.

The belief that Ned Cantle had about him a large sum of money lent the banditti courage, and so, without pausing to reflect, they rushed in.

The smoke confused them very much, but almost immediately upon their entrance they discovered the two bodies near the door.

Ned Cattle was lying down at full length, and Edgworth Bess was leaning over him, frantically but vainly endeavouring to restore him to consciousness.

As soon as the bandit chief made this discovery, he stooped down and picked Edgworth Bess up in his arms with as much ease as though she had been a child.

Then, shouting to his men to drag the body of Ned Cattle out of the flames, the bandit chief rushed into the open air.

As we have previously said, Edgworth Bess almost, but not quite, lost her consciousness.

She knew she was being moved, though by what means she could not tell.

The flames spread themselves entirely before the door of the hut, and the chief had to force his way through what might be termed a wall of fire.

The intense scorching heat lasted but an instant, but it had the effect of restoring Edgworth Bess to her senses.

It was then that, feeling herself in the arms of some one, and being carried rapidly away, she by an effort turned her head, and, looking up, saw that it was the bandit chief who was conveying her in his arms.

Upon making this discovery, a loud shriek thrilled from her lips, and she fell into a state of utter insensibility.

The bandit chief placed her down upon the ground and returned to his men, who, according to his directions, had dragged the body of Ned Cattle out of the hut.

Already they were stooping over him and busily engaged in searching his pockets.

They were rewarded by finding a large sum in thalers, as well as pearls and other jewels, worth at least three times as much.

It was many a day since this banditti had had so good a booty, and their elation of spirits was consequently very great.

They forgot all about those of their unfortunate companions who had met with their deaths in this affair; or if they did remember them, they at the same time made the reflection that now they were gone there were fewer to divide the booty amongst, so that the share of each would be greater.

The chief was careful to take possession of the whole of the valuables, money included, having done which, he became anxious to retire.

The flames from the cottage would light up the country for miles round, and though no one dwelt near, yet the fire might be seen by some one who would hasten to the spot.

They wished to leave behind them no more traces of their presence than they could possibly help.

"Quick—quick!" said the chief. "We will retire—we have no more to do. Pick up the body of that fool, who has caused so much loss and trouble, and fling him back into the fire!"

This command was at once obeyed, and Ned Cattle, bleeding, warm, and scarcely dead, was picked up by three of the bandits, and hurled into the flames.

At that moment the roof fell, bringing several of the walls along with it.

The fall of this mass of rubbish had the effect of almost extinguishing the fire.

The flames no longer sprang upwards as they had done, but only flickered.

"Pick up your dead and wounded comrades," said the chief, "and carry them into the forest. We do not want to leave any clue that will cause us to be suspected of this deed."

This was done, and the chief then advanced to the spot where he had placed Edgworth Bess.

The poor girl was fast recovering her senses; and she looked about her, terrified and bewildered.

Roughly the bandit chief raised her to her feet, and grasping her by the arm, he said:

"Come, you must go with us!"

She shuddered, but made no reply.

Mechanically she suffered herself to be led forward.

In a desultory throng the bandits and their chief plunged into the recesses of the forest, upon the borders of which the cottage had stood.

There seemed to be no path among the trees, and yet they advanced with perfect confidence. Doubtless they were familiar with every tree and bush.

Edgworth Bess suffered herself to be led for a considerable distance before she fully realised the nature of her position.

Then she thought about Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, whose appearance she hourly expected.

What would they think when, upon arriving at the cottage, they found it a mass of burning ruins, and were unable to form an idea as to where she had gone?

Perhaps, she thought, they had already arrived, and if so, was it right of her to suffer herself to be led unresistingly wherever the banditti pleased?

As she mentally asked herself this question, she made a sudden effort to free herself from the grasp which the bandit chief kept upon her arm.

He was unprepared for such a movement, for the manner in which she had hitherto permitted him to lead her along had thrown him off his guard.

To her joy, then, Edgworth Bess found herself free.

Turning round, she bounded off with the speed of a hunted hare, and disappeared among the bushes before the bandit chief could recover from his astonishment.

"After her!" he cried. "Throw down your comrades, and follow her! If she escapes it will be all over with us—she will let out all that we have done."

So saying, the bandit chief commenced a rapid pursuit after the escaped prisoner.

He was assisted by his men, who spread themselves out into an irregular line, and kept steadily in the direction which Edgworth Bess had taken.

They made good speed, for they were accustomed to travel in the forest, and in a little while they had the satisfaction of hearing the rustling of the bushes and the crackling of the twigs before them, as they were displaced or trodden upon by the poor girl in her hasty flight.

This caused them to quicken their steps, and then emerging into a broad, open glade, they saw the fugitive before them at no great distance.

It was evident that her strength was failing her, for she did not run so swiftly as at first.

Still she flew onward in rapid, frenzied bounds.

The chase, however, was one that could not continue.

She could hear her pursuers close behind her—she did not attempt to turn her head and look back, but she uttered shriek after shriek, in the hope that these sounds of distress might reach some friendly ear, and bring some one to her assistance.

But, alas! they had no such result.

She could feel her strength rapidly leaving her, and at the same time she was aware that her pursuers were coming closer and closer behind her.

At last, with a moan of anguish, she sank upon the ground, and once more she became a prisoner of the banditti.

They seemed disposed to show her even less kindness and consideration than before.

They forced her to rise—though her strength would scarcely allow her to do so—and then she was seized by both arms by the bandit chief and one of his companions, and, in spite of her struggles and frantic screams for help, was dragged forcibly along.

After a time she became passive.

She found that her struggles availed her not, and that her screams brought her no assistance.

Completely exhausted, she suffered herself to be dragged along without a murmur.

She was overcome by the harrowing reflection that in all probability at that very moment Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had reached the cottage, and were full of despair at her disappearance.

The journey through the forest was a long one, and at length, being unable to proceed further, she sank upon the ground.

The bandit chief stooped down and picked her up, carrying her in his arms as before.

Ere she had gone many yards further, the poor girl lapsed into a state of perfect insensibility, from which she did not recover for several hours.

The banditti continued their course some distance further through the forest, until at length they paused before a huge, majestic-looking ruin, the outlines and extent of which could not be perfectly seen in the darkness.

This ruin, doubtless at some former time the residence of a feudal German baron, was evidently the destination of the banditti.

Crossing the dilapidated court-yard, they passed under the low arched doorway leading into the donjon or keep.

At this point the chief separated from his followers.

Still carrying Edgworth Bess in his arms, he pushed open an inner door at the bottom of a flight of steps.

Up these he sped quickly, nor did he pause until he had reached the top.

Here he kicked open another door, which led into a small apartment situated just beneath the roof of the keep.

This chamber was furnished with just a few necessary articles of furniture, and that was all.

Depositing his fair prisoner upon a wretched pallet in one corner, the bandit chief quitted the apartment, leaving her to recover when and how she pleased.

On passing out he was careful to secure the door, and having done this he descended the stairs.

He made his way to a large apartment on the ground floor, in which his gang of desperadoes had assembled.

In former times, judging from its size and general appearance, this must have been the banquetting-hall of the castle.

Few traces of its former grandeur now remained, and the floor was littered with miscellaneous articles of every description.

The bandit chief was greeted by his men with a round of applause when he entered.

He smiled grimly, for he understood the rascals were anticipating the division of the large plunder they had so unexpectedly gained.

The chief set about this duty without delay, and when it was over, wines and spirits were produced from an inner chamber, and a regular carouse commenced.

The banditti who inhabited this old ruin had been the terror of the inhabitants of the surrounding district for years past.

They were strong in numbers, and always took such good precautions that up to the present moment they had set at defiance all attempts to discover their secret haunts.

Their depredations, however, were perpetual.

Travellers through that thinly-populated region were stopped and plundered of every article of value they possessed, and if they resisted their lives paid the forfeit.

Cottages were burned to the ground and the inhabitants brutally murdered if the banditti had the least suspicion that valuables were contained within.

Indeed, there was no enormity, however great, of which they had not at some time or other been guilty, and though many efforts had been made to capture them, all had failed.

Such, then, was the character of the villains into whose hands poor Edgworth Bess had fallen.

The object of the bandit chief in making her his prisoner seemed clear enough.

He saw that she was a native of a foreign land, and believed that if he took her prisoner, in all probability he should be able to exact a ransom from her friends.

CHAPTER CCCCLXIII.

EDGWORTH BESS BECOMES ACQUAINTED WITH CRAZY CARL.

How long she remained in that deathlike state of insensibility Edgworth Bess knew not.

When she recovered herself, the first sounds that struck upon her ears were those which came from the banquet-hall below, where the banditti were still carousing.

She listened to the sounds in the utmost terror, and for a long time could not imagine where she was.

The little chamber in which she had been confined was profoundly dark, so that she was unable to form the least idea as to the kind of place she was in.

By slow degrees, however, the recollection of all that had happened came back to her.

She remembered Ned Cantle's death, and how she herself had been carried off by the banditti.

The last point to which her memory took her was where she had sank on the ground.

She fancied she had been carried along for some distance, but after that, all was blank until she had awoke with those horrible sounds ringing in her ears.

Having understood all so far, it required no great mental effort to enable her to imagine the rest, and to come to a tolerably correct conclusion regarding her position.

Clasping her hands over her face, she sobbed and cried bitterly; indeed, so violent was her grief, and so much had it exhausted her, that unconsciously she sank off into a deep slumber.

When she awoke again it was daylight, and so she was enabled to observe the various features of her prison.

There was very little to see, however.

The bare stone walls were black with age, and so was the ceiling above.

There was only one door leading out of this little chamber, and that was the one through which she had been brought.

At length summoning up sufficient courage to do so, she arose and went towards this door, but her heart sank when she saw how strong it seemed to be.

Despairingly she took hold of it, but, as she fully expected, found herself unable even to shake it in its frame.

Her sobs and tears broke forth again.

Feeling almost heartbroken, she crossed the room to the window.

This was a small opening in the thickness of the wall.

In width it was little more than a foot, and its height less than three.

From the exterior it must have looked like a small loophole, and this is the only name which it deserves.

Edgworth Bess was astonished when she beheld the thickness of the wall.

It was a yard at the very least.

This little loophole was strongly barred both on the outside and within, so that there was no hope of escape in that quarter.

Holding by these bars, and pressing her face as close to them as she could, Edgworth Bess looked out.

She could only obtain a view of a very limited extent.

Nothing met her earnest gaze but the tops of myriads of trees and the fair blue sky above them.

There was nothing to indicate the presence of any of her fellow-creatures.

The silence of the very grave was around her, for the banditti, having finished their carouse, were all engaged in sleeping off the effects of it.

The tops of the tallest trees were a long way below her, and by this means—and this alone—the poor girl became aware that the chamber in which she stood was an immense distance from the ground.

In the prospect from the window there was nothing to encourage her. Even if those iron bars had not been there, she could not have escaped through the loophole, for there was nothing in the little chamber by the aid of which she could have descended to the ground.

She looked once more at the door, but it seemed stronger than ever.

She sank down again upon the pallet from which she had risen, feeling more dispirited and downcast, now she had made an examination of her prison, than she had done before.

She wept long and silently, and in no direction could she turn to see the least glimmering of hope.

The prolonged absence of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard filled her mind with apprehension.

She dreaded that something terrible had happened to one or both of them.

She had great faith in their resources, but still she could not bring herself to believe that they would be able to track her through the forest to the place where she was confined; or, if they did, how could they cope with such a superior force as the banditti?

She was, too, at a loss to imagine for what purpose she had been made a prisoner, and the more she thought upon this subject the more perplexed did she become.

She came at last to the conclusion that the only chance she had of rejoining her friends was to find some means of escaping from the prison, and making all speed to the ruined cottage.

This, however, seemed impossible.

How could she escape from so secure a place of confinement?

She was a prisoner—a hopeless prisoner—and must resign herself to the course of events.

In this gloomy and despondent state she remained for some time.

At length she was aroused by hearing a faint sound.

It was the first sound which had reached her ears since she had awoke, and she listened to it eagerly.

At first she could not tell what it was, but soon she became aware that it was caused by some one ascending the flight of stone steps.

Presently, the footsteps paused before the door, and then she heard the fastenings removed.

Immediately afterwards, a youth entered, whose appearance, to say the least of it, was very singular.

One glance, however, at the expressionless countenance and peculiar eyes would have served to show that he was deficient in intellect.

He was, indeed, what is usually called half-witted.

His mouth was expanded into a vacant, meaningless grin, and he nodded his head in a manner half painful, half amusing.

He carried in his hand a basket containing bread and wine.

He brought this forward and placed it down by the side of the fair prisoner, nodding and smiling incessantly while he did so.

Edgworth Bess gazed at her visitor in mingled surprise and pain.

At first she was unable to comprehend his extraordinary behaviour, but in a moment afterwards it flashed across her mind that he was an idiot.

If such was the case—and she felt quite sure of it,—there would be little use in putting any questions to him.

The answers he gave could not have been depended on; or, more probably still, he would not understand what was said to him.

Although aware of this, Edgworth Bess addressed him, fancying that perhaps she might be able to learn from him the motives for the behaviour of the banditti.

In a sad but gentle voice she spoke.

"Tell me," she cried, "why I have been brought to this place, and why I am kept a prisoner!"

The idiot boy smiled and nodded his head in the same way as before.

Edgworth Bess repeated her inquiry, but with no better result.

Just as she had finished speaking, however, a tall figure strode into the room.

Edgworth Bess had not heard this man ascending, and she looked up in fear.

That feeling changed to loathing and disgust when she saw that it was the bandit chief who had entered.

"I can answer your question best, pretty one!" he said. "It is no good to ask Crazy Carl anything. He is an idiot, and has been so from his birth. He would not understand what you said to him."

Upon the entrance of the bandit chief, the idiot boy—or Crazy Carl, as he had been called—shrank back, exhibiting every symptom of terror and affright.

He got close to the door, and seemed more than half inclined to beat an immediate retreat.

Edgworth Bess felt her heart fail her when she beheld the hideous countenance of the bandit chief, and for a moment she seemed as though she must faint.

By a powerful effort, however, she controlled this feeling, and endeavoured to assume a certain amount of calmness.

Rising to her feet, she confronted the bandit chief with a boldness that astonished even herself.

"Speak!" she said. "For what purpose have you brought me a prisoner to this place? Why am I kept here?"

The bandit chief laughed as he replied:

"Because I choose to do so!"

Edgworth Bess trembled, for, in spite of all that Ned Cantle had told her, she could not help thinking that Jonathan Wild was at the bottom of this outrage, and that she had been made prisoner in consequence of directions he had given.

In this supposition, as the reader knows very well, she was wrong.

Jonathan Wild had nothing to do with it.

Just at that moment the whole of his attention was required to look after himself.

"If it will be any consolation for you to know," continued the bandit chief, "I will tell you why you have been brought here and made a prisoner. It is in order that we may exact a ransom from your friends. Doubtless, they would willingly pay a good round sum to have you restored to them uninjured."

"If that is your calculation," said Edgworth Bess, "it is a vain one. I have no friends."

The bandit chief laughed incredulously.

"I know better!" he said. "You must have friends, and rich ones, too! I know that you expected two to come and join you. Doubtless they are as well off as yourself."

"You are mistaken," returned Edgworth Bess. "Two friends of mine, it is true, were about to join me, but they are not rich, and they would be unable to pay any ransom for my deliverance."

"Ah, well," returned the bandit chief, calmly, "we shall see! All prisoners say at first that they have no friends who will pay ransom for them; but when they have been shut up awhile, it is wonderful what an improvement takes place in their memory. They are sure to recollect some one or other who will come forward with the money necessary for their release."

Edgworth Bess remained silent, and the bandit chief, after a short pause, resumed:

"You will stay here until you tell me who your friends are, and where they are to be found. If you are obstinate, and refuse to do this, you will have to remain a prisoner. I am in no fear that you will escape. Strong men have been confined in this very chamber for many months; but not one of them ever managed to make their escape from it. I tell you all this for your own good. Weigh over what I have said. To-morrow I shall see you again, and by that time you will be able to realise your position."

With these words, the bandit chief turned on his heel and left the room.

Crazy Carl, as soon as he saw him approaching, rushed down the stairs with the utmost precipitation, leaving the bandit chief to secure the door himself.

Edgworth Bess listened to the creaking of the bolts, the sharp snap of the lock, and the retreating footsteps of the bandit chief with an aching heart.

Her situation seemed now to be more hopeless and forlorn than ever.

She knew it would be useless to apply to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard for money for her ransom.

She was, indeed, filled with an ever-increasing fear on their account.

She felt sure some misfortune had befallen them.

As the day advanced, she grew more serious and alarmed.

The least sound terrified her exceedingly, and she listened with suspended breath, for every moment she expected that the thief-taker would make his appearance.

The day wore away, however, without the occurrence of this expected event.

For a long time she stood at the grated window, looking out over the forest.

But although she stood there for a long time, she saw nothing living, and at last, quite wearied both in mind and body, she threw herself down upon the pallet.

There she remained throughout the night.

When darkness came, the bandits commenced another carouse.

The sounds distracted her, and she was unable to obtain the only consolation it was possible for her to have in her prison—namely, the unconsciousness of sleep.

The next morning the idiot boy again entered the apartment, bringing with him a fresh supply of provisions.

Edgworth Bess smiled sadly upon him as he entered.

Somehow, deprived of all intelligence as he was, she fancied he was a friend.

Nodding and smiling, he placed the basket down, and then started with astonishment upon perceiving that what he had brought on the preceding morning was untouched.

Edgworth Bess was about to speak, but Crazy Carl rapidly carried his finger to his lips as a sign for her to be silent.

This was a greater manifestation of intelligence than she had expected to receive.

Crazy Carl, having deposited the basket, stole on tiptoe to the door.

Then, leaning out, he placed his hand to his ear, and listened.

He was apparently satisfied that no one was near, and so he returned to the spot where he had previously stood.

"All right!" he muttered, smiling and nodding at every word. "All right—don't be afraid. Old Grimm not come this morning."

"Do you mean the man who came yesterday?"

The idiot nodded.

"Why not eat?" he said, pointing to the basket of provisions.

"I cannot."

As she spoke, Edgworth Bess fancied that her visitor looked longingly upon the viands.

She wished to conciliate him, if possible, for the time might come when he would be able to render her a service.

Stooping down, then, she picked up one of the baskets and held it towards him, saying, as she did so:

"You are welcome."

The idiot's eyes grew brighter, and, taking the flask containing the wine, he nodded and smiled; then, placing it to his lips, kept it there until he had drained it to the last drop.

It was evident that he was much delighted, and by various signs endeavoured to show Edgworth Bess how very grateful and pleased he felt.

She pressed him to partake of the bread, but this he refused to do unless she ate also.

More to humour him than to satisfy any natural cravings, she broke off a small piece of the loaf and began to eat, while the idiot devoured the remainder with avidity.

He seemed, indeed, to be half starved, and he bore about him many traces of ill-usage.

He was compelled to wait upon the bandits, hand and foot, and he found them no very gentle masters.

Without exception they all felt a brutal delight in torturing and tormenting him.

Kindness was totally unknown to him.

Edgworth Bess was the first who had exhibited it, and so great was the impression made upon him, that he felt ready and willing to become her slave.

The company of this half-witted being was preferable to the solitude of that turret chamber, and doubtless Edgworth Bess would have tempted him to remain much longer, but soon the poor fellow started and listened.

"Grimm!" he said, in a trembling voice—"he is coming!"

A heavy footstep could now be heard ascending the stairs.

Crazy Carl thrust the piece of bread he had been eating under his apparel, and, making another rapid sign for silence, he crept towards the door.

Trembling in every limb, and looking excessively frightened, he awaited the arrival of the bandit chief.

Up he came at the same deliberate speed.

Upon reaching the door, and finding it open, he uttered an angry growl.

His eye fell upon the trembling form of the poor idiot.

"Why do you linger here, fool?" he said, and, as he uttered the words, he struck Crazy Carl a violent blow with the scabbard of his sword.

"Begone!" he continued—"descend at once!"

Glad to escape further brutality, the idiot flew downstairs, leaving the bandit chief alone with his prisoner.

CHAPTER CCCLXXIV.

EDGWORDTH BESS AND CRAZY CARL ENDEAVOUR TO EFFECT AN ESCAPE FROM THE OLD RUIN.

EDGWORDTH BESS shrank back instinctively when the bandit chief entered.

He noticed the movement, but affected not to do so.

"Well, pretty one," he said, in a bantering tone, which was, of all others, most displeasing to the prisoner, "have you thought over your situation—have you weighed what I told you yesterday?"

He paused as if waiting for a reply, but Edgworth Bess continued silent.

"Have you made up your mind," he continued, in a louder voice, "to trouble your friends for a ransom? I am in no great hurry, only the longer you stay the more money will be required to purchase your freedom."

"I can only repeat what I said yesterday," replied Edgworth Bess, speaking with much difficulty. "If your sole object in bringing me a prisoner to this place is to extract money from my friends, release me at once. I tell you again I have no friends—at least, none who would be able to pay any money for my ransom."

"You will think of some one in a day or two," said the bandit chief, calmly. "I have heard so many others tell the same tale, that I am tired of listening to it. As for letting you go, that is out of the question; I am determined to be recompensed for my trouble in some way or other!"

"I am in your power," said Edgworth Bess, "and unable to make any effectual resistance. I shall, however, do my best to get free."

"You are welcome to try; but I have no time to waste in talking to you this morning. I must go, and all I shall say is, that I don't believe you when you say you have no friends who would pay money to have you set at liberty. It doesn't stand to reason that anyone with so much money and so many valuable articles as you and your companions carry about with you, should be without wealthy friends."

"You are mistaken," said Edgworth Bess; "I have but two friends in the whole world, and they are the reverse of wealthy."

"Well, we shall see. The longer you stay, as I said yesterday, the greater the amount will be. It will advance a hundred pounds a day—that is the modest charge I shall make for your board and lodging."

With these words, the bandit chief again left the room.

His bantering, half-sneering, half-jocular manner distressed Edgworth Bess exceedingly.

She knew not what to make of it, but something seemed to tell her that she had much to dread from such a man.

During the remainder of the day her solitude was not broken in upon, and so of course no incident occurred needing any description.

The fair prisoner had no other companion than her own thoughts, and these were sad enough.

The next morning, at the usual time, the idiot boy paid another visit to the cell.

As he entered, Edgworth Bess could not help noticing the expression of his countenance.

He seemed to be overjoyed about something.

"What is the matter?" asked Edgworth Bess, curiously; "what has happened?"

"He, he!" laughed the idiot, "Old Grimm went out yesterday, and he's not come back yet."

The poor girl felt her hopes rise upon hearing this intelligence.

"Gone out!" she said, "and the men too?"

"Not all."

"How many remain?"

"Four."

Her hopes sank again.

For a moment she fancied that she had a chance of making her escape, but now there was an end to that idea.

Recollecting, however, the pleasure with which the idiot had partaken of the bread and wine on the preceding morning, she again offered him the basket.

He ate as greedily as before.

"You are kind to Crazy Carl," he said—"everybody else gives me hard blows."

Edgworth Bess was surprised to hear him speak so rationally; she didn't believe that he possessed so much intelligence.

The fact was, occasionally the poor fellow had lucid intervals.

The present was one of them, but they were invariably succeeded by a state of helpless imbecility.

"Do you understand what a prisoner is?" asked Edgworth Bess.

"Yes, I know—you are one."

"I am," she returned, hope once more reviving in her breast.

There was a possibility, she thought, of winning this boy by kindness to serve her.

"I want to get away," she said.

Carl shook his head slowly.

"You can't."

"Can you help me?"

"No—no. If I did, old Grimm would kill me!"

"But should you not like to leave this place?"

This seemed a fresh thought to the poor idiot, and he passed his hand restlessly over his brow.

"Leave here?" he repeated.

"Yes; should you not like to go away—should you not like to go with me to some place where everyone would be kind to you, and where Grimm could not come?"

"Can't be," he said—"can't leave here."

"Why not?"

The idiot shuddered.

"We should have to go into the forest," he said.

"And what of that?"

"Ghosts!" he said, with a shudder—"evil spirits—demons with long arms, who would twine them round and round you, and hold you till you died! The forest is full of them! I could not go in the forest!"

Edgworth Bess looked at her strange companion in wonder.

She was at a loss to think where he had imbibed such notions; but, after a little reflection, she came to the conclusion that the bandit chief and his followers had impressed these horrible ideas upon his mind, in order to prevent him leaving the ruins, which were surrounded by the forest.

She could tell that his alarm was real, and she feared that without she could change the current of his thoughts, she would fall into his idiotic state.

"Have some more wine," she said, "and some more bread. You will be strong then, and the evil spirits in the forest will not be able to harm you."

He could not reconcile himself to this idea.

The utmost pains had been taken to excite his terror, and it would have been a very difficult matter to remove the impressions then made.

How to disabuse his mind of these ideas Edgworth Bess was at a loss to think.

The desire of making her escape, and her belief that her sole chance of doing so rested in the being before her, sharpened her inventive powers, and soon a fresh thought struck her.

"Carl," she said, "should you like to go away with me, if it was not to the forest?"

"I should—I should!" he replied, his eyes gleaming with something like intelligence. "I should, but I dare not go to the forest!"

"Does Grimm go?"

"Oh yes!"

"And all his men?"

"Yes."

"And do the evil spirits ever hurt them?"

"No."

"Then, why should they hurt you?"

Carl pressed both his hands over his head, and seemed as though he was trying to think, or as though he was endeavouring to grasp at this new idea.

"But I am a poor idiot," he said, at length, "and Grimm and his men are not. The evil spirits would hurt the poor idiot!"

"Not if I was with you," said Edgworth Bess, quickly, as this new thought struck her—"not if I am with you! I shall be able to keep away the evil spirits, and in a little while we should be out of the forest."

"Could you keep them away?" asked the idiot boy, doubtfully.

"I could indeed!"

Her confident tone and manner produced a remarkable effect upon him, and he seemed almost inclined to believe her.

"Can you not take me downstairs," said Edgworth Bess, "and out into the forest, without our being seen by anyone? If you can do that all will be well! I will answer for the rest. I am not afraid of the evil spirits, and the demons with the long arms, and I can keep them from hurting you. Will you try?"

Carl hesitated.

The poor fellow seemed quite bewildered.

Doubtless his brain had never been so taxed before.

"Do you know where those four men are?"

"In the large room."

"Then, could we not creep downstairs silently and get into the forest without them seeing or hearing us? It is worth while, Carl, for you will be happy; you will have plenty to eat and drink, and no one will illtreat you; you will have no more hard blows."

These last words appeared to contain some powerful inducement, for Carl took Edgworth Bess by the hand and led her to the door of the apartment.

How the poor girl's heart beat!

She was so agitated that she could scarcely move or breathe.

The road to escape she fully believed lay plain and clear before her. Once out into the forest, and then she felt she should have nothing to fear.

Carl drew her across the threshold; and she was about to put her foot upon the first step, when a loud voice was heard shouting below.

An immediate change came over the idiot.

He trembled and shook, and became the helpless being he was when he first entered the apartment.

"Grimm!" he murmured—"Grimm!"

Edgworth Bess felt there was only one course she could adopt, and that was to retire into the cell again, reluctant as she was to do so.

The bandit chief called loudly upon Carl, and the sound of his voice so alarmed the idiot that he could scarcely close and fasten the door.

He did so, however, and then descended.

Edgworth Bess placed her ear against the keyhole and listened.

She heard loud shrieks of pain, accompanied with a sound of heavy blows, which told her that the bandit chief was again illtreating his helpless dependent.

In a little while, however, these sounds ceased, and all became silent.

Edgworth Bess felt this disappointment bitterly, and she shed many tears.

She made sure of being able to escape.

She fancied that in a few moments, at the most, she should have been in the open air, and now she was as much a prisoner as before.

She wept until she was quite exhausted, and then sank off into a deep slumber.

She was awakened by feeling some one touch her on the arm.

She started up in terror, fully expecting to behold the countenance of the bandit chief.

To her joy, however, she found that it was Crazy Carl.

"Hush!" he said—"don't make a noise!"

He seemed more rational than ever.

Edgworth Bess now noticed for the first time that it was night, and that the chamber was only illuminated by the moon.

"Why are you here, Carl?" she asked, kindly.

"I want you to take me away," he said; "you promised to take me where old Grimm could not come, and where I should have no more hard blows. I would go by myself, only I am frightened at the spirits. Take me with you! Let us go now! Are you sure you can keep away the spirits?"

Edgworth Bess started to her feet.

Hope sprang up in her breast.

"I will take you, Carl," she said, "and gladly. Are you sure we can reach the forest unperceived?"

"Oh yes, I know the way. I can take you easily."

"I will undertake to do that," said Edgworth Bess, with a smile, "if you will do the rest."

"Come then, now—follow me down the stairs."

Gladly Edgworth Bess complied.

But when she again reached the head of the stairs, she feared she should be unable to descend.

Every instant she expected to hear the dreaded voice of the bandit chief.

A deeper silence, however, than she could recollect having before experienced, reigned around, and reassured by it, she took the idiot's hand, and the pair stole noiselessly down the spiral staircase.

Every now and then the poor girl would have to pause and gather strength to proceed.

She was giddy, and faint with apprehension.

Lower and lower down the staircase they went, slowly but yet noiselessly.

As she got further from her prison, Edgworth Bess felt her courage revive.

And now that they had got so far down the staircase in safety, there appeared to be a probability of accomplishing the remainder of the descent.

"Stop!" said the idiot, suddenly, "there is a door here, which we must go through."

[EDGORTH BESS AND THE IDIOT ESCAPING FROM THE BANDITTI'S STRONGHOLD.]

He cautiously withdrew the bolts, and then led Edgworth Bess into a chamber into which the moon was shining.

The silvery light showed that this chamber was in a state of great dilapidation; the walls were crumbled and broken, and the floor was covered with fragments of masonry.

At the further extremity was a large, irregularly-shaped opening in the wall, which had in all probability been a window.

Towards this the idiot led the way.

Upon reaching it he paused, and Edgworth Bess looked with curiosity about her.

This opening in the wall was a considerable distance from the ground, and she wondered what could have been the idiot's motive for bringing her there.

She looked, but she was unable to perceive any means by which they might descend.

No. 100.—BLUESKIN.

Her heart seemed to turn cold, and she went very faint, for the thought came over her that the idiot had relapsed into his old condition, and had brought her there without any definite object.

In all likelihood she was as far off making her escape as ever.

As this distressing thought crossed her mind she turned her head towards her companion.

The bright rays of the moon shone full upon his countenance, revealing every feature with great distinctness.

Edgworth Bess started when she beheld it.

His eyes appeared to have an unnatural glare, and were rolling wildly in their sockets, while a general quivering of his whole frame and other unmistakable symptoms showed that he was suffering from extreme fright.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXV.

EDGORTH BESS SUCCEEDS IN MAKING HER ESCAPE FROM THE BANDITTI'S STRONGHOLD.

EDGORTH Bess felt her very heart turn sick when the thought occurred to her that she was being made the victim of the idiot's imbecility.

No doubt he had wandered without any purpose to that strange apartment; or if he possessed any ray of intelligence when starting, it seemed to have departed.

There could be no mistaking the fact, however, that the expression on his countenance was caused by the most abject fear.

It was the same expression as she had seen when the bandit chief ascended to the turret chamber.

Was it possible that he was now at hand?

The thought seemed sufficient to drive her into madness. She felt that if she failed in her attempt to escape on this occasion, such precaution would afterwards be taken that she would not have the slightest chance of gaining her freedom again.

Crazy Carl still continued to tremble, and his eyes to roll wildly in their orbits.

Edgworth Bess took hold of him by the arm, and endeavoured to arrest his attention.

After a time she succeeded.

"What is the matter?" she asked, in an anxious whisper. "What is it that has so greatly alarmed you? Can you see or hear anyone? What is it?—what has happened?"

"Grimm!" said the idiot, through his chattering teeth—"Crimm!"

"Where?" asked Edgworth Bess—"where?"

"I can hear him!" said Crazy Carl—"I can hear him quite plain!"

Edgworth Bess, upon hearing these words, at once assumed a listening attitude, but to her no sound was audible save the rustling of the tree-tops as they were slightly agitated by the wind.

"I cannot hear him," she said, after a pause. "You must have been mistaken! Shake off this terror! Remember, I am with you, and will protect you! Do not fear any of the evil spirits in the forest!"

Carl grew calmer, and he murmured:

"He is gone now—he is gone! I am sure I heard him, and fancied he had discovered your flight. But he is gone now; let us fly at once!"

"Why have you brought me to this place?" said Edgworth Bess, once more approaching the opening in the wall. "We are a great distance from the ground. Why did you not descend the remainder of the steps?"

Carl shook his head.

"Wouldn't do!" he replied. "Men are at the bottom of the steps, and we could not pass without their knowing it. This is the only way."

"But how can we descend?" said Edgworth Bess, her fears being now considerably allayed.

"I will show you. It is not so hard as you think. Come this way."

Edgworth Bess was almost frightened at her strange companion, and almost hesitated to accompany him to the opening in the wall.

She could not tell what sudden freak his disordered intellect might impel him to attempt upon getting her there. He might throw her off her balance, and she would fall to the earth and be killed.

It was only for a moment that Edgworth Bess allowed this thought to retain the mastery over her.

She looked into the idiot's countenance, which was fully revealed by the moonbeams falling upon it, and she felt that she could trust him.

His face was calm; the vacant look which generally characterised it had disappeared, while his mouth was no longer drawn up into the usual grin.

She approached, then, to the very edge of the wall, where Crazy Carl was standing.

He pointed downwards, and said:

"Look, can you see that broad wall a little way below us?"

"Yes, yes!"

"Well, you will find it easy to get down upon it, and from there on to the roof, and from the roof to the ground."

The poor girl trembled. It looked a desperate feat, and had she not been urged forward by her terrible position, in all probability she would not have attempted to make such a perilous descent.

"I will show you," said Carl. "It is very easy; I have done it myself a hundred times. Look."

He stooped down as he spoke, and cautiously lowered himself over the abyss, until he hung down at the full length of his arms. His feet then rested on the wall which he had pointed out, and which was, in reality, very much wider than it appeared to be when viewed from above.

"Now," he said, "descend in the same way as I did. I will stand here and assist you. Do not fear—all will be well!"

Edgworth Bess feared that she would be unable to accomplish this feat, but then she thought of her prison, of the hideous bandit chief, and lastly of Jack Sheppard, who doubtless was wandering about in the forest and encountering a thousand dangers while seeking for her.

This gave her strength and resolution.

Quickly and carefully she imitated the actions of the idiot boy, and lowered herself down.

He stood on the wall and steadied her as she descended.

In another moment, with her heart beating at a terrible rate, she was standing on the wall.

It was at least two feet wide, so that to walk upon it was an easy enough matter.

Crazy Carl was evidently familiar with the route, for he walked along the wall with great ease and confidence, at the same time assisting Edgworth Bess to follow him.

At last the extremity was reached, and the idiot pointed out a steep, sloping roof.

"We shall have to slip down that," he said, "but you will find the task much easier than it looks to be. Come, I will assist you."

Edgworth Bess committed herself to the care of the idiot, for she felt more confidence in him now than she had hitherto done.

She found he was quite right; the task of slipping down the roof was not half so difficult as she made sure it would be.

By the time she had reached the lowest part, she discovered that she was at least twelve feet from the level ground.

"I will go first," said Crazy Carl, "and when I tell you to do so, you must drop, and I will catch you. You need not be terrified, for you will not be hurt."

The idiot lowered himself to the ground, and then caught Edgworth Bess, who was thus saved from any injury from the fall.

Now she was once more standing on firm earth, the young girl felt her courage rise wonderfully, and she believed that she should be fully equal to the remainder of her task.

She paused for a moment just where she was, in order to look around her.

The old ruin in which the banditti had taken up their quarters was very picturesque and beautiful.

It was, too, of considerable extent; some portions of it were much decayed, while others seemed to have escaped the ravages of time.

The donjon or keep, at the top of which she had been confined, was the most prominent object.

She looked up, and near the top could just perceive a tiny loop-hole closely barred.

That was the window that looked into her prison.

At first Crazy Carl looked about him with great apprehension, but by degrees his spirits rose when he found that the profound stillness was unbroken.

"Come!" said Edgworth Bess. "Our flight has not yet been discovered, but we cannot tell how soon it may be. Let us fly while we have the opportunity, for the further we can get from this place the better chance we shall have of escaping, should a search be made for us."

She advanced towards the trees as she spoke, and Crazy Carl followed her, though with a hesitating, reluctant step.

Edgworth Bess perceived this, and encouraged him to come forward.

When he was fairly beneath the shadow of the trees his terrors rapidly increased.

All those frightful tales which had been so artfully impressed upon his mind by the banditti respecting the inmates of the forest thronged thickly upon his brain.

Edgworth Bess saw how rapidly his terror was increasing, and it was clear that, unless she could do something to inspire him with courage, it would increase to such a degree that he would not follow her.

It is true that, in the hour of danger, he would more likely be an encumbrance than aught else, but somehow Edgworth Bess fancied she was more secure when she had some one with her.

The thought of wandering through that immense forest by herself was a fearful one, but if she had company, the enterprise was shorn of half its terrors.

"Why do you hang back?" she said. "Why do you seem so frightened? You must put trust in me—I have told you that I will save you from all the evil spirits who inhabit this forest, and I will be as good as my word. While I am with you not one of them will have the power to do you the least harm!"

"Are you sure?"

"I am quite sure. I tell you again, if you will only keep by my side no harm will befall you. The evil spirits will not dare to emerge or show themselves!"

The confident tone in which Edgworth Bess spoke produced a great effect upon the idiot's mind; but for all that, he hung back.

Suddenly both were startled by a loud blast upon a horn, which rang out clear and loud through the silent forest.

Edgworth Bess uttered a faint scream of terror.

The sound came from the direction of the ruin, and the only cause to which it could be attributed was that their escape had been discovered.

The horn was blown again.

Edgworth Bess seemed as though she was about to sink into the earth.

All her strength left her, and her brain reeled.

So great was the horror, however, which the bandit chief had inspired in her heart, and so much did she dread being taken back to her prison, that she was enabled to shake off this feeling, and, grasping the idiot by the arm, she said:

"Fly—fly!—be quick and fly! If you linger, old Grimm and his men will have us, and they will torture you, and me as well!"

Crazy Carl's terror was very great—so great, indeed, as almost to deprive him of the power of motion; but when Edgworth Bess spoke, he aroused himself a little.

She took hold of him by the hand, and plunged at random among the trees.

He followed her mechanically.

Intense fear enabled the fugitives to make great speed, but before they had gone far they heard sounds in the rear, which unmistakably proclaimed that the banditti were in pursuit and making close search after them.

As she hurried on, forcing her way through thickets and tangled undergrowth, the poor girl could hear the banditti shouting to each other, and also the trampling of their heavy feet, still she flew onwards, until at length she emerged into an open glade in the forest, in which nothing but soft green turf was growing.

Along this she bounded at a speed that was truly wonderful, Crazy Carl keeping pace with her from the mere force of imitation.

Still the banditti could be heard in the rear, and from the loudness of the sounds, it seemed that they were gaining rapidly upon the fugitives.

They were accustomed to travelling through the forest, and no doubt were well acquainted with its inmost recesses.

This would be a great advantage, for they would be able to keep upon the track of the fugitives.

Like some poor wounded deer, Edgworth Bess still continued to bound onward.

She drew her breath with difficulty, and her limbs seemed to fail her, still she struggled on.

Her companion seemed no less exhausted than herself. At length she felt that she could not possibly go any further.

What with fear and what with fatigue, her strength was utterly exhausted.

The banditti did not appear to be so close behind as they had been hitherto.

But still they could be heard with great distinctness.

"I can run no farther," said Edgworth Bess. "My strength is quite spent. We must try and hide ourselves among these bushes. I should think we shall be safe. The banditti, fancying we are in advance, may pass us by, and then we shall escape."

CHAPTER CCCCLXXVI.

EDGWORTH BESS AND CRAZY CARL HAVE SOME PERILOUS ADVENTURES IN THE FOREST.

CRAZY CARL was quite as glad to rest as Edgworth Bess, and he consented to hide himself without hesitation.

The undergrowth was very dense, and Edgworth Bess fancied that she would be able to conceal herself amongst it without much difficulty, and in such a manner as to leave no trace to show the banditti where they were.

With beating heart and trembling limbs, she laid herself down at full length upon the ground.

The fern and brake, and the rest of the rank vegetation completely hid her from sight.

Crazy Carl was close by.

She could not see him, but she could hear him panting for breath.

She listened with the greatest anxiety to the sounds which came from the banditti.

Every moment the voices grew more and more distinct, and again she could hear the trampling of their feet as they forced their way through the bushes.

From the manner in which they shouted to each other, it would seem that they were advancing in a line, each man being separated from his comrade by a distance of several feet.

The nearer they came the more terrified Edgworth Bess felt, and she was afraid that, after all, her hiding-place would be discovered, and she would be led back to the ruin a prisoner.

But she could do nothing save remain perfectly still where she was.

The least movement would have the effect of betraying her to her foes.

It was too late to rise and fly.

On came the banditti at a rapid pace, until at length they reached the place where the fugitives were concealed.

They halted only a few feet from the bushes beneath which they were hidden, and Edgworth Bess heard the bandit chief address his men in angry, growling tones.

He commanded them to search in every direction, and not to give up the pursuit until they had accomplished their purpose.

He told them the danger that would result from this girl remaining at liberty, inasmuch as she would communicate with the authorities, and an attack would be made upon their secret stronghold.

In addition to all this, which was quite enough to make his men use every effort, he offered on his own account a large reward for the recovery of Edgworth Bess, for, from secret reasons of his own, he much desired to recover possession of her.

Lying hidden under the brushwood, the poor girl was compelled to listen to all that was said, and she shuddered fearfully, lest one of the band should make some movement and discover her.

It was clear that the banditti had lost the track, and they now dispersed themselves around, in the hope that they should be able to discover some signs of those they sought.

Edgworth Bess and Crazy Carl narrowly escaped detection, but by great good fortune the banditti, although they marched about in every direction, passed by their hiding-place.

In a few minutes all had left the spot, and the sounds of the footsteps of their foes grew fainter and fainter each moment.

Quite half an hour elapsed before Edgworth Bess sufficiently recovered from her alarm to rise to her feet; at the expiration of that time, however, she did so, and commanded the idiot to rise also.

Looking literally frightened to death, Crazy Carl rose up and looked about him.

"Old Grimm is gone," said Edgworth Bess, "that is

"Well, you will find it easy to get down upon it, and from there on to the roof, and from the roof to the ground."

The poor girl trembled. It looked a desperate feat, and had she not been urged forward by her terrible position, in all probability she would not have attempted to make such a perilous descent.

"I will show you," said Carl. "It is very easy; I have done it myself a hundred times. Look."

He stooped down as he spoke, and cautiously lowered himself over the abyss, until he hung down at the full length of his arms. His feet then rested on the wall which he had pointed out, and which was, in reality, very much wider than it appeared to be when viewed from above.

"Now," he said, "descend in the same way as I did. I will stand here and assist you. Do not fear—all will be well!"

Edgworth Bess feared that she would be unable to accomplish this feat, but then she thought of her prison, of the hideous bandit chief, and lastly of Jack Sheppard, who doubtless was wandering about in the forest and encountering a thousand dangers while seeking for her.

This gave her strength and resolution.

Quickly and carefully she imitated the actions of the idiot boy, and lowered herself down.

He stood on the wall and steadied her as she descended.

In another moment, with her heart beating at a terrible rate, she was standing on the wall.

It was at least two feet wide, so that to walk upon it was an easy enough matter.

Crazy Carl was evidently familiar with the route, for he walked along the wall with great ease and confidence, at the same time assisting Edgworth Bess to follow him.

At last the extremity was reached, and the idiot pointed out a steep, sloping roof.

"We shall have to slip down that," he said, "but you will find the task much easier than it looks to be. Come, I will assist you."

Edgworth Bess committed herself to the care of the idiot, for she felt more confidence in him now than she had hitherto done.

She found he was quite right; the task of slipping down the roof was not half so difficult as she made sure it would be.

By the time she had reached the lowest part, she discovered that she was at least twelve feet from the level ground.

"I will go first," said Crazy Carl, "and when I tell you to do so, you must drop, and I will catch you. You need not be terrified, for you will not be hurt."

The idiot lowered himself to the ground, and then caught Edgworth Bess, who was thus saved from any injury from the fall.

Now she was once more standing on firm earth, the young girl felt her courage rise wonderfully, and she believed that she should be fully equal to the remainder of her task.

She paused for a moment just where she was, in order to look around her.

The old ruin in which the banditti had taken up their quarters was very picturesque and beautiful.

It was, too, of considerable extent; some portions of it were much decayed, while others seemed to have escaped the ravages of time.

The donjon or keep, at the top of which she had been confined, was the most prominent object.

She looked up, and near the top could just perceive a tiny loop-hole closely barred.

That was the window that looked into her prison.

At first Crazy Carl looked about him with great apprehension, but by degrees his spirits rose when he found that the profound stillness was unbroken.

"Come!" said Edgworth Bess. "Our flight has not yet been discovered, but we cannot tell how soon it may be. Let us fly while we have the opportunity, for the further we can get from this place the better chance we shall have of escaping, should a search be made for us."

She advanced towards the trees as she spoke, and Crazy Carl followed her, though with a hesitating, reluctant step.

Edgworth Bess perceived this, and encouraged him to come forward.

When he was fairly beneath the shadow of the trees his terrors rapidly increased.

All those frightful tales which had been so artfully impressed upon his mind by the banditti respecting the inmates of the forest thronged thickly upon his brain.

Edgworth Bess saw how rapidly his terror was increasing, and it was clear that, unless she could do something to inspire him with courage, it would increase to such a degree that he would not follow her.

It is true that, in the hour of danger, he would more likely be an encumbrance than aught else, but somehow Edgworth Bess fancied she was more secure when she had some one with her.

The thought of wandering through that immense forest by herself was a fearful one, but if she had company, the enterprise was shorn of half its terrors.

"Why do you hang back?" she said. "Why do you seem so frightened? You must put trust in me—I have told you that I will save you from all the evil spirits who inhabit this forest, and I will be as good as my word. While I am with you not one of them will have the power to do you the least harm!"

"Are you sure?"

"I am quite sure. I tell you again, if you will only keep by my side no harm will befall you. The evil spirits will not dare to emerge or show themselves!"

The confident tone in which Edgworth Bess spoke produced a great effect upon the idiot's mind; but for all that, he hung back.

Suddenly both were startled by a loud blast upon a horn, which rang out clear and loud through the silent forest.

Edgworth Bess uttered a faint scream of terror.

The sound came from the direction of the ruin, and the only cause to which it could be attributed was that their escape had been discovered.

The horn was blown again.

Edgworth Bess seemed as though she was about to sink into the earth.

All her strength left her, and her brain reeled.

So great was the horror, however, which the bandit chief had inspired in her heart, and so much did she dread being taken back to her prison, that she was enabled to shake off this feeling, and, grasping the idiot by the arm, she said:

"Fly—fly!—be quick and fly! If you linger, old Grimm and his men will have us, and they will torture you, and me as well!"

Crazy Carl's terror was very great—so great, indeed, as almost to deprive him of the power of motion; but when Edgworth Bess spoke, he aroused himself a little.

She took hold of him by the hand, and plunged at random among the trees.

He followed her mechanically.

Intense fear enabled the fugitives to make great speed, but before they had gone far they heard sounds in the rear, which unmistakably proclaimed that the banditti were in pursuit and making close search after them.

As she hurried on, forcing her way through thickets and tangled undergrowth, the poor girl could hear the banditti shouting to each other, and also the trampling of their heavy feet, still she flew onwards, until at length she emerged into an open glade in the forest, in which nothing but soft green turf was growing.

Along this she bounded at a speed that was truly wonderful, Crazy Carl keeping pace with her from the mere force of imitation.

Still the banditti could be heard in the rear, and from the loudness of the sounds, it seemed that they were gaining rapidly upon the fugitives.

They were accustomed to travelling through the forest, and no doubt were well acquainted with its inmost recesses.

This would be a great advantage, for they would be able to keep upon the track of the fugitives.

Like some poor wounded deer, Edgworth Bess still continued to bound onward.

She drew her breath with difficulty, and her limbs seemed to fail her, still she struggled on.

Her companion seemed no less exhausted than herself. At length she felt that she could not possibly go any further.

What with fear and what with fatigue, her strength was utterly exhausted.

The banditti did not appear to be so close behind as they had been hitherto.

But still they could be heard with great distinctness.

"I can run no farther," said Edgworth Bess. "My strength is quite spent. We must try and hide ourselves among these bushes. I should think we shall be safe. The banditti, fancying we are in advance, may pass us by, and then we shall escape."

CHAPTER CCCLXXVI.

EDGWORTH BESS AND CRAZY CARL HAVE SOME PERILOUS ADVENTURES IN THE FOREST.

CRAZY CARL was quite as glad to rest as Edgworth Bess, and he consented to hide himself without hesitation.

The undergrowth was very dense, and Edgworth Bess fancied that she would be able to conceal herself amongst it without much difficulty, and in such a manner as to leave no trace to show the banditti where they were.

With beating heart and trembling limbs, she laid herself down at full length upon the ground.

The fern and brake, and the rest of the rank vegetation completely hid her from sight.

Crazy Carl was close by.

She could not see him, but she could hear him panting for breath.

She listened with the greatest anxiety to the sounds which came from the banditti.

Every moment the voices grew more and more distinct, and again she could hear the trampling of their feet as they forced their way through the bushes.

From the manner in which they shouted to each other, it would seem that they were advancing in a line, each man being separated from his comrade by a distance of several feet.

The nearer they came the more terrified Edgworth Bess felt, and she was afraid that, after all, her hiding-place would be discovered, and she would be led back to the ruin a prisoner.

But she could do nothing save remain perfectly still where she was.

The least movement would have the effect of betraying her to her foes.

It was too late to rise and fly.

On came the banditti at a rapid pace, until at length they reached the place where the fugitives were concealed.

They halted only a few feet from the bushes beneath which they were hidden, and Edgworth Bess heard the bandit chief address his men in angry, growling tones.

He commanded them to search in every direction, and not to give up the pursuit until they had accomplished their purpose.

He told them the danger that would result from this girl remaining at liberty, inasmuch as she would communicate with the authorities, and an attack would be made upon their secret stronghold.

In addition to all this, which was quite enough to make his men use every effort, he offered on his own account a large reward for the recovery of Edgworth Bess, for, from secret reasons of his own, he much desired to recover possession of her.

Lying hidden under the brushwood, the poor girl was compelled to listen to all that was said, and she shuddered fearfully, lest one of the band should make some movement and discover her.

It was clear that the banditti had lost the track, and they now dispersed themselves around, in the hope that they should be able to discover some signs of those they sought.

Edgworth Bess and Crazy Carl narrowly escaped detection, but by great good fortune the banditti, although they marched about in every direction, passed by their hiding-place.

In a few minutes all had left the spot, and the sounds of the footsteps of their foes grew fainter and fainter each moment.

Quite half an hour elapsed before Edgworth Bess sufficiently recovered from her alarm to rise to her feet; at the expiration of that time, however, she did so, and commanded the idiot to rise also.

Looking literally frightened to death, Crazy Carl rose up and looked about him.

"Old Grimm is gone," said Edgworth Bess. "that is imagination the reins too freely; she had been terrifying herself unnecessarily.

The white object was nothing more than a monument of rather peculiar shape, and formed of some kind of white stone-like marble.

Its shape was very rude and grotesque.

Finding out what it really was, she did not hesitate to go close up to it in order to make an examination of it.

The interior of the cave situated in the heart of a forest seemed a strange place for the erection of a monument.

Her curiosity was raised in spite of the dangers and difficulties of her position; she felt it would be a satisfaction if she could ascertain something about it.

Holding the light close to the stone, she saw that the monument was in an advanced state of decay.

In every part it bore witness of its great antiquity.

She walked completely round it without being able to discover anything more than she already knew.

On one side were some words rendered almost illegible by the effects of time.

These no doubt would afford a clue to the presence of a monument in so strange a place, and it was with great eagerness that she stooped down and tried to make the letters out.

In a little while she found that the inscription itself was not only almost illegible, but also in a language which she did not understand.

In about the middle of the stone slab were some figures.

There were four of them placed close together, and no doubt expressed the date at which the monument had been erected.

She had much trouble in deciphering them, but at last succeeded.

As she expected, the figures formed a date, and that date was 1214.

This was but scanty information to obtain, and did not serve in any way to reveal the meaning of the presence of the monument.

For the present, however, that seemed to be the only information she was likely to obtain.

While continuing her researches, she was aroused by Crazy Carl, who touched her on the shoulder and said: "Listen!"

The poor girl's heart beat so violently that for a minute or two it was the only sound she was able to distinguish. Presently, however, she heard the murmur of voices.

The sound clearly came from the forest, or rather from that portion of it just outside the entrance of the cavern.

The wild boar rose to his feet, uttering angry cries.

"Grimm," said the idiot—"Grimm and his men are outside."

"But there's a wild boar between us," said Edgworth Bess, in a whisper. "We may be safe yet. Let us stand behind this monument; we shall be able to conceal the light and also to listen."

This was done.

The next moment the forms of the banditti appeared at the entrance to the cavern.

It was evident that they intended to enter, but all drew back with great suddenness when they heard the boar uttering those angry cries.

From their long residence in the forest, they knew full well what those sounds meant.

The wild boar is at all times a dangerous animal, and one requiring much courage and skill to slay or capture.

By the peculiar cry which this one uttered, they could tell that it was badly wounded, and with the instinct possessed by so many wild beasts, had sought its own lair either to lie down and die, or to recover from its hurts.

It is while in such a state as this that the wild boar is most dangerous to attack.

Pain fills it with ungovernable rage, and it seems blind to everything.

When thus forced to bay, the banditti knew that it was no uncommon thing for a wild boar to rush forward and attack many men, and, before they could defend themselves, do serious injury.

Consequently, when they heard the sound, they drew back with the utmost precipitancy.

They did this all the more quickly, because, not long before, several had seen this boar and wantonly wounded it. They had noticed then that its size was almost gigantic—not one could remember having seen one so large.

To attack it while wounded and lying in its den required a much greater amount of courage than any of the banditti possessed.

They halted just outside the cavern, however, and consulted together as to what was to be done.

Independently of the boar, the greater portion of the banditti seemed very reluctant to enter the cavern. The chief, however, had seen the glimmer of a light within, and at once jumped to the conclusion that the fugitives were there.

He was compelled either to come to this conclusion, or else confess that they had eluded him altogether, for they had been searching many hours, and had not been able to obtain the least clue.

"We will have the boar out," said the bandit chief. "I am determined to enter the cavern, and ascertain whether the fugitives have taken refuge in it or not; there are quite enough of us to overcome the wild boar, even if he was twice as large and twice as furious as he is!"

The banditti did not seem to be of this opinion, but their chief was despotic, and so great was the influence he had over them that not one dared to grumble or refuse.

"I will show you how to get him out," he said, "and as soon as he makes his appearance fire and kill him; after that the rest will be easy. Now, then, look to your firearms, and be ready to shoot the moment I give the word!"

The banditti obeyed, and the chief, with a long spear in his hand, went towards the entrance of the cavern.

Standing close to the side, he began to poke about with the spear, and all the time hissed loudly like a serpent.

The banditti all looked on anxiously, and their admiration of their chief's courage was very great.

At first no notice whatever was taken by the wild boar of these proceedings; suddenly, however, with an awful roar that seemed to shake the very cavern, and which caused Crazy Carl to fall flat to the earth, and Edgworth Bess almost to faint, the wild boar rushed forth.

He came out like a hurricane.

"Now," said the chief, "fire! and be quick—if you don't, he will return, and we shall have had our trouble for nothing!"

The banditti raised their weapons and fired.

The report of so many firearms was something tremendous, and when the smoke had cleared away a little, there lay the wild boar rolling over and over in the agonies of death.

"Come on," said the bandit chief, and he waved his sword as he spoke; "we shall have no further trouble with him—come on, I say, I feel convinced they are in the cavern, and now we shall quickly have them!"

His followers set up a disorderly shout and rushed after him into the cavern.

"All is over," moaned Edgworth Bess, as she heard them coming—"all is over; it is no good to resist any longer!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXXVIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD COMMENCE A PURSUIT AFTER EDGWORTH BESS.

NED CANTLE'S escape from death was neither more nor less than miraculous.

Although seriously wounded in the throat by a pistol-bullet, covered with burns from head to foot, and badly crushed with the rubbish which had fallen upon him, still, when he was extricated from the ruins of the burning house he was, as we have already seen, well enough to give important information to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

But after he had told them that the cottage had been attacked and Edgworth Bess carried off by German banditti, he fell back as it appeared perfectly lifeless.

It had cost him a terrible effort to speak at all, and now that he had communicated the intelligence he was utterly exhausted.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard were to a certain extent prepared to hear some terrible tidings, but yet their fears had hardly made them suppose anything so dreadful as that the poor girl had been made a prisoner and carried off they knew not whither.

For several moments they were completely overwhelmed.

Jack Sheppard, who was kneeling down, clasped his hands over his face, and uttering a deep groan, gave full vent to his grief.

For a moment Blueskin seemed stunned.

It took that length of time to realise the dreadful news he had received.

The sight of Ned Cantle lying upon the ground enabled him to recover himself, and he immediately turned all his attention to his unfortunate comrade.

He presented a truly deplorable spectacle.

The blood had flowed from the wound in his neck in incredible quantities, and he was completely saturated with it.

The bruised and burnt condition of his body was enough to make the stoutest heart quail to look on.

All hope of recovery was at an end.

No one could receive such frightful injuries as those and outlive them.

All that Blueskin or anyone else in the world could do was to make his passage out of this world easier.

"Can you speak again," said Blueskin, bending over him—"is there anything that I can do for you—have you no request to make—is there no message you would like me to deliver?"

The muscles round Ned Cantle's mouth twitched convulsively, and after several inarticulate efforts he managed with great difficulty to gasp out, "Water—water!"

Some water was procured from the little well and poured down his throat.

The draught seemed to revive him greatly, but along with returning consciousness, seemed to come great pain, for he uttered several dreadful groans.

He subdued them with great difficulty, and then in a hollow voice he said:

"I fancy plunder was the wretches' object—they knew that we had money. I have already told you that they carried off poor Edgworth Bess."

"Yes, yes," said Jack Sheppard, "but can you tell where?"

"No more than I already have done—they have carried her into the forest."

"But for what object?"

Ned shook his head.

"Do you think they are in any way connected with Jonathan Wild—do you think they are acting for him?"

Ned Cantle shook his head again.

"Raise me up a little," he said slowly—"there, that will do. I am going—going fast—I can tell that by the strange light that is around me. Good-bye, Blueskin—good-bye, Jack—it is all over with me!"

Our two friends were deeply affected, for though their acquaintanceship with Ned Cantle had been short, yet for all that it had been long enough to show them that he was a staunch, true friend, and they were already deeply indebted to him.

There was a short pause, and then Blueskin said:

"Is there no message you wish delivered—is there no one that you would like to know your fate?"

"Only the old boys in the cavern—you know where, Blueskin, and you, Jack. When you get back to England, if ever you do, I should like you to go there and tell them what has been my fate."

Ned closed his eyes, and his head fell back as though the muscles of the neck had suddenly lost all strength.

Blueskin and Jack thought he was dead.

But he was not.

"Water! water," he cried. "Let me have plenty of it. I burn—I burn!"

More water was fetched by the widow's deformed son. While he was gone, Ned said:

"I defended her to the last—I did all I could to keep them off, but their numbers were too great. I expected that you would make your appearance every moment, and if you had there might have been a chance. If you had only come a few hours sooner, all would have been well."

"Here is the water."

"Thanks! You will search for her, of course—I know you will. She is perhaps not far from here. I wish I could accompany you, for I know the forest well; but—but that is all over. Good-bye to you both! Water—water!"

Blueskin placed the water to Ned's lips and continued to pour it down his throat, until at length he ceased to swallow it.

There was a slight shudder, a sudden contraction of the limbs, and all was over.

Ned Cantle's sufferings had passed.

He was dead.

Several minutes elapsed before our friends spoke or moved.

Jack Sheppard was the first to rise to his feet.

He stepped up to Blueskin, and touching him on the shoulder, said:

"Rise—rise—it is all over with Ned now, poor fellow; we can do no good for him. Don't let us lose any more time—let us commence the search at once. Who can tell what peril the poor girl is in by this time?"

Blueskin rose.

"Yes," he said, "we will begin the search at once. At least, before we start there is one duty we must perform."

"And what is that?"

"To bury Ned—it is the last and only service we can render him. If he remains here he will become the prey of all the wild beasts in the forest, and that is too horrible to think of."

"It is indeed," said Jack. "I would even save my worst foe from such a fate as that."

They were but ill provided with the necessary tools for digging a grave, but, going to the borders of the forest, where the soil was soft, they managed to hollow out a hole large and deep enough for their purpose.

It was, however, a labour which consumed a great deal of time, and when they had finished the day was far advanced.

Ned's body was placed in the grave and the earth filled in. They hammered it down hard and flat, so that none of the wolves or other ravenous creatures which infested the forest should be able to unbury it.

When this was over, our two friends refreshed themselves by a draught of water from the well, and then they commenced their search.

There were marks of many heavy feet on the ground surrounding the spot upon which the woodman's hut had stood, and these Blueskin examined with great care and attention.

By looking closely, he was at last enabled to discern a kind of track which led towards the forest.

They followed it carefully, and Blueskin said:

"How much I regret Ned Cantle's loss! Had he been with us our task would have been much easier. You heard him say that he knew the forest well."

"He did."

"And think what an advantage that must be. Here are we, and neither of us have seen it in our lives before."

"No, but it is useless to regret now he is dead."

"He is, poor fellow, and it will be a long time before we find another who will be to us what he has been."

The track which they had followed became fainter and fainter, until at last, when they were fairly among the trees, it was invisible.

Their search did indeed seem to be a hopeless one.

When approaching the hut, they had seen from the distance that the forest was of immense extent, and, without the slightest clue as they were, they might wander through it for weeks and months without finding what they sought.

Chance was their only guide.

It mattered little which way they took.

To them all paths were the same, and one was just as likely to be right as the other.

As they proceeded their difficulties appeared to grow greater and greater.

They journeyed on among the trees for several hours without making any discovery, and without meeting with any incident deserving of special record.

They penetrated some distance into the forest.

But still they seemed no nearer the achievement of their object than before.

Jack Sheppard was quite downcast.

Just about sunset he flung himself down upon the ground, and said:

"Let us rest a little, Blueskin, for I am so fatigued that I cannot possibly go any further; besides, I have no heart to proceed. We may continue wandering about in this manner for ever and ever."

"Cheer up, Jack!" said Blueskin, as he lay down on the turf by his comrade's side. "I am quite as fatigued as yourself, and am heartily glad of a brief rest."

"But what is to be done?" said Jack, dejectedly.

"We can do nothing but continue our search in the same way as we have begun it."

"Alas!"

"The enterprise before us is a difficult one, Jack; but we must be of good heart, and hope for the best; chance alone can befriended us. I trust that ere long we shall discover something which will serve as a clue."

There was but slight consolation to be derived from this, and Jack Sheppard turned away his head in silence.

Blueskin was silent too; he was wondering what would be the best thing that could be done.

The sun went down, and darkness began rapidly to creep over the forest.

Still our friends remained lying motionless upon the ground, nor did they rise till the moon's rays lighted up the scene.

"Come, Jack," said Blueskin, "arouse yourself—we will continue our search! First of all, we must manage to obtain some refreshment; if we do not we shall soon find our strength fail, and then we shall be badly off indeed!"

"I am sick and faint for want of food," said Jack; "but where are we to obtain anything to eat?"

"Here readily enough;—there are plenty of birds on the trees, and plenty of dry sticks lying about, so that we can quickly have a fire."

"Set about it, then, Blueskin; for my own part, I feel too weary to assist you."

"Nay, nay—I can't consent to that! Rouse yourself! When you are occupied in doing something you will be better. Take my advice,—action is the best thing for you. I will catch a bird, and you can make a fire."

Jack Sheppard consented.

Blueskin primed his pistols, and went to a little distance.

He fired twice, and soon afterwards returned, bringing with him a couple of large birds covered with black feathers.

"I don't know what birds these are, Jack, nor what they are like, but I should fancy they are good to eat."

Jack Sheppard soon made a fire by the aid of some gunpowder and his pistols.

He placed some dry leaves upon the ground, sprinkled gunpowder over them, then put more leaves, and then dry twigs.

A spark from the flint of his pistol quickly set the whole in a blaze.

Their meal was a primitive one, but nevertheless they enjoyed it amazingly, although their hearts were so heavy.

Blueskin was very sad himself; but, perceiving how low-spirited his comrade was, he concealed his feelings, and endeavoured to cheer him up.

He was only partially successful.

When they had finished their meal, Blueskin said:

"Now, Jack, I will be guided entirely by you in this matter. Do you think it will be better for us to remain here during the night, and commence our search at daylight to-morrow morning, or do you think we had better set about it now?"

"Which do you think would be the best?"

"Nay, I leave the choice to you."

"Then I fancy we shall not stand so good a chance of finding out anything if we travel by night, as we should if we travelled by day. We must have rest, and night is the proper time to take it."

"I quite agree with you," said Blueskin; "and that is the course which I should have adopted myself, only I feared that if I made the proposition you would accuse me of want of zeal."

"You did me an injustice, then. Let us remain where we are, and, if possible, obtain a good night's sleep. In the morning we shall awake rested and refreshed, and shall feel equal to the day's work before us."

"I hope we shall," said Blueskin. "We shall be able to make ourselves comfortable here, no doubt. It will be best to gather together as many dry sticks as we can find, and make a large fire with them; we can then lie down by the side of it and pass the night in safety."

This was agreed to.

All three occupied themselves in collecting fuel for the fire, which they placed in a great heap close at hand.

They piled plenty on the fire—then threw themselves down beside it.

They conversed together for several moments, but at last they all fell asleep.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXIX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARE AROUSED FROM THEIR SLUMBERS IN A STARTLING MANNER.

BLUESKIN and Jack Sheppard had travelled from Amsterdam without taking much rest upon the road, and from the time of their arrival at the ruined cottage until they laid down beside the fire in the forest, they had gone through no ordinary amount of fatigue.

Consequently, when they closed their eyes, their slumber was profound.

In all probability it would have continued for many hours had not both been startled by a loud and terrible cry.

Heavy as their slumber was, it awoke them instantly.

Under the impulse of the moment they sprang up, but they could not tell what they had heard or what it was that awoke them, or whether it was the effect of some dream.

The fact was, their brains were still clouded by sleep.

Another piercing cry, of a character similar to the first, completely restored them to the use of their faculties.

The fire had gone low, and gave out but little light.

Blueskin, however, on the first impulse of alarm had drawn his sword, and with this he turned the faggots over, and a bright blaze instantly sprang up.

A cry of horror then pealed at the same moment from his lips and those of Jack Sheppard.

Bending over the deformed boy, who had laid himself down to sleep, close to our friends was some huge object, but of what kind they could not at the first glance make out.

Jack Sheppard was the first to recognise it, and in accents of the greatest alarm he cried:

"It is a bear!"

He was right,—a bear, and one, too, of the largest and most ferocious species.

The fire now blazed fiercely, and gave forth a vivid light, fully revealing the form of the monstrous animal.

Its eyes were red with anger, and had a hungry look, while the lips were drawn back, thus showing the glittering teeth.

The deformed boy was quite overcome by the horror of his position, and had fainted.

One of the bear's paws rested on his breast.

Our friends had started up only just in time.

A minute later, and they would have had no chance of saving the boy's life.

As it was, it seemed very doubtful whether they would be able to do so.

The bear seemed to regard Blueskin and Jack with mingled defiance and apprehension.

The occurrence was altogether of such a startling and unexpected nature, that at first our friends stood perfectly still, not knowing what to do.

Neither had seen a bear before, and consequently were ignorant of the animal's exact powers of mischief, and of the easiest means of killing it.

Its huge size and fierce appearance made them think that an attack would be attended with great danger.

While making these reflections, both felt that it would be necessary to put an end to this hesitation.

Blueskin was the first to recover himself.

As we have said, he had his drawn sword in his hand, and brandishing this he suddenly rushed forward.

His intention of course was to attack the bear with it.

Jack Sheppard saw what he was about to do, and, springing forward, seized his comrade by the arm and drew him back.

"Be careful!" he said—"be careful!" Let us consider what would be the best mode of attacking the animal, and decide upon that which will rescue the boy with the least amount of danger to ourselves."

"And while we are doing that," said Blueskin, "struggling to release himself, the poor lad will doubtless fall a victim."

"No, no!—look steadily at the bear,—see how it is watching us;—it will not turn away to attack the boy for fear we should take advantage of the moment."

Blueskin saw that Jack was right.

"What shall we do?" he said. "How can we make an attack?"

"Let us shoot it."

[JONATHAN WILD IS BROUGHT A PRISONER INTO THE VESTIBULE OF NEWGATE.]

"But the death-blow must be inflicted at once. If you wound it, it will become quite ungovernable, and will rush upon us regardless of what injuries we may inflict." "Let us both take our pistols and shoot it; I am sure that would be better than attacking it with a sword."

This was agreed to. Blueskin sheathed his sword and drew a couple of pistols from his belt.

Jack Sheppard did the same, and pointed them full at the bear's head.

They were only a few paces off, and had no doubt that their aim would be successful.

It would almost seem as though the bear was conscious that it was menaced by no ordinary peril, for it appeared half inclined to beat a retreat.

Blueskin fired both his pistols in rapid succession. He hit the bear both times, once in the neck and once in the shoulder.

An angry roaring growl was the result, and Blueskin stepped back, for he fancied the bear was about to rush upon him.

No. 101.—BLUESKIN.

It was just at this moment that Jack fired.

But excitement rendered his aim unsteady.

One bullet struck the bear in the paw which rested on the deformed boy's breast, and the other went crashing among the trees.

By this time Blueskin had drawn two more pistols.

He fired, and both shots took effect in or near the animal's head.

With an angry snarl it left the body of the boy and came towards our friends with a shuffling, ungainly motion, which seemed clumsy and slow, but which was in reality much more rapid than they could have believed possible.

Jack Sheppard saw the bear coming, and hastily fired one pistol.

Fortunately he had the presence of mind to reserve the other.

Upon receiving this last wound, the bear gave an impetuous dash forward, and before Jack could get out of the way he found himself hurled with great violence to the earth.

The fall was not violent enough to deprive him of his senses, and looking up he saw the bear's head within a few inches of his face.

A sickly feeling of horror came over him, and he almost gave himself up for lost.

He was paralysed.

He held the undischarged pistol in his right hand, and although he was aware of it, yet he had not the power to raise his arm and point its muzzle towards his adversary.

Blueskin uttered a shout when he saw the bear rush forward.

He carried only four pistols, and these were all discharged.

There was no time to load, and so he once more drew his sword.

Two steps took him to where the bear was, and raising his sword, he brought it down with tremendous violence upon the brute's neck; at the very same instant, Jack Sheppard, who had recovered from the horror caused by his position, raised his pistol.

He was able to put the muzzle within an inch of the brute's throat.

He pulled the trigger, and a tremendous report followed.

Blueskin raised his sword and brought it down for a second time upon the brute's neck.

This was the last stroke.

The huge animal dropped suddenly, and lay perfectly still, as though entirely bereft of life.

It fell, too, exactly upon the body of Jack Sheppard, who was in imminent danger of being suffocated.

Perceiving that the bear was dead, Blueskin hastened to extricate his friend from his uncomfortable situation.

This task proved almost beyond his power, and when at last he succeeded in rolling the bear over, he found that Jack was unconscious.

He did not believe, however, that he was seriously hurt, and so this gave him small concern.

Raising him in his arms, he hurried off towards a stream which he had noticed while looking for the birds.

He laid Jack in the shallow brook, and let the water roll over him from head to foot.

The treatment was somewhat rough, but it was effectual.

The sudden chill restored Jack Sheppard to the full possession of his senses.

Blueskin assisted him to his feet, and then Jack shook the water from his clothing.

"Are you hurt?"

Jack did not reply, but drew two or three long breaths, and then worked all his limbs about, to ascertain whether he had received any injury.

"No," he at length gasped out, "it is all right."

"I am glad to hear that."

"It was a sharp touch, but it doesn't matter now. The bear is dead, I suppose?"

"Yes."

"I thought that last bullet would do the business—it must have gone right up into his brain; but how about the boy?"

"I had forgotten him," said Blueskin, with a start; "but never mind; stay where you are a moment, and I will fetch him."

"I don't think he is hurt."

"Nor I, though he has very likely fainted."

With these words on his lips, Blueskin hastened back to the fire.

He found the lad in a deep swoon.

Lifting him up, he carried him to the stream, and used just the same means to restore him to life as he had used to restore Jack Sheppard.

"That is rough treatment," said the latter.

"But very effectual."

As he uttered the words, the deformed boy shuddered and looked up.

His face wore an expression of great alarm.

Doubtless he expected to see the bear still bending over him.

"It is all right," cried Blueskin quickly; "you are safe and unhurt—the bear is dead."

This intelligence was received with manifest pleasure, but the poor lad's teeth chattered together, and he looked a very dismal object with the water streaming from all parts of his clothing, for he had not shaken off the moisture as Jack Sheppard had done.

He was told to do so, and then Blueskin said:

"Come on; let us go back to the fire—I will soon throw on some more wood, and your clothes will be dry in a little while."

There was something cheerful in the prospect of a fire, and they followed Blueskin with great willingness.

Their first care, however, was to ascertain whether the bear was really dead.

Little more than a glance was necessary to satisfy them upon this point.

The ferocious brute had ceased to breathe.

"During the remainder of the night," said Blueskin, "we will watch and watch by turns; it will never do for us all to go to sleep at the same time again."

"We ought not to have done so at first."

"We ought not; but I am glad matters are no worse. Help me to throw some wood on the fire, and then you will soon be all right."

This was done, and in a few minutes, as the wood was dry, they had quite a bonfire.

The heat quickly dried their apparel.

"Now," said Blueskin, "if you will lie down both of you and go to sleep, I will keep watch; at the end of a couple of hours or so I will awake one of you, who must take my place while I lie down to sleep."

This was at once consented to, for after their sudden immersion the heat of the fire made Jack and the boy excessively sleepy.

They had scarcely stretched themselves at full length before they fell into a sound slumber.

CHAPTER CCCCXXX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARE ATTACKED BY WOLVES.

BLUESKIN seated himself at a little distance from the fire and close to his companions.

Ere long, however, he discovered that the deep silence of the place as well as the warmth of the fire was drawing him off to sleep.

This is not to be wondered at, for he was greatly fatigued, and the sleep he had had was too brief to recuperate his strength.

As soon as he felt this sleepy feeling creeping over him, he rose to his feet.

It cost him an effort to do so, but he was convinced of the danger that would result from all three sleeping at the same time.

"I will walk up and down," he said, half aloud. "That will be the best means of keeping awake."

He did so, but even then felt sleepy—marching up and down grew wearisome.

From time to time he threw more wood on the fire.

On one occasion when he advanced to do this he happened to look across the open clearing, and then he saw something which greatly astonished him.

He threw the wood on the top of the fire, and this had for a moment or two the effect of almost extinguishing the flames, so that he was able to see much better.

Straight before him in the darkness he could see two small glittering objects close together.

What they were he could not for the life of him make out; but looking more closely, he saw two more close to the first, and then two more, until, as he continued to gaze, they grew innumerable.

He stood perfectly still for several minutes gazing at this phenomenon, and endeavouring to make out what it was.

The faintly-glittering objects were different to anything he had ever seen before, and the longer he gazed the more numerous did they become.

Then the fire blazed up again with full force, and he was no longer able to see them.

As may be expected, his curiosity was greatly raised.

The sleepy sensation which had come over him was dispelled as if by magic.

It was some time before he could quite make up his mind what he should do.

He had already taken the precaution to re-load his pistols, and he placed them in his belt in such a manner that they would be handy to his grasp.

Then, drawing his sword, he, after a brief period of hesitation, walked round to the other side of the fire.

Standing with his back to the flames, he once more looked across the open space.

There were the glittering objects as before, only they looked very much brighter, as though the light from the fire was reflected upon them.

He soon found that they were ranged round him in an irregular semi-circle.

And though he had discovered this he found himself unable to come to any conclusion.

He was as mystified and bewildered as when he first caught sight of them.

Instead of pacing up and down on one side of the fire, as he had hitherto done, he walked round and round it.

On one occasion he paused, and as it happened, not far from the spot where the body of the bear lay.

He looked upon it, for, as the fire was burning brightly, he could see with great distinctness.

Then he looked straight across the open space, and was astonished to find that the glittering objects he could see all around him were much closer together, and more numerous in this spot than in any other.

While meditating upon this occurrence, and while his brain was filled with a thousand wild ideas, he was startled by hearing a loud howl.

It was almost such a sound as a dog would have made, and the cry was quickly repeated, only it seemed to come from the throats of thousands.

Blueskin staggered back in alarm, until warned by the heat of the fire that he could not retreat any farther.

"It is wolves," he said—"wolves! I have heard of them often! It is their eyes that I can see all around me! They have been attracted to the spot by the dead body of the bear, but they are frightened to come too near to the fire."

Blueskin had hit upon the true solution of the whole affair.

The small glittering objects which had so puzzled him were indeed the eyes of wolves, who had scented from afar the blood which had flowed from the bear.

They had continued silent, gazing at the fire and frightened to advance nearer, until one of their number had uttered the howl that had so startled Blueskin.

That seemed the signal for the rest.

Without exception, they all commenced a hideous howling, which did not cease for a single moment.

The sound grew louder and louder.

It penetrated the ears of the sleepers, and both started up in the utmost terror.

Blueskin got round to the other side of the fire where his comrades were.

"What is it?" asked Jack Sheppard, with difficulty making his voice heard above the howling chorus.

In a few words Blueskin explained.

"What is to be done?" he asked.

"Nothing but remain where we are," said Blueskin.

"We are safer here than we possibly could be elsewhere."

"How so?"

"Because of the fire. We have only to keep it well piled up, and we are secure. The wolves will be frightened to approach it."

"Then, if that is all," said Jack, "we will soon have a good fire."

"Heap on plenty of wood," continued Blueskin. "In the morning they will all disappear."

The howling of the wolves was by this time truly terrific; they seemed to have assembled in thousands.

In spite of the assurance which Blueskin had given of their safety, Jack Sheppard and the boy were much terrified by the awful sounds, and they glanced apprehensively in the direction which they came.

Wood was piled upon the fire in tremendous quantities. Blueskin ventured round to the other side.

He quickly returned, and as soon as his companions saw him, they perceived that the expression of his countenance had changed.

"What is the matter?" they asked. "What is amiss?"

"Nothing—nothing! I may be mistaken; but still, when I looked out, I fancied that the wolves were closer than before."

This was alarming intelligence, and there was little doubt that it was true, for in such a matter Blueskin would not be likely to let his fears lead him astray when he had spoken so confidently about the power of the fire to keep them away.

"What is to be done?" asked Jack Sheppard.
"I am at a loss to tell you. I have always heard that the safest and best protection against wild animals is a fire. This one has certainly kept them off to some extent, but they appear to me to be gradually drawing nearer and nearer."

"Are you sure you are not mistaken?"

"Come with me, and you can see for yourself. We have to but walk round to the other side of the fire."

Jack Sheppard accompanied Blueskin as requested, and then, after gazing earnestly for a few moments, he said:

"I am sure they are nearer!"

"It is the dead body of the bear which attracts them," said Blueskin.

"Then, what will it matter if they come forward. They can devour it, and welcome, so long as they let us alone."

"That is just it," said Blueskin—"they won't let us alone!"

"Why not? Will not the carcass of the bear satisfy them?"

"No. Just estimate, if you can, the number of wolves. Probably there are more than we can see; but whether or not, there are enough to devour every morsel in a trice."

"And what then?"

"Why, it will but be a mouthful apiece or so to them all round, and will serve to give them an appetite. They will then come towards us, and we shall find it utterly impossible to contend against such a multitude."

Jack Sheppard was silent, but he fixed his eyes constantly in the direction of the wolves.

It was clear enough that they were coming nearer, and, as they advanced, they continued to utter the most fearful yells.

The position of our two friends was rapidly becoming critical.

They taxed their brains to the utmost, in the endeavour to hit upon some plan by which they might keep the wolves at a distance.

"If we can only keep them off till daybreak," said Blueskin, "all will be well; they will retire then, never fear; they are cowardly creatures at the best!"

"But how are we to keep them off till then?"

"I wish I could tell you. At present, it appears to me we can do nothing more than pile plenty of wood upon the fire, so that it shall give out as much light and heat as possible."

All three set about this task, and in a little while the fire crackled and gave out as much heat as a furnace.

The unearthly howls still continued, and the wolves, stimulated by hunger, overcame by degrees the terror which the fire occasioned them, and crept gradually nearer and nearer.

Blueskin looked up to the sky in the hope of being able to discover some traces of the dawn.

But all was dark.

The moon had sunk, and the whole face of the heavens was covered with dense leaden-coloured clouds.

Jack Sheppard looked anxiously from time to time into Blueskin's countenance, and noticed what a terrible look of fatigue it wore.

At last he said:

"The wolves do not appear to be very aggressive yet, Blueskin. Lie down and rest yourself. Try and get a few minutes' sleep—I am sure you are in great need of it."

"I am—I am."

"I knew that, but whether you will be able to sleep or not with this horrible howling ringing in your ears is more than I can tell. Let me, however, entreat you to make the attempt."

"And you will keep watch?"

"Yes, most faithfully. The brief rest I have already had has refreshed me wonderfully."

"And you will call me the moment any danger threatens?"

"Yes."

"Then I will lie down, for, to tell the truth, I feel more worn out than I have done for many a long day."

"I don't wonder at it. It is a long time since you had any proper rest. It is now more than ever necessary that you should sleep, for the probability is, that we shall have a long and harassing day to-morrow."

"I shall not care for that if I can sleep now, but I am afraid the effort will be a vain one."

While speaking these words, Blueskin threw himself down upon the turf near the fire, and so complete was his exhaustion, that, contrary to his anticipation, the howling of the wolves produced no effect upon him, and in a very little while he was sound asleep.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD COMMENCE THEIR SEARCH FOR EDGWORTH BESS.

JACK SHEPPARD continued to watch.

He walked frequently round and round the fire, and looked in the direction where the largest number of wolves had assembled.

After gazing upon them repeatedly, he at last concluded that they had become stationary.

He was almost afraid to believe in such good tidings, but at last he felt certain that the wolves had ceased to advance.

Such was the case.

The hungry creatures had approached to within a certain distance of the fire, and there they remained, terrified to come nearer, for the fire was much fiercer now than it had yet been.

The satisfaction to be derived from this fact was, however, but very slight; they would remain there for a certain time, until, growing accustomed to the flames, and impelled by their hunger, they would creep nearer and nearer to the bear's carcass.

Jack Sheppard did not think of this, but imagined that the wolves had got as near the fire as they dared, and would not venture to approach any closer.

Finding the alarm had to some extent subsided, the poor deformed boy laid himself down near Blueskin, while Jack Sheppard was left alone.

The brief slumber which he had already had, had proved sufficient to rest him, for his disposition was too restless and excitable to demand much sleep.

He had no other companion save his thoughts, and these were sad enough.

He did indeed seem to be the sport of a malignant destiny.

After passing through such a horrible ordeal as he had recently done, he had come over to Amsterdam under the full anticipation that he should once more see Edgworth Bess.

He was very doubtful as to the manner in which she would receive him, for since they had parted in hastiness and anger, they had had no opportunity either for explanation or reconciliation.

He had arrived in time to learn that she had been spirited away by German banditti. Their object for this act and the poor girl's fate were like inscrutable.

He sighed heavily and his throat ached.

The only consolation and relief that he was able to find was by passing rapidly up and down. While in motion his thoughts did not seem to chafe him so badly.

A prolonged yell from the wolves at last aroused him, and he found that while giving way to his sad reflections he had neglected the important duty of piling fuel upon the fire.

Perceiving the omission, he hastened to repair it.

But the quantity of wood he threw on at once had, for a moment or two, the effect of dulling the flames considerably.

The wolves, whose eyes had been fixed ceaselessly and untiringly upon the fire, perceiving this sudden diminution in its brilliancy, felt emboldened to advance.

The foremost gave a few bounds forward and reached the prize.

The example of one was sufficient.

The rush of footsteps as they hastened forward came clear enough to Jack Sheppard's ears, and, starting back, he uttered a cry of alarm.

Blueskin heard the cry, and awoke.

He started immediately to his feet and put himself in an attitude of defence, for he imagined that the wolves were already upon them.

The flames now shot up from the fire with great suddenness and fierceness, revealing clearly every nook and corner of the open space.

Fighting, tearing, scrambling, howling, the wolves had piled themselves up in one dense mass over the body of the bear.

When the flames burst forth in the manner we have described there was a momentary silence.

All paused, and ceased what they were about.

They were half inclined to turn and fly, and had one set the example, the others would doubtless have followed without exception.

Their appetite was whetted, however, by the few monthfuls they had already been able to obtain, and so they remained still.

Then, finding that the fire grew no brighter and did them no injury, they recommenced their battle for the food.

Standing near the fire in such a position that they could command a view of that portion of the open space, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard stood watching the movements of the wolves.

Their numbers were incredible, and could they have all commenced their repast upon the bear, every fragment of the flesh would quickly have disappeared.

Anxiously our friends looked up to the sky, but all was dark.

There was not the slightest token of the coming of the much-wished-for dawn.

The frantic shriekings and strugglings of the wolves continued without abatement, until at length every edible morsel of the bear was devoured.

Then came the moment of danger.

Jack Sheppard looked anxiously into his comrade's face.

"Let us retreat to the other side of the fire," said Blueskin. "It is possible that, after all, they may depart satisfied."

Blueskin said this, but he did not think it.

It was, however, quite clear that the best and most prudent course was to place the fire between them and the rapacious animals.

The yelling and fighting which had taken place over the bear's carcass was followed by a remarkable, and, as our friends felt, ominous silence.

In vain they listened for the retreating footsteps of the wolves.

No such sounds came upon their ears, and so they were driven to the conclusion that they had all remained stationary.

Believing that no harm could result from such a proceeding, Blueskin once more ventured to pass round the fire, in order to reconnoitre the enemy.

His worst fears were realised when he saw the whole troop in a dense pack, with their heads all turned towards the fire, and their gleaming eyeballs fixed upon it.

He returned to Jack and told him what he had seen.

Most fervently did they wish for the coming of the new day.

But the clouds looked as black as ever.

"Morning cannot be far off," said Blueskin, "and I fully believe that the darkest hour is the one before the dawn."

"I hope this is the hour."

"And so do I, for after a time, in all probability, the wolves will gather courage and advance. If such a thing happens, we shall find ourselves quite unable to cope with such an enemy."

A silence followed these words.

Jack Sheppard was wondering where Edgworth Bess was at that moment, and whether she was menaced by any imminent peril.

Then the wolves broke forth into a dismal howl again, making the whole forest resound with their hideous yells.

"That is just the way they behaved before," said Blueskin. "They waited for a time in silence watching the fire, and then commenced to yell. I suppose in a little while they will get their courage up."

"Let us look at them once more," said Jack Sheppard. "I am sure we cannot do wrong in keeping an eye upon their movements."

"You are right. Come with me."

Creeping stealthily round the fire, in order, if possible, to escape the notice of the wolves, they looked out.

The immense pack had crept much nearer.

Evidently they were overcoming their dislike or dread of the fire, and were hungering to attack the three human beings they knew full well were near it.

Beyond them could be seen the skeleton of the bear.

The bones were quite stripped, and every one looked white and glistening in the fire-light.

Although the weight of this animal must have been enormous, and although they had devoured every fragment, including even the skin, yet the wolves appeared as ravenous as ever.

They grew more and more daring, and they had most certainly got hold of the idea that the fire would not harm them.

Closer and closer they came, even while our friends looked upon them.

They were already very, very close, and it was perfectly easy for our friends to distinguish the whole of their dark forms.

Suddenly, Blueskin was struck with a fresh thought.

Without saying a word, he turned round and drew a blazing fragment of wood from the fire.

It was a portion of a bough of a tree, and, whirling it round his head, he flung it with full force into the air.

It fell where the wolves were thickest, and a terrific howl was the result, succeeded by a violent scramble as all endeavoured to rush away.

Perceiving the advantage that had been thus gained, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard continued to throw the fragments of burning wood, until they forced the wolves to retreat across the open space and take refuge among the trees.

They then appeared to shrink gradually away, and in a few moments not one was to be seen.

The two friends congratulated each other most warmly upon the success of this scheme.

"I think their fright will endure for some time," said Blueskin; "ten to one if we are troubled with them again!"

"I wish dawn would come."

"So do I as heartily as you do, for I am thoroughly tired of the adventures of to-night."

"As we have been so lucky as to drive off the wolves, I think our wisest plan will be to obtain as much rest and sleep as we can,—to-morrow we shall require to call forth all our energies."

"We shall indeed!"

Just at this moment the deformed boy, who had remained on the other side of the fire, uttered a loud shout, and they hastened to find out what had happened.

There was no necessity to question the boy, for the first thing they saw was the wolves.

It was another pack, or else the same one that they had driven back who had made a detour and reached the other side of the fire.

Without a moment's hesitation, both our friends set to work to pelt them with the firebrands.

The rapacious animals retreated, but this time not so quickly as before, and with fewer signs of terror.

"I am afraid we shall have much trouble with them yet," said Blueskin; "they seem very resolute."

"We'll throw on more fuel," said Jack Sheppard, "and make up as large a fire as we can."

"Yes, do so; but I think it would be a good plan to make up another fire not far from this one; we could then place ourselves between the two, and, ten to one, should be in perfect safety!"

"It is worth trying, at any rate," said Jack Sheppard, "and will give us but little trouble."

They set to work to carry out this idea with all possible alacrity, and in a few moments they had another fire lighted, which promised in a little while to be as large and as fierce as the first.

The smoke and flames effectually prevented them from catching sight of the wolves, but they could hear their horrible howls clearly and distinctly above the roaring and crackling of the fires.

Our friends had to place themselves exactly half-way between the two fires, and at one time the heat was so excessive that they feared they should be compelled to abandon their place of refuge.

They were scorched a little; but, by stirring the blazing embers with their swords, they presently succeeded in remedying this evil.

The only demonstration they received from the wolves was an incessant howling, which probably betokened the extent of their disappointment.

At last, to their relief, morning came.

As the sky grew lighter and lighter, so did the howls of the wolves grow fainter and fainter, until eventually they died completely away.

Jack Sheppard was now impatient that the search for Edgeworth Bess should be commenced, and it was with some difficulty that Blueskin persuaded him that it would be best to remain there for a little while longer, and obtain more rest as well as a substantial meal.

Ultimately, this was agreed to.

Blueskin shot some more birds, which they cooked in the same primitive fashion as they had done overnight; and, having finished their repast, they laid down to obtain an hour or two's slumber.

Just as the sun rose above the tree-tops, Jack Sheppard awoke.

He aroused his companion, and then, without further delay, they set about their search in good earnest.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS HAVE SOME TROUBLE AND DANGER IN CONVEYING JONATHAN WILD TO NEWGATE.

THE order of our story now brings us back to Jonathan Wild.

He certainly deserves some attention, for when we last saw him his situation was one of extreme peril.

It will be remembered that after his return from the bank he had entered the stable-yard, and had unexpectedly found himself surrounded by a large body of police officers.

Although the police officers were at least twenty in number, he made a most frantic and desperate resistance.

It, however, availed him nothing; all he got for his pains was some additional hard blows.

In the end, he found himself securely a prisoner.

Each one of the officers seemed to have hold of him in some way or other.

As a last effort, he tried to prevent the handcuffs from being slipped over his wrists.

But in this, as in the rest, he failed.

Long practice had taught the officer much dexterity, and, watching his opportunity, he slipped the handcuffs on in an instant.

"Here you are, Jonathan Wild, at last," he said; "and a fine game you have led us altogether! You might just as well have given in at first. You would have saved both us and yourself a great deal of trouble."

Jonathan Wild replied to this speech by uttering the most fearful curses that could be imagined.

The police officer himself was in the habit of "letting out," as he called it, now and then, but when he heard the blasphemous imprecations which came from the thief-taker's lips he turned pale, and, raising his voice a little higher than Wild's, he said:

"Come, come, Mr. Wild, leave that off! I am not very particular about swearing myself, but when I hear you go on like that, it gives me an awful turn!"

Jonathan Wild continued to shriek out his impotent curses without heeding him.

Left to himself, he soon exhausted himself at this exercise, and became comparatively calm; but when he ceased it was not because he had reached the end of his vocabulary, but because his throat was hoarse and cracked, and his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth, so that to speak louder than a whisper became impossible.

He licked his parched lips nervously, and gazed angrily into the officer's countenance.

"I am heartily glad you have done, Mr. Wild," said the one in command, "and I hope that will last you till I get you safe inside Newgate. When you are in a stone cell by yourself, you may curse away as much as you like!"

Jonathan Wild's eyes were frenzied with rage.

He struggled even now to free himself from his bonds, and if he could have done so, there is no doubt he would have taken the very first moment to inflict some serious injury upon his foes.

He even felt that while he did so it would be some satisfaction to him—that he should go to the prison all the more willingly if he could inflict some deadly wounds upon one or more of them.

This, however, was more than he could accomplish.

"Now, Mr. Wild," said the chief officer, "are you willing to listen to reason? We have got you, and I can tell you that we mean to keep you! Mind that! It just remains for yourself to decide whether you will be dragged through the streets to Newgate with all the rufians in London at your heels, or whether you will behave peaceably, and go in a hackney-coach."

The thief-taker paused a moment, and then spoke.

"Do you know who I am?" he said.

"Of course! Jonathan Wild."

"I am; and a police constable! Tell me upon what charge you arrest me!"

"You know all about that," said the chief officer. "I have got a warrant for your apprehension in my pocket, so that is all right."

"Let me see it."

"Not if I know it!" said the officer, with a wink.

"Then I refuse to accompany you."

"You can refuse what you like, but you will find you will have to go! I will take all the responsibility, and when you get to Newgate, I will hand the warrant to the Governor, when you will have the opportunity of seeing that it is all right."

Wild broke out into curses again.

"Stop, stop—that does no good! Just say, will you be hauled through the streets by main force, or will you get into a hackney-coach, and ride quietly to Newgate?"

Jonathan Wild glared about him.

He could not conceal from himself the fact that it would be easy enough for so many men to drag him along by sheer force.

A crowd would quickly be collected, which would surround them.

Already the gateway leading into the stable-yard was blocked up by a gaping multitude, who were with difficulty kept back.

Curiosity was on every face, for as yet they did not know that it was Jonathan Wild who had been made prisoner.

In the first place, they had scarcely caught a glimpse of him, and had failed to recognise the thief-taker in his Quaker's disguise.

From former experience Jonathan Wild knew well that he was by no means a favourite with the populace.

On a recent occasion he had had good proof of it, and he felt that he would have everything to dread from the violence of the mob, should he suffer himself to be dragged through the streets in the manner the officer had mentioned.

Yet, on the other hand, he could not help fancying that while he stood on foot among his foes, he stood a much better chance of making his escape than he possibly could do if he was cooped up in a hackney-coach.

The chief officer saw that his prisoner was considering, and remained quiet, in the hope that Wild would decide upon giving in quietly.

The officer was quite willing to be saved the trouble of hauling him through the streets.

"Come, Mr. Wild," he said at last, "have you made up your mind? I can't stop here all day, you know; my strict orders were that as soon as I captured you I was to take you direct to Newgate, and I have a warrant to that effect in my pocket at this moment."

Jonathan did not speak.

"Come now, which will you do?" repeated the officer.

"Do!" roared Wild, suddenly; "you can do your worst! I defy you all! Do your worst!"

"Very good! Since you will have it so, I can't help it. Bring him along, my lads; there is no need to be over-particular with him, and the sooner we get to Newgate the better! You need not be afraid of treating him rather roughly—he is done for; the charge against him is so clear and complete that, with all his cleverness, he will not be able to get off, and will never again be in a position to do harm to any of you."

Jonathan Wild bent furious and angry glances on the officer when he spoke, but that was all that lay in his power to do.

Among the police, there was not one who had not some grudge or other against the great thief-taker, though, hitherto, circumstances had always prevented them from showing it.

Now, however, the case was quite altered, and after such a speech as they had uttered, they one and all, in the roughest possible manner, set about the task of dragging Wild along.

Despite his furious struggles the street was reached.

A dense crowd had already collected, and when they saw the officers emerge, some one who caught sight of the prisoner, yelled out:

"Why, that is Jonathan Wild!"

The pronunciation of this much-dreaded and much-execrated name produced an almost magical effect upon the assemblage. Shouts and cries of every description were given utterance to, and although he had anticipated this scene, and had tried to school himself into firmness, yet Jonathan Wild trembled and quailed.

"Stone him!—shoot him!—smash him!—hang him up to the next lamp post!—down with Jonathan Wild!—death to him!—death to the villain!"

These and a thousand other horrible cries rose above the din of conflicting sounds, and reached the ear of the thief-taker with great distinctness.

Every instant the multitude increased in numbers and also in violence.

The police officer and his men looked apprehensively around them; they found they were getting hemmed in and were unable to proceed.

None had any affection for the prisoner, but it was their duty to defend him, and take him in safety to Newgate, and so they did so.

It was doubtful, however, whether they would be successful in keeping off the attack of so many people.

Stones and other missiles began to fall among them, and from shouts and threats it was clear that the people would quickly proceed to actual deeds of violence.

Jonathan tried hard to retain his firmness, and in the effort bit his lips till the blood flowed.

It was all in vain, however, he could not do so, and when some more than usually horrible cries assailed his ears he would tremble and shake like an aspen leaf.

Surely, never before had such a commotion been known in the City of London.

The streets were completely blocked up, windows were thrown open, and everyone appeared in a state of the greatest possible excitement, all eager and curious to obtain a glimpse of, and others to inflict some injury upon, the notorious thief-taker.

Jonathan ceased to struggle. Probably at this moment he regretted that he had not taken the officer's advice, and entered a hackney-carriage.

Had he done so he would have been saved the present terrible scene, for his heart failed him at every step he took.

As for escape, there was no chance or hope for such a thing, and the more he reflected and the further he went the more did he regret that he had made the choice he had.

The police officers regretted it too, for they looked hot and anxious.

They knew the desperate character of their prisoner, and had to care for his safety, while at the same time they had to protect themselves and him from the mob.

At last, upon reaching the bottom of Cornhill, they were brought to a complete stop.

It was no longer possible for them to advance a single step, and the pressure of the mob continually increased.

At this point many thoroughfares converged into one focus, so that it is no matter for wonder that the crowd should augment so rapidly as it did.

Had anyone been placed at a sufficient elevation to command a view of the whole of this strange spectacle they would have beheld an ocean of human beings surging wildly and madly to and fro, struggling desperately with each other like wild beasts, yet all pressing gradually to one point.

That one point was the spot where Jonathan Wild stood surrounded by the police officers.

Stronger and stronger became the pressure upon them. And they made strenuous efforts to preserve a little open space, but failed.

With admirable presence of mind, the one in command ordered his men to form into a solid square, with their prisoner and himself in the centre.

This they did, and, drawing their cutlasses, placed them against their breasts, and so endeavoured to keep off the excited beings who surrounded them on all sides.

CHAPTER CCOCLXXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS HIMSELF THE INMATE OF A NEWGATE CELL.

For a moment or two this manœuvre proved successful.

The people who were nearest, and who were pressing forward with the greatest eagerness, recoiled before the sharp points of the officers' cutlasses.

Having formed into a solid square, the police stood as firm as a rock, for the pressure of the people was resisted on all sides alike.

Those people whose bodies were exactly opposed to the officers' weapons shrunk back and endeavoured to remain stationary at a safe distance, while they continued their shouts and yells for vengeance upon the thief-taker.

Those persons, however, who formed the outer portion of the mob knew nothing about this clever little arrangement on the part of the officers, and also continued to press forward with ever-increasing strength.

In vain those in the centre endeavoured to remain stationary.

The pressure behind them was greater than they could withstand, and so they found themselves, unwillingly enough, forced on to the points of the cutlasses.

The officers grasped their weapons with both hands, and prepared to meet the shock.

Slowly, yet surely, the people were forced towards them.

They held back, but in a minute or so they felt the sharp steel penetrating their breasts.

Convinced that if they did not make a desperate and successful effort to stem the current they would be transfixed by the cutlasses, they recoiled with greater strength than before.

The intelligence that the officers had formed for themselves such a formidable barrier was quickly passed from mouth to mouth; and those who were nearest to the centre remained stationary, and resisted to the utmost the pressure from those on the outskirts of the crowd, who either did not or would not understand what was taking place.

The shouts, and groans, and screams, and yells that rose from the dense throng were positively fearful.

The chief police officer was much annoyed and vexed at this occurrence, and he was unable to see his way out of the difficulty.

At length, he desired his men to raise him as well as they could above their heads, in order that he might wave his hat, or give some other signal that he was in imminent need of assistance.

His men hoisted him on their shoulders willingly enough, for they were far from pleased with their position.

From this point of vantage the chief officer was able to command a view of the whole crowd, and he was astounded at its immensity.

He waved his hat in the air, and made many other gesticulations to express that he stood in need of help.

The populace responded to his actions with derisive cries.

The chief officer then, becoming somewhat calmer, looked slowly and carefully all around.

Presently a cry of satisfaction escaped his lips.

Coming from the direction of Cheapside, he caught sight of a troop of mounted soldiers.

"Let me down!" he said to his men who held him up—"let me down! Keep the people off for a few minutes, and all will be well—assistance is coming!"

The officer was glad enough to descend, for while he had occupied his lofty position he had been the mark for many missiles, and, although he had been struck by several, yet he escaped any serious injury.

In the meanwhile, Jonathan Wild—the cause of this tumult—had regained his calmness.

He no longer regretted the course he had taken, for he felt that, let things be how they might, his position could not possibly be made worse than it was.

He received the intelligence that assistance was coming with a grim smile.

The officer was perfectly correct.

As soon as the crowd collected in such prodigious numbers, intelligence was forwarded to the proper quarter, for it was feared, and with good reason, that a terrible riot would ensue, the result of which would be very difficult to estimate.

The military were called out, and, with that promptitude which distinguishes all military affairs, a troop had been mustered and led to the scene of action.

As soon as the soldiers arrived, the Lord Mayor appeared at one of the windows of the Mansion House, and, calling aloud to the people, commenced to read the Riot Act.

All the people, however, were so intent upon pushing forward, that they paid not the slightest attention to his words.

As soon as he had finished reading, the Mayor called upon the soldiers to disperse the crowd.

Under the command of their officer, the soldiers spurred their horses forward, and laid about them with the flat side of their swords.

The attack was soon productive of results.

The people began rapidly to disperse, and many in the distant portions of the crowd no sooner heard that the soldiers were out, and that the Riot Act had been read, than they took to their heels and departed.

It proved, however, to be a work of considerable time to disperse the whole mob, but at length this was done.

The soldiers then came up to the police officers who surrounded Jonathan Wild.

The chief of the police warmly expressed his thanks to the officer in charge of the soldiers for the effectual service he had rendered him, and requested him, in order to prevent the recurrence of this affair, that he would form a guard of escort for them and their prisoner as far as Newgate.

This was agreed to.

Jonathan Wild glared about him with undissembled rage.

He felt, now that the soldiers accompanied the officers, that he stood not the slightest chance of making his escape.

However he might object to such a course, he would be led to Newgate.

Becoming convinced of this, and feeling that he could do nothing, the thief-taker bent his head forward and walked slowly along.

"We have done a good service, Mr. Wild," said one of the officers. "If the people could have got at you they would have torn you limb from limb! By this time scarcely a fragment of you would have remained!"

Jonathan made no reply to this speech, but continued to walk on slowly as before.

The people who had formed the crowd only retreated a short distance, and quickly assembled again.

The presence of the soldiers overawed them, however, and they made no hostile demonstration, and walked on peacefully and quietly enough in the rear.

It was deemed advisable not to interfere with them.

In this manner the procession proceeded at a brisk walk.

The distance they had to go was not very great.

Crossing over the open space between the Royal Exchange and the Mansion House, they took their way along the Poultry and Cheapside until Newgate Street was reached.

Here they were compelled to come to a halt, for the thoroughfare was very narrow.

The pause was a brief one, and the whole party was quickly in procession again, for the officers were anxious to see their prisoner once safe inside Newgate.

On entering Newgate Street, Jonathan Wild raised his head and looked about him.

The officers noticed it, and placed themselves more upon their guard, for they fancied the movement portended something.

The thief-taker looked from side to side, as though in search of something.

It is just possible that, rendered desperate by his close proximity to Newgate, some during schemes of escape were flitting through his brain.

If such was the case, he must have been unable to find one that seemed at all likely to succeed, for he did not struggle with his captors in the least.

Jonathan could not refrain from casting a glance down Warwick Lane.

His eyes rested for a brief space upon the quaint old archway, from the top of which he had had such a fearful fall.

The next instant the street was passed.

Another object now attracted his attention.

That was his house, or rather the ruins of it.

Only the shell remained, the interior having been completely burnt out.

The bare and blackened walls had a dismal appearance.

It was such a ruin as its master's fortunes.

The police officers all looked up at the remains of Wild's house, and then they turned their heads and looked into the countenance of the thief-taker, in order to observe what effect the sight had upon him.

Jonathan's face was inscrutable.

What thoughts might have been at that moment passing through his mind, the police officers had no means of knowing.

That his reflections were bitter ones we may feel quite sure.

He watched his house as long as he was able to do so, and, when at length the other buildings hid it from his view, he thought how quickly his own destruction had followed that of his house.

Round the corner, into the Old Bailey, the procession now passed.

The mob still orderly and peaceable; indeed, as they came nearer and nearer to the gloomy city prison, a kind of awe seemed to creep over them.

It was noticed that Jonathan Wild gave one swift glance at the old structure.

Then his eyes once more sought the ground, and he walked gloomily onwards.

The intelligence that Jonathan Wild had been captured and was being brought through the streets, had already reached Newgate.

A considerable body of police officers had placed themselves across the lower end of the thoroughfare, in order to keep off the crowd.

Had not this precaution been taken, it would have been difficult, nay, almost impossible, for the prisoner to have been led to the door of the vestibule.

As it was, the place was perfectly clear, with the exception of those constables who formed a kind of guard round the door itself, and would facilitate the entrance of the prisoner and his captors.

In spite of the calmness that he had so well assumed, Jonathan's cheeks blanched, and his heart shook.

The knowledge that he full well merited imprisonment and the death which is awarded to criminals of the deepest dye, was ever before his mind, and it seemed to crush him to the earth.

Curses and maledictions no longer issued from his lips.

Despair was taking hold of him, and he was fast sinking into a state of apathetic dejection.

At every step that he took bringing him nearer and nearer to the portals of the gloomy prison, this feeling increased.

In another moment the procession came to a halt, and looking up, Jonathan saw that he was standing at the foot of the little flight of stone steps that led up from the street to the strong iron-bound door opening into the vestibule or lobby of Newgate.

The chief police officer knocked loudly.

The summons was expected, and the man on the lock, after giving one hasty glance through the little wicket, flung the door wide open and allowed the party to enter.

For the first time in his life, Jonathan Wild found himself standing beneath the roof of Newgate a prisoner!

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIV.

MR. NOAKES IS MUCH DISCONCERTED BY THE ARRIVAL OF JONATHAN WILD AT NEWGATE.

WE may safely affirm that there was no person in Great Britain who felt so much uneasiness and apprehension on account of the steps that were taken against Jonathan Wild, than did Mr. Noakes, the Governor of Newgate.

As the reader is well aware, a compact of an infamous nature had for a length of time subsisted between him and the thief-taker.

He stood committed in many nefarious transactions which Wild had from time to time been guilty of, and not unreasonably he dreaded that Jonathan's downfall was but the forerunner of his own.

He foresaw in the future an immense amount of disagreeableness and trouble.

In his heart of hearts most fervently and devoutly did he wish that Jonathan Wild might succeed in making an escape from his foes.

At any rate, that he would defend himself to the last, and choose death rather than submission, or that some chance shot should rid him of existence.

Anything rather than that he should be brought a prisoner to Newgate.

That was an idea that had the effect of almost driving Mr. Noakes into madness.

In a greater state of suspense, then, than the thief-taker himself endured, the Governor awaited the result of the pursuit that was being made.

A gleam of joy came over his heart when he heard of Jonathan's first escape, and how he had succeeded in mounting a horse and galloping away, leaving no trace behind him.

Days passed by, as we know full well, without the officers having the least clue to guide them; and with each hour the Governor's spirits rose, for it induced the belief that Jonathan Wild had left the country.

The agitation and distress of mind which he suffered produced a great change in the personal appearance of the Governor, and the sheriffs and officials connected with the prison wondered what in the world it was that ailed him.

Of course Mr. Noakes never thought of satisfying anybody upon this point—his trouble was one that must be endured alone.

He experienced a sudden and alarming shock when he heard the news that Jonathan had again been seen, and at no great distance from London, and pursued for some distance.

True, there was some consolation to be derived from the fact that he had succeeded in escaping, but then the Governor felt a special uneasiness when he found that, instead of getting away, as he might have done, the thief-taker was still lingering near the metropolis.

He argued from that, that Wild did not intend to quit England, and his apprehensions grew greater and greater, for he saw a thousand evils in prospective.

When at last, on that eventful morning, he had been told that Jonathan Wild had been captured near Fenchurch Street, and that a strong body of officers were bringing him to Newgate, he gave a gasping sort of cry and sank into a chair.

For some time he showed no signs of life, and when at last he recovered and the intelligence was repeated to him, he refused to believe it.

He was in a state of the most abject fright; and then he received another shock when a messenger brought word that the prisoner had already entered Newgate Street.

With a view of satisfying himself as to the correctness of the report, Mr. Noakes ascended to the roof of the prison, from which, as he knew full well, a view of Newgate Street could be obtained.

Heavy leaden weights appeared to be fastened to his feet, and it was almost more than his strength could accomplish to lift them up and ascend the steps.

"Oh," he muttered to himself, "if I could only find that it was untrue—that they have deceived me—what a relief it would be!"

He reached the top step and emerged on to the roof.

Fortunately the stone parapet was so high as to preclude all danger of his falling into the street, or it is probable, in his great agitation, he might have done such a thing.

Clutching the stonework nervously with his hands, he hastened onwards, until at last he reached the spot which commanded a view of Newgate Street.

Then a cry of despair issued from his lips, and, his strength suddenly deserting him, he sank down in a strange crouching posture.

At that moment he must have felt like Macbeth, when, from the ramparts of his castle, he saw his worst fears confirmed, and saw Birnam Wood approaching Dunsinane.

The sight of Jonathan Wild being brought towards

[JONATHAN WILD INSISTS UPON BEING FREED FROM HIS FETTERS.]

Newgate under so strong an escort, completely prostrated him.

A singular kind of fascination, however, caused him to raise himself a little, so that his eyes were just above the level of the parapet, and so that he could see down into the street.

By this time the procession was almost immediately below him.

He could see the officers, he could see the soldiers, and he could see the multitude behind.

But it was not on these that his gaze rested.

His eyes were riveted upon Jonathan Wild.

There he saw him, and such was the state of desperation that the Governor had worked himself up into, that he even wished the huge stone he clutched was loose, and that he could hurl it down upon the head of the prisoner, and so cause his death.

He even fumbled in his pockets with the vague idea that he should find a pistol there, and with the equally vague intention, if he had, of firing it at Jonathan Wild.

No. 102.—BLUESKIN.

But his search was unsuccessful, and the prisoner passed the corner.

Letting go his hold of the parapet, he once more cowered down upon the roof, and grovelled there, as contemptible and miserable an object as could well have been beheld.

Surely the punishment of the corrupt and villainous Governor of Newgate had commenced.

In his despair and dread of what was going to happen in the future, he muttered dismal groans and dashed his head violently against the lead-covered roof.

In prospective he saw no end of troubles, dangers, and difficulties.

He had the greatest dread of Jonathan Wild, and ten times more now that the thief-taker was a prisoner.

"He has reached the end of his career," wailed Mr. Noakes. "He is going—going down, and I know very well that he will drag me down along with him! I can see my error now! What a fool I must have been to have had any dealings with such a man. But I thought then I was acting for the best—I thought I was acting for the best!"

Slowly the Governor raised himself to his feet, and straightened his disordered apparel.

Although his mind was in such a state of confusion, he had a dim consciousness that it would be necessary for him to descend to the vestibule, and receive the prisoner when he was brought in.

He made his way towards the trap door above the steps he had ascended, and, passing through it, he crept down again.

Ere he had gone far, he heard some one calling him.

He tried to respond, but his voice failed him.

The nearer he got to the vestibule the greater his dread of meeting the thief-taker became.

"How will he look?" he asked himself, in nervous anxiety. "What will he say? Oh, he is a desperate wretch, and no doubt is in a furious rage! When he sees me his passion will increase, and who knows what dreadful words he may utter?"

The Governor was sadly afraid that Jonathan should disclose some secret, or make some remark that would be taken up by those who heard it, and repeated until it led to an investigation.

How true it is that a guilty conscience needs no accuser.

The Governor needed none, and the suspense and terror he endured while in this state of suspense was even worse than actual ill could have been.

He had to pause several times in his descent.

To reach the vestibule by the nearest route it was necessary for him to pass through those apartments in the prison which were allotted to his own use.

Upon entering one of them he sank down breathless and almost insensible upon a chair. Scarcely had he done so, than some one tapped at the door, and one of the turnkeys entered.

"Oh, you are here, sir! If you please," he said, "I have been looking all about for you—you are wanted at once!"

The Governor looked up, and when the turnkey beheld his countenance he exclaimed:

"Dear me, Mr. Noakes, how ill you look!"

"I am ill, Saunders—very ill. Go to yonder cupboard; you will find some brandy there pour some out."

Saunders obeyed.

The Governor swallowed nearly a quarter of a pint of brandy at a gulp, then, gasping for breath, he said:

"Come, what is it, Saunders?—what do you want?"

"If you please, sir, it's Mr. Ford wants you in the vestibule."

Ford was the name of the chief police officer.

"Would you believe it, Mr. Noakes?" continued Saunders. "They have actually brought Mr. Jonathan Wild a prisoner! There is no doubt about it, and Mr. Ford wants to hand you the warrant, and receive the receipt as usual."

"I am almost too ill to attend to any business, Saunders, but I suppose I must go. You say he has got Jonathan Wild a prisoner?"

"Yes, Mr. Noakes."

"Then I will write out the receipt now, and take it down with me to save time."

The Governor rose, and, having filled up the usual form which was handed to the officer who brought a prisoner in, he traversed the short corridor which led to the vestibule.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXV.

FORD THE OFFICER GIVES THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE A WORD OF ADVICE, AND JONATHAN WILD CHANGES HIS TACTICS.

CALLOUS-HEARTED as he was, Jonathan Wild felt a cold, disagreeable chill come over him when the large door leading to the street was closed with an ominous clang.

And yet it was by no means the first time he had stood and heard that sound.

It was familiar enough to him; but whenever he had heard it before, his position was very different to what it was now.

He was a prisoner.

Not wishing his captors to observe the effect which his entrance into the prison had had upon him, he raised his head and looked around him with an air of cool defiance.

The clanging of that door produced a far different effect upon the mind of Ford the police officer.

A sigh of relief came from his lips, and he felt himself heartily glad that his trouble with his prisoner was over.

His men also congratulated themselves, and counted heads, in order that they might tell how much each would receive as his share of the reward.

"Where is Mr. Noakes?" said Ford, addressing one of the astonished turnkeys. "He is not out, is he?"

"No, I think not," stammered Saunders, in reply.

"Then go and find him immediately, and tell him that I am here with an important prisoner."

Saunders withdrew, and was absent some time, until at length he returned, the Governor with him.

While he was gone a strange silence prevailed in the vestibule.

A dogged, sullen expression had settled upon Wild's face, and the officers, Ford included, directed their eyes towards the door through which Saunders had passed, expecting every moment to see him return.

Several turnkeys were present.

Some had been seated on the bench in the vestibule, but they quickly rose up on the entrance of the prisoner, and three more came out of the adjoining chamber.

They exchanged significant glances with each other when they discovered it was Jonathan Wild who had been brought in.

No expression of triumph or satisfaction appeared upon their countenances, as one would have almost expected. The fact was, they thought Jonathan Wild would prove a very troublesome prisoner.

The silence, then, remained unbroken till the Governor made his appearance.

All noticed how pale, agitated, and ill he looked.

Upon entering, Mr. Noakes could not resist looking at the thief-taker, in order that he might judge by his appearance whether he would be likely to make matters disagreeable.

Jonathan saw how troubled and alarmed the Governor was, and attributed his agitation to its right cause.

He smiled exultingly, and felt a malicious pleasure at seeing his accomplice in a state of such mental distress.

Wild contented himself by darting one significant glance at the Governor.

Then he bent his head forward and looked down upon the ground.

"I am sorry to disturb you, Mr. Noakes," said Ford. "You really look very unwell, but you see I have a good excuse—I have brought you a prisoner of importance."

The Governor smiled in a sickly fashion, and made two efforts before he could speak.

Then, in an absent, jerking way, he said:

"Yes, yes—oh yes, certainly!"

"Here is the warrant for his apprehension," said Ford, producing a folded paper from his pocket; "you will find it all right, and I shall be glad to exchange it with you for a receipt."

The Governor rubbed his hands together and tried to appear at ease.

It was quite a failure, however.

Still he took the receipt from his pocket and handed it to Mr. Ford, who in return gave him the warrant.

The Governor opened it.

"It is all right, is it not?" said Ford, as he placed the receipt in his pocket. "You see my instructions upon it were to capture the prisoner, and then lodge him at once in Newgate. You will see also that it enjoins you to take the greatest possible care of him, and to use every precaution you may think necessary and advisable in order to keep him in safe custody."

The Governor nodded and Wild looked up.

Ford continued:

"The warrant does not say what you are to do in order to keep him secure, and I don't wish to interfere or teach you your duty; I will only say this, I have had a great deal of trouble in capturing him, and a great deal of trouble in bringing him here; and if I was in your place I should put him in irons and confine him in the strongest cell in the prison."

"Thank you, Mr. Ford—thank you," said Wild, turning round and making an ironical bow. "I am very much obliged to you—very much indeed; your consideration is really quite overpowering. You may depend that I shall not forget it!"

Wild accompanied these words with such a peculiar look and such a peculiar tone that Ford felt quite uncomfortable, and wished he had not spoken.

The next moment he felt inclined to laugh at his fears.

Jonathan Wild, he thought, was now as harmless as some venomous reptile whose fangs had been extracted.

The Governor looked greatly distressed.

"I will see to him," he said, at last, "never fear that; you will leave him to me; he is in my charge now, and I am responsible. He will be safe enough, I'll warrant!"

"That is all right, Mr. Noakes. I hope you will excuse, but I only spoke as I did by way of caution. You have had one or two escapes from the prison——"

The Governor made a wry face.

"And," continued Ford, "if Mr. Wild was to escape, you may depend the consequences would be serious. All his villainies have been discovered, and the Government is determined fully to punish him!"

"Yes—yes! Very well."

The Governor spoke as though he would have been glad for Ford to go, but that officer was rather officious.

"Shall you put him in irons, Mr. Noakes?" he asked.

"If you take my advice you will, as I said before; and I speak now, because if you have made up your mind and do so I will stay, and my men will render you any assistance you may require."

"No—no thank you!" said the Governor, nervously. "Just leave him to me."

"Well, it's no business of mine. Good morning, Mr. Noakes—good morning!"

"Good morning!" returned the Governor.

Jonathan Wild again raised his head and looked at Ford.

"Good morning!" he said, in his former ironical tone. "I am really quite sorry to be deprived of your company; I had no idea that I had a friend who was so solicitous about my welfare. As I told you, I shall not forget it!"

The same uncomfortable feeling came over Ford's heart, nor did he feel better until he had reached the street.

Then he drew a long breath, and said:

"How glad I am that that job is over, and that he is out of my hands!"

Jonathan Wild and the Governor stood face to face in the vestibule, regarding each other curiously enough.

A silence ensued between them of several moments, and it might have lasted much longer had not Jonathan been the first to speak.

The turnkeys had formed round the thief-taker in a group, yet none ventured to lay hold of him.

"This is a ridiculous affair, is it not, Mr. Noakes?" said Wild, in tones of the greatest unconcern.

He had resolved upon a particular course of action, and had changed his tactics accordingly.

The Governor looked greatly astonished; it was not at all the sort of speech that he fancied Wild would make.

In accordance with a long-established rule, however, he said:

"Yes, yes—very ridiculous!"

He made it a point never to say anything in opposition to Jonathan.

"It is a most ridiculous affair," continued Wild; "it places you in a false and awkward position. I know if I stood there as you do I should feel quite vexed and annoyed, as I dare say you do. However, don't let me be the least trouble to you, it is the fate of all great men to have enemies. I had mine, as I have found to my cost, and doubtless you have yours, and there are certain persons who would be glad to lay hold of anything that they could repeat to your disadvantage."

Jonathan laid a particular emphasis upon the words "certain persons," and then continued his extraordinary speech:

"Do not let my being brought here a prisoner be a source of annoyance or uneasiness to yourself; the only favour I have to ask of you is this, that you will simply do your duty. You need not fear that I shall be offended; the fault is none of yours, and so to keep yourself right, I say, do your duty, and treat me just as the warrant commands; I shall think none the worse of you for it!"

Had not Mr. Noakes known Jonathan Wild so well as he did, he would have been completely deceived by this very plausible speech.

As it was, he felt more uncomfortable than ever, because he knew very well that Jonathan Wild meant playing some very deep game indeed.

What it was he was at a loss to conceive.

He assumed as much composure as he could.

"I never thought to see you here, Mr. Wild, and I am exceedingly sorry for it. As you have said truly, I feel in a difficult position; I was afraid of offending you, and yet I felt I must do my duty. However, now that you have spoken as you have, all is quite easy and plain."

"Quite," returned Wild, "and whatever you do I shall not consider any act of your own, but the act of those whose instrument you are, and whose commands you are bound to perform."

The turnkeys listened to this conversation with very great amazement; they could not make out what Wild meant by making so many civil speeches to the Governor.

The thief-taker had a motive, and a good one, which will be apparent in due time.

"I must lock you up in a cell, Mr. Wild," said the Governor: "I am obliged to do that."

"Shall you take the advice that Ford was so very kind as to offer?"

"Certainly not!" said Mr. Noakes, with great emphasis. "Put irons on you indeed, an innocent man! I know you are innocent; and apart from that, it is always my principle to consider every man innocent until he is proved guilty."

The turnkeys looked slyly at each other when the Governor spoke, and the muscles around their mouths quivered and twitched as though they would have been glad to have given a prolonged whistle of astonishment if they had only dared to do so.

"That is a sentiment which does you great honour, Mr. Noakes," said Wild.

The Governor bowed.

"I should never have thought of putting irons on a prisoner under such circumstances. I have my own opinion of Mr. Ford."

"And so have I," returned Jonathan; "but I don't wish to keep you waiting here wasting your valuable time. Just show me to a cell."

"You shall go to number twenty-three, Mr. Wild," said the Governor; "it is the cleanest and most comfortable cell in the prison, and I will take care that things are not made unnecessarily uncomfortable for you."

Then, turning round to Saunders, the Governor said:

"Get the keys of number twenty-three, and come with me and Mr. Wild; and as you are all present, let me tell you to treat Mr. Wild with the greatest respect."

Saunders unlocked a door leading into a corridor.

The Governor and Jonathan followed, complimenting each other by the way.

In a few minutes the cell was reached.

The Governor had spoken the truth when he said it was the most comfortable cell in the prison.

In the first place it was clean, and then there was a barred window through which came a plentiful supply of light, and this was a great deal, for generally speaking the cells in old Newgate were very dirty and very dark.

"Here I must leave you then, Mr. Wild," said the Governor. "You must make yourself as comfortable as you can under the circumstances. There will be a man stationed outside your door, and if you want anything you have only to call out and your wishes will be immediately attended to."

"I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Noakes," replied the thief-taker, "and when this little affair is over, you may depend upon my showing my gratitude in a substantial manner."

Mr. Noakes bowed.

"I only want to do my duty, and when I have done it I always think I am sufficiently rewarded."

"Still, I shall give you a testimonial of some kind, and I hope you will not deprive me of the pleasure which I shall feel if you accept it."

After a few more speeches of the like nature, which were uttered for the especial edification of Saunders and the other turnkeys, Mr. Noakes withdrew.

The cell door was securely fastened, and a man was posted on the outside in order that good guard should be kept in the corridor.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS TIME PASS VERY UNPLEASANTLY IN THE NEWGATE CELL.

No sooner had the door closed, and no sooner did Jonathan Wild find himself alone, than a most remarkable and entire change came over him.

He listened to the sound of their retreating footsteps along the corridor, and as he did so his countenance assumed such a hideous and diabolical expression that no one could have looked upon him without fear and trembling.

His first occupation was to stride up and down the cell, and while he did so he gnashed his teeth and uttered such curses as would have frozen a listener's blood.

"Betrayed!" he said. "Yes, yes—I have been betrayed; but I will be revenged upon them all—I will have a full, deep, and deadly vengeance! Curses on this unlucky day! Everything has gone wrong! First, there was the bank! Oh, George—George!" he cried, in a changed tone, "you are a heartless, unmitigated scoundrel! You have been a bad son to me, and I have been a fool to trust and place so much dependence on you! I know his course—I can see it all now! He looked upon me merely as his tool—as a stepping-stone! He will reap the advantage of all my toil! He has the greatest part of my wealth—I might say the whole of it. He has the papers relating to the Donnnull estate. He will suffer me to perish without making the least effort to save or assist me. I know it—I know it,—that is his scheme!"

The thief-taker ceased, and paced up and down his cell several times without speaking.

But his thoughts were of too violent a nature to be restrained.

They demanded an outlet, and he was obliged to avail himself of the only relief in his power, and that was by speaking aloud.

"He shall fail!" he said, with sudden energy,—"he shall fail! I can see my way out of this position; perilous as it seems to be, all will be perfectly easy, and then, when I am at liberty, I will devote myself to the task of foiling his plans! Yes, yes—that is it!"

He ceased again, but almost immediately continued in tones of the greatest exultation:

"Ha, ha!—a good thought—a brave thought! Unknown to him, I will do all I can to bring his schemes and plans to a successful issue; he shall be elated by the prospect of achieving that upon which he has set his heart; and when he feels that he has but to put forth his hand and take,—when, indeed, he is in the act of putting the cup of pleasure to his lips, I will dash it to the earth. He shall fail in the moment of success, and fail so utterly and completely that he will never have the heart to make a second effort! That is a good thought, and one easily carried out! That shall be the beginning of my revenge!"

Having come to this comfortable conclusion, Wild became much calmer.

He seated himself upon the miserable little pallet in the cell, and, clasping his hands over his eyes, gloated in imagination over his prospects.

Starting up, he continued his rapid walk up and down, and from time to time uttered his fierce ejaculations.

Jonathan Wild was under the impression, and not without some reason, that it was to the treachery of Powell that he owed his arrest.

In this he was wrong. The officers had been clever enough to penetrate his disguise, and had taken up their position in the stable to wait for his return in the manner we have formerly recorded.

It was the sudden recollection of Powell which caused Wild to start to his feet.

"Curse the villain!" he cried; "he has betrayed me! Had it not been for him, I should at least have escaped in safety. It must be him; no one else knew that I was disguised as a Quaker; and, in spite of my warning and his own protestations, he determined to try and obtain the reward. But he shall suffer! I have but to utter a few words, and he will be the inmate of one of these gloomy cells; and when he is tried, the evidence will be so complete that he will be sentenced to death without doubt! He will die, and at Tyburn! It serves him right!"

The thief-taker was considerably consoled by this reflection.

"Yes," he repeated, "he shall suffer! I will have my revenge upon him at once! As soon as I am a little calmer, I will call for pen and ink. An anonymous letter stating where he is to be found will be sufficient to do his business! No doubt he thought to himself that he had managed matters very cleverly indeed; but he must have been mad if he thought I should not suspect him of putting the officers on my track! It is not, however, worth my while to waste another thought upon him; his fate is as good as settled!"

It was wonderful to see what a soothing effect this had upon Wild's mind.

He was not half so chafed and angry as he had been, and began to take a calmer and better survey of his condition.

"I think I can make sure of getting myself out of this difficulty," he muttered. "Of course the charge they will prefer against me will be that of having the stolen lace in my possession. Bah! that is nothing; still, I have no doubt it will enable the magistrate to order my committal to Newgate; and while I am here waiting for the sessions to commence, who can tell what they may rake up against me? The gold lace is but a mere pretext; but I can't see how I am to prevent it answering their purpose."

Wild tried hard to think, but presently he gave up the attempt in despair; for even if he did succeed in rebutting or weakening the evidence brought against him with respect to the robbery of the gold lace, another charge would be preferred, and then another, so that his committal might be said to be absolutely certain.

He felt this, and so desisted.

"I may as well be committed on that charge as any other," he said. "Let me see—when will the next sessions commence? On the seventeenth of this month. That is exactly ten days hence. Between now and then I shall have ample time to consider what I shall do."

He walked to the door of the cell, and knocked loudly at it with his knuckles.

The man outside opened a little barred wicket in the upper portion of the door and looked in.

"Did you knock, Mr. Wild, if you please, sir?"

"Yes, Chambers. Tell Mr. Noakes I want pens and ink immediately!"

"All right, Mr. Wild!"

The man slammed the little wicket shut and disappeared. In a few minutes he returned with writing materials.

"Now to settle Jack Powell's business!" said Jonathan Wild, as he seated himself at the rude table in the cell.

Taking the largest piece of paper, he wrote upon it, in great sprawling characters:—

"Of course you remember at the time of the trial that just one link was wanting to complete the chain of evidence. That missing link I can supply. You will find it in the person of a man named John Powell, who keeps a wardrobe shop at the address given below."

Wild wrote at the foot of the note the name of the street and the number of the house in which Powell resided.

"That will do," he said. "I rather think that will settle Jack Powell's hash, and serve him right! What a fool he was to betray me!"

He folded up the letter as he spoke, and addressed it.

"I feel quite in a letter-writing humour; and now that I have the writing materials before me, I may as well make use of them. I may as well write to my friend the Secretary of State."

Owing to the peculiar position in which he had lately been placed, Jonathan Wild knew nothing about the change in the ministry that had taken place.

He imagined that the same corrupt wretch whom he had frequently addressed, and whose ready tool he had always been, still occupied the post of Secretary of State.

Under this impression, Jonathan Wild wrote as follows:—

"My Lord,—

"Once more the most humble and most obedient of your lordship's servants takes the liberty of addressing you. My lord, you may not be aware that I have been this day arrested in the streets of London upon some ridiculous charge of which I am perfectly innocent, and lodged in the prison of Newgate like a condemned felon.

I suppose in the morning I shall be taken before the magistrate; and I hope your lordship, out of consideration for the many eminent services I have rendered you, will take such steps as will procure my release from my present unpleasant position.

"From your lordship's most humble servant,
"now lying in Newgate,

"JONATHAN WILD.

"P.S.—I hope your lordship will not overlook this little affair, or neglect my application, because, in the event of your doing so, it is just possible that my memory may serve me a trick, when I might let out something connected with your lordship, which you would fain have concealed from the public ear.

"J. W."

Wild said no more, but folded up the letter and addressed it.

The threat contained in the postscript was a very ambiguous one, but he knew the Secretary of State would perfectly understand it.

The thief-taker possessed a knowledge of some very dangerous secrets in connection with the late Government, and some of them were of such a nature that if disclosed they would inevitably drag down the Secretary and his colleagues to the lowest depths of ruin and degradation.

"I feel quite comfortable now," said Jonathan, with a ferocious grin. "Those are two capital letters, upon my word! One will give me full revenge upon the man who has betrayed me, and the other will get me out of this cell. I don't care now how soon to-morrow comes."

Jonathan rapped at the door again, and desired the man to go for Mr. Noakes.

The Governor received the message with dismay and dread; he wondered what Wild could have to say to him so soon.

He entered the cell with a heavy heart.

"Sorry to disturb you, Mr. Noakes," said Wild, affecting to be exceedingly polite, "but I have written two letters of the greatest importance, and I want you to have them delivered immediately."

"All right, Mr. Wild," said the Governor, glancing at the addresses—"all right! I will have them delivered at once. Is there anything else you want?"

Mr. Noakes felt quite relieved.

"Brandy," said Wild—"that is what I want; bring me in a stone bottle full."

"You shall have it, Mr. Wild, though it is against the regulations. However, I can't do less than oblige you in this."

"And oblige me still more by having those letters delivered with all speed, for the sooner they reach their destination the better."

The Governor withdrew, and he went back to his own apartments feeling lighter-hearted and more at ease than he had done since Jonathan's arrival.

When the brandy was brought to him, Jonathan Wild drank deeply.

He swallowed the fiery liquid as though it had been water, and it appeared to take not the least effect upon him.

It soothed his mind, however, and he was calmer and more contented than he had been since the moment of his arrest. He believed that he saw the way out of his difficulty.

"His lordship," he muttered, "will be afraid of my babbling, and will take care to have me set at liberty; and when I am once free, if they can catch me I will give them leave to hang me at once."

The remainder of the day passed by slowly and wearily. Jonathan waited with great anxiety for a reply to his letter from the Secretary.

Night came, however, without his hearing anything.

At first this gave him some uneasiness, but gradually he calmed himself.

"It's all right, of course—it's all right! I don't suppose he would take the trouble to send any reply to the letter; he would consider it would be quite sufficient to attend to it; so it is—he is quite right. If I could only lie down now and sleep till morning, how glad I should be! I'll try."

Jonathan did try, but sleep never came near his eyelids.

His brain was working all the time, for his thoughts were continually wandering in fresh directions.

Night approached, and the gloomy cell became involved in darkness.

In the obscurity, dark, shadowy forms appeared to be flitting hither and thither, and the thief-taker was obliged to close his eyes and clasp his hands over them to shut out these phantoms.

At last, worn out both bodily and mentally, and lulled by the darkness and the deep draughts of brandy he had taken, the thief-taker fell off into an uneasy slumber.

He was, however, tortured by such hideous dreams that sleep became a horror.

He tossed about on his couch, and waved his arms wildly, while strange, gasping, guttural noises came from his throat.

His countenance wore an expression of the most frenzied terror.

The dreams that were passing through his mind were truly of an awful character.

One time he fancied he was pursued by a band of grisly spectres, all of whom had over their heads the frightful-looking white caps which are drawn over the culprits' faces to hide the horrible contortion of features produced by the strangulation.

They had halters round their necks, and they stretched out their arms towards him, and shrieked out horribly for him to pause.

Overcome with horror, Wild fancied he endeavoured to fly onwards, but his limbs became heavy as lead; his feet glued themselves to the ground, so that motion was almost impossible.

Spectres surrounded him.

Each one took off the halter from round its neck, and cast it over his own, then all pulled in opposite directions.

Uttering a loud yell of fear and pain, Jonathan Wild awoke.

Instinctively he carried his hands to his throat, where he felt a dreadful choking sensation.

So vivid was this vision that he could scarcely believe that it was not real.

As soon as he ascertained that it was a dream, however, and that he was alone in that dismal prison cell, he got up and struggled to the table on which the brandy stood.

He trembled from head to foot, but he drank deeply.

"Oh, it is horrible!" he muttered, with a shudder—"most horrible! I shall dread to sleep again! Why am I tormented with these frightful visions? What can it mean?"

Jonathan Wild sat down and wiped the perspiration from his brow.

He was a superstitious man, and attributed these visions to some supernatural cause, and believed they portended something.

The night passed slowly away.

To Jonathan it seemed an age from the time he awoke to the time when the light first began to struggle faintly into his cell.

"I am thankful," he said, "that day has come at last! In a few hours I shall be set at liberty, and then all will be well!"

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD IS BROUGHT BEFORE THE MAGISTRATE AT BOW STREET.

JONATHAN WILD passed the time between then and breakfast in various ruminations.

He felt very anxious about the letter which he had addressed to the Secretary of State.

He wondered what sort of notice would be taken of it, and what course the Secretary would adopt to effect his release.

"It would be an immense advantage to me," he said, "if I only possessed some clue as to their intentions. I should then be able to assume a behaviour in accordance with my situation; now I am like one in the dark. However, I must make the best of it, and do the best I can."

When breakfast came he asked for the Governor, and Mr. Noakes, reassured by the interview he had had on the preceding night, came in readily enough.

"I suppose I shall be taken before the magistrate this morning, Mr. Noakes?" said Wild.

"You will."
 "To Bow Street?"
 "Yes."
 "Which magistrate will sit to-day?"
 "Mr. Fielding."
 Wild ground his teeth savagely.
 "Curse him! I hate him for an officious rascal!"
 "He is no friend of yours, Mr. Wild," said the Governor.

"I know it. Are you sure that he will sit to-day?"

"Quite."

"You sent my letter last night?"

"Yes."

"Have you had no reply?"

"No. If I had, you would have received it instantly."

"No message of any kind?"

"None at all. Where did you expect one from?"

"The Secretary of State."

"You mean the late Secretary."

"Late Secretary?" yelled Wild, in a voice that made the Governor jump again. "What do you mean by that?"

"Just what I say."

For an instant Wild was quite overwhelmed.

He could not bring himself to believe that a change of ministry had taken place so suddenly and so quickly, and that his venial patron was no longer possessed of power.

"There has been a change of ministry, then?" he gasped out.

"Yes, there has—the Whigs are now in power. But is it possible that you did not know this?"

"I hadn't the least idea of it!" returned Wild—"such a thought never entered my head! I have not heard a syllable breathed about the matter! Curses on this unlucky occurrence—it has upset all my plans!"

"I am sorry to hear that, Mr. Wild! I thought it was rather strange when I glanced at the address yesterday, but I said nothing, for I thought you ought to know your own business best."

"I wish you had spoken," said Wild, nervously. "The intelligence you have just given me would have been worth pounds, could I have received it a few hours ago; now I am taken at unawares, and have no time to concert any fresh scheme."

"I should not let a change in the ministry produce any effect upon me; if the Secretary had remained in office, he would probably have disregarded your appeal."

"Would he?" replied Wild—"I rather think not—he knew better than that. I had him in my power—ay, as much in my power as I have you!"

A yellow tint crept over the Governor's face as Wild thus spoke, and the tip of his nose assumed a bluish tinge.

"I could have compelled him to pay attention," said the thief-taker; "now it's too late—it is no good thinking about it, or grieving; he cannot assist me, and so I must assist myself."

"Can I be of any service to you, Mr. Wild?" asked the Governor—"I should only be too glad to receive your commands!"

"You shall have them, never fear!" said Jonathan, with a meaning glance. "When the time comes, you will receive my commands; and, what is more, you will obey them!"

The last three words were uttered in a tone of deep meaning, and the Governor felt more uncomfortable than before.

"Leave me now," said Wild, "I want a little reflection."

"Very good!"

"How long can I have?"

"You will have to go to Bow Street in half an hour."

"That will do. Tell the man outside to get what I want quickly."

"I will, Mr. Wild. I will attend faithfully to all your instructions."

Jonathan sat down and covered his face with his hands.

The unexpected intelligence which the Governor had communicated to him had disconcerted his plans, and he was almost at a loss to know how to proceed, or what line of conduct to decide upon.

He had but a little time for reflection, and at length raising his head, he muttered:

"I must face the matter out as well as I am able. I will assume an air of injured innocence. I will try whether I can't elicit the sympathy of the magistrate. Even if I am committed it will not much matter, for I have another scheme ready, and a most effectual one."

Jonathan rose, and, going to the door, asked for water.

Some was brought to him, and he washed himself thoroughly, and endeavoured to make himself look as much like a human being as possible.

To some extent he succeeded, for Jonathan Wild always looked very much better when the dirt with which his face was usually coated was removed.

By the time he had finished his toilet the cell door was opened, and the officers appeared who were to conduct him to the police court.

At the time of which we write, the large black vans in which prisoners are removed from one place to another were not in use, and had not been thought of.

It was the general rule to link all the prisoners together and lead them through the streets, when there was always a yelling, shouting mob at their heels.

An exception was sometimes made in the case of any great criminal.

It was deemed advisable after their former experience not to attempt to take Wild through the streets, and so a hackney-coach was provided, into which he was forced to enter.

The handcuffs were put on, as a precautionary measure, and, guarded by a strong force of constables, the thief-taker passed through the corridors of the prison, and out at the gate into the coach.

Just as they were descending the steps, Wild made a sudden and frantic dash to escape.

He was in hopes of being able to take the officers by surprise, and had he done so, in all probability he would have succeeded in getting off.

But they were expecting some such movement, and were fully prepared for it.

Wild looked savage when his plan was defeated, but said not a word.

He did not take it much to heart, and he had made the attempt, not because he thought he should succeed, but merely as the thought darted into his mind.

As many police officers as the vehicle would hold were crowded in with him, the doors were shut, then one mounted by the side of the driver and four more sat on the top.

In this way Jonathan Wild was taken from Newgate to the Bow Street Police Court.

He was in imminent danger of being suffocated, so closely did the officers press round him.

Escape was impossible, for he was unable to move a single limb.

He felt quite thankful when at length the coach drew up in Bow Street.

The police officers descended from the roof, and summoned others from the station opposite, and formed a double line extending from the door of the coach to the door of the court.

Then they returned and let Wild out.

As swiftly as possible they hurried him inside the building and closed the door.

In accordance with the plan which he had determined upon adopting, Jonathan Wild assumed a gentle manner.

He stood up, with his head bent forward and his chin resting upon his breast, as though he was quite overcome by his situation.

He suffered himself to be led, without the least show of resistance, to the strong little room adjoining the court, in which the prisoners await their turn to be called up to the bar.

It had been agreed that the magistrate should take his seat upon the bench somewhat earlier than usual that morning, and that Jonathan's case should be attended to first, before the usual night charges were brought up.

Consequently he had the little room to himself.

Much to the surprise of the police officers, who expected he would be extremely violent, he seated himself with a well-assumed air of passiveness and resignation.

He was not kept waiting long, for the magistrate arrived punctually and took his seat.

The prisoner was then brought before him.

Although the hour was an earlier one than usual, and though this fact had been kept back from the knowledge of the public, nevertheless the little justice room was completely filled with spectators.

There was not a single corner unoccupied, and they were so closely packed together that they could not move.

Upon his entrance the thief-taker was greeted with a succession of groans which were with difficulty subdued, and it was not until the magistrate threatened to have the court cleared that they became silent.

The Mr. Fielding who presided on this occasion was no other than the celebrated novelist of that name.

His aversion to Jonathan Wild and his detestation of his doings were well known to everyone, and it was only a few weeks before that he had published a pamphlet in which many of Wild's villainies were exposed.

True to his purpose, Jonathan Wild stood in the dock, as he believed, with the air and in the attitude of a martyr.

Mr. Fielding regarded him with some surprise, for Wild's demeanour was exactly opposite to what he expected it to be.

The clerk of the court handed the charge-sheet to the magistrate, who, looking at it, said:

"Is your name Jonathan Wild?"

"It is, your worship."

Wild's tones were respectful in the extreme.

"You are charged here with being guilty of the offence of having in your possession a quantity of gold lace, you well knowing the same to be stolen. Do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty, your worship," said Wild, in the same respectful voice; "I am quite innocent. The charge is one which has been brought against me by my enemies, and—"

"There, there—that will do; we want to hear no more! You plead not guilty?"

"Yes, your worship."

"That will do."

Wild's plea was then duly recorded, and the officer who had been employed to make the search among the ruins of Wild's house was called into the witness-box.

Jonathan continued to keep his head bent forward, but by rolling his eyes he managed to catch a glimpse of the officer's face without appearing to make a movement.

Jonathan Wild was acquainted with all the members of the police force, from highest to lowest, and he recognised this one immediately.

He bit his lip with vexation.

He knew him to be a man whose character was unimpeachable, and who had a high, strict sense of justice.

He was gifted with a larger amount of intellect than the generality of his companions, and he had also received what in these days was considered a good education.

From such a man Jonathan Wild had everything to fear.

He would give his evidence clearly and impartially, and it would require more tact and acumen than the thief-taker possessed to baffle him or to throw discredit upon his testimony.

Wild resolved, however, to pay particular attention to all he said, and not to omit to lay hold of the slightest circumstance that might benefit him.

The people in the court were very quiet, for without exception they were desirous of hearing what this officer had to say, and becoming acquainted with the exact charge which was to be preferred against Jonathan Wild.

CHAPTER CCOOLXXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD IS DULY COMMITTED TO TAKE HIS TRIAL AT THE NEXT OLD BAILEY SESSIONS.

THE police officer in the witness-box, whose name was Barret, was then duly sworn.

"Now," said the clerk, "be good enough to state what you know with respect to the prisoner at the bar."

"From instructions I received," commenced Barret, "I paid a visit to the ruins of Jonathan Wild's house in Newgate Street, on the night of Saturday last."

"You received the instructions from your inspector, I presume?" said Mr. Fielding.

"Yes, your worship."

"Well, go on!"

"I took with me two men, and made with them a thorough examination of the premises, which, as your worship is doubtless aware, were destroyed by fire a little more than a week ago."

"Yes—yes!"

"I found the basement of the house choked up with rubbish, and with a good deal of trouble I sifted and searched the whole over."

"And what did you find?" asked Mr. Fielding.

"A box containing—"

"Stop!—have you the box?"

"Yes, your worship."

"Produce it, then!"

The witness turned round and spoke to an officer who was near him, and who, nodding his head, went into an adjoining room, and returned with a rather large box in his arms.

He gave this to Barret, who not without some difficulty succeeded in balancing it upon the edge of the witness-box.

It was so placed as to conceal him from the view of the people in the court, and also from the prisoner.

When Jonathan heard the box mentioned, he slightly raised his head, and eagerly watched the movements of the officer who brought it from the next room.

A glance seemed to satisfy Wild with respect to this box, and he bent his head down again.

The examination continued.

"Is that the box you found among the ruins?" asked the magistrate.

"It is, your worship."

"Did you open it upon the spot?"

"I did."

"And what did it contain?"

"A quantity of gold lace, your worship."

"Open the box."

Barret did so, and the gold lace was disclosed.

"There were eleven pieces of lace in this box," continued Barret; "in all, about fifty yards."

"That is enough," said the magistrate—"without you have anything further to describe with respect to the discoveries you made."

"Other discoveries were made," said Barret, "but I am told it will not be necessary to refer to them here, the object being merely to produce such evidence as will warrant the commitment of the prisoner to Newgate."

"It will be necessary, then, to show that the lace which you have found was really stolen, which has not been done at present."

"A witness is in waiting, your worship, who will swear upon this point; and there are also the two officers who were with me when I discovered the box, and who witnessed the opening of it."

"Very good," said Mr. Fielding; "you can stand down—without the prisoner has any questions to ask of you."

Jonathan Wild raised his head.

"I have a few words to say to the witness, your worship, if you will allow me."

"Certainly—certainly!"

"Would your worship order that box to be removed from where it now is, because I cannot see the witness?"

Mr. Fielding nodded, and the box was removed.

"Now, Barret," said Wild, sharply—"that is your name, I believe?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"You said my house had been burnt down, but you omitted to inform the Court on what day, or rather night, that misfortune occurred. Would you mind doing so now?"

"Certainly not!" said Barret. "To the best of my belief, your house was burnt down on the night of Thursday week. I can't swear to it, however, for I was not present at the fire, but I have been told that was the day."

"You are quite correct, Barret—it was Thursday. And do you happen to know where I was at that particular time?"

"You, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes—where was I? Wasn't I in a cell in Newgate, where I had been for several days and nights previous, watching over Jack Sheppard, in order to prevent him making another escape from Newgate?"

"I believe you were, Mr. Wild."

"I was—I can bring a dozen witnesses to prove, from the time I brought Jack Sheppard into Newgate I never left him, but remained by his side until the hour of execution arrived, and I accompanied the condemned prisoner to Tyburn."

"But," interrupted Mr. Fielding, "what has all this got to do with the case?"

"Everything, your worship," said Wild, still preserving his humble demeanour and respectful tone of voice. "From what has now been admitted, you will see yourself that I had not visited my house for a long time, and that when the box was found in the manner described I was at that moment the inmate of a cell, as I also was when my house was burnt down."

"Well, what defence do you set up?"

"No defence at all, your worship, for I presume you will commit me for trial."

"I have no other resource after this evidence."

"Then I only wish to state that I know nothing about that box—nothing about the gold lace it contains; that I never saw either in the whole course of my life, until they were produced a few minutes ago; that I had no knowledge anything of the kind was in my house; and I can only account for its presence among the ruins by the supposition that some one placed it there in order to bring a charge against me."

"But, your worship," said Barnet, "I don't see how it is possible for anyone to have hidden the box among the rubbish in the way that the prisoner supposes, because from the time of the fire until I went in to search, the premises were barricaded, and a police officer constantly kept on guard over them."

"That point will have to be gone into at another time and before another person," said Mr. Fielding; "I have nothing to do with it; all I require is some evidence that the gold lace found was stolen."

"That evidence will be forthcoming, your worship. The two men who were with me at the time of the search are in the adjoining room, and will corroborate what I have said."

"Let them be called first, then."

The two police officers who had accompanied Barnet were placed in the witness-box in succession.

They each swore distinctly to the truth of what the former witness had said, and corroborated his evidence in every particular.

"Who is the next witness?" asked Mr. Fielding.

The clerk referred to a paper, and said:

"The next witness, your worship, is the owner of the lace, whose name is Catherine Stretham."

"Let her be called, then."

Catherine Stretham was called, and in response to the summons, a middle-aged respectable-looking woman made her appearance in the witness-box.

She appeared to be in a fluster and excited condition.

The oath was duly administered, and then Mr. Fielding said:

"Is your name Catherine Stretham?"

"Yes, your worship, it is."

"Where do you live?"

"At number three hundred and fifty, Holborn Hill, your worship."

"Have you a husband?"

"No, sir, I am a widow."

"Are you in business?"

"Yes, your worship. I keep a shop on Holborn Hill, in which gold lace and other ornaments of a similar character are sold."

The magistrate made a sign to one of the police officers, who opened the tin box, and taking out the pieces of gold lace, handed it to Mrs. Stretham.

"Do you know that lace, Mrs. Stretham?"

"I do, your worship."

"Is it yours?"

"It is."

"Can you swear to it?"

"Most positively, your worship, because the card on which it is wrapped has my private mark upon it."

"What private mark?"

"One to signify what the lace cost, and the other to signify at what it should be sold."

"Then you swear to it without hesitation?"

"Yes, your worship."

The other pieces were then handed to the witness in succession, and after examining them, she swore to the whole as her property.

"I believe also that the tin box is mine, but I cannot swear to it, because it appears to be much battered and covered with smoke and dirt, and the box which I lost was nearly a new one."

"And when was the lace last in your possession?"

"On the twenty-second of January, your worship."

"Do you know how, or by whom, the lace was stolen?"

"I don't, your worship. I only know that I had the box of lace on the afternoon of the twenty-second of January, because then I sold one piece of lace out of it, for the box originally contained twelve pieces."

"And when did you miss the lace?"

"The same night, your worship. As soon as I discovered my loss I searched everywhere for the box, but could not find it, and the next day I offered a reward. Here is the bill, your worship. It is dated January twenty-third, and that is how I know it was on the twenty-second of January that the lace was stolen, because the reward was offered on the following day."

"Very clear indeed," said the magistrate, as he looked at the bill handed to him, which was one offering a reward of ten pounds for the recovery of the lace.

"How much do you estimate the lace to be worth, Mrs. Stretham?"

"Fifty pounds, your worship."

"That will do," said Mr. Fielding. "I have no more questions to ask you. Your evidence is quite sufficient. Perhaps the prisoner may wish to say something?"

"I reserve my defence," said Wild, "until my trial."

Then, turning to Mrs. Stretham, he continued:

"Do you know who I am?"

"Yes, of course—you are Jonathan Wild."

"Exactly. Well, previous to the time when you offered the reward for your lace, did you ever see me in your shop?"

"Not to my knowledge."

"Not to your knowledge? Of course that just means that you never have, because my pleasing face is one that everybody recollects."

Wild made one of his old hideous grins as he spoke.

"Have you no more questions to ask?" said the magistrate.

"None, your worship," returned Wild; "as I said a few minutes ago, I shall reserve my defence."

"And very wisely too. My duty is clear enough before me;—you stand committed to take your trial at the next Old Bailey sessions."

A murmur of voices arose from the body of the court as soon as the magistrate finished speaking.

Jonathan Wild was removed from the dock and taken into the next room.

Here he was allowed to take some refreshment, after which the handcuffs were placed upon him, and a strong force of police officers having assembled, he was led to the door of the court.

The hackney-coach in which he had been brought from Newgate was still standing before the door of the court.

The police officers had been compelled to surround it, and also to form a line from the door of the court, in order to keep off the crowd.

The news that Jonathan Wild was before the magistrate very quickly spread, and the consequence was that an immense mob had assembled.

All were anxious to catch just one glimpse of the prisoner.

As soon as the officers reached the door of the court the excitement of the crowd became intense.

When, however, Jonathan followed them, a succession of the most fearful howls came from their lips.

Hisses, too, arose; and one would think if any person was ever universally detested Jonathan Wild was that man.

He scowled fearfully when he caught sight of the excited throng, and when their cries of execration and contempt reached his ears.

[EDGORTH BESS IN THE CAVERN.]

The next moment he lowered his head, and suffered the police officers to lead him unresistingly to the hackney-coach, place him in it, and seat themselves beside him in the same manner as before.

Jonathan Wild submitted to this because he was so well aware that resistance was utterly useless.

He was only safe while surrounded and protected by the police officers; if he once got among the crowd, they would tear him piecemeal.

The other officers were still compelled to form a circle round the coach, while others with drawn cutlasses in their hands were obliged to march in a dense body before the horses' heads, and so clear the way before them.

Such being the case, their progress was of course very slow, but upon reaching Holborn the crowd became thinner and their speed was accelerated.

Upon gaining the top of Snow Hill, it was discovered that another mob had collected round the doors of Newgate, and it was being swelled every second by fresh arrivals.
No. 103.—BLUESKIN.

This crowd was to a great extent composed of the people who had stood outside Bow Street.

Finding it was useless to follow the coach, they had taken the nearest cut through the back streets, and, running at the top of their speed, had managed to arrive first.

In this way they hoped to have the double gratification of seeing the prisoner taken out of the coach and led up the steps into Newgate.

They were more orderly and behaved much better than the crowd which had assembled on the preceding day, and confined themselves to uttering groans, yells, and hisses.

Many of course were disappointed, but still a few saw Jonathan Wild descend from the coach and pass through the portals of the prison.

CHAPTER CXCXXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD INSISTS UPON BEING FREED FROM HIS FETTERS, AND THE GOVERNOR MAKES A COMPROMISE.

UPON reaching the vestibule of Newgate, the thief-taker found that quite a large crowd of distinguished persons had collected and were waiting his arrival.

Among them were the sheriffs' men, who until within the last few days had believed Jonathan Wild to be a most efficient police officer, who studied the interests of the people at large more than he did his own.

Jonathan grinned derisively when he saw with what altered looks they regarded him, but he hung down his head and tried to conceal the expression of his face as much as possible, for he had made up his mind to one particular course.

He had resolved to adopt and maintain as far as possible an air of injured innocence, to curry favour with everybody in the best way he could, and to submit patiently and without resistance to anything that might be done.

As soon as it became known that the evidence given at Bow Street had been sufficient to warrant Mr. Fielding committing the prisoner to Newgate, the High-sheriff stepped forward, and addressing the Governor of the prison, said:

"Mr. Noakes, you will be held particularly responsible for the safe keeping of this prisoner. During the time you have held your present situation there have been several daring escapes from the prison. If another is made, you will find yourself in serious trouble."

"I thought, sir," said Mr. Noakes, humbly, "that I had shown to the satisfaction of everybody that it was not my fault the prisoner escaped."

"Well, we will say no more about the past, but I caution you with regard to the prisoner. In the first place, as a necessary precaution, you will put irons upon him and confine him in the strongest cell you have."

Jonathan Wild ground his teeth when he heard these words.

Mr. Noakes found his position growing more and more difficult and complicated every day.

He did not dare say "I will not put irons on the prisoner," and he scarcely dared to give the order for them to be brought, lest Jonathan Wild should say something unpleasant.

"We will wait here and see the irons riveted on," said the High-sheriff, "so call the smith at once."

Mr. Noakes had no other resource than to obey this order.

A turnkey was despatched to fetch the smith, as the man was called whose duty it was to put on and strike off the fetters from the limbs of the prisoners.

He came in with a bag of tools and a small portable anvil.

In his right hand he held a set of unusually heavy fetters, which he dragged along the stone floor of the prison after him, making a most horrible clanging din as he did so.

When the smith approached, Jonathan Wild felt for a moment as though inclined to resist.

He mastered the impulse, however, and without speaking a word, or replying in any way to what the smith said, he suffered the iron basils to be clasped around his ankles and secured there by a rivet.

A strong iron belt was padlocked round his waist, and the fetters were also locked upon his wrists.

When decorated with these little ornaments, Jonathan weighed about two hundred pounds heavier than before.

Jonathan Wild uttered no word of complaint, and made not the least resistance to the irons being placed upon him, and finally he was marched off and placed in the same dungeon that he had before occupied.

The sheriffs were so amazingly polite as to accompany him to his cell and see him placed in it, after which they withdrew, and Mr. Noakes at last had the satisfaction of getting rid of his distinguished visitors.

Scarcely had he closed the door behind them than one of the turnkeys touched him on the shoulder.

He turned round sharply.

"Well, Watson, was is it?"

"Please, sir," said Watson, "Mr. Wild's a-kickin' up a row in his cell, and says he must see you!"

The Governor sighed as he said:

"I am coming!"

He followed the turnkey to the door of Mr. Wild's cell with a lagging step.

"Was ever a man in such a fix before?" he asked himself. "No, never! What am I to do? I can see the end of it—between the two stools I shall fall to the ground, and I wonder who'll care?—nobody—nobody; but I know plenty who would rejoice."

This was not at all a pleasing reflection, and the Governor felt very uncomfortable after he had made it.

Just then the door was opened, and he was ushered into the cell.

The prisoner was standing up in an angry attitude, with his back to the grated aperture which served for a window.

Mr. Noakes thought it highly probable that Wild would make some disagreeable speeches—speeches that he would not like to be overheard, so he said to Watson:

"You can leave me with the prisoner and go back to the vestibule; come back in a quarter of an hour."

"All right, sir!"

Mr. Noakes closed the door of the cell.

The first thing Wild did was to utter a string of curses. They were levelled at all the world in general, but at the High-sheriff and his colleagues in particular.

"Am I to pass the time between now and the commencement of the sessions in this fashion?" he roared. "Do you think I am going to submit to it—do you think I'll be manacled in this way?"

"Now, my dear Mr. Wild!" said the Governor.

"Oh, d—n your civility! Don't 'dear Mr. Wild' me—I don't want any of your politeness!"

"But what could I do? You must make some allowances."

"It's no good talking about the past," said Wild; "I don't intend to do it—my business is with the present and the future. You would tell me and wish me to believe that you would not have had these fetters put on me had you not been obliged to it."

"Exactly."

"Oh yes, I quite expected that! Well, now, we may as well save our breaths. One word is as good as a hundred. I insist upon being freed from these fetters!"

"Now, my dear Mr. Wild!" began the Governor again in the most soothing voice imaginable.

Jonathan interrupted him with a ferocious howl.

"I say I will have them taken off, and that at once!"

"It is impossible."

"I will see about that!"

"Now, do be reasonable!"

"Reasonable! How can I be reasonable with a couple of hundredweight of iron dragging me to the ground?"

"It is uncomfortable, I know."

"Uncomfortable! I only wish you'd got them on instead of me!"

"I daresay you do," said the Governor, with a grin.

"And if you don't have them taken off," continued Wild, with menacing voice and gesture, "you'll d—d soon find yourself accommodated with a set to match!"

The Governor's face assumed that yellow, sickly tint which it always did when Wild uttered his ambiguous threats.

"Do you hear what I say?" continued the thief-taker. "While you do as I want you, I shall keep my mouth shut; but I tell you, the minute you refuse I shall open my mouth, and the consequences will be on your own head!"

The Governor groaned and wrung his hands.

"But what can I do—what can I do?"

"Why, take off these fetters, as I command you."

"If I do, I shall lose my situation."

"If you don't, you will, and that very soon, I can promise you!"

"Alas, alas! this is a most unfortunate affair!"

"It is for me."

"And for me, Mr. Wild. You don't know what I suffer, and I dread to look into the future."

"Then take my advice, and don't do it."

"But can't we compromise this matter in some way?" asked Mr. Noakes, as a fresh thought darted into his mind; "can we not settle it in an amicable manner?"

"I don't care a d—n whether it is amicable or not, so long as these irons are off!"

The Governor rubbed his hands together.

"You know as well as I do, Mr. Wild, that I am only a servant, and that I am bound to do as I am told. I dare not refuse what the sheriffs say. They have given orders about the irons, and if they were taken off without their permission I should get into serious trouble. Suppose they were to take it into their heads, as they very likely will, to come into this cell to pay you a visit—what do you think the consequences would be to me if they found you unfettered?"

"I don't want to get you into trouble, if I can help it," said Wild, more calmly than he had yet spoken; "but now you mention it, I think we can compromise matters, and arrange things so that they will turn out well for all parties."

"I should rejoice most heartily."

"Well, then, you must give me a key, so that I can unlock my fetters and take them off whenever I think proper."

"But—"

"Hear me out before you interrupt. You must contrive to give me a few minutes' notice when anyone is about to enter my cell. I shall then make all speed and put them on again, and who will be the wiser?"

"No one, Mr. Wild. You release my heart of quite a heavy load, you do. You shall have the key, and I hope, for your own sake as well as mine, that you will be careful."

"Depend upon it I will."

"If I was suddenly removed from my situation," said the Governor, whiningly, "it would prove a serious disadvantage to yourself, for in all probability my successor would not feel so disposed to render you what kindnesses he could as I am."

"It all depends," said Wild. "If I had got the same power over him as I had over you, it would not matter in the least; but you know very well I could have you hanged any day I liked."

"Don't talk like that, Mr. Wild; there may be somebody listening. Here is a key,—you will find it will unlock your fetters easily."

"Thanks!—and if you will only take care to let me have a little notice before anyone enters, I will give you my word that they shall not have the least suspicion of the little arrangement which exists between us."

With these words Mr. Noakes took his departure, and the thief-taker was once more left in his cell.

CHAPTER CCCCX.

THE MORNING APPOINTED FOR JONATHAN WILD'S TRIAL AT LENGTH ARRIVES.

JONATHAN WILD found the time pass slowly and unpleasantly enough in his cell, although he was able to disencumber himself of his fetters whenever he thought proper.

The sessions would commence at the Old Bailey in a couple of days, and would probably last three, and on one of the days Jonathan Wild would have to stand and take his trial upon the charge brought against him.

It was a rule then, as it is now, to try the unimportant cases first.

The thief-taker imagined that his was an important one, and upon making inquiries of Mr. Noakes, he learned that Friday was the day appointed.

After receiving this announcement, Jonathan deliberated a long time with himself as to what he should do.

He thought over the evidence that was likely to be brought against him, and weighed it carefully in his mind, in order that he might judge what likelihood there was of his escaping conviction.

Not a single circumstance escaped him, and after much thought he resolved to stand his trial, and not make an attempt to escape, as at first he intended.

It was just possible, he thought, that he might be clever enough to secure his acquittal, and if he was discharged, why, then he would be in a much better position than he would be if he was an escaped prisoner.

He was the more inclined to run the risk of being brought to trial because after the verdict was pronounced it would be just as easy for him to make his escape as it was then.

"Yes," he said, "I will take my trial—I will try what cleverness will effect. I have succeeded well hitherto in what I have undertaken, and have plenty of time for reflection, and it is odd to me if I don't outwit them. It would be a revenge indeed upon my enemies if I was released from custody."

Jonathan Wild was so pleased with this idea that he sat down and pondered for several hours.

At the end of that time he felt his determination strengthened, and his whole demeanour consequently underwent a most remarkable change.

Mr. Noakes was continually on the look-out for any alteration, and when he saw Wild suddenly become calm and quiet, he grew fidgety and anxious, for he knew very well it meant something.

He endeavoured on several occasions to enter into conversation with his prisoner, but he failed signally. Wild would have nothing to say to him.

On Wednesday the sessions commenced, and Mr. Noakes was too busy to pay much attention to his important prisoner.

When the Court rose, however, one of the turnkeys delivered a message to him, to the effect that Wild wanted him.

During the whole of that day, Jonathan Wild had been busily engaged in writing.

As soon as the Governor entered the cell, the thief-taker took up a rather large packet of papers from the table, and said:

"Mr. Noakes, I want this delivering with all speed and without fail to the address I have written on it. It is something I am going to have printed, so that when the printer brings the parcel you will know what it is, and you will let me have it."

"But it is against the regulations."

"I don't care for that. It must be done, without you like to take upon yourself the consequences of a refusal."

"Don't be harsh, Mr. Wild—it shall be done."

"Good!—that will do! And now be off—the sooner the packet is delivered the better."

"I will deliver it myself, and so make sure."

"It will very likely be best, and I should think it will be as well if you were to ask the printer when the job would be finished and the parcel ready,—you might then call and bring it to me without anyone being the wiser."

"That's precisely what I intended to do."

"Go on, then—you have my consent."

The Governor took his departure, and on the following day, towards evening, Jonathan received his parcel from the printer's.

He was well satisfied with it, and seemed to be in excellent spirits.

"I don't wish to make you downcast, Mr. Wild, but of course your case is very much talked about, and I can't help hearing a great deal that is said."

"What of it?"

"Everybody believes that things will go hard with you, the present Government having made up their minds to put you out of the way. The Attorney-General will conduct the case for the prosecution. Who shall you have for a counsel?"

"Myself!"

"Yourself?"

"Yes, and a good counsel I shall make, as you will find. I am not afraid but I shall be a match for the Attorney-General."

"Well, Mr. Wild, I heartily hope that you will, for nothing would delight me so much as to see you once more a free man."

"I should doubt you," said the thief-taker, "only I happen to know that I am more trouble to you inside the prison than I should be out."

"You are—you are indeed! I have not had one night's sleep since you have been here."

"That's no affair of mine. I am anxious for morning to come."

In a little while the Governor departed, and the thief-taker, throwing himself upon the hard mattress, gave himself up to reflection, and arranged in his own mind the details of the defence he should make.

The morning of his trial arrived.

He rose early, and washed and dressed himself as carefully as he was able.

He was bent upon making a favourable impression if he could.

The papers he had printed he caused to be distributed among the jurymen and other persons in and round the court.

On the front page appeared the following words:—

"A list of persons discovered, apprehended, and convicted of several robberies on the highway, and also for burglary, housebreaking, and also returned from transportation, by Jonathan Wild."

The following pages contained the names of thirty-five for robbery on the highway, twenty-two for housebreaking, and ten for returning from transportation.

On the end of the list appeared the following words:—

"Several others have been also convicted for like crimes, but remembering not the persons' names who had been robbed, I omit the criminals' names. Please to observe that several others have also been convicted for shoplifting, picking of pockets, &c., by the female sex, which are capital crimes, and which are too tedious to be inserted here, and the prosecutors not willing of being exposed.

"In regard, therefore, of the numbers above convicted, some that have yet escaped justice are endeavouring to take away the life of the said Jonathan Wild."

These words closed this extraordinary production, but it is doubtful whether the circulation of this list produced the effect which Jonathan Wild expected it would.

Upon the hour for trial arriving, his fetters were knocked off, and he was taken to a part of the prison called the leads, where it was usual for prisoners to remain for a few moments until their names were called.

This was a place where many people connected with the business of the sessions were continually passing to and fro, and the thief-taker busied himself in giving to every person who would accept one, a copy of his list of persons convicted.

From where he stood he could hear distinctly a roaring sound in the street below.

He knew what it was.

It arose from the people who had assembled there, and who had been unable to gain admittance to the court.

It was already crowded, and the people were so densely packed together that it would have been a matter of impossibility to find room for one more.

Those on the outside were angry, tumultuous, and impatient, yet they resolved to remain where they were, in order to be the first to learn the issue of the great trial.

It might be said with every confidence and without the slightest exaggeration, that never before had a trial caused so great an amount of curiosity and interest in the public mind.

Jonathan Wild was as well known as King George himself. Although there were some who had obtained a partial insight into his proceedings, yet by far the larger portion of the population had looked upon him as a very energetic police officer, one who set an excellent example to the rest, for he appeared to devote the whole of his time to the capture of offenders against the community at large.

Now, however, when different facts connected with him became known, an entire revolution of feeling took place; he was loathed and detested by all persons, and yet they felt doubtful how the day's proceedings would terminate.

It caused Wild a certain amount of depression when he noticed that, of all those who passed him on the leads, not one paused to cast a friendly eye upon him.

"They fear me!" he exclaimed, mentally—"that is the reason, and they think now that they have the opportunity of getting rid of me and their fears together; but they will be mistaken. I know how things are managed inside the court better than most of them."

This was true, for Jonathan Wild had stood in the witness-box at the Old Bailey more times than he could well have counted.

It was some satisfaction to him when his papers were taken and perused, for many did take them, and read them from sheer curiosity.

The preparations within the court having been made, and the time for his case to be called on having arrived, a summons was given for him to take his stand in the dock.

A little winding staircase led up to the floor of the dock, and this Jonathan ascended in company with a couple of police officers.

In another second he found himself at the bar, with an indistinct mass of something before him.

CHAPTER CCCCXCI.

JONATHAN WILD PLEADS "NOT GUILTY" TO THE INDICTMENT.

Hisses and groans smote upon his ear, but, taking no notice of these demonstrations of dislike, the thief-taker made a kind of circular bow to the judge, jury, and to the whole court generally.

Then, raising his head, he folded his arms upon his breast, and looked with an air of defiant calmness around him.

The crier in court quickly succeeded in restoring silence, or, rather, the people themselves became still, because they were so anxious for the proceedings to commence.

Jonathan looked across the court at the judge, who, placing a pair of spectacles upon his nose, stared at him in return.

Then Wild looked at the jury-box, but the men who were seated in it avoided his gaze.

His eyes rested for a moment or two upon the table at which the Attorney-General sat.

A pile of papers was upon it, and several other barristers in their wigs and gowns were conversing earnestly with him.

Acquainted as he was with all the proceedings of the court, Jonathan Wild looked about him, and noted everything with as much interest—nay, even more than he would have done had he beheld them for the first time.

It must be borne in mind, however, that never before had he occupied the same position as he did then.

On previous occasions some other trembling wretch, brought up to hear his doom, stood where he stood then, while either he was a spectator, or else placed in the witness-box.

Silence having been obtained, the business of the court at once commenced.

The Clerk of Arraignment having fluttered the parchment upon which the indictment was written, in an imposing manner rose to his feet and commenced to read.

As is nearly always the case, little attention was paid to this portion of the ceremony.

The judge occupied himself in perusing a book, the jury nibbled the ends of their quill pens and tried to look wise, and the different barristers at the tables chatted and laughed over various subjects.

It was perhaps in consequence of his having found out what a little attention was paid to him, that the Clerk of Arraignment gabbled over what he had to read at a very rapid rate.

His voice was harsh and unintelligible,—the only words that were clearly heard in consequence of additional stress being laid upon them, were "said" and "aforesaid."

Having finished the perusal of this document, he dipped his pen in the ink, and, looking straight across to Jonathan Wild, said:

"Prisoner at the bar, do you plead guilty or not guilty to the charge preferred against you?"

"Not guilty!" said Wild, almost with a shout.

The plea was recorded, and then the Clerk of Arraignment sat down in his seat with a bang, amid an imposing rustle of parchment.

A change now took place in the appearance of every one, and the business of the court fairly commenced.

Divested of all legal technicalities, Wild was indicted for privately stealing in the house of Catherine Stretham, in the parish of St. Andrew's, Holborn, fifty yards of lace, the property of the said Catherine Stretham, on the 22nd of January last past.

"The Attorney-General prosecutes on behalf of the Crown?" said the judge.

"I do, my lord," said the Attorney-General, standing up for a moment and then sitting down again.

"Who appears on behalf of the prisoner?" continued the judge.

There was a silence, and none of the counsel moved.

Then in a clear voice Jonathan said:

"I am innocent of the charge made against me, and so, with the permission of your lordship, I will conduct my own case."

"You are quite free to do as you like in that respect."

"Thank you, my lord!" said Wild, with great apparent respect.

The Attorney-General then rose and spoke as follows:

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—To-day, as you are aware, there stands before us, at the bar of this court, a prisoner of more than ordinary interest.

"This is no other than Jonathan Wild, who has for such a long time past represented himself as one of his Majesty's police officers.

"In my address to you, gentlemen of the jury, it is not my intention to enter at great length into the details of the prisoner's life; on the contrary, I shall confine myself as closely as I can to the charge I have to prefer against him.

"Still, it will be necessary, in order that the charge should be fully comprehended, that I should enter into some statements and place certain facts before you; in doing which, I will promise to occupy no more of your valuable time than I am compelled.

"And now for the facts.

"With some trouble, the following information has been procured, and I have no hesitation in giving you my assurance that all the particulars are quite correct.

"First, then: It can be proved that for many years past the prisoner at the bar has been a confederate with great numbers of highwaymen, housebreakers, shoplifters, and other thieves.

"Secondly: That he has formed a kind of corporation of thieves, of which he has been, and indeed is, the head or direct; and that, notwithstanding his pretended services in detecting and prosecuting offenders, as ingeniously set forth by the prisoner in the pamphlet he has had so industriously circulated, it can be proved upon evidence that he procured such only to be hanged as concealed their booty or refused to share it with him.

"Thirdly: It is a matter of certainty that he divided the town and country into so many districts, and appointed distinct gangs for each, who regularly accounted to him for their robberies; he employed also a particular set to steal in churches at the time of divine service, and likewise other moving detachments to attend at Court on birthdays, balls, &c., and at both Houses of Parliament, circuits, and country fairs.

"Fourthly: That the persons employed by him are, or have been, for the most part felons convict, who had returned from transportation before the time for which they had been transported had expired, and that he made choice of them to be his agents because they could not be legal evidences against him, and because he had it in his power to take from them what part of the stolen goods he thought fit, and otherwise use them ill or hang them as he pleased.

"Fifthly: That he has from time to time supplied such convict felons with money and clothes, and lodged them in his own house, the better to conceal them, particularly some against whom there are now informations for the counterfeiting and diminishing of broad pieces and guineas.

"Sixthly: That he has not only been a receiver of stolen goods, as well as of writings of all kinds, for nearly fifteen years past, but has frequently been the confederate and robber along with the above-mentioned convict felons.

"Seventhly: That in order to carry on these malpractices, and to gain some credit with the ignorant multitude, he usually carried a short silver staff as a badge of authority from the Government, which he used to produce when he himself was concerned in robbing.

"Eighthly: That he has, or had, under his care and direction several warehouses for receiving and concealing stolen goods, and also a ship for carrying off jewels, watches, and other valuable goods to Holland, where he had a superannuated thief for his factor.

"Ninthly: That he has kept in his pay several artists to make alterations and transform watches, seals, snuff-boxes, rings, and other valuable things, that they might not be known; several of which he used to present to such persons as he thought might be of service to him.

"Tenthly: That he seldom, if ever, helped the owners to the notes and papers they had lost, unless he found them able to specify and describe them, and then often insisted on more than half the value.

"Lastly: It appears that he has often sold human blood by procuring false evidence to swear persons into facts they were not guilty of, sometimes to prevent them from being evidences against him, and at other times for the sake of the great reward given by the Government.

"These, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, are the startling facts which have been elicited with respect to Jonathan Wild, and, as I have previously said, I can vouch for the truth of all that I have put forward.

"There are other facts which I do not mention, simply because I am not so certain about them, so we will let them pass.

"The charge against the prisoner is that of having stolen, from the house of Mrs. Catherine Stretham, a quantity of gold lace, and that he did commit this felony, I think I shall be able to prove to the satisfaction of all parties present. As I have already occupied a great deal of your time, I shall refrain from giving an outline of the circumstances, as I at first intended to do, but will at once proceed to call the witnesses, and the testimony they will give I hope will suffice to make the whole case quite clear to your minds.

"In conclusion, I have to perform the duty of reminding you that the charge upon which the prisoner is arraigned is one that affects his life. If he is proved guilty of the felony with which he is charged, sentence of death will be pronounced upon him.

"Therefore, gentlemen of the jury, it behoves you to listen with serious attention to the whole of the evidence. By your verdict you can take this man's life away, but after having done so you cannot restore it to him."

The Attorney-General sat down.

Many persons were surprised by the temperate manner in which he had made his speech, and wondered what could be the cause of it.

It is quite certain, however, that all that he did say with so much earnestness produced a very great effect, probably much more than if he had declaimed violently against the prisoner, and dwelt upon the enormity of the crimes he had committed.

CHAPTER CCCCXIII.

MR. HENRY KELLY IS EXAMINED BY THE JUNIOR COUNSEL, AND GIVES AN ACCOUNT OF THE ROBBERY ON HOLBORN HILL.

A JUNIOR counsel next rose.

He held a brief in his hand, to which he referred, and then said:

"Call Henry Kelly!"

"My lord," said Jonathan Wild, addressing the judge, "I wish to make a request."

"Speak."

"My lord, it is my intention, as I have before said, to defend myself. The charge against me is one which has been carefully got up by my enemies,—the tale they have to tell has been well drilled into them.

The judge interrupted him.

"You said you had a request to make. I cannot listen to any such statements as those you are now making. What is it you desire?"

"That the other witnesses, my lord, be ordered out of the court, and that no communication take place between them; I shall then have an opportunity of pointing out some glaring contradictions to your lordship, which I should not have if they were all in the court, because the one would swear to what the other had said."

"Your request is a reasonable one, and shall be granted."

The other witnesses were ordered from the court, and kept separate from each other.

Henry Kelly was placed in the witness-box.

His appearance was by no means prepossessing, for he seemed to be a terrible scoundrel.

His clothing was ragged and fitted him badly; his face had a sinister, brutal, and evil look; his hair was combed straight over his forehead, and cut quite level, leaving a small space between it and his eyebrows. At each side the hair was suffered to grow long, and upon these two locks he bestowed great care and attention, for as soon as he stood up in the witness-box he occupied himself by wetting his fingers with his lips, and then endeavouring to twist the harsh, wiry hair into a curl.

Wild knew the man well.

He was about the greatest villain and the most unmitigated scoundrel in the whole of his fraternity, which, seeing that the aforesaid fraternity was composed of all the ruffians in the kingdom, is saying a great deal.

Wild fixed his eyes upon this man, but Kelly would not look towards the dock for fear of catching sight of the thief-taker.

Jonathan had much to fear from the disclosures which this man might make, but he preserved a calm countenance, and set his brain to work to think of some means by which he could upset what he said.

It was evident that the appearance of this witness did not create an impression in his favour.

The Attorney-General hastily wrote a few words on a slip of paper, and handed it to the junior who was about to examine this witness.

"What is your name?"

"Henry Kelly."

"You know, of course, why you are here to-day?"

"Yes, sir; in connection with the box of gold lace."

"Just so."

The tin box was now produced and handed to the witness, who was requested to examine it.

He did so, and then the junior counsel continued:

"Have you seen that box before?"

"Yes, sir; it has been bruised and battered about a great deal. I should not like to swear to it, but yet in my own mind I feel sure it is the same."

"Well, now tell the Court all that you know in connection with this tin box, and the gold lace which it contains."

"Well, sir, and you, my lord, I hope what I say won't be taken down and used agen me."

"No; you are permitted to stand there as a King's evidence."

"Many thanks, sir."

"Now proceed, and, in as few words as you can, tell the Court what you know about this matter."

"It was somewhere about the twenty-first of last January that I saw Mr. Wild at his house, and we had some conversation together."

"What was the nature of that conversation?"

"Well, sir," said Kelly, with a grin, "it was of a private nature, you see. I am a poor man, under pecoiliar circumstances. I was so unfortunate as to have sentence passed upon me for fourteen years' transportation; but I didn't like my quarters, and as I had the opportunity, I made my escape and came back to London."

"Go on; it will be best for you to make a clean breast of the whole affair."

"I will do so, sir—many thanks to you. I came back to London, but I hardly dared show my face. I tried to get work, but couldn't because I had no k'racker, and I was frightened to death for anybody to look at me, because I thought they would know who I was. I was well-nigh starving, when I happened to meet with Mr. Wild, and so he gave me employment."

"In what way?"

"He used to tell me where there was a chance of getting some booty. I was forced into thieving again, but Mr. Wild promised to keep me clear of all harm."

"And what consideration did Mr. Wild require for that?"

"Eh, sir?"

"I mean, what did you have to pay him for this information?"

"Why, sir, if I took him twenty pounds' worth of swag, he might perhaps give me two guineas."

"And did you agree to such a bargain as that?"

"I was obleeged, sir; I could do nothing else."

"And this frequently happened, I suppose?"

"Oh yes! Me and Mr. Wild was friends for a goodish bit."

"Well, now, what about the twenty-first of January?"

"I saw Mr. Wild on that day—or about that day. It might have been the nineteenth; I won't swear to the exact day. However, I called upon him at his house, and asked him if he could put me up to any little job, as I was very bad off, not having had anything to do lately."

"And what did Mr. Wild say?"

"He told me he knew of a capital chance, that would suit me exactly, provided I could get a woman to assist."

"Well?"

"I said I could get a woman who would help, and then Mr. Wild told me that he had heard from good authority that Mrs. Stretham, of Holborn Hill, was in the habit of keeping a considerable quantity of gold lace in her shop, and proposed that we should try to get some of it."

"What next?"

"I axed Mr. Wild which would be the best way to manage the affair, and he said I should have to enter the shop with the woman, and pretend I wanted to purchase some lace, and take the opportunity of stealing some."

"And what part was Mr. Wild going to take in this transaction?"

"He was going to wait in the street, sir, just outside, in order to take all the swag we laid hold of, and to rescue us if we happened to be taken into custody. Mr. Wild is a very deep card—very!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, in the way he waited outside—because, if we had got out by ourselves and he hadn't seen us, we might have kept some lace, and only accounted to him for a portion of it."

"I see; that was a precaution he adopted." Then, turning to the jury, the junior counsel said:

"You see, gentlemen, that upon this point the evidence given by this witness quite bears out what has been stated to you."

Then, addressing Kelly, he said:

"We now want you to tell the Court what success you met with."

"Well, sir, I went into the shop along with a woman named Margaret Murphy, and pretended we wanted some lace. Mrs. Stretham, supposing us to be genuine customers, showed us a great deal; but we objected to all in some way or other, and left the shop without buying anything."

"And without taking anything?"

"Not 'zactly," said Kelly, with a satisfied chuckle at his own cleverness. "I took the opportunity to prig this ere tin box."

He put his hand on the article named as he spoke.

"Mrs. Stretham knew nothing about it, and we went out into the street."

"And was Mr. Wild waiting for you?"

"Yes; he came up to us in a moment, and asked for what we had got. I gave him the box, and he told us to call at his house in the course of an hour or two, and he would give us as much as he could."

"And did you go?"

"Yes, we went; and he said all he could afford to give was five guineas, which, after some objection, I took, because I couldn't get any more."

"And what did you do with the money?"

"I took three guineas and a crown for my share, and gave the rest to Margaret Murphy."

"And that settled the affair, I suppose? When did you hear any more about it?"

"Not till a few days ago, sir, when I was taken prisoner for being concerned in the robbery, and so was Margaret Murphy; but I was told if I came here into the witness-box, and made a clean breast of all from first to last, I should be held free from all trouble, and what I had done in the past should be overlooked."

"Very well—that will do. You can stand down, so far as I am concerned; but perhaps Mr. Wild has some questions to ask of you."

"Yes!" said the thief-taker, with such startling suddenness that it made Henry Kelly jump again. "I have got a few questions to ask, so the witness will please remain where he is for a little while."

Henry Kelly heaved a sigh, and stepped back into the witness-box.

He looked very uncomfortable, and he felt that the most disagreeable part of the business had yet to be gone through.

CHAPTER CCCCXIII.

CATHERINE STRETHAM'S EVIDENCE CONSIDERABLY DAMAGES WILD'S CASE.

DURING the investigation, so far as it had gone, Mr. Noakes had sat as usual in the little box-like place provided for his accommodation at the side of the dock.

Here he sat, the books and papers before him, but it was easy to see that he was in a very distressing state of mind.

Indeed, his perturbation was so great as to incapacitate him from performing his trifling duties.

He listened to every word that was uttered, feeling all the while as deeply interested as he possibly could have done had he been on his trial himself, and not his colleague, Jonathan Wild.

But although he listened with this intentness, he never once removed his eyes from the face and form of the thief-taker.

His gaze seemed fascinated.

It was but little that he was able to gather from the expression of Wild's countenance.

It remained perfectly inscrutable.

Of one thing, however, he was perfectly certain, and that was, that Mr. Wild was noting down every word uttered by the counsel and witnesses for the prosecution.

At last a moment came when Wild's face ceased to remain impassible.

Mr. Noakes noted the change, and understood perfectly well what it meant.

Jonathan's countenance had suddenly lighted up, and the Governor knew then that he had thought of something which would enable him to gain an advantage.

It was while Kelly was giving the latter part of his evidence that the thief-taker's countenance had lighted up in the manner we have described.

It was also clear to the Governor that Jonathan was doing his best to conceal from observation the satisfaction which he felt.

Poor Mr. Noakes, being aware how closely his own fate was mixed up in Wild's, wondered what this could be, and waited with great impatience in the hope that he should shortly hear.

He was not long kept in suspense.

Jonathan drew himself up to his full height when he announced his desire to question the witness, and his calm, defiant air much surprised those who were in the court.

He was perfectly collected.

Not a muscle wavered, and his voice was as steady as it was possible for a human voice to be.

"You have told the Court that your name is Henry Kelly," he began. "But that is not the name you have been convicted under, and you know it."

"Prisoner at the bar, you must conduct your cross-examination in a proper manner."

An angry reply rose to Wild's lips, but he suppressed it.

He was well aware that it would be extremely bad policy upon his part if he said anything to make the judge an enemy.

It was his most prudent and wisest course to conciliate him by every means that lay in his power.

"My lord," he said, "I was under the impression that I was conducting my cross-examination in a proper manner. I am sorry I am not, but you must not forget that I am not so calm as the other persons in the court, because I stand here on a charge that affects my life, and my enemies are as powerful as they are clever and unscrupulous."

This skilful appeal was not without its due effect.

Unpopular as he was, a faint hum of applause arose.

"Proceed, prisoner," said the judge, in a calmer voice. "I merely caution you."

Jonathan made a deep and most respectful bow.

Then, turning round to Kelly, he resumed his interrogation.

"You swear that I put you up to committing the robbery on Holborn Hill?"

"You know you did!"

"Do you swear to it?"

"Yes."

"That will do! That is just what I wanted! You swear that you and Margaret Murphy went inside the shop and stole the lace?"

"Yes!" said Kelly, eagerly.

"You swear to that?"

"I do."

"My lord," said the thief-taker, "might I presume so far as to call your lordship's attention to this statement? I shall want to refer to it by-and-by."

The judge wrote something down in his book.

Wild waited until he saw the pen cease to move, and then he continued:

"And you swear also that I was outside?"

"Yes."

"And where was I when you say you gave me the tin box?"

"Where?"

"Yes, where? At home?"

"No, in the street."

"In the street! I thought that was what you said, and you swear to it?"

"Oh yes!"

"You gave me the tin box containing the gold lace while I was standing in the street?"

"Yes."

"Then that is all the information I want from you, without, just for the satisfaction of his lordship and the gentlemen of the jury, you will say whereabouts in the street I was. Was it a mile from Mrs. Stretcham's?"

"No."

"How far, then? Five hundred yards?"

"It was about half a dozen houses off."

"Half a dozen houses off? That will do, and yet there is even one more question. By your own confession, you are a returned convict, and have committed numerous offences. Now, was not one of those offences the crime of perjury?"

Kelly was silent.

"Did you not swear away a man's life? Did you not stand in the witness-box, and take a solemn oath before God and man to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and did you not immediately utter statements that you knew perfectly well were false? Answer me that!"

"Ye—yes!" stammered Kelly.

"Now stand down."

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury, will you allow me to call your attention to these answers? Please bear in mind what he swears to, also that he admits having been convicted of the crime of perjury."

The junior counsel rose again and said:

"Call Margaret Murphy."

"Margaret Murphy!" cried the usher.

Considerable curiosity was manifested to catch sight of this witness.

Wild's cross-examination of Henry Kelly had been listened to with the most profound attention by all persons in the court.

Many were disappointed, for they had anticipated that Wild would attempt to confuse the witness in some way or other, instead of which he had simply called upon him to repeat what he had formerly said, and the most important admission appeared to be that he had been convicted of the crime of perjury.

The thief-taker's face wore a satisfied and triumphant expression, which, however, he tried hard to subdue.

All wondered at it, for they could not see what particular point he had gained in obtaining a repetition of the statements made by the witness.

A bustle at the door of the court now took place, and immediately afterwards Margaret Murphy was placed in the witness-box.

All eyes were turned towards her.

A more unprepossessing female could scarcely be imagined.

Her face was of a purplish red colour, and her cheeks and lips had an unpleasant, bloated appearance, while her eyes looked bleared and watery, as though she indulged very freely in spirituous liquors.

She made a succession of bobbing curtsies as soon as she was placed in the box, and she scarcely ceased while the crier administered the oath.

She kissed the greasy volume with a loud smack, as though she would show to the Court how emphatically she took the oath.

"Now, witness," said the junior counsel, "attend to me, if you please."

"Yes, your worship!"

"Don't 'worship' me, but just answer my questions! What is your name?"

"Margaret Murphy."

"Well, now, be good enough to turn round and look at that tin box at your side, and tell me whether you know anything about it."

Margaret Murphy glanced at the tin box and its contents, and turning round, nodded to the junior counsel.

"You know something about it, then?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then tell me all you know, in as few words as you can."

"This tin box, sir?—oh yes! But will what I say be taken down and used against me in evidence?"

"Certainly not. Speak out freely and openly, and then you will have nothing to fear."

"Well, sir, last Janniwerly Henry Kelly he comes to me and 'Margaret Murphy,' sez he, 'are you willing to do an easy job and come in for a good share of swag?' To the which I made answer and said, 'I am,' sez I, and sez he, 'Mr. Wild has put me up to a very good thing, only I can't carry it out without you will help me.'"

"Very good; and did Henry Kelly tell you what this little job was?"

"Yes, sir; sez he, 'Do you know that gold-lace shop on Holborn Hill?' To the which I answered and said, sez I, 'The one as is kept by Mrs. Stretham?' 'Yes,' sez he, 'I know it,' sez I. 'That is the crib,' sez he. 'We are to go inside and pretend to buy something, and carry off whatever we can lay our hands on.'"

"And you consented to this proposal, and agreed to accompany him?"

"You're as good as a witch, sir; I did that same. I went into the shop along with Kelly, and while he was pretending to buy something, I slipped this here tin box under my shawl, and we walked out into the street without anyone being the wiser but ourselves."

"And what did you do then?"

"Outside the shop, a few houses off, was Mr. Wild, and I gave him the box, and he told us to go to his house that same night, and he would see what the box was worth, and give us the money."

"Is that all?"

"That is all, sir."

"Prisoner," said the judge, "do you wish to ask this witness any questions?"

"If you please, my lord."

"Proceed, then."

Wild turned to Margaret Murphy.

"You know me, of course?" he said.

"Yes—you are Mr. Wild."

"I am, and I know you; you call yourself Margaret Murphy, but that isn't your name."

Then, turning to the jury, Jonathan said:

"Gentlemen, if you will be kind enough to refer to the list of persons convicted which I have circulated this morning, you will find the witness's name among the rest, and it will show that she has been seven times convicted. She is one of the most daring thieves in London, and is no more to be believed on her oath than the last witness, as any police officer will tell you."

"You must question the witness," said the judge, "and not make statements."

"I beg your pardon, my lord," said Wild, humbly,—"I forgot!"

Then, addressing Margaret Murphy, he said:

"You are a clever woman, and I feel pretty sure you have been well drilled into what you are going to say, so I shan't attempt to make you contradict yourself,—I merely wish to know whether you swear positively and distinctly that you gave me the box of lace while I was standing in the street at some distance from Mrs. Stretham's shop. Is that right? Do you swear to that?"

"Yes, I do. It is the truth, and you know it!"

"Never mind that. You are sure there is no mistake? I was not in the shop with you, was I?"

"No, you were outside."

"That will do, then. I have no more questions to ask."

Margaret Murphy stepped out of the witness-box with great briskness.

She was heartily glad her part was over.

Jonathan Wild had not exaggerated her character, and she was executed about three years afterwards for stealing plate.

CHAPTER CCCCXCIV.

IN WHICH JONATHAN WILD MAKES A SPEECH FOR HIS DEFENCE.

CATHERINE STRETHAM was the next witness called.

Upon entering the box, the usual preliminaries were gone through, and she was requested to turn to the box of gold lace on the table at her side.

She looked at the contents, and swore positively that the gold lace was her property; she also believed that the box was hers, but could not swear to it in consequence of its altered condition.

"Now, Mrs. Stretham," said the junior counsel, "be good enough to tell the Court the whole of the particulars connected with the loss of your property."

"It was between three and four o'clock on the afternoon of the 22nd of January last," commenced Mrs. Stretham, "that a man and a woman came into my shop, pretending that they wanted to purchase some lace. I showed them two or three parcels, to the quality and price of which they objected, and finally left the shop without making any purchase whatever. In about three or four hours after they left the shop I missed the box containing a quantity of lace, which is worth about fifty pounds."

"That will do," said the junior counsel,—"nothing could be more straightforward or simple."

"Do you wish to ask this witness any questions, prisoner?" said the judge.

"I do, my lord, if you will permit it."

"Say on—it is your right."

"Now, ma'am," said the thief-taker, turning to the witness-box,—"be good enough to take a good look at me!"

He put on a ferocious expression of countenance as he spoke.

"Now," he said, "do you know me?"

"I do,—you are Jonathan Wild!"

"Quite right! Now, I wish you to remember very particularly whether I ever came into your shop in the whole course of my life. Can you remember my having done so?"

"I cannot."

"Perhaps you would not mind swearing that I have not entered your house at all this year?"

"I will swear that," said Mrs. Stretham, "because I am quite sure you have not."

"Very well, then, that is all I wish to know."

"That is the case for the prosecution," said the Attorney-General, rising from his seat as Mrs. Stretham left the witness-box.

Everyone was now prepared to listen to the defence which Jonathan Wild was about to make.

Wild paused a moment.

Then, amid the breathless silence in the court, he spoke as follows:—

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—I stand here before you at the bar of this court on a charge of which if I am found guilty I shall have to expiate with my life.

"But, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, I am not guilty, and I trust I shall be able, without putting your patience to a very severe trial, to prove conclusively that I am innocent.

"I ask only that which I am sure to get from a jury composed of my fellow-countrymen—namely, a fair and impartial hearing.

"As all the world knows, for very many years past I have fulfilled the duties of police officer, in a more energetic and satisfactory manner than anyone else has ever done. I do not say this boastfully; and if it is doubted, I have only to refer you to one of the printed lists, which will prove the truth of what I say. In brief, I am the victim of a conspiracy, and one so artfully planned and carefully got up, that I am afraid innocence would stand but a poor chance of escaping the penalty which is due only to guilt.

"It was my misfortune to come under the notice of his Majesty's late Government, and the Secretary of State made use of me to perform several acts of a secret nature. I consented; not from any willingness on my part, but because I felt it was my duty, as an officer of the Crown, to obey the commands of those who were in a position superior to mine, and who would, I imagined, be responsible and answerable for what I did.

"To put it out of my power to betray any of the secrets with which I am acquainted, this prosecution has been got up against me.

"In my own mind I have not the slightest doubt that the two witnesses examined before you—namely, Henry Kelly and Margaret Murphy—were indeed and in truth guilty of the robbery of Mrs. Stretham's gold lace.

"Their evidence, so far as relates to the stealing of the lace, may, I think, be relied upon and considered as correct; but beyond that point all is farce. The tale about the delivery of the box to me, and my appointment with them, is a fiction, as also is the statement made by Kelly, who says that I instigated him to commit the crime.

"It would be easy to understand how any unscrupulous persons having the groundwork of a robbery to go upon would be able to add the little embellishments which I have mentioned, and which, if they could get a jury to believe them, would cause the conviction they very much desired to get me out of the way.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury, it is my hope and my belief that your brains are clear and your judgments clear. If they are you will not allow yourselves to be stultified by this spurious evidence. I repeat my assertion that I am innocent of the whole charge preferred against me; but, gentlemen of the jury, you will say that my assertion of innocence is not sufficient, and that a proof of it is required.

"Alas, I have no proof! It would be difficult to prove the correctness of many things; but there is one circumstance—one trifling thing which, in their damaging cleverness, the prosecution has overlooked—just such a one as one would imagine likely to be overlooked; for, gentlemen of the jury, I do not believe it possible for any human beings to get up a case against another human being with all the points, however so minute, being perfectly accurate—they are sure to overlook some trifling thing, or some trifling thing escapes their notice, which proves that the whole is false, and no more than a base conspiracy to deprive a fellow-creature of his life.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury, my profession is that of police officer or thief-taker, and in that capacity I have had many opportunities of seeing how business in this court is conducted, and it is for that reason that, feeling my innocence, I made so bold as to undertake my own defence, and to address you on the present occasion.

"But although I know something, I don't know all. I am not a lawyer, and therefore should not be able to avail myself of various little facts so well as an experienced counsel would.

"In conclusion, for instance, I have something important—vitally important—to say, but I don't know how to say it."

Jonathan Wild paused.

The jury looked at each other, and wondered, now they had heard him speak, whether the prisoner really was guilty, as they had before believed him to be.

The judge, however, did not seem to be much impressed with Jonathan's remarks.

It was clear the judge had already arrived at a decision in the case.

He believed the prisoner to be guilty.

Upon hearing these last words spoken by the prisoner, he fixed his eyes upon him and said:

"Your life is at stake, and therefore all who have to decide upon your fate will listen with patience and attention to what remarks you have to make. What is it that you desire to say?"

"My lord, it is something upon which my fate hangs—it is the turning-point of this case; but I don't know how to bring it about; there is one means, but I am afraid that is irregular."

"What is it? Speak! If it is possible, it shall be done!"

"I am deeply indebted to your lordship. What I wished was, that the indictment recorded against me should be read, in order that I and the gentlemen of the jury should comprehend the exact charge against me."

"There is no obstacle to reading that portion of the indictment. It shall be done."

"Many thanks, my lord. Now I shall be able to make my innocence apparent."

At a sign from the judge, the Clerk of Arraignment rose with the parchment on which the indictment against him was written, in his hand.

All in the court seemed to hold their breaths, so full of suspense did they feel to know what would be the important fact which Jonathan Wild desired to elicit.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the Clerk of Arraignment, "the indictment against you is to the effect that on the twenty-second of January last you did privately steal in the house of Catherine Stretham, in the parish of Saint Andrew's, Holborn, fifty yards of gold lace, the property of the said Catherine Stretham, the value of which is fifty pounds."

The thief-taker's countenance flushed with triumph.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury," he said, speaking in a much louder tone than he had hitherto done, "you hear that the indictment charges me with stealing that tin box containing the gold lace."

"But, gentlemen of the jury, you will see at a glance that the charge against me falls to the ground. I am not guilty of this robbery, and it has been proved to you in evidence."

"The witness, Margaret Murphy, swears that she stole the box of gold lace, and that at the time when she stole it the only persons who were in the shop besides herself were Henry Kelly and Mrs. Stretham."

"How, then, can I be guilty of privately stealing in the house of Catherine Stretham? That lady has sworn to you that never to her knowledge have I stood in her shop at all."

"Gentlemen of the jury, this is often the case when false charges are brought against a man—something or other is sure to turn up and destroy their plan entirely."

"As I remarked a little while ago, I have no doubt that, in confessing to the robbery of the gold lace, the two witnesses Kelly and Murphy spoke nothing but the truth. What I say is this, even if the box was delivered to me in the street—but it was not—still, if it was, I should not be guilty of the charge of privately stealing in the dwelling-house of Catherine Stretham!"

CHAPTER CCCXC.

SENTENCE OF DEATH IS PASSED UPON JONATHAN WILD.

MANY a lawyer seated in the court looked with admiring eyes upon Jonathan Wild during the time he was making this speech for his defence.

They were amazed at the cleverness which he had displayed, and could not help confessing to themselves that, trained as they had been to the legal profession, they could not have seized upon a flaw in the indictment with more skill and effect than he did.

A decided effect was produced.

The statements which Jonathan Wild had put forth could not be gainsaid. The evidence was as clear as noon-day, that, let the prisoner have been guilty of what crimes he may, he certainly had not committed a robbery in the house of Catherine Stretham.

The expression of the judge's countenance showed how much astonished he was, and he turned over his notes hastily in order to conceal his confusion.

There was but one course open for his adoption, so he commenced summing up as follows:—

"Gentlemen of the jury,—You have heard, and no doubt have weighed well, the peculiar evidence which has been laid before you relating to this extraordinary case."

"That the lace was stolen is certain, and by the confession of one of the witnesses we know who it was that actually committed the act."

"In my opinion the guilt of the prisoner is a point beyond all dispute, but as a similar case to the present one is not to be found in any law books, it becomes my duty to act with great caution. It is clear that the prisoner cannot be legally convicted, because the indictment positively expresses that he stole the lace in the house, whereas it has been proved in evidence that he was at a considerable distance when the act was committed. It is possible that he may have been liable to conviction as an accessory before the fact, or guilty of receiving the property knowing it to be stolen, but he cannot be deemed guilty of a capital felony unless the indictment declare, as the act directs, that he did assist, command, or hire."

"Gentlemen of the jury, under these circumstances, as the life of a fellow-creature is at stake, I cannot do otherwise than recommend the prisoner to your mercy."

The judge ceased, and the jury consulted eagerly together.

Great confusion now prevailed in the court; everyone seemed to have something to say.

But the thief-taker himself was not more rejoiced at the turn which affairs had taken than was Mr. Noakes, the governor of the prison.

He leaned back in his chair with a smile of complacency and content on his face.

At last, as he fancied, he saw the way out of all those difficulties which had troubled him. Jonathan Wild would be brought in not guilty; he was almost sure of that after the manner in which the judge had summed up—he would be set at liberty, and then he would have no further trouble.

Jonathan drew himself up to his full height, and looked proudly and defiantly around him. His gaze was particularly concentrated upon the jury-box.

The twelve men seated there were busily engaged in chatting to each other, and though the case appeared so clear, there was evidently some diversity of opinion among them.

At last they all seated themselves properly, and silence having been restored, the Clerk of Arraignment rose and put the usual question:

"Gentlemen of the jury, are you agreed upon your verdict?"

The foreman rose and replied:

"We are."

"Do you find the prisoner guilty or not guilty?"

Amid an intense stillness the foreman replied:

"Not guilty."

A loud cry of triumph came from the lips of the thief-taker when he heard the words pronounced; he could not repress it, although he felt almost certain what the verdict of the jury would be.

He imagined now that all was clear, and that all he had to do was to go through a few forms and receive his liberty.

But his exultation received a sudden check.

Order was demanded, and then the judge said:

"Prisoner at the bar, a jury composed of your own countrymen have brought you in not guilty of the charge preferred against you in the indictment. It is with considerable reluctance that I admit the justice of that verdict; they could not do otherwise than bring you in not guilty. By the expression of your face, I can tell you imagine you have gained a great victory, and that now no obstacle intervenes between you and liberty; but there is another indictment against you, upon which you will stand to take your trial to-morrow; if you can prove yourself not guilty of that, then you will be set at liberty."

Jonathan's jaw fell, and so did the Governor's. Their faces assumed a totally different expression to what they had worn a moment ago, and Jonathan Wild, as he clutched the front of the dock convulsively, wished from the bottom of his heart that it was the judge's throat that he had got such a firm hold of.

He made several attempts to speak, and some time elapsed before he was successful.

Then he said:

"My lord, I imagined that this was the sole charge against me, but I perceive now that my persecutors—not prosecutors—are determined to carry their point at all risks. I did not know there was a second indictment against me, and consequently I had not prepared any defence."

"The nature of the indictment shall be explained to you," replied the judge, "and you will have the time between now and the opening of the court to-morrow to prepare your defence."

"What is the nature, then, of this second indictment?"

"You are charged with receiving money from Catherine Stretham under the pretence of restoring to her the property that had been stolen."

Upon hearing these words, Jonathan's countenance brightened.

"And is that the only other charge you have against me?" he asked.

"It is."

"And if I prove myself not guilty of that, shall I be set at liberty?"

"Certainly."

"Then I wish you would try me now, and save me the disagreeableness of passing another night in a Newgate cell."

His confident tone amazed all, and the general impression was that he would get off.

"Your trial stands adjourned until the opening of the court to-morrow morning," said the judge, calmly.

"Many thanks, your lordship—I am much obliged to you for the forbearance which you have shown to me, and I am sorry that you should be impressed with the notion that I am guilty. I repeat again, I am the victim of a base conspiracy."

Jonathan was then removed from the dock, and as the day was almost gone, the business of the court was adjourned until the morrow.

It was, however, with a light elastic tread that Jonathan Wild descended the steps leading from the floor of the dock, and accompanied the turnkeys to the door of his cell.

He entered, and the door was closed behind him, but he cared not—his heart was elate with victory.

"I knew I should triumph," he said, with a chuckling laugh, as he paced rapidly up and down his cell. "I shall yet rise above my enemies, and cover them with confusion. After this affair my power will be greater than ever; people will be afraid to attack me. Ah yes! desperate as the affair once looked, I am now convinced that everything will turn out for the best."

The thief-taker was too excited to remain still.

"Bah!" he said, "the charge which they are laying against me to-morrow is utterly beneath my contempt—I despise it, and it shows to what shifts they are driven, or else they would never attempt to obtain my conviction upon such a paltry charge."

Later in the evening, the Governor of Newgate paid his prisoner a visit.

He found him in better spirits than ever, and Mr. Noakes himself was quite overjoyed.

"Let me congratulate you, my dear Mr. Wild," he said, as soon as he entered the cell,—"let me congratulate you upon the signal victory which you have this day obtained over your foes; their defeat is utter—complete!"

"It is," said the thief-taker, with triumphant joy, "and to-morrow will but serve to witness a victory more signal still."

"I rejoice to hear you say as much, Mr. Wild. I have great faith in you, and more now than ever. I hope this will be the last night in Newgate."

"So do I, though I comprehend full well why you say it."

"Don't be unjust, Mr. Wild—don't be unjust. I have behaved towards you as well as I have been able, and I am sure your wishes and my hopes coincide."

"Yes—I shall be free to-morrow," said Wild—"never fear for that; and even if the offence is proved, it is not a capital offence; I shall only receive some light punishment. But it will not be proved; after surmounting such difficulties as I have to-day, is it likely that I shall be overcome by something which, in comparison, is insignificant?"

"I don't think it at all likely, and feel more certain than ever that to-morrow will see you a free man and with liberty to go wherever you choose."

"I feel so too."

"Is there anything I can do for you, Mr. Wild—is there nothing you wish? I am entirely at your commands."

"No, no—there is nothing," returned the thief-taker, "without you can send me some substantial meal. I don't feel in want of food, but still it is necessary that I should appear before my enemies fresh and vigorous."

"It would be much the best."

"Then bring me in a good supper—that is all I require. In a few days, Mr. Noakes, I shall be able to reward you for the kindness and consideration you have shown."

The Governor and Jonathan seemed inclined to be on mighty good terms with each other, and when they separated their ugly countenances were quite radiant with smiles.

Jonathan Wild made an alarming supper and drank a great quantity, but no effect seemed to be produced upon him.

Never in the whole course of his life had he been in such a state of feverish excitement.

He lay down on the couch, but could only obtain a little sleep—his brain was by far too active.

To his infinite relief, morning came at length.

"A few hours now," he said, "will see me at liberty. I shall be free to carry on those schemes and work out those plans which I had conceived and resolved to execute. I shall be free to adopt such measures as will bring me a full revenge upon all my foes. Not one shall escape. All shall suffer—all shall rue the hour when they opposed themselves to me and tried to bring me to death!"

"This charge is a ridiculous one—it has never been preferred against anybody, and if it is proved, they would do nothing that will distress me; at the worst, they may sentence me to a few months' imprisonment, and if they do that, well then I shall have all the more favourable opportunity for thinking over the means by which I can carry out my revenge."

CHAPTER CCCCXCVI.

JONATHAN WILD TAKES HIS TRIAL UPON THE SECOND INDICTMENT.

JUST before the hour for opening the court arrived, a fresh thought recurred to Jonathan Wild, which caused him very great uneasiness.

How it was he could scarcely tell, but his thoughts went back to that time when he had the interview with Lord Ingestre concerning the diamond necklace.

The words which his lordship had uttered when he had handed over to the thief-taker such a large sum of money came forcibly back to him.

The reader will probably remember that the nobleman in question expressed a great amount of dissatisfaction at the existing state of the law.

He had announced his intention of having the subject brought before Parliament, in order that he might try to put an end to such iniquitous traffic between thieves and the thief-takers.

Whether his lordship had carried out his threat—whether the law had recently been altered—Jonathan Wild did not know, but he could not help thinking that if the alteration had been made, his position was a thousand times more dangerous than he had imagined it to be.

The more he thought over this subject, the more unpleasant and alarming did it become, and he ended at last by heartily wishing that he had not been so confident in his own powers as he had been, but that he had taken the opportunity of the preceding night to make his escape from the prison.

It was too late for that now, however; he had chosen to stand his ground, and it was too late to commence—every instant he expected to receive the summons to proceed to the court.

He remembered, too, that a change in Government had taken place, and that the officials connected with it were not at all in his power, and there was no knowing what lengths they might have gone to in order to get the law altered.

Jonathan worked himself up into a very uncomfortable state of mind.

All his confidence was destroyed, and he looked forward to the trial with feelings of great suspense and dread.

The noise produced by the removal of the fastenings of his cell door roused him from the kind of reverie into which he had fallen.

Raising his head, he saw that it was his old friend the Governor who had just entered.

At the same time he perceived that the expression of Mr. Noakes's face had undergone an alteration as complete as his own.

Starting to his feet, he exclaimed suddenly:

"Something is amiss—what is it? Speak out at once—what has happened?"

"Nothing—nothing," returned the Governor, nervously—"at least, nothing of any moment."

"Then why do you look like that? You have heard some bad news. Make haste and let me know what it is!"

"I have received a few hints, Mr. Wild—very disagreeable hints—and the reason I have come here is in order to make you acquainted with them. I don't know whether there is any real cause for alarm. I hope there is not."

"Speak out!—don't talk in that roundabout fashion!"

"Well, then, I have heard—but I don't know how true it is—that some new or special Act of Parliament has been framed, or some clause added to an existing act, in order to meet your case."

"I dreaded as much—I have feared it nearly all the morning. Why did you not tell me this last night?"

"I did not know it until a few minutes ago, and as soon as I received the intelligence, I hastened to tell it to you."

"Thanks—thanks! but this has quite unsettled me. But I will not be cast down. Difficult as my position seems to be, I don't consider it so perilous as it was yesterday, and it may be that I shall be equally successful."

"Have you prepared your defence?"

"I have arranged a general outline of what I shall say, but I can't tell what alterations it may be subject to—things may take a different turn to what I expect. I shall be on the look-out, as I was yesterday, in order to avail myself of any little thing which may turn up likely to prove to my advantage."

"I should not suffer this intelligence to trouble me so much," said Mr. Noakes, after a pause. "I think we have both alarmed ourselves unnecessarily. However, I will go back, and if I can learn anything further about this matter, you shall be immediately acquainted with it without delay."

"How long will it be before the court opens?"

"A quarter of an hour at the outside."

The Governor departed, and Wild assumed an attitude of the deepest reflection.

The more he thought, however, and the better he recollected Lord Inglesire's manner when he paid the money for the restoration of the diamond necklace, the more convinced he became that the law had been altered.

"Perhaps," he murmured, "they have framed a clause so as to make it a capital offence. I fancy it must be, or they would never have taken the trouble upon this second indictment. Ah well, it is no matter! I am prepared for the worst, and if I can come off best in the contest, why then there will be all the more honour and credit due to my abilities."

In less than a quarter of an hour the turnkeys entered the cell and led the prisoner to the court.

As before, he had to wait some time upon the leads before his name was called, and, as on the preceding morning, he occupied himself in distributing the pamphlets he had had printed.

They were in more active demand than before—nearly everyone seemed anxious to possess one.

Jonathan Wild did not think the reason was because they looked upon him as a doomed man, and wished to preserve some relic of so extraordinary a criminal.

Foolish as it may seem, this desire upon the part of the people to possess his tract put Wild in better spirits, and he began to return to his original frame of mind, and to think that after all he would get off.

At last his name was called out, but long before this happened he had given away every pamphlet he had left.

Once more he resumed his old place in the dock.

Once more he looked around him at the mass of people. But he did not feel half so interested as he had done; the novelty of the thing had worn off.

With some difficulty silence was obtained, and then, as the jury had already been sworn, and as the judge had taken his seat, the case was at once proceeded with.

The chaplain of the prison, the Lord Mayor, and two of the sheriffs took their seats upon the bench beside the judge, and when he perceived this, Jonathan was aware that it was expected that day's proceedings would be of a very interesting character indeed.

In the same gabbling voice as before, the Clerk of Arraignment rose and read over the second indictment.

Jonathan strained his ears to the utmost, and strove to catch every syllable, and though he to some extent succeeded, he was so confused with the mass of legal jargon with which the indictment was overwhelmed that he found himself unable to comprehend the true spirit of it.

As on the previous day, he pleaded not guilty in a loud voice when the question was put to him by the Clerk of Arraignment.

With the deepest interest and curiosity Wild looked forward for the counsel for the prosecution to commence his speech. That and that alone would enable him to come to a correct conclusion as regarded his position.

He was not kept long in suspense, for the Attorney-General rose and spoke as follows:—

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—This second indictment against the prisoner at the bar is one of a peculiar nature, and I shall have to request that you will pay more than usual attention to my statement of facts."

"I shall confine myself to the same course of action that I adopted yesterday; that is to say, I shall not make a speech for the mere sake of displaying my powers of oratory, nor shall I dwell in a vague manner upon the enormity of the crimes which the prisoner has committed, and which have nothing to do with the case now under consideration. I shall simply confine myself to a recapitulation of hard facts. It will be necessary for you to treasure them up in your memory, and when the time comes for the prisoner to defend himself, you will have to decide whether he disproves those facts or not."

"In the first place, as to the nature of the offence."

"The prisoner is charged with taking a reward from Mrs. Catherine Strettham, under the pretence of restoring to her possession the box of gold lace which had been stolen from her."

"This indictment is framed upon an Act of Parliament which has recently been passed."

"You must understand, gentlemen of the jury, that I made some statements yesterday with respect to the proceedings of the prisoner at the bar."

"For very many years past he has carried on a large trade, the nature of which, though scandalous to a degree, has been highly profitable to him."

"To such an extent did he carry these practices that it was deemed advisable to draw up a fresh Act of Parliament, simply with a view to meet his case, of causing him to be punished, and to serve to deter other people from following in his footsteps."

"And now to give you an idea of the manner in which Jonathan Wild carried on his business while pretending to be a police officer and an apprehender of thieves."

"In his employ he had numerous men who committed robberies of every description. These men were all more or less in his power, and frequently so situated that they could not give any evidence against him whatever."

"These men would go out night after night upon plundering expeditions, and such booty as they managed to obtain they brought to the prisoner at the bar, who, receiving it, paid them a certain amount, and the next day proceeded to negotiate with the people who had lost their property, and inform them in what manner they might get it back."

"To make this quite clear, I will give you a case in point."

CHAPTER CCCCXVII.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS THE STATEMENTS MADE BY THE COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION EXCEEDINGLY DISAGREEABLE.

THE counsel for the prosecution paused a moment, and then resumed:

"The wife of a nobleman happening to be at a ball or party, discovered, when the time came for her to leave, that she had lost a diamond necklace of great value.

"She could not remember how or when she had lost it, but an immediate alarm was raised, close search was made, but not a trace of the missing necklace could be seen.

"One of Jonathan Wild's emissaries, known by the nickname of Pinching Tom, has confessed that he stole the necklace in question. Within a few hours after he had obtained possession of it, he went to Jonathan Wild's house, in Newgate Street, and offered it to him.

"Jonathan took the necklace, and offered Pinching Tom fifty pounds for it.

"As the necklace was composed of diamonds, and worth between four and five thousand pounds, the thief thought this sum too small, but offered to be content if Wild would give him one hundred pounds.

"This sum was refused, and he demanded the necklace back again.

"But Jonathan Wild refused to deliver it, and having asked him whether he would take fifty pounds, and having been replied to in the negative, he caused Pinching Tom to be imprisoned in one of the cells beneath his house, from which he did not release him for some time, and when the cell door was opened Pinching Tom was only too glad to escape with his life; and so you see, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, Jonathan Wild got this very valuable diamond necklace for nothing.

"And now the next thing I have to tell you is what Jonathan did with it—how he acted, and what money he made by the transaction.

"A short time afterwards, the nobleman whose wife the necklace belonged to was persuaded to go to Jonathan Wild.

"He did so, and although it is quite certain that at that very moment the prisoner at the bar had the diamond necklace in his possession, yet he pretended to know nothing about it, but very artfully said he would make inquiries, and, if he possibly could, would recover possession of the jewel.

"Jonathan Wild represented to the nobleman that the man who had stolen the necklace was doubtless somewhere quite safe, and would not feel inclined to part with the article unless he received something very handsome in return.

"In short, he told the nobleman that if he persisted in bringing the thief to justice, he would never see his diamond necklace any more; but if he was willing to offer a reward for it, and ask no questions, why then it was possible the necklace might be recovered.

"After a lengthened conversation, the nobleman reluctantly consented to adopt this course, and his reasons for doing so were not on account of the value of the article itself, but because it had been in the possession of his family for many generations, and he did not wish to part with it.

"And now comes the most astounding part of the business. You will scarcely believe what sum Jonathan Wild proposed that the nobleman should offer for the return of the necklace.

"That amount was no less than three thousand pounds.

"Gentlemen of the jury, you may well start upon receiving such an announcement as that,—it is nevertheless true.

"The behaviour of the prisoner has been described by this nobleman as artful to a degree.

"He pretended that he did not know whether he should be able to obtain the necklace at all—whether the holder of it would feel disposed to surrender it for the sum of three thousand pounds. He said that he would try his best, and would offer the reward.

"Now, all this while the audacious prisoner had the diamond necklace in his possession—perhaps it was in his coat pocket, and very likely his hand was upon it several times during the conversation.

"In order not to excite suspicion, this nobleman had to call repeatedly at the thief-taker's residence.

"On each occasion he was told that the reward for the recovery of the necklace had been offered, but had produced no effect.

"At last he was informed that the necklace had been recovered, and Jonathan restored it to him, with the assurance that he had been compelled to pay every penny of the three thousand pounds to the man who had stolen the necklace, or rather to an intermediate agent that the thief had employed.

"Thus, you see, the nobleman had no other resource but to give Jonathan Wild the three thousand pounds, and receive his necklace in return; and then—if I may so speak about so serious a matter—the cream of the joke was that Jonathan Wild represented he had not only been at great trouble and personal inconvenience himself in the matter, but had also been at some expense in bribing different people, and had lost a great deal of his own time. For these services he professed himself unwilling to make any charge, but added, he should be quite content to leave the affair to the generosity of his noble patron; and so Jonathan Wild netted something extra, over and above the three thousand pounds.

"Now, that will give you an idea of the manner in which Jonathan Wild has carried on his business, and he must have amassed an immense sum of money in this way.

"As may be supposed, the nobleman of whom I have been speaking felt much exasperated to think he should have to pay so dearly for his necklace, and to think he should also be obliged to encourage thieving in such a manner, and he resolved to bring the matter before the Legislature.

"He has done so, and the result is an Act of Parliament, from which I will now read one clause that applies to the particular case under investigation."

The counsel for the prosecution took up a book, and read as follows:—

"And whereas there are certain persons who have secret acquaintance with felons, and who make it their business to help persons to their stolen goods, and by that means gain money from them, which is divided between them and the felons, whereby they greatly encourage such offenders: Be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that whenever any person taketh money or reward, directly or indirectly, under pretence or upon account of helping any person or persons to any stolen goods or chattels, every such person so taking money or reward as aforesaid (unless such person apprehend, or cause to be apprehended, such felon who stole the same, and give evidence against him) shall be guilty of felony according to the nature of the felony committed in stealing such goods, and in such and the same manner as any such offender had stolen such goods and chattels, and in the manner and with such circumstances as the same were stolen."

The counsel closed the book.

"You see, gentlemen of the jury," he said, "that this clause was expressly framed in order to bring to justice such offenders as the prisoner at the bar.

"It will be proved before you in evidence that Jonathan Wild received from Catherine Stretham certain sums of money upon the pretext of getting back the lace which had been stolen from her shop.

"I shall be able to conclusively prove that the prisoner at the bar had secret acquaintance with felons—that he made it his business to help persons to regain their stolen goods, and, instead of bringing the thieves to justice, shared with them the money thus obtained.

"If, then, gentlemen of the jury, you find that the prisoner at the bar has been guilty of thus proceeding, it will amount to a felony, and you will have to give your verdict accordingly. I need scarcely remind you that it is your duty to weigh the evidence most carefully, for if the prisoner is found guilty, sentence of death will be passed upon him."

The Attorney-General sat down, and the same junior counsel rose to examine the witnesses.

During this speech, and during the reading of the clause from the Act of Parliament, Jonathan Wild had felt exceedingly uncomfortable.

He saw that he would have the greatest difficulty in rebutting this charge; still he did not despair of doing so, although as yet he had not been able to detect any flaw, as he had done on the former occasion.

He listened to the account given by the counsel of the loss and recovery of the diamond necklace, and wished most heartily that he had never seen it.

Very little time was allowed him for reflection, however.

He was compelled to take notice of all that was going on around him, and, without making any pause, the junior counsel cried out:

"Call Mrs. Stretham!"

CHAPTER CCCCXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD DOES NOT EFFECT MUCH GOOD BY HIS CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. STRETHAM.

MRS. STRETHAM was once more placed in the witness-box, and the oath was administered to her.

She was very pale, and her whole manner betrayed the greatest agitation.

No one could wonder at it, for she knew full well that the words she spoke would cause a fellow-creature to be doomed to death.

This was by no means a pleasant thought for her to have; and had the matter rested with her, Jonathan Wild would have got out of his trouble easily.

"Is your name Catherine Stretham?" asked the junior counsel.

"It is."

"On the twenty-second of January last, a tin box containing gold lace was stolen from you, under circumstances which you described yesterday?"

"Yes, sir, that is quite right."

"Well, now, I want you to inform the Court what you did—what steps you took upon discovering that the lace had been stolen."

Mrs. Stretham hesitated, and seemed very disinclined to speak.

"You have taken an oath," said the junior counsel, "to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and it is your duty to abide by the oath that you have taken, therefore I again wish you to tell the Court what steps you took after you discovered the robbery."

"It was not until the shop was shut up that I found the lace had been stolen, and how I came to discover it then was in consequence of a habit I have of going over the different things in my shop, in order to make sure everything is correct before locking up."

"Well, what did you do?"

"I was much put about, as you may think, for I am a poor woman, and have only the shop to depend upon, and the loss of fifty pounds' worth of gold lace was more than I could bear. I tried to think what had become of it and when I saw it last, and then I remembered the two people who had come into the shop, and at once came to the conclusion that they were guilty."

"Go on, please."

"I asked my neighbours what I had better do, and they advised me to go to a printer, and have a bill issued offering a reward of ten pounds for the recovery of the lace. This I did the following morning—the bills were distributed."

"It produced no effect. No one made any inquiries about it, and so I asked my neighbours what I should do next."

"And what did they advise you to do this time?"

"Some one thing and some another, but most said that the best thing I could do would be to go to Jonathan Wild, who lived in Newgate Street, and who was very clever in recovering property that had been stolen."

"And did you follow this advice?"

"Yes—I went to Mr. Wild's house, and saw him. I told him my business, and described as well as I could the personal appearance of those I imagined had been guilty of the theft."

"And now be careful!—please to tell the Court what Jonathan Wild said."

"He asked me whether I had offered a reward, and I told him yes. He then wanted to know the amount, and I told him ten pounds. Upon hearing this, he shook his head and said it was not enough. I told him I was very anxious to recover possession of my property, and said I would not mind offering a still larger reward to get the lace back if he thought I stood the least chance of doing so."

"Continue, please."

Mrs. Stretham paused every now and then, and it was clear to all the persons in the court that she was giving her evidence with very great reluctance.

"He advised me to offer a reward of fifteen guineas, with the condition that if the lace was returned no questions were to be asked, and I was to rest satisfied. The great desire I had to diminish my loss as much as possible caused me to consent to these terms, and accordingly I offered a reward of fifteen guineas."

"He promised to do his best to assist me, and said he would make every inquiry. Finally, he told me to call upon him again in the course of two or three days, when he hoped he should have some satisfactory information to give me."

"You went, of course?"

"Yes, I went, and he told me he had learned something about my goods, and expected more particular information in a short time. During this conversation we were joined by a man who said he had reason to suspect that one Kelly, who had been tried for circulating plated shillings, was concerned in stealing the lace. Mr. Wild then stated that the chief obstacle in getting back my goods was the smallness of the reward. I told him I was poor, but yet I so much desired to get my lace back again that I said I would not mind giving twenty guineas."

"And what did Mr. Wild say to that?"

"As before, he promised to make every inquiry, and said he would get the lace back if it was possible."

"And did he succeed in doing so?"

"No. I went again, when he told me he had had an interview with a man who knew the thieves, and that this man had stated to him that the thieves would not surrender the property for less than five-and-twenty guineas. This amount, after some hesitation, I consented to give. I handed it to Mr. Wild, and he undertook that my lace should be delivered at my shop in the course of a couple of hours."

"I then asked him what recompense he expected for the trouble he had taken."

"And he answered as nearly as I can remember in the following words:

"Not a farthing. I have no interested views in matters of this kind, but act from the principle of serving people under misfortune. For the service I can render you I shall only expect your prayers, for I have many enemies; but we will talk further upon this matter. I will call upon you to-morrow morning, after you have received the lace."

"And what took place next?"

"I went home and sat up all night, expecting every moment that the tin box containing the lace would arrive; but no box came. In the morning I expected to see Mr. Wild, and so I had patience, but he did not come, and then I heard that a warrant had been issued for his apprehension, and that he had fled no one knew where."

"Then it seems you lost your box of lace and parted with five-and-twenty guineas into the bargain?"

"That is the truth, sir—I did, and the loss almost ruined me. As I told you, I gave Mr. Wild the five-and-twenty guineas, but I never saw either my money or my lace again until I saw the latter at Bow Street, where the prisoner was brought up for examination."

"I suppose that is all you can tell us about the matter?"

"It is, sir, for of course since he has been prisoner I have had no intercourse with him whatever."

"That will do, then; but probably Mr. Wild has some questions to ask you."

"I have," said Wild, in a voice which told how fearfully enraged he was—"I have. Mrs. Stretham, look at me. I suppose you consider yourself an honest woman, and fully understand to nature of an oath?"

"I do."

"Then," said Wild, louder than before, "how can you come into this court, and stand there in the witness-box and swear to facts which you know are wholly and entirely untrue?"

Mrs. Stretham looked exceedingly agitated, and at last she said:

"All I have spoken is true. You did receive the twenty-five guineas, and I never had the lace."

"It is false!" said Wild. "You have been hired to play this part by those who are plotting to deprive me of my life, but a day will come when you will regret what you have said. Are you aware that if your evidence is believed I shall be pronounced guilty, and sentence of death passed upon me? What then will be your feelings when you know I have been executed, and upon a charge of which I am wholly and entirely innocent—executed through your instrumentality? If I am hanged, you will be my murderer!"

Mrs. Stretham seemed ready to faint.

The Attorney-General rose hastily to his feet.

"My lord," he said, addressing the judge, "can you permit this state of things to continue? I claim protection for my witness. This is not the proper way for the cross-examination to be conducted. It is infamous, and I call upon your lordship to shield this respectable witness from the abuse of the prisoner at the bar."

CHAPTER CCCCXCIX.

THE JURY RETURN A VERDICT OF GUILTY AGAINST JONATHAN WILD, AND THE JUDGE PASSES SENTENCE OF DEATH IN THE USUAL TERMS.

A HUM of applause from the spectators in the court followed this speech, for there was not one who did not feel deeply indignant at the manner in which Jonathan Wild had spoken.

All had observed with what reluctance Mrs. Stretham had given her evidence, and it was universally believed that she spoke the truth.

Order was quickly obtained, and then the judge said:

"Prisoner at the bar, I cannot allow you to conduct yourself in this manner. If you have any questions to ask this witness, ask them, but you must do so in a proper manner."

"My lord," said Wild, fiercely, "I decline to say any more—you have all made a resolution to hang me, and it is folly for me to struggle against so many, while I am placed in the position I now occupy."

"Such talk is idle," said the judge, "and you must be silenced. There is no determination, at least upon my part, to procure your death, except the law demands your life. Once more, if you wish it you may ask the witness any questions that you may think likely to be of benefit to yourself."

"No," said Wild, "I will say no more."

In this the thief-taker made a virtue of necessity. He did not believe that he stood the least chance of making Mrs. Stretham contradict herself.

He was well aware that every word she had said was perfectly true; she had not exaggerated or misrepresented one single fact, and the conviction came over him that it would require more skill and certainly more calmness than he possessed at that moment to achieve anything on his own behalf by questioning her.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury," said the Attorney-General, "this is the case for the prosecution. It remains for you to decide whether the evidence you have just heard bears out the facts which I have stated to you; if, in your judgment, they do, your duty is plain and simple. I have no more witnesses to call—no more evidence to offer. I beseech you to weigh well all that has been said."

The Attorney-General sat down, and public attention was immediately directed to the prisoner.

All wondered what he would say.

For a minute or two he wondered the very same thing himself, but when calling up all the audacity he possessed, he said:

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—I trust you will hear with patience the few words I have to say—they will not occupy you long.

"Once more I repeat that I am the victim of a conspiracy. The evidence that has been brought before you, and which sounds so plausible, has all been got by my enemies, and its very plausibility will show how clever and unscrupulous my enemies must be.

"Had all this been grounded in fact, the case would not be so clear, simple, and straightforward in all its bearings as it is, but there is no break-in anywhere.

"Gentlemen of the jury, the charge preferred against me to-day was adopted as a last resource; they tried their utmost yesterday to have me found guilty, but they failed.

"It is no good to refer to the past, however; you were kind enough to declare me innocent of theft.

"Even if I were guilty of what is charged against me in the indictment to-day, would it not be monstrous to magnify a crime of so little importance into a capital offence? It is monstrous—monstrous in the extreme!

"But setting that aside, I repeat that I am perfectly innocent, and I ask you, gentlemen of the jury, whether you will pronounce your verdict upon the unsupported evidence of one witness.

"She has come into the witness-box and made a number of statements, not one of which has been proved in any way. I can tell, gentlemen of the jury, and you, my lord judge, by the expression of your countenances, the decision that you have arrived at.

"You are listening with impatience to all that I am saying, and wishing for the moment to arrive when I shall finish.

"Under such circumstances, what heart have I to proceed? I stop at once. I can do no more than repeat over and over again that I am innocent. Unfortunately, I am so placed that I cannot prove what I assert.

"Gentlemen, I have done, but if upon this evidence and under all the circumstances you find me guilty, and if you, my lord judge, pronounce sentence of death, then will all of you, jointly and individually, be guilty of my murder—the murder of an innocent man!"

Jonathan Wild ceased when he spoke these words.

He did not fail to perceive that the last few sentences had produced some effect; but yet, although he was ready to clutch at any frail hope as desperately as a drowning man will clutch at a straw, yet he could not bring himself to believe that he stood the least chance of obtaining a verdict of not guilty.

The judge now summed up, and in a very few words.

It must with justice be admitted that he did not attempt to unduly sway the jury either one way or the other; he simply desired them to bear the evidence in mind, and to weigh well what the witness had stated upon oath, with the assertions put forth by the prisoner, and then pronounce a verdict according to the best of their ability and judgment.

Many thought that a verdict of guilty would be recorded instantly, but such was not the case.

A long consultation followed, during which the thief-taker experienced that keenest of all tortures, the torture of suspense.

Mr. Noakes sat in a huddled-up heap in his chair; his face was ghastly white, and every now and then he would attempt to moisten his parched lips with his fevered tongue.

Few could bear to gaze upon the countenance of Jonathan Wild during the time the jury were deliberating.

At last, after a little more energetic whispering, the jurymen turned round and sat down, with the exception of the foreman, who remained standing.

Perceiving this, the Clerk of Arraigns rose, and, in the most indifferent manner conceivable, said:

"Gentlemen of the jury, are you agreed upon your verdict?"

"We are."

"Do you find the prisoner guilty or not guilty?"

"GUILTY."

Jonathan Wild neither moved nor spoke.

Not a sound escaped his lips, and he stood there as if he had been changed to stone.

Before the jury had commenced to deliberate, he had made up his mind that they would bring him in guilty; when he saw them whispering to each other for so long, hope began to rise in his breast.

But he schooled himself to bear the worst, and resolved not to allow his enemies, if he could help it, the satisfaction of seeing any emotion appear when the verdict was pronounced.

The crowded court became intensely and painfully silent.

The rustling of a piece of paper, or the least move-

they found, as they could not fail to do, that you had escaped with connivance?"

"The most likely thing to occur under such circumstances would be, I should say, your dismissal from the post of Governor of Newgate."

"That would be it, Mr. Wild."

"And I suppose you have quite an affection for this snug little office—it suits you—you are quite in your element, and I suppose you would not like to give up such a comfortable situation?"

"Indeed I should not, Mr. Wild!"

"Well, I don't wonder at it. I should like such a post myself, but we must all bow to circumstances. It may be disagreeable to lose your situation, but then that might be the lesser of two evils. Think it over."

"I know I am in your power, Mr. Wild."

"You are, and so I briefly tell you this. You have the choice of two alternatives,—you can refuse to listen to the request which I have just made, but if you do, to-morrow No. 105.—BLUESKIN.

I shall make such revelations as will be easily substantiated, and you will be removed from your situation, and, in addition to that, made a prisoner yourself and brought up for trial at the next assizes."

The Governor's teeth chattered, for he knew perfectly well that Jonathan Wild spoke no more than the truth.

"Well, now, upon consideration, don't you find that it will be very much the best to help me to escape? If you do that you will only lose your situation; if you refuse you will not only lose your situation but your life as well."

"Ah, Mr. Wild, I never dreamt that this would be the termination of the good understanding that has existed so long between us."

"I suppose not," said Wild, "but I foresaw the possibility of the coming of such a day as the present, and therefore I adopted what means I could to get you securely into my power."

The Governor wrung his hands.

"Hark!" said Jonathan Wild, "I can hear the clock of St. Paul's striking the hour of twelve! There must be no delay; I must go at once or not at all!"

"What shall I do?—oh, what shall I do?"

"Just whichever you like; but I know what will be the best for both of us."

"But in the morning what should I say when your escape was discovered?"

"You might say you resisted, and that you had been overpowered; though if I stood in your shoes I should not wait for morning to come."

"What do you mean?"

"I should leave the place immediately, taking with me whatever there was valuable I could lay my hands on, and getting as far away as possible before daybreak."

Most heartily did the Governor regret that he had ever lent his aid towards the furtherance of Wild's plans. He saw his error now, and, like many other people, repented when it was too late.

"If I could have foreseen this," he said, "how differently I should have acted."

"No doubt you would; but that is neither here nor there—time is passing away."

"Alas—alas!" moaned the Governor. "I am the most miserable man in London to-night!"

But while he spoke these words the Governor's right hand wandered to his breast and stopped there.

Jonathan observed the movement.

"You have a weapon concealed there!" he said.

"I have," said the Governor, pulling a pistol from the breast of his coat, "and I will take your life rather than you shall force me to aid in your escape! I will say I was forced to shoot you in self-defence."

"No, you won't," said the thief-taker, as he wrested the weapon from the Governor's hand. "I now possess an additional argument."

He seized Mr. Noakes by the arm as he spoke, and placing the pistol close to his head, said:

"Now, then, will you lead me out of the prison or not?"

"I must submit—I must submit! Come on, I am a ruined man for ever!"

"Not so; you have talents which will soon exercise themselves to your advantage; never fear of that. Come on, I must be some distance from the prison before the clock strikes the hour of one!"

Much against his inclination, and with a very heavy heart, Mr. Noakes opened the door of the cell.

Jonathan still kept his grasp upon his arm, and held the pistol in a threatening manner towards him.

"Now," he said, "make the least alarm at your peril—If you do I will fire, and you will be a dead man!"

"I will make no alarm. Now that I am compelled to submit, I will do so with the best grace I can."

"A wise resolution. Now, where are your keys?—open this door, and be quick about it!"

The Governor always carried about with him a bunch of keys with which he could unlock all the doors in the prison.

The one which barred their progress and which had caused Wild to speak was quickly opened.

Passing through it, they continued their way along the corridors, until Wild suddenly said:

"In which way do you intend for me to leave the building—not by the vestibule?"

"No, there are too many turnkeys about. I was going to take you to my apartments and let you out at my private door."

"Good!—that will do very well—it could not be better! Come on!"

In a few minutes afterwards another door was opened.

This was the one that formed the communication between the Governor's house and the prison itself.

The passage on the other side was covered with some kind of matting, so that it was possible to walk almost noiselessly upon it.

"We can't leave the prison bare-headed and as we now are," said Wild.

"We?" said Mr. Noakes.

"Yes; upon consideration, I have determined that it will be best for your welfare not to stay till morning. You had better avoid the questions that will be put to you, and, in order that you may continue to be safe, I am going to make you the companion of my flight."

The thief-taker spoke as though he was doing a really generous action; but the Governor could not see it, and was by no means grateful.

"Come," said Wild, "we must both wrap ourselves up in cloaks, and we must have a hat each,—you have got such things somewhere, I am sure!"

"I have, Mr. Wild, but they are upstairs."

"Well, we will go upstairs and fetch them, then. Is this the staircase?"

When Wild asked this question they were close to the foot of a flight of stairs.

"Yes," replied the Governor.

"Come on, then, and in a few minutes we shall reach the street."

The two villains ascended the stairs, and the Governor entered a room, in which he found two cloaks and two hats.

These they put on in such a way as to disguise themselves as much as possible, and then they proceeded to descend the stairs.

Going a little further along the passage, Wild caught sight of a light, and then, to his dismay, found some one was approaching.

"What's the meaning of this?" he said,—"is it some treachery on your part? If it is, beware!"

"No—no!" said the Governor, "it is no treachery of mine! I fancy it is the ordinary who is coming, and if so our plan will be ruined entirely."

"Not so—we must conceal ourselves."

Close to where they stood Wild perceived a door which opened out of the passage.

He hastened towards this door, dragging the Governor with him, then, opening it, he passed quickly into the chamber beyond it.

Still retaining his clutch on Mr. Noakes's arm, Jonathan Wild stood just inside the room, listening to the approach of the person in the passage, and feeling very doubtful as to what would be the result of the encounter.

CHAPTER DI.

THE BANDIT CHIEF MAKES A SEARCH IN THE CAVERN FOR EDGWORTH BESS.

JONATHAN WILD has for a very long time past occupied the whole of our attention, to the exclusion of the other characters.

For awhile, then, it is necessary that we should leave him standing just inside this room, in a state of great suspense, while we go back to Edgworth Bess and relate what happened when the banditti rushed into the cavern in which she was concealed.

It will be remembered that, along with Crazy Carl, she was crouching down behind that singular-looking monument which had caused her so much alarm when she first caught sight of it.

From this position she had been able to see, without being seen, the different proceedings of the banditti.

She had noted the artful manner in which they drew the wild boar out of the cavern, and how, by one brisk discharge of their firearms, they had put it out of the brute's power to do any harm to them.

It was then that the bandit chief waved his sword and rushed into the cavern, calling to his men to follow him.

To his vexation and astonishment, however, they suddenly stopped short, and refused to advance a step further.

In vain he called upon them and threatened what he would do if they refused obedience to his commands.

It was evident that they were swayed by a much stronger feeling, and from their manner it seemed as if they were more than half inclined to retreat from the cavern altogether.

They even called out to their chieftain to retire.

"This is the children's cave!" they cried—"this is an accursed spot! If we advance further into its recesses, we shall be swallowed up like those children were whose fate that monument commemorates!"

"Fools!" cried the bandit chief. "Do you place belief in such an idle tale as that? Come on, I say, or rely upon it I will make you rue the consequences of your refusal!"

The men, however, still hung back, and refused to advance.

"There is the monument!" they cried, pointing into the darkness—"there it stands! That is where the earth opened, and where the children were swallowed up!"

"And if it was," said the chief, "that is no reason why it should open again. Idiots and cowards that you are, remain where you now stand, and I will search this cavern myself!"

The men could not avoid feeling a very great amount of admiration at this exhibition of courage upon their leader's part; nevertheless, so great was their demur, that they one and all cried out aloud, and entreated him to forego his rash intention.

When the wild boar had uttered that awful cry of rage, Crazy Carl was so terrified at the hideous sound, that he fell flat to the earth.

In his fall he extinguished the rude torch he had carried, so that the bandit chief had nothing whatever to guide him in his search, or to indicate in what portion of the cavern the fugitives were concealed.

But, with his drawn sword in his hand, the bandit chief rapidly searched over the whole of the cavern.

Edgworth Bess had half swooned when he first entered, and she came to the conclusion that all was over—that she would be recaptured, and that it would be perfectly useless to resist any longer.

But when she became aware that, from some cause or other, the banditti were afraid to advance into the cavern, her courage rose again.

She touched Crazy Carl upon the shoulder, and by sign compelled him to rise to his feet.

The obscurity of the cavern was greatly in their favour; at first it had seemed to be perfectly dark, but by this time her eyes had become accustomed to the gloom, and she could dimly perceive those objects which were not far off.

This also seemed to be the case with the bandit chief, for he avoided the many obstacles which lay around him.

His long, bright sword seemed to attract towards it all the light there was in that gloomy place, and to reflect it with redoubled brilliancy.

Edgworth Bess avoided him easily, and no doubt some time would have elapsed before Grimm could have captured her, had not the sound of Crazy Carl's footsteps reached his ear.

He hastened in the direction of the sound, and just at that moment the poor idiot was unfortunate enough to stumble over a piece of rock which jutted from the floor of the cavern, and to fall heavily upon his face.

Ere he could rise, the bandit chief seized him by the neck, and dragged him to the entrance of the cave, where his followers were assembled in a dense throng.

As soon as Grimm recognised Crazy Carl, he uttered a howl of rage.

He released him, and struck him a violent blow with his sword.

Carl fell to the earth bleeding and a corpse.

This success appeared to have an inspiring effect upon the bandit chief, and he again dashed into the cavern in pursuit of the other fugitive.

Edgworth Bess could scarcely restrain herself from uttering a scream when she saw what a sad fate had overtaken the companion of her flight, but she felt that she was powerless to aid him in any way, so she turned the whole of her attention to looking after her own safety.

The cavern was a large and almost circular place, from which she could find no outlet whatever.

Grimm paused and listened, and managed to catch the sound caused by the rustling of her dress.

He bounded forward, and Edgworth Bess escaped being caught in his grasp by the merest trifle.

Still, she did escape, and this fact lent her redoubled strength to hasten onwards.

But she could find no outlet, and at last, breathless and entirely exhausted by her efforts, she sank down half fainting upon the floor.

Grimm saw her sink down, and, sheathing his sword, he hastily raised her in his arms, and carried her out into the open air.

"Cowards!" he cried, addressing his men. "You see how much danger there was in entering this cavern! What harm has come to me? If you had chosen to assist me, I should not have had half this trouble, and should have succeeded long ago!"

Carrying his prisoner in his arms with the greatest possible amount of care, he led the way through the forest in the direction of the ruined castle.

This was much nearer than might have been expected, for, in her hasty flight, Edgworth Bess had taken a circuitous route, and was going closer and closer to her prison, while she was all the time under the impression that she was going farther and farther from it.

Without accident or interruption, the banditti arrived at their destination.

Edgworth Bess was just conscious that she was being carried back to the prison from which she had escaped with so much trouble, and that was all.

Grimm hesitated for some time as to where he should bestow his prisoner, but then he reflected that it was not her cell which had proved insufficiently secure; his prisoner had escaped from it through the treachery of another.

He could prevent all treachery in the future, and so he made up his mind that he would once more place her in the little chamber in the turret.

He did so, and carefully locked and secured the door.

Several hours elapsed before Edgworth Bess properly recovered her senses.

When she found, after all her toil and trouble, that she was once more an inmate of her former prison, she burst into tears, and felt that her heart would surely break.

"What can be this man's object?" she asked herself. "What can he want with me? It seems I have lost one persecutor to find another. Was ever anyone so unfortunate as I am?"

Night came, and found the poor girl still weeping, though not so violently as before.

No one had been near to disturb her in any way, and at last she sank off into an uneasy, unrefreshing slumber.

When she awoke, she went to the loophole and found that the sun had risen.

His golden beams were shining with great beauty upon the tree tops.

As on the former occasion when she had looked through that loophole, she was now unable to detect any signs of life; no one was stirring, not even one of the banditti.

The poor girl had but one hope, and that was that, when Blueskin and Jack Sheppard arrived at the woodman's hut and found it in ruins, they would at once make an immediate search for her.

She wondered greatly that they had not made their appearance earlier, and wondered whether anything had occurred to detain them.

Then she recollected that even if they did find she had left the cottage there would be no clue by which they could ascertain where she had gone, or what kind of fate had befallen her.

Her only hope was that, by standing at the window watching patiently, she might perchance catch sight of the two only friends she had in the world.

She had no heart to attempt to make another escape, after having experienced such a signal failure—in fact, she looked upon escape as an impossibility.

Slowly and drearily the day passed away, and darkness came again without her having had her hopes raised in the slightest degree.

She was surprised that the bandit chief should have remained so long without paying her a visit.

She could not even tell whether the banditti were at that moment in the ruins or not.

All was perfectly still, as though the whole place was deserted.

The night passed even more disagreeably than the preceding one, and she began to wonder within herself whether they intended to allow her to perish of starvation.

Upon awaking in the morning, however, she found that her chamber had been visited during the night, for on the floor was a basket containing some very coarse fare.

It was clear, then, that they did not intend to allow her to perish of hunger.

Going again to the loophole, the poor girl looked despairingly out, but her eyes failed to find any fresh, unfamiliar object.

Every hour that elapsed gradually increased her uneasiness.

She began to fear that something dreadful had occurred either to Blueskin or to Jack—perhaps to both.

So intently occupied was she in gazing through this window, that she did not hear the fastenings removed, nor the door open.

She turned round with a scream of fright upon feeling some one touch her on the shoulder, and upon turning round she found herself face to face with the bandit chief.

In his hand he carried pen, ink, and paper, and these articles he deposited upon the one table in the turret chamber.

"You understand what I mean by bringing you these? It is in order that you may write a letter to your friends, acquainting them of your situation, and stating that, upon the payment of eight hundred thalers, you will be set at liberty."

"I have no friends," said Edgworth Bess, "who possess any such sum."

"Bah! Why do you repeat that nonsense? However, I don't wish to hurry you—take your own time. Here are the writing materials. When you feel inclined, you can begin your letter. As soon as it is finished I will take care that it is forwarded to its destination without any loss of time.

With these words, Grimm turned upon his heel and departed, closing and carefully securing the door after him.

After one glance at the writing materials which he had brought, Edgworth Bess turned again to the window, and looked out.

Then a fresh thought entered her mind, and with great speed she tore up the paper which had been brought into a number of small fragments.

Upon each of these she wrote a few words to the effect that she was a prisoner in the hands of banditti, and confined in a turret in the ruined castle.

These she threw, one by one, out of the narrow aperture, but she had great difficulty in doing so, owing to the thickness of the walls, and the distance which intervened between each grating.

Some pieces of the paper seemed to fall straight down to the ground, while others were caught by the wind, and whirled over the tree tops for a considerable distance.

She was in hopes, if her two friends were searching for her, that they might find one of these pieces of paper, and so learn where she was, and the peril in which she was placed.

It was a frail hope, and but little could be expected to result from this proceeding, for it was not likely that fragments of paper would be carried to any great extent, yet it would be hard to say where they would be blown to, or by whom they might be found.

After the last piece had been thrown she waited in great suspense for some result to follow, but there was none; without all remained as profoundly silent as before.

All the paper was used up, and now that it was gone she began to wonder for the first time what Grimm would say when he discovered that she had destroyed it.

But she would not suffer the fear of what he might do to be any trouble to her, and hoped most fervently that one of the fragments might be found.

But when she saw the sun declining to the west—when she knew that ere long he would set, and night would come again, she began to give herself up to despair.

Suddenly, at a distance, she perceived three human forms.

They were making their way along a broad, open glade in the forest.

They were waiting off for her to be able to recognise them, and yet her heart seemed to tell her that they were her friends.

She knew that her voice could not possibly reach them, and yet she placed her mouth close to the iron grating, and called out aloud in frenzied tones.

Then they became suddenly lost to her sight, and she burst into tears.

Then she thought if it was her friends who were approaching, they would be able to see the tower when she could not see them, and so there would be a chance of attracting their attention if she could give any signal.

But this seemed to be impossible, until she bethought herself of tearing a portion of the covering of the bed into long strips, which she tied together.

When she had a sufficient length she went to the loophole.

The iron bars were not so close together as to prevent her from putting her arm through; but the outer grating was at too great a distance for her to be able to reach it.

But with great patience, and after many trials, she succeeded in pushing one end out.

The wind caught it, and made it flutter like a pendant, gradually drawing it further and further out.

She tied the other end to the inner grating, and then waited with great anxiety and suspense for the result of this experiment.

But she did not again catch sight of the three figures she had seen, and it was just as the sun sank behind the tree tops that she heard a loud shout, which was responded to by a cry; then came other shouts, and finally the clashing of swords and the report of firearms.

A contest of some sort was evidently going on at the foot of the tower, but by whom it was carried on, or whether it was likely to be anything in her favour, she could not tell, for she had nothing but her sense of hearing to guide her.

By degrees the sounds of combat died away, and finally all became as silent as before.

What was meant by this completely baffled her, nor could she judge who was victorious in the encounter—the banditti, or those by whom they were attacked.

She waited for a long time, listening patiently, but nothing happened to furnish her with a clue to these strange events, and when darkness came she laid herself down upon the rude couch, feeling more distressed and broken-hearted than she had ever done before.

CHAPTER DII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDED IN DISCOVERING THE PLACE WHERE EDGORTH BESS IS CONFINED.

It is now time we returned to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, whom we last left on the morning when they set about making their search through the wood.

They had not been able to obtain a very good night's rest, but still they were considerably refreshed, and pushed through the dense undergrowth with much less fatigue and difficulty than they had experienced on the previous day.

It was in vain, however, that they looked around them in search of something which would serve them as a clue to the whereabouts of Edgworth Bess.

They were constantly on the look-out for any unusual object, and at last Jack Sheppard perceived upon a thorn bush something white and fluttering.

Upon examination, this was found to be a portion of a woman's dress.

It was as though she had been running rapidly, and the thorn bush had caught her apparel and torn a small piece out of it.

"Look," said Jack Sheppard, as he placed it in Blueskin's hand, "here is certain proof that we are on the right track! I am sure this is a portion of the dress which Edgworth Bess wore, and it may be that we shall find her before we go much further."

This discovery stimulated them to fresh exertions, but, although they looked carefully and keenly on all sides, mid-day arrived without their having been so fortunate as to obtain any further clue.

Fatigue now compelled them to come to a temporary halt, where they partook of another meal as rude and primitive as those which they had lately had.

Rising to their feet, they renewed their search, and continued it until nightfall.

During the darkness it would be ridiculous to continue their search, so they very wisely came to a halt.

They happened to be in the vicinity of some huge jagged rocks.

They imagined they would not have to go far without finding a crevice or indentation in one of these, which would serve them as a place in which to pass the night, for after their previous experience they felt but little inclination to remain in the open air.

Their conjectures proved quite correct, and in a few minutes they found a hollow in the rocks, which, although it appeared to extend to no great distance, was yet quite large enough to answer their purpose.

Entering this cavern, if such it can be called, they made a hasty examination of it, in order to satisfy themselves that no wild animal was lurking there.

Nothing of an alarming character, however, was found. The floor of the recess was thickly covered with leaves and other rubbish which had from time to time drifted in from the forest, but there was nothing more.

"Here will be capital lodgings for the night," said Jack Sheppard. "The only thing necessary will be to collect a quantity of firewood and place it in the interior. We should then have to make a fire quite across the mouth, and when this was alight it would form an impassable barrier to all wild creatures."

Jack's suggestion was carried out.

All three set to work to collect dry wood, and place it inside the cavern, and in the space of a very few minutes they had made quite a large fire. Behind this they felt they should be quite secure, but yet, as a measure of additional precaution, and in case anything should occur during the night, it was agreed that they should take it in turns to watch and sleep.

Morning came without anything having occurred to disturb them, with the exception of the occasional howling of the wolves.

When they commenced their search the next morning they were rather more downcast than before.

Still they did not despair, and resolved not to rest until they had accomplished their purpose.

Keeping close to the rocks, they came at length upon a sight which filled them with astonishment.

This was the carcass of the wild boar which had been shot by Grimm's banditti, and our friends could tell when they looked at it that only a short time had elapsed since it was slain.

Looking around, they perceived the marks of many footsteps, and following these, they found they led to the mouth of that cavern in which Edgworth Bess had found a temporary refuge.

Of course they did not hesitate to enter, and almost the first thing they discerned was the lifeless body of Crazy Carl.

They dragged it out into the open air, in the hope that they should be able to find life was not quite extinct.

But they were disappointed—the poor fellow was quite dead, though his body was scarcely cold.

After some deliberation they determined to procure a light and search the cavern.

The branch of a tree, which was of a resinous quality, served for a torch, and was easily ignited by the means of the flint and steel which formed the lock of one of their pistols.

It burnt clearly and gave forth a ruddy light.

By its aid they examined every portion of the cavern.

The floor was hard and firm, and they were unable to detect the imprint of any footsteps upon it.

A close search round the walls convinced them that there was no outlet from the cavern, except the one by which they had entered it.

They looked with great curiosity at the singular monument behind which Edgworth Bess and the idiot had for a little while concealed themselves, and they wondered greatly what could be the meaning of the erection of a monument in so strange a place.

In what they had seen so far there was nothing to show them that Edgworth Bess was connected with, but although they had no proof, they could not help feeling this conviction.

They were forced at last to return to the open air and to acknowledge that what they had discovered amounted to nothing.

Still, when they looked upon the dead body which they had found, they could not help coming to the conclusion that it looked very much like the work of banditti—and had not Ned Cantle told them that it was banditti who had carried off Edgworth Bess?

All round the mouth of the cavern the grass was much trodden down, indicating the presence of many people.

In the hope that this might furnish them with the clue they wanted, they examined the footprints with great attention.

They came at last to a place where they led into the forest.

The undergrowth was broken and trampled down, and they were able to follow this path easily enough, until at last, to their vexation, the traces vanished, and they had nothing whatever to guide them.

They wandered on until nightfall, when they were again compelled to come to a halt.

All three were greatly fatigued.

They were out of spirits too, for when they commenced their search they did not anticipate that it would last so long and be so fruitless.

They were not near any cavern, and so they were forced to remain in the open air during the night, but they made a huge fire, and consequently suffered no interruption.

In the morning they recommenced their apparently hopeless task.

Now that so long a time had elapsed, they began to fear that the poor girl would be taken completely out of their reach.

The closest scrutiny failed to show them any other clue.

The forest seemed as though it had not been trodden by human feet for centuries.

They were weary and disappointed to the last degree, and every hour that elapsed made them believe that they stood less and less chance of success.

The remainder of the day was spent like so many previous ones had been, in wandering about among the trees.

There is no doubt that they doubled many times upon their footsteps, and went over the same ground again and again.

The next morning they were so enfeebled and exhausted, that it was with the greatest difficulty that they managed to creep onwards at all.

At last they emerged into a glade of great length and considerable width.

It was on rising ground, and consequently they were able to obtain a more extensive view around them than they had been able to do since they first entered the forest.

Simultaneously all three caught sight of a massive-looking ruin in the distance.

"What place is that, think you?" asked Jack Sheppard, in an anxious voice.

"It looks like the ruin of some old castle or other, but how it happens to be situated in the midst of a wood, as it appears to be, I can scarcely tell you."

"Do you think it likely that the banditti of whom we are in search have taken up their quarters there?"

"It is very, very probable. We will push forward and see; if it is not, why we shall have a tolerably comfortable place in which to pass the night."

In the hope that they had at last discovered the place to which Edgworth Bess had been taken, and yet almost dreading to indulge in that hope lest their disappointment should be greater than they could bear, they made their way along the smooth open glade in the direction of the ruin.

As they proceeded the ground sloped greatly downwards, so that in a little while the building was lost to sight.

But they remembered its position, and pushed forward with confidence.

At last it once more came in sight, and then, happening to glance up, they saw something fluttering from a loophole in the topmost turret.

Jack's heart beat violently when he perceived this signal, and grasping Blueskin tightly by the arm, he said:

"Look—look, my friend. Tell me, if you can, what is the meaning of that?—does it not show that Edgworth Bess is a prisoner in this place, and that she has adopted this means to let us know it?"

"There seems every probability that such is the case but if so, we must proceed with great caution; we do not know the numbers of the banditti, and we have had many convincing proofs that they are desperate characters, and not at all likely to stick at trifles."

"Yes, we will be cautious," said Jack; "at if she is there and the banditti number a thousand I would not rest until I had set her at liberty."

With more caution than they had yet used, they drew nearer to the ruins of the castle in order to reconnoitre

They soon found that it was a huge rambling place, that some portions were in the last stage of decay, while others presented something like a habitable aspect.

"If we can conceal ourselves among the ruins," said Blueskin, "I have no doubt all will be well; we shall have a chance then of making our way up into the turret; the danger is that we may be seen before we can reach the walls."

"All is still," said Jack; "there appears to be no one about; very likely the banditti are absent on some excursion. If such is the case, we shall have a glorious opportunity of effecting our purpose."

"I am afraid that is too much to hope for. However, as there seems no one about, we will steal cautiously across this open space and conceal ourselves among the walls."

With this intention they crept rapidly yet cautiously forward.

Scarcely, however, had they reached half-way, than they heard a sudden shout, and then a body of well-armed men rushed out upon them.

Almost before they were aware of it, they found themselves surrounded by the banditti, who were led by Grimm himself.

The numbers of the banditti were so greatly superior to their own, that our friends felt in a moment that it would be madness to resist, but for all that, they defended themselves with great vigour and determination, for they resolved not to surrender until compelled to do so.

The banditti made no attempt to slay them—if they had, they would have succeeded without difficulty.

Their intention, however, appeared to be to take them prisoners.

This was no easy task.

First of all the widow's son was seized and borne away, then a number of the banditti laid hold of Blueskin, while as many more surrounded Jack Sheppard, and in spite of their frantic struggles they were made prisoners.

"Bring them along," cried Grimm—"bring them along this way, my gallant hearts! Fortune smiles upon us!"

The banditti set up a cheer, for they were vastly delighted with the victory they had gained, and followed their chieftain into the interior of the ruins.

A door was opened, and our friends were compelled to descend a flight of rude stone steps, which appeared to lead down to the very foundations of the building.

After descending a great distance, Grimm paused before a massive door, deeply set into an archway.

The iron bolts were drawn back from their rusty sockets, the heavy bar was removed, and by an exertion the key was turned in the lock.

The door was then pushed open, and Blueskin and Jack Sheppard were thrust into the dark and dismal dungeon beyond.

The door was closed and carefully fastened, and in a moment afterwards our friends found themselves listening to the footsteps of their captors.

CHAPTER DIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE, AND HAVE TO FLY FOR THEIR LIVES.

WITH an intentness that no words can possibly convey the least idea of, Jonathan Wild stood near the partially-opened door, listening to the approach of the person who was coming.

It was a man. He could tell that by the firm, heavy tread, and whoever it was he carried in his hand a light, the reflection of which the thief-taker could plainly see shining on the walls of the hall.

Mr. Noakes shook in every limb, and the extreme terror which he experienced caused a cold perspiration to break out all over him.

His teeth chattered audibly, and he tried in vain to keep them still.

Nearer came the footstep, and as it did so, Jonathan Wild's uneasiness increased, and he retreated slowly from the door.

The Governor put his lips close to Wild's ear and tried to whisper something to him, but his voice failed him altogether, and he could not.

Jonathan set his teeth and prepared himself for the worst.

His worst forebodings were realised when the footsteps paused upon the threshold of the room in which he had taken refuge.

Then the door was pushed open, and a figure carrying a lamp in its hand made its appearance.

Jonathan let go his hold upon the Governor's arm, and sprang forward like a tiger.

He seized the new comer by the throat with so violent a grip, that before he had time to utter a cry of alarm he felt he was choking.

The lamp dropped from his hand and rolled on to the floor, but was not extinguished.

By the faint light which came from it, Jonathan saw who his antagonist was.

As Mr. Noakes had fancied, it was the ordinary of the prison.

The room into which they had retreated was one set aside for the chaplain's own use.

He would be not a little astonished at the reception he received. When he saw who it was, Jonathan forced him into a chair.

The ordinary had on a very large white neckcloth.

This Jonathan speedily slipped off, and passing it once round his neck, secured it to the back of the massive arm-chair.

He did this in such a manner, that although the pressure around the ordinary's throat was not enough to cause strangulation, yet it made respiration difficult, and left him without the power of shouting for assistance.

Mr. Noakes sank down in a huddled-up heap on the floor as soon as ever Jonathan let go his hold upon his arm.

He remained there in this position as though insensible, until Jonathan had securely bound the chaplain, and it is probable he would not have risen then had not Wild dealt him a furious kick in the ribs, which caused him to utter a howl of pain.

"Make another sound like that," said Jonathan, fiercely, "and it will be your last! Get up, I say, and be quick. We have no time to waste!"

Painfully and slowly the Governor rose up.

"Have you killed him?" he said.

"Killed who?"

"The ordinary."

"No—no, I have only accommodated him with a seat; he won't interfere with us. Come along—be quick!"

The thief-taker almost dragged Mr. Noakes out of the room.

Upon gaining the door, he paused and turned the key in the lock.

"Now," he said, "show me the nearest way into the street! Come along—a moment's hesitation may spoil all!"

Uttering suppressed groans, the Governor led Wild along the passage to the front door.

At the command of his companion, he removed the fastenings.

Wild raised the latch and cautiously opened the door to the extent of about a couple of inches.

The cold night air blew gratefully upon him, and he drank it in with sensations of the utmost pleasure.

He looked out into the street, but all was perfectly silent—there did not seem to be a single human being abroad.

"Come on," said Wild, addressing Mr. Noakes—"be quick! Slip through the door, and close it gently after you!"

The Governor obeyed.

A flight of four steps led from the Governor's private door down to the pavement.

On the topmost step Wild paused while the Governor closed the door.

Although he was very careful, a slight sound was produced, and both stood still and terrified, fearful that some one should have heard it.

Just at that moment the heavy tramp of a footstep on the pavement reached their ears.

Jonathan muttered a curse.

"Draw back," he said—"draw back! The shadow of this doorway will conceal us—we will wait until the man passes!"

"Past one o'clock, and a cloudy morning," bawled the voice, and then both Jonathan Wild and the Governor knew that it was the watchman who was approaching.

Just then he came in sight.

In one hand he carried a lantern, and in the other a rattle.

He paused in front of the doorway, in the shadow of which they were concealed, while he muttered:

"I fancied I heard someone's door shut! Shall I take no notice of it or not? Past one o'clock, and a cloudy morning."

The watchman swung his lantern so that the light fell upon the Governor's private door, and then, as a matter of course, he caught sight of the two figures that were standing close against it.

"Hullo!" he said. "Oh, murder!"

He sprang his rattle as he spoke, but he was only able to cause the instrument to make two or three revolutions.

As soon as they found they were discovered, Jonathan rushed down the steps.

He held his pistol by the barrel, and, striking the watchman one terrific blow on the head with the butt-end, laid him senseless on the pavement.

Jonathan Wild turned round for his companion, and found that Mr. Noakes was standing trembling on the steps.

He clutched him tightly by the collar.

"Fool!" he said. "Why do you linger here? We must fly for our lives! Hark! there goes another rattle—and another! The alarm has been given, and, if we are not careful, all our trouble will go for nothing. Come on, I say!"

Despite his evident unwillingness to proceed, Jonathan dragged the Governor across the street, and turned down a narrow lane that was nearly opposite.

The springing of rattles and loud shouts could now be heard on every side, and Jonathan was fearful that after all he should be discovered.

But his intimate acquaintance with the streets of London proved of great value to him, and he took turning after turning with a rapidity that would have bewildered anyone.

But he knew where he was going, and had it not been that he was encumbered with the Governor, he would have made much better speed than he did.

"Come on!" he roared to Mr. Noakes. "I will blow your brains out where you stand! Come on, I say! Why do you hang back?"

"Leave me here," said the Governor—"leave me here! I will go my way, you can go yours!"

"No you won't! For the future we keep close together. It is important that we should not part; and for things to be comfortable, is to do just what I tell you. Come on, I say! Can you not hear they are behind us?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Run, then—run! Don't feel afraid! If you will exert yourself, I will soon place you in safety!"

Loud shouts and cries came from the rear, showing that, by some means or other, the watchmen had got upon the right track.

In another moment the fugitives gained Fleet Market.

Just then a bell began to toll with rapid and alarming strokes.

"Your escape has been discovered," said the Governor, pantingly. "We are as good as taken already!"

"Nothing of the kind, I say,—come on! Don't flag, or you will repent it! You need not think that I shall leave you. If I escape, you escape—if I perish, you perish!"

Crossing Fleet Market, Jonathan Wild made his way into that maze of courts which lie between Holborn Hill and Fleet Street.

On he went at a furious speed, compelling Mr. Noakes, by the continual utterance of awful threats, to follow him.

Suddenly a man appeared before them, and outstretching his arms, strove to arrest their progress.

But with one blow Wild felled him to the earth, and, trampling over his body, continued on his way.

When they reached Fetter Lane they paused, for the double purpose of recovering their breath a little and listening to the sounds of pursuit.

They were much fainter than they had been, and this discovery made Jonathan feel inclined to redouble his exertions.

The Governor of Newgate was in such a state of dread and terror, that he could scarcely keep his feet.

"I can't follow you much further, Mr. Wild," he said, imploringly—"indeed I can't!"

"But you must!" returned the thief-taker, fiercely—"you must! It is quite necessary for my safety that we should keep together. It will be a long time ere we part, my friend!"

The Governor groaned.

"I shall sink!" he said—"I shall fall to the ground! My limbs are giving way beneath me!"

"I can't help that! Come on, I say!"

Every time the thief-taker uttered these words, he would give his companion a sudden pull, which would almost bring him to the earth.

The thief-taker had no very clear idea as to where he should go just then; the only thought which occupied his mind was that of getting away from his pursuers in as short a space of time as possible.

In a few more minutes they emerged into Chancery Lane from a narrow court situated nearly opposite the old gateway leading into Lincoln's Inn.

Loud shouts and the trampling of footsteps could still be heard behind, and Jonathan ground his teeth with vexation, for he could already feel the effects of the exertions he had been obliged to make.

"What shall we do?" said the Governor, in a piteous voice. "In another moment they will be upon us!"

"No they won't," returned the thief-taker. "We are in luck's way—look there!"

As he spoke, a hackney-coach came lumbering along at rather a rapid rate.

"Stop!" cried Wild, at the top of his voice, addressing the driver—"stop! You can have two guineas for your fare!"

These words evidently reached the ears of the driver of the hackney-coach, for he pulled up his horses with a suddenness that very nearly threw them down.

"All right, your honour's lordship," he said. "I am the man!"

"Don't get down," said Wild, as he saw the driver about to get down from his seat; "I am in a great hurry. I want you to drive us to the corner of Oxford Road, and, if you go quickly, you can have two guineas for your trouble."

While speaking these words, Wild opened the door of the coach, thrust Mr. Noakes inside, and scrambled in himself.

"Drive on!" he roared, as he closed the door and held it shut without fastening it—"drive on for your life!"

Jonathan was only just in time, for at the very moment the driver put his horses in motion, a tumultuous crowd of persons poured out from the narrow court into Chancery Lane.

The driver whipped his horses manurefully, and they galloped over the stones at a furious rate.

Round the corner into Holborn they went at undiminished speed.

Still holding the door with his hand, Jonathan looked behind him.

They were rapidly getting away from their pursuers, though he knew very well that, as his escape from Newgate was discovered, mounted officers would be sent out in pursuit.

Every moment he expected to hear the clatter of horses' hoofs on the silent roadway, but to his joy no such sound reached his ears.

Suddenly the coach stopped.

Jonathan projected his head from the window.

"What are you pulling up for," he asked.

"Corner of Oxford Road, sir," said the coachman.

"All right!"

Jonathan stepped from the coach, dragging his companion with him.

He had not a fraction with him, but nevertheless, he put his hand into his pocket, as though feeling for the amount he had promised the man.

Seeing this, the driver got down off his box, with the intention of receiving the amount and closing the door.

"Hie!" said Wild, quietly, "here you are! You have performed your services well!"

The man touched his hat and came forward unsuspectingly.

Wild took his hand out of his pocket and held it as though the money was between his fingers.

As soon as the unfortunate driver was near enough, he clenched his fist and struck him a tremendous blow in the face.

The man staggered.

Jonathan did not allow him the opportunity of recovering himself, but struck him a more violent blow than the preceding one.

The driver dropped down into the street as though shot, and lay there as motionless as a log.

CHAPTER DIV.

JONATHAN WILD GETS THE BETTER OF THE OFFICERS BY AN INGENIOUS ARTIFICE.

THE driver of the hackney-coach fully believed in Jonathan Wild's good faith, and never dreamed for a moment that he intended to serve him in such a shameful and rascally manner.

Mr. Noakes, too, was much taken by surprise, although he had been wondering where his companion was going to get the two guineas from that he had promised him as his fare.

"That is a settlement in full," said Wild, calmly. "Don't you think that is very well managed indeed?"

"What do you intend to do?"

"I'll tell you. But hush!—hark! What is that?—listen!"

The sound of horses coming at full gallop reached the ears of Jonathan and the Governor with great distinctness.

"They are after us," said Mr. Noakes; "they have discovered all, and are in full pursuit."

"Yes! and if they capture us you will find your position a very unpleasant one indeed."

"Thanks to you!"

"Ha—ha! It was to be! But why stand lingering here?"

"What is it you intend to do?"

Jonathan paused thoughtfully for a moment, and then said:

"All right—I have it! Just you keep your courage up, and all will be well!"

Jonathan did not stop to explain, but very much to Mr. Noakes's astonishment, he stooped down, and quickly divested the driver of his huge white coat and hat.

These he rapidly put on.

Addressing Mr. Noakes, he said:

"Get up on the box. I will sit beside you and drive!"

"And the man—what shall you do with him? Shall you leave him in the roadway?"

"No; I thought at first of doing so, but now I have a better thought. Wait a moment!"

Jonathan stooped down, and by an exertion of strength lifted the insensible driver in his arms, and placed him in an upright position on one of the seats in the coach.

Then, shutting the door, he scrambled upon the box, took the reins in his hand, and seated himself by the side of Mr. Noakes, who was trembling in every limb.

By this time the horsemen had got very near, and the beat of their hoofs could be heard with alarming plainness.

Jonathan muffled himself up well in the great coat, and pulled the hat well down over his brows, and then, with an appearance of great calmness, whipped the horses, and drove rather slowly along the Oxford Road.

Ere he had gone many yards, he heard a loud shout and cries behind him.

At first he took no notice, and did not try to increase the pace at which the horses were going in the least, and when he heard those in the rear stop, he pulled up there and then, in the middle of the road, very much to the dismay of Mr. Noakes.

"What are you going to do, Mr. Wild?" he asked, in an agony of apprehension.

"Never you mind! All you have to do is to sit still; if you say a word or move you will be a dead man!"

Jonathan looked back and saw, as he had fully expected, that those who were coming along at such a rapid rate were police officers.

In another instant they reached the coach, and paused in a dense throng near it.

One, who appeared to have the command, rode forward and put his head inside the coach.

"Shure now, gentlemen, an' would you please tell me what all this manes?" said Jonathan Wild, speaking with an admirable Irish brogue—"what is it you're after now?"

"Why, did not you pick up two men in Chancery Lane a little while ago," said the chief officer, withdrawing his head from the interior of the coach.

"Divil a bit, yer honour! I picked the gentleman up I've got inside by Holborn Bars! You mane the other hackney-coach, I'll be bound!"

"What other hackney-coach?"

"Why, one that passed me awhile ago. It was going at a furious rate! I wouldn't like to swear to it, because it went by so quick, but it's very odd to me if it did not go up Tottenham Court Road."

"I saw nothing of a second hackney-coach," said the police officer, "but I'll ask your fare if he knows anything about it."

Wild laughed.

"Divil a bit, sir! he's got as heavy a load as he can carry. I picked him up at Holborn Bars. The poor gentleman's drunk an' insensible!"

The chief officer paused in doubt.

So admirably had Wild played his part that, although he knew the thief-taker well, he never once suspected his identity.

"You say that another coach passed you?"

"Yes, your honour."

"And how many people were inside it?"

"Shure now, how should I know that?—it was by like a shot! I just caught sight of the jarvey, and that was all."

"And it turned up Tottenham Court Road?"

"I wouldn't like to swear to it, yer honour, for fear I should be mistaken, and so lead you astray, but I believe that's where he went."

"Who's that on the box with you?"

When Mr. Noakes heard this question asked, so terrified was he that he almost fell to the ground.

But Wild answered, with perfect calmness:

"Yer honour, it's my friend, Pat Flin; it was him that found the gentleman drunk and insensible in the road, and so he called me, and we're going to take him home, and that's how it comes that he's on the box with me to-night."

There was nothing peculiar or unusual about Wild's answers.

It was no uncommon thing for persons to be driven home in a hackney-coach while they were in an insensible state.

"Come, my boys!" said the commanding officer, "I am afraid we have lost the scent! Still there is nothing else left for us to do than to try the Tottenham Court Road."

"Have you done with me, yer honour?" asked Wild.

"Yes—drive on!"

"Good luck to yer, gentlemen! Good night!"

Wild whipped up his horses and started off, while the officers turned round and took their way along the Tottenham Court Road.

Jonathan had a narrower escape than he thought for.

The real driver inside was fast recovering from the effects of his blows, and if he had stayed—or, rather, if the officers had kept him—only a few minutes longer, the man would have recovered sufficiently to give his account of the matter.

"Was not that well done?" said Wild, addressing his companion—"did you think we should get off so easily as that? Why, what are you trembling and shaking for in that manner?"

"Oh, Mr. Wild!" said the Governor, "I am not used to these narrow escapes,—they terrify me—they do indeed!"

"Bah! All's well! The trouble and danger is over now! Before these officers discover their mistake we shall be far enough off—never fear!"

"But where is it you intend to go?"

"That is more than I can tell you,—I shall be guided entirely by circumstances. If it will be any consolation to you, I can tell you that you will go with me wherever I go."

"I think we should be better apart, Mr. Wild,—I do indeed!"

"Never mind what you think—I will have things my way!"

Wild started, for at this moment there came from the interior of the coach a most unearthly yell.

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD DISCOVER THE BANDITTI'S STRONGHOLD]

"That is our friend inside," he said. "Well, never mind, we are in a lonely place, and let him make as much noise as he will—no one will hear him!"

"Stop—stop!" cried the driver,—“where are you going to?”

"What's that to you?" said Wild. "Hold your row, or it will be the worse for you!"

The driver then did a very foolish thing, though probably at the time he was scarcely in full possession of his senses.

He opened the door of the coach and attempted to get out.

The consequence was he rolled headlong into the road.

Jonathan lashed the horses till they broke into a gallop, and in a few moments the driver was left behind, although he scrambled to his feet and ran as fast as he could after the vehicle.

The success of this little device put Jonathan Wild in excellent spirits—he seemed to look upon it as a token of how he should get on in future.

No. 106.—BLUESKIN.

He drove straight on until he came to Kensington Gravel Pits, and here he paused.

"Get down!" he said, addressing Mr. Noakes, "we are far enough from London. I don't want to get too great a distance. This will do very well."

The Governor reluctantly obeyed, and Wild, having secured the reins to the piece of iron at the end of the seat on which he had been sitting, took hold of the whip and got down likewise.

He took hold of the bridles of the panting horses, and turned their heads in the direction of London.

Then, stepping aside, he gave them several severe cuts with the whip, running along by the side of the coach for several yards in order to do so.

At a mad speed the infuriated horses galloped off towards London.

"We are clear of them, at any rate," said Jonathan, "and I think it will puzzle the police officers to trace us to this spot."

"But where are you going?"

"Follow me, and you will see; I know all the ins-and-outs of this place perfectly well."

Wild turned off from the high-road, leading his companion by the arm.

"Stop!" he said, suddenly; "you will have to descend here, and you must be careful, as you stand a good chance of breaking your neck!"

All around was perfectly dark, and so these words caused Mr. Noakes no small amount of terror.

To his great relief and satisfaction, the moon broke out from a dark cloud and partially showed him where he was.

He stood on the verge of an old gravel pit, the depth of which seemed unfathomable.

It had evidently not been used for a very long time.

The sides were covered with ferns and such other vegetation that is found growing in similar places.

"Come on!" said Wild,—"there is a snug retreat at the bottom, and I am not at all afraid that we shall be found."

"But how are we to reach it?"

"There is a winding path which is well known to me," was the reply. "Take hold of my hand, and follow carefully in my steps—I will lead the way."

Mr. Noakes by no means relished this adventure, but he was forced to submit; and he felt that it was only one of many disagreeables that he would have to put up with.

Although he spoke so confidently about knowing the path, Jonathan Wild proceeded with very great caution indeed.

There was good reason for it, for the path was only just wide enough to allow one person to walk upon it, and one false step would have the effect of precipitating him to the bottom of the abyss.

The loose soil crumbled in many places beneath, and went rolling down into the depths below.

Mr. Noakes's fright was excessive, and he clutched wildly at the shrubs which grew out from the side of the pit, heedless of the injuries that he inflicted upon his hands, for many bushes were of a thorny character.

To add to the discomfort of his position, the moon again went behind a cloud, and all was dark as the very grave itself.

Every now and then the thief-taker would speak to his companion, generally in a gruff and angry tone of voice.

At last, without the occurrence of any accident, though they had several narrow escapes, Jonathan and Mr. Noakes reached the bottom of the gravel pit.

The latter looked up, and saw they were at a great distance from the surface.

He could just see the clouds above, which appeared to rest on the very edge of the excavation.

"Be careful how you tread," said Wild. "Be sure you follow in my footsteps, for there are many deep and treacherous holes hereabout, and some of them are partly filled with water."

It was quite evident that the thief-taker was intimately acquainted with this place, for he walked across the bottom of the gravel pit with great confidence, and without making one false step.

At last he stopped before some low, rude building, the principal outlines of which Mr. Noakes could dimly distinguish, for his eyes were becoming accustomed to the deep gloom.

"What place is this?" he asked.

"Where we can hide in security," replied Wild. "I feel quite safe now."

"Is it a shed?"

"Yes. I fancy it must have been built many years ago for the accommodation of the men who dug the gravel in this place. Perhaps it was made in order to contain their tools."

"Very likely. Can you get in?"

"Oh, yes! The place has not been occupied since I can remember. The door will open with a push. I could mention several who have hidden themselves here, and never been found."

Wild pushed open a little door as he spoke, and dragged Mr. Noakes into the shed along with him.

It was not high enough to allow them to stand upright—indeed, its dimensions in every way were limited.

Jonathan closed the door.

"Here we are," he said. "For a time we shall be safe."

I am worn out now, and shall try to get a few hours' sleep. If you are wise, you will do the same thing."

"I am horribly fatigued," said the Governor. "I am a wretched man—a most miserable one!"

"Pho—pho! There is a pair of us! Better times will come yet, Mr. Noakes! You leave matters to me! I would let you go, for you are more of an encumbrance to me than anything else, only I feel so much safer while you are by my side."

Jonathan gave one of his old chuckles as he spoke.

Both were very, very weary, and they threw themselves down upon the damp floor of the shed with a feeling of very great pleasure.

They were fatigued to the last degree, and before they had laid down very long, both fell asleep.

Jonathan must have had great confidence in the excellence of his hiding-place, or he never would have taken matters so easily as he did.

While both were sleeping thus, what an easy prey they would have been had the officers chanced to find them, and it did not by any means seem impossible that they should track them to their present place of retreat.

CHAPTER DV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES LEAVE THE OLD GRAVEL PIT AND FALL INTO EXTREME DANGER AT THE INN.

THE remainder of the night, however, passed away without the occurrence of any incident.

The slumbers of the two companions in crime were undisturbed.

No officers came near, and so they slept in security and peace.

No, not in peace—in security it might be; but the dreams which visited the slumbers of both were of the most horrible description.

When at last they awoke, it was with a feeling of infinite relief that they noticed that daylight was streaming in through the many crevices in the shed.

"Are you there, Noakes?" said Wild, in a growling voice. "Speak!—are you there, I say?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild," replied the Governor, timorously, "I am here."

"That's all right then! Don't you try to give me the slip, or it will be the worse for you! It is daylight I see."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Then get up, and don't lie there like a fool! Get up, and let us look around us!"

With many groans Mr. Noakes rose to his feet.

His limbs were stiff, and all his bones ached, for he had been compelled to stretch himself at full length upon the damp earth while he slept.

Jonathan Wild got up, and he uttered some horrible groans when he found how the least movement of any of his limbs pained him.

He pushed open the door of the shed and looked out.

It was a miserable morning—rain was descending slowly and steadily, soaking through everything with the greatest pertinacity.

The thief-taker uttered a growl.

"Pleasant weather this!" he said. "But no matter; they won't be so likely to be looking out for us. We are safe, don't you think, Noakes?"

"You know best, Mr. Wild. I hope we are safe!"

"Oh yes!—but what we are to do all day is more than I can tell. I suppose we must remain here and make ourselves as comfortable as we can."

"Y—yes, Mr. Wild," said the Governor; "but it is a very uncomfortable place."

"It is; but there might be more uncomfortable places; for instance: Tyburn on such a morning as this would be very uncomfortable."

"Don't talk like that, Mr. Wild," said the Governor, with a shudder. "I had much rather you hold your tongue altogether."

"I shall do as I please," returned Wild. "You understand you will obey all my commands—if you don't it will be the worse for you!"

"I have always been ready to serve you, Mr. Wild, and I am the same now—I will do all I can for you."

"That's right; it is not much at present. We must stay here all day; when night comes we shall be able to make a move, if we think it necessary. I wish we had something to eat and drink."

"And a fire, Mr. Wild. It is very cold—I am chilled to the bone. Couldn't we have a fire?"

"No, idiot, of course we could not! The smoke would rise above and betray our hiding-place at once. Now, if we had some brandy or rum, or something of that sort, we should be able to keep the cold out."

"So we should."

The two villains, in anything but an enviable frame of mind either with themselves or with each other, crept back into the shed.

Crouching down at some distance from each other, they felt there was nothing left for them to do but to wait in patience for night to come.

What would be done then Mr. Noakes could not tell; he was entirely at the mercy of his companion, and would have to go just where he thought proper.

As for the thief-taker, he was busily engaged in thinking what should be next done.

It was a raw, cold, miserable day, and they experienced much inconvenience and discomfort.

In a little while the pangs of hunger began to make themselves felt, but they had nothing wherewith to satisfy them.

As they grew more and more hungry so did their ill-temper increase, and they were perpetually snarling at each other.

It seemed as if the day would never reach an end; but at last, to their great joy, it began to grow dusk, and as soon as the obscurity was great enough, they ventured forth.

The rain had ceased, but the sky looked dark and threatening, and there was every probability that it would turn out a stormy night.

"Come," said Wild to his companion, "follow me, and take care how you tread."

"Where are you going, Mr. Wild?"

"Out of this place. I must get something to eat and drink."

"I am very hungry too, and cold to the bone."

"Of course you are; but we will soon remedy that state of things. Follow me!"

Jonathan Wild strode onward with a confident step, evincing his familiarity with this strange place.

He led the way up the narrow precipitous path they had descended a few hours before, and the two rascals gained the top without the occurrence of any accident.

All around looked very cheerless and dismal, and the ground was completely soaked by the rain which had fallen so continuously all day.

The thief-taker led the way to the high-road.

To reach it they had to force a passage through a strong hedge.

Before doing this, Jonathan Wild provided himself with a stout, heavy stick, almost a bludgeon.

He grasped the lightest end, and whirled it round in his hand with extreme satisfaction.

"Now," said Wild, as soon as the high-road was gained, "this seems a nice, quiet spot, so we will wait here and see what turns up."

"What are you going to wait for, Mr. Wild?"

"Money," was the laconic reply.

"You are not going to commit a highway robbery?"

"Why not? Surely you are not the man to stick at a thing like that!"

"But the danger!"

"Stuff! Never mind the danger; besides, we must have something to eat and drink. I have no money—how do you any?"

"None."

"Very well, then, what else are we to do? You would not have us starve, would you?"

"This will be the death of me," said Mr. Noakes, shivering. "I am sure it will be the death of me. Why not let me go, and allow me to seek my own safety in my own fashion?"

"Because I don't choose to do so! Silence!—hark! I can hear something approaching!"

Mr. Noakes listened, and could hear the rumbling of wheels, and then soon after he perceived in the distance two small twinkling lights.

"The stage coach," said Wild. "We must creep back into the shadow of the hedge and let it pass us; it is no good for us to think of stopping that."

Mr. Noakes was only too glad to shrink back, and, crouching down under the hedge in a dry ditch, they waited for the stage coach to pass by.

On came the huge, lumbering vehicle at a rapid rate, and swept past them with a prodigious clatter.

"Patience," muttered Wild. "Something will come in our way before long—there are always plenty of people upon this road."

Mr. Noakes said nothing.

As the rumbling sound produced by the stage coach passed away, another sound became audible to his ears.

This was the rapid beat of horses' hoofs upon the road. Jonathan listened intently for about a moment, and then he said:

"They are officers!"

Mr. Noakes uttered a cry of alarm, and made a frantic effort to dash through the hedge.

Jonathan prevented him by roughly seizing hold of his arm.

"Keep still, you fool!" he said. "What are you going to do?"

"Let us fly while we have the chance!"

"Nothing of the kind! Keep still where you are; the officers will not dream of our being here, and will pass, beyond a doubt."

As the approaching troop of horses drew nearer, Jonathan Wild's surmise was proved to be correct.

They were police officers, and proceeding at a rapid gallop.

They dashed past the spot where the fugitives were concealed, without for a moment suspecting their presence there, and Jonathan Wild had the satisfaction of watching their retreating forms.

Mr. Noakes was so full of alarm at having had this narrow escape, that he trembled so excessively as to be scarcely able to stand.

Jonathan still kept hold of him, in case he should attempt to run away.

About a quarter of an hour passed away in perfect silence, and then the quick ear of the thief-taker detected a footstep.

"Hush!" he said to his companion. "There is some one coming at last! Move or speak at your peril!"

Some one was walking along the road in the direction of London.

It was one man, and he was whistling some complicated tune in a very loud key.

As he heard him coming, Jonathan grinned ferociously, and clutched the stick he had taken out of the hedge with additional tightness.

Not dreaming he was in any danger, the traveller walked on with a brisk and confident step.

At last, Jonathan caught sight of his dusky form.

He allowed him to pass by the spot where he was concealed without attempting to molest him, but as soon as the unfortunate traveller's back was turned towards him, Jonathan rose swiftly and silently to his full height.

With the thick stick raised in the air in readiness to descend at any moment, Jonathan strode rapidly after the traveller.

Then, when he was near enough, he brought the stick down with full force upon the man's head.

He fell as though he had been struck by lightning, and lay in the road on his back perfectly motionless and insensible.

Jonathan Wild laughed horribly and exultingly at the success he had met with.

It was a cowardly, treacherous attack.

He turned round, expecting to see Mr. Noakes just behind him.

But he was not; the Governor had never moved from his position in the ditch.

Wild went towards him.

"Get up," he said—"get up at once! Don't you think I did the job well?"

Mr. Noakes shuddered and obeyed the thief-taker's command.

"Now," said Wild, "I don't intend to perform all the work! You must take your share of it, or else you shall have none of the profits!"

"What do you want me to do?"

"I'll show you."

Wild half dragged the Governor along the road until the spot where the traveller lay was reached.

"Now," he said, "stoop down and pick his pockets—" take everything there is of any value. I know you can manage that job first rate—you have had plenty of practice!"

Mr. Noakes seemed half inclined to disobey Wild's commands, but at last, with a dismal groan, he sank down on his knees beside the body.

The feeling then came over him that the sooner he performed his task the better it would be, so he searched in all the pockets with great speed.

There was little to recompense them for their trouble.

The traveller had only a small amount of money in his pockets, and scarcely any article of a valuable nature.

Jonathan was much enraged when he became aware of this, though he affected to be content.

"Roll the body into the ditch," he said, "and then it will be out of the way. There is not much money, it is true, but still we have sufficient to purchase something to eat and drink, and that's all we need trouble about just at present."

Mr. Noakes rolled the body of the traveller into the ditch as Wild directed, and then looked up, as though waiting for further orders.

"Come along!" cried Jonathan. "We will now get something to eat."

Both were ready to sink to the earth from the combined effects of cold and hunger.

Jonathan walked along the high-road for a little distance, until he came to a narrow lane which branched off from it.

Down this he turned, and in a little while came to a small roadside public-house.

"Shall you go in here?" asked Mr. Noakes, in some alarm.

"Yes. Why not? It is dark, and the chances are a thousand to one that we shall not be recognised; besides, there is no other place that I know of where we are so likely to obtain what we want."

"I am terrified, Mr. Wild!"

"But you must be calm and collected; if you are not, you will ruin all. Take pattern by me!"

Wild walked into the public-house with as much unconcern as anyone possibly could have done.

His companion crept in after him.

On the left-hand side of the passage was a large room, in which many persons were assembled.

With a boldness that almost amounted to recklessness, Jonathan walked into this public room and seated himself near the fireplace.

Mr. Noakes sat down beside him.

About a dozen men were seated in various positions, engaged in smoking, drinking, and talking.

When the two new comers entered, all bent their eyes upon them, but they were not able to make out much, for the room was only lighted by a few tallow candles, which were stuck into sconces and suspended against the walls.

When they sat down, the forms of Wild and his companion were in deep shadow, so there appeared to be not much fear of recognition.

Wild called for something to eat and drink, and upon the articles being placed before them on the table, both fell to work so ravenously, that they almost forgot where they were.

As they were finishing their meal they heard some one enter the room.

Looking up, they saw it was a man whose dress showed that he was of humble station.

He was greeted by several of those present, and seated himself in a chair with easy familiarity.

"Well, Luke," said one of the guests, "what is the latest news—anything particular?"

"Well yes, if it's true, and I believe it is."

"What has happened then?"

"Why last night Jonathan Wild escaped from Newgate. The Governor of the prison has disappeared, and it is supposed that they are both together."

Mr. Noakes dropped his knife and fork and seemed to be gasping for breath.

Wild dealt him a savage kick when he saw him thus lose his self-control.

The man who had been called Luke continued.

"It seems very mysterious how Jonathan Wild escaped, but the particulars have not been properly made known. One comfort is, they have got upon the rascal's track, and he is almost certain to be captured before morning."

"I am glad of that," said one of the guests, "for Jonathan Wild deserves hanging a thousand times over!"

"So he does—and look you, I have had it from good authority, that he has been tracked to this neighbourhood. He is supposed to be hiding somewhere close at hand, and the police are out searching in all directions. A party of officers stopped and questioned me not long ago. They were on their way to the inn here. I shouldn't wonder if they don't make a call."

Just at that moment the trampling of horses' feet outside reached the ears of all present, and Luke said:

"Ah! Here they are! I thought they would pay this place a visit—not that I suppose the men they want are here though!"

CHAPTER DVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ESCAPE FROM THE DUNGEON, AND DISCOVER THE PLACE WHERE EDGWORTH BESS IS CONFINED.

The attack which had been made by Grimm's banditti upon Blueskin and Jack Sheppard was so sudden and unexpected, that it to some extent deprived them of the power to think, and it was not until they found themselves the inmates of a dungeon beneath the ruined castle that they fully realised their position.

After this, their first care was to ascertain whether either of them had been wounded, and they were rejoiced to find that they were not hurt.

"Should you think we are on the right track?" said Jack Sheppard, coolly. "Do you think these are the rascals that killed Ned Cattle and carried Edgworth Bess away?"

"I have no doubt they are," replied Blueskin. "Ned described them as banditti, and this is evidently their secret haunt."

"But there might be two gangs of them!"

"So there might; but you must not forget the signal that we saw fluttering from that loophole in the turret; there is some prisoner confined there, and my conviction is, that it is Edgworth Bess."

"Then," said Jack, resolutely, "it won't be very long before she is set at liberty."

Blueskin laughed.

"Stone walls and strong doors are no good to confine you with, Jack!" he said. "You think nothing of them! I suppose you look upon it as perfectly easy to make an escape from this dungeon?"

"Certainly I do! Here are two of us, unfettered, and with all our weapons about us. Why, we could have the place down in a very little while!"

"An escape from this place," said Blueskin, "seems insignificant enough in comparison with an escape from Newgate under such circumstances as you managed to escape."

"Decidedly. But let us turn the whole of our attention to considering what we had better do. Something seems to tell me that Edgworth Bess is a prisoner above, and I am impatient for the moment to come when I shall see her once more."

"We had better wait, I think, until the night is further advanced. The banditti then will probably have retired to rest, or else have set out upon some excursion."

"I hope the latter."

"So do I; but let us make as good an examination of this dungeon as we can, and find out which is the weakest part of it."

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, in no way daunted by their situation, made a rigid examination of the cell.

The walls were of massive stone, and so strong and solid did they seem to be, that Jack shook his head and turned away.

The dungeon was lighted by a single loophole high up in the wall, and so narrow that not even Jack Sheppard could have squeezed his slender form through it.

They were thus driven to the door as the only route by which they could hope to escape.

This was of great strength, and strongly studded with iron rivets: and when it had been closed they heard the banditti turn the key in the lock, shoot two bolts into their sockets, and place a heavy bar across the door.

"We shall have a little hard work to do," said Jack Sheppard, "but the door will yield before us; I have no doubt of that. We will wait an hour or two longer before we commence operations."

Accordingly the two friends seated themselves upon a rude kind of stone bench that was in the dungeon, and talked over their future prospects.

In that subterranean place no sound of any kind from above reached their ears, so they were unable to discover whether the banditti had retired to rest, or whether they had sallied forth into the forest.

At last Jack Sheppard found himself unable any longer to control his patience, and, rising to his feet, he commenced an attack upon the door with a strong clasp knife.

Blueskin seconded his efforts, and it soon became evident that what they intended to do was to cut a hole in the lower part of the door just large enough to allow them to creep through.

That this would be a work of time was quite certain, but still they persevered and continued at their task with a great amount of energy.

At last, one vigorous blow was sufficient to knock the square piece out of the door, and then there was no obstacle between them and freedom.

They crept through quickly, and then paused to listen. All was very still and very dark, and they had some difficulty in groping about and finding the stone staircase.

Having done so, they began to ascend it, and reached the top without experiencing any interruption.

At the top of the stairs, however, was another door—a very strong one, yet not quite so strong as the one which guarded the dungeon.

Jack Sheppard passed his hands rapidly over this door and felt a lock.

He considered it was quite possible that this was the only means by which it was secured, so, taking his clasp knife from his pocket, he set to work to remove the screws.

This occupied him about half an hour, but at the end of that time the lock came off in his hand.

With a beating heart he tried the door, and, to his joy, found that it would open.

They stepped out into the ruins instantly, and had their object simply been to make their escape they could have done so with very little trouble.

But first of all they had to find their way to the turret in which they believed Edgworth Bess was confined, and after that to release her.

They had nothing whatever to guide them, so they took their course through the ruins at perfect random, until suddenly they stopped upon hearing the murmur of many voices.

They listened and then crept nearer.

"The rascals are enjoying themselves!" said Jack Sheppard. "I wonder which is the way to the turret. If we can find it, and if it is not too strongly guarded, all will be well."

"Let us leave this spot," said Blueskin; "we can do no good by lingering here, and we are running extra danger."

"What had we better do?"

"I should advise that we take the nearest way into the forest; because when we are there we shall be able to see just where the turret is situated and to make our way towards it."

"Let us do so, then."

Creeping forward with as much silence as they could, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard endeavoured to find the way out of the ruins.

In a few minutes they saw before them a low, strong-looking arch, through which they could see the trees in the forest.

They were just about to pass through it, when Blueskin seized Jack suddenly by the arm and drew him back.

There was no need for him to explain his motive for this sudden proceeding—the necessity of it became apparent at once.

A man, carrying a musket in a very slovenly manner over his shoulder, passed slowly by the archway.

He only remained in sight a moment, and then Blueskin asked:

"What shall we do with him?"

"We must manage to dispose of him quietly somehow or other!" returned Jack. "Let us keep in the shade and get a little closer."

They were only able to advance a few steps when the man appeared again.

It was evident from this that he had not far to go backwards and forwards.

Indeed, the probability is, that he was only placed there to guard the archway, and he was walking up and down in order to overcome the severe cold.

As soon as he was out of sight again, our friends took the opportunity of getting a little closer.

When the archway was reached, Blueskin touched his companion on the arm and said:

"Leave the rascal to me—I will settle him!"

"You must do it silently, then—if you make the least noise an alarm will be given."

"I know all about that, do not be afraid."

Blueskin placed himself in readiness to carry out his purpose.

Then the sentinel appeared.

Blueskin dashed forward with great suddenness, and struck him a violent blow with his clenched fist.

So well was it delivered that the man fell to the ground without so much as a groan escaping from his lips.

"Cleverly managed," said Jack. "That is one obstacle less we have got to contend against."

"Be cautious—there may be other men about! We must not be seen."

"All is well!" replied Blueskin. "Quick!—this way!"

He hastened towards the trees as he spoke, and having reached them, he paused.

It was a dark night, and it was only with great difficulty that they were able to see about them.

The ruins of the castle rose up, however, above all surrounding objects, and after gazing for a little while they were able to perceive the turret.

Having made it out, they crept cautiously onwards, keeping their eyes fixed upon it as long as they were able, and then trusting to themselves to keep in the proper direction.

Upon approaching the base of the turret, the sounds of revelry which had before reached their ears again made themselves heard.

"We are close to where they are carousing," said Jack Sheppard. "Be cautious!"

"I am; but, from the appearance of the place, I can't help thinking that the only means by which the turret can be reached will be by passing through the room where the banditti are assembled."

"But that is simply impossible."

"I am aware of it."

"Then we must think of something else. Look up! Do you see that breach in the wall above?"

"Yes."

"Well, if we reach that, don't you think we should manage to gain the turret?"

"It is quite possible."

"Let us try, then, and speedily, for it is our only chance. If we linger much longer, morning will be upon us."

Upon making a closer inspection of the premises, our friends came to the identical place where Edgworth Bess and Crazy Carl had descended.

The edge of the roof was a little above their reach as they stood, but, giving a vigorous leap, they managed to grasp it with their hands, and then to draw themselves up.

Climbing the roof, they reached the wall, and along this they trod swiftly, and gained the ruined chamber with little trouble.

Now, however, they were at a loss how to proceed, for the door opening upon the staircase was situate in a dark corner, and for some time it eluded their observation.

Blueskin discovered it, and uttered a cry of satisfaction.

They found, however, that it was firmly fastened, for, after the escape of Crazy Carl and Edgworth Bess, the bandit chief had been at great pains to have it thoroughly secured.

After having accomplished so much, it was not likely that Jack Sheppard would suffer himself to be daunted by this obstacle, and so, speaking in an encouraging voice to his comrade, he set to work upon it with as much vigour and determination as he had used in his attack on the door of the dungeon.

Although they worked hard, quite an hour elapsed before the door yielded to their efforts.

Then, passing through it, they found themselves on the stone staircase, and they began to ascend it without hesitation.

They suffered great inconvenience from the want of a light, for the staircase was involved in almost pitch darkness, and they had to grope their way upwards by the sense of touch alone.

There were narrow loop-holes here and there, but the night was so dark that they were scarcely of any service, and they would have been ignorant of their existence, except that the sky, as seen through them, was of a lighter tint than the walls themselves.

Believing that he had now accomplished his task, and that in a few moments more he should rejoin Edgworth Bess, from whom he had been so long separated, Jack Sheppard could hardly restrain his impatience.

He bounded up the steps at a speed which Blueskin was totally unable to keep up with, nor did he pause until his further progress was barred by a door.

That door was the one leading into the turret chamber in which Edgworth Bess was confined.

Jack paused before it, and his heart beat so quickly and so painfully, that he was unable to move or speak.

In this condition he was found by Blueskin a moment afterwards.

"Rouse up, Jack! We have succeeded up to the present moment far better than we could possibly have hoped for—indeed, our success alarms me!"

"This door," said Jack—"try it! I have not dared to do so! Tell me whether it is fast?"

Blueskin tried the door, and found it firm, but he discovered that the fastenings were all on the side on which he stood.

There were two bolts, a massive bar, and a ponderous lock: the last, however, was without a key.

"Jack," said Blueskin, "before we do any more, I will knock. Perhaps we shall get a reply—perhaps we shall know who it is on the other side of this door."

CHAPTER DVII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN LIBERATE EDGWORTH BESS, AND OLD GRIMM SETS FIRE TO THE RUINED CASTLE.

THAT night, so eventful to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, was a most distressful one to Edgworth Bess.

At one time she indulged in the hope that deliverance was at hand, and that in a little while she should be freed from her captivity, but as hour after hour passed away without the occurrence of anything unusual, her hopes grew fainter and fainter, until at last they died out altogether.

Throwing herself upon the rude couch, she fell into a strange, dreamy state, half-waking, half-sleeping.

From this she was aroused by a knocking at her door.

She started up and listened for a repetition of the sound, for, not unnaturally, she supposed that her fancy had deceived her.

The knocking was repeated.

Almost suffocating with joy, she hurried to the door, and, placing her lips close to it, said:

"Who is there?"

The voice was faint and almost inarticulate, but Jack Sheppard heard her speak, and he rapped encouragingly upon the woodwork.

"We are here," he said—"Blueskin and myself. We have come to set you at liberty."

With a cry of joy, Edgworth Bess burst into tears, and then, quite overcome, sank down upon the floor of the chamber.

The energy and skill which Jack had before exhibited were as nothing in comparison with the efforts he now made.

Blueskin seconded him in a most able manner.

The rusty bolts were withdrawn from their sockets, the ponderous iron bar was removed, and nothing remained but the lock.

As this was fixed on the outer side, Jack Sheppard knew that the quickest, as well as the most noiseless way to remove it, was by taking out the screws.

One by one he removed them, and then, flinging open the door, he rushed in.

While her friends were at work upon the door, Edgworth Bess had regained her courage.

She had risen to her feet, and as soon as Jack Sheppard entered she sprang forward, and the next moment found herself tightly clasped in his embrace.

For a brief space of time nothing was remembered or thought of except that they were once more united.

Their happiness, however, was destined to be of brief duration.

Pueskin touched Jack upon the shoulder, and said:

"Be on your guard, but keep silence—some one is coming!"

A cry of alarm almost escaped the lips of Edgworth Bess, but, with great presence of mind, she suppressed it.

Jack listened, and he heard plainly enough that some one was ascending the stairs.

"The alarm has been given!" he said.

"I fear so!" replied Blueskin. "They have either discovered the man I knocked down, or else they have heard us opening this door."

"What is to be done?"

"We must defend ourselves to the best of our ability."

Blueskin strode to the door as he spoke, and took hold of the heavy iron bar.

He stood with this in his hands, waiting for the person who was coming to complete his ascent.

Almost immediately he caught sight of the figure of a man, whose features were revealed by the small hand-lamp he was carrying.

He was recognised by him as the one who had taken the lead in the attack that had been made upon them at sunset.

It was Grimm, the bandit chief.

Blueskin drew back so as to avoid being seen, and Grimm, who had been drinking deeply, came slowly and staggeringly up the stairs.

From his manner, it would almost seem that he was about to pay some ordinary visit, and not that an alarm had been raised, or that he had any idea his prisoners were escaping.

This was a doubtful point, however, and Blueskin determined to run no risks.

He waited till the bandit chief had almost reached the topmost step, and then, holding the iron bar in both hands, he rushed forward with it, and struck him with the end full in the breast.

Grimm uttered a loud shout, and made frantic efforts to preserve his balance, but in vain, and he fell backward down the winding staircase with a crashing sound that was appalling.

"That was an effectual blow," said Blueskin, "but I am afraid it will do us as much harm as good. The whole of the banditti in the ruins now will be aware that something amiss is going forward."

"Never mind," said Jack Sheppard, "we will fight them all; they are cowardly wretches, and scarcely worthy to be our opponents."

"I am afraid you will find our position more dangerous than you think."

"Let us fly!" said Edgworth Bess,—"let us leave this hateful place at once, while we have the chance!—I can show you the way."

"That is good advice," said Blueskin; "we can do no good by remaining here."

All three now prepared to descend the staircase, but before they had gone down many steps they heard loud cries from below, and then the sound of many feet rushing up the steps.

"We must retreat!" said Blueskin. "While we are in the chamber above we shall be able to defend ourselves, but here our position is much worse."

Jack saw this, and did not hesitate to turn back.

"Get your pistols ready," he said,—"it will be a sharp touch, no doubt."

"All right! Mind that you place Edgworth Bess where she will be out of danger."

Jack did so, and then rejoined his old comrade, who stood calmly at the top of the stairs with the iron bar in his hand which had already done him such a good service.

The banditti were pouring up in a tumultuous throng; they could hear them plainly, but as yet they were not in sight, though the probability was that in another moment at the most they would be.

"If we can only take them by surprise," said Jack, rapidly, "as you took the first one, we shall do well; but, then, that bar, though good against one man, would be useless against many."

"What do you propose, then?"

"In yonder corner I have just seen a couch. There is a mattress upon it. Let us both seize that, and, as soon as the banditti appear, fling it down upon them; rely upon it, they will lose their balance!"

Blueskin approved of this scheme, and placed the iron bar where he could readily take hold of it again.

Jack Sheppard dragged the mattress off the couch, and Blueskin assisted him to carry it to the door.

Just as they had it in readiness the banditti appeared.

Jack's intention was to take the banditti by surprise, and he fully succeeded.

They could not imagine what on earth it was that was coming down upon them.

As Jack had prophesied, it threw them off their balance, and all the more easily because they could not make out what it was that was attacking them.

They were rank cowards at heart, and their terror now was very great indeed.

All the lot disappeared from our friends' view with a rapidity that seemed magical.

Having once lost their balance, they tried vainly to recover it.

Such a horrible din as was caused by their rapid descent had never been heard before.

Their bodies bumped on the stone steps and against the walls in a manner that was really dreadful to listen to, while a chorus of oaths, and shrieks, and yells came from their lips.

Despite the imminent danger in which they stood, our two friends could scarcely forbear a smile.

But the time for action had arrived.

"Now," said Blueskin, "we must take this opportunity to descend."

Once more they began to go down the steps, and once more they were compelled to retreat.

The repulse they had met with, so far from disheartening the banditti, produced an opposite effect.

The bruises and the other injuries they had received worked them up into a fit of the most ungovernable rage.

Furious with passion, they all scrambled to their feet, and rushed up the stairs again, in the heat of their anger vowing and declaring to slay them all upon the spot.

For the same reason as before, it was thought prudent to retreat.

As they got higher up the staircase, the rage of the banditti abated.

Still, they would not forego their intention.

Having met with such great success, caused our friends to feel a great deal of confidence.

They resolved to change their tactics, and stood on the threshold of the turret chamber with a pistol in each hand.

As soon as the dark forms of the bandits appeared round the angle of the staircase, they fired all four weapons simultaneously.

They produced an immediate and decided effect, but still some more furious than the rest continued to press upwards.

A hand-to-hand conflict with these seemed inevitable, yet Blueskin wished to avoid it if he could.

Those banditti who continued to ascend returned the volley with great promptitude, and then, although he almost despaired of success, Blueskin picked up the iron bar in both hands, and flung it lengthways at them.

The manner in which the mass of metal carried the banditti before it was terrible.

Down they went, and this time more severely injured than at first.

For the last time, Blueskin, Jack Sheppard, and Edgworth Bess ran down the staircase, and then they were brought to a standstill from another reason.

Up the spiral staircase, as up some huge chimney, there came dense volumes of blinding, suffocating smoke, the heat of which increased with great rapidity.

"They have lighted a fire at the bottom of the staircase," said Jack Sheppard, "and there seems draught enough to make it roar like a furnace! What is to be done?"

"There is a door a little lower down, through which we can escape!"

"We know it," said Blueskin. "We made our way through it a little while ago."

"Come on, then!" said Jack Sheppard. "The longer we stop the worse the smoke will be."

It seemed the height of madness to continue to descend the staircase, yet our friends well knew that they had no other resource; they must either make a bold rush for it now, or else perish miserably in the flames.

By Jack's directions, Edgworth Bess placed a portion of her dress over her face, so as to keep out the smoke as much as possible, while Blueskin and himself adopted the same precaution.

The pungent smoke, however, confused them beyond measure.

They gasped for breath and reeled.

Once or twice they narrowly escaped a fall.

They had nothing but the sense of touch to aid them in discovering the door.

It was impossible to see more than a few inches before them.

And as they went lower and lower, the heat increased to an insupportable degree, and then the long-tongued flames made their appearance.

Further progress now seemed impossible, and all three felt a powerful impulse to turn and fly.

It was certain, if they remained where they now stood, they would be scorched to death.

Their situation now was alarming to a degree, and they were beginning to despair, when Blueskin suddenly cried out:

"Here is the door!"

They rushed quickly in the direction from which his voice proceeded, and in another second passed through the door.

They were severely scorched by the process, but still they felt that they were for the time being comparatively safe.

The flames began to pour fiercely through the open door into the room, so Blueskin closed it.

This would check the progress of the flames for a few moments, and by that time they hoped they should be out of danger.

To their alarm and horror, however, they discovered that the floor of the apartment which they had gained was so hot as to make it almost impossible for them to walk upon it.

In the distance could be seen the breach in the wall through which they had entered, and, believing that this offered them their sole chance of escape, they ran towards it.

Upon reaching it they looked down, and were unable to see anything but a mass of flames and smoke beneath.

The distance to the ground was considerable, and it seemed impossible to reach it.

What astonished Blueskin and Jack was the rapidity with which the flames had spread.

Had they known all, their astonishment would have ceased.

In anticipation of the time when the end of his career should come, the bandit chief had caused many of the chambers in the ruin to be filled with the most combustible materials he could obtain.

His intention was, that should he find things going against him, he would set fire to the place, and so bring about the destruction of as many of his enemies as he could.

But he had never resolved to do this until driven to it in the last extremity.

On the present occasion, however, he suffered his passion to get the better of his reason.

When he reached the bottom of the stairs, after being hurled down by the blow with the iron bar, he lay several moments quite insensible.

Pain, however, quickly brought him back to life, and then, literally maddened with rage, he sprang to his feet and set fire to the inflammable materials he had been at so much trouble to collect.

When he saw the rapid and fierce progress of the flames, his passion cooled, reason returned to him, and he regretted that he had been so precipitate.

But it was too late.

No mortal power could possibly quench the fire, and it increased in fury every instant.

CHAPTER DVIII.

BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGORTH BESS ESCAPE FROM THE BANDITS' STRONGHOLD AND EMBARK FOR ENGLAND.

TRULY was the position of our three friends a most perilous one.

When they looked down and saw the flames raging so fiercely beneath them, they instinctively turned back with the intention of retreating and seeking some other mode of escape.

But the fire, which was raging with the utmost fury underneath, had attacked the floor.

The boards were now literally red hot, and the flames shot up between them with increasing fierceness.

It was quite clear that it would be impossible to recross the chamber to the door by which they had entered it.

Not only was the heat terrific, but the state of the floor was such, that the least additional weight pressing upon it would have the effect of carrying it in with one crash.

"We must escape this way," said Jack Sheppard; "and if we are quick I fancy it may be done. We must either try it, or else remain here and be burnt to death. I will drop down on to the wall first, you hand Edgorth Bess to me, and then follow with all the speed you can."

It looked like certain death to make the attempt which Jack Sheppard proposed, still Blueskin thought that if it was their fate to be consumed among the ruins of that ancient building, the event might as well take place while they were trying to escape as while they were standing where they were.

After he had spoken, Jack Sheppard lost not a moment in lowering himself on to the wall.

Edgorth Bess was handed down to him in safety, and Blueskin followed quickly.

All three stood upon that broad stone wall.

Flames were around them on every side, and curling about their feet.

The stone wall was heated to such a degree, that they could scarcely bear to stand upon it.

"Quick!" cried Jack. "Follow me! I will lead the way. If we are speedy, I fancy even now that all will be well!"

Jack did not think so, but he spoke thus in order to inspire his companions with as much courage as he could.

They ran hastily along the wall, and as they got still further from the window through which they had escaped, the heat and fury of the flames much abated.

As we have stated in a former chapter, this stone wall led to some small out-buildings, which were at no great height from the ground.

The roofs of these were not in the least injured by the fire, which had not spread so far, therefore our friends were able to slip down them and reach the ground with very little difficulty and danger.

All were more or less scorched and blistered by the fire, but the injuries they had received were comparatively trifling, and a feeling of deep thankfulness came over their hearts at once more finding themselves on firm ground beneath the open sky.

But they were not destined to get off so easily as they imagined.

There was a shout and a sudden rush of footsteps, and then the bandit chief with three of his men appeared suddenly before them.

Grimm was furious with rage, and rushed forward to commence the attack, calling loudly upon his followers to keep close behind him.

Edgorth Bess uttered a scream, and then swooned as soon as she caught sight of the new comers.

Blueskin placed her on the ground beside him, and then a furious struggle commenced.

But Jack Sheppard and Blueskin were more than a match for four cowardly German rascals, and they laid about them with great vigour and determination.

The conflict was sharp but short.

When it was over, the bandit chief and his three followers lay stretched upon the ground.

Both our friends had been wounded, but not seriously.

They bound up their hurts, and then bent over Edgorth Bess, who began to show signs of returning consciousness.

So anxious was he to get clear of the place, that Blueskin did not wait for her to completely recover, as she probably would have done in the course of a few moments, but picked her up in his arms and hastened off into the forest.

Jack Sheppard followed, so as to be in readiness should the bandits make a further attack upon them.

But they were unmolested.

After going some little distance, Blueskin paused.

He had the will to go further, but his strength was not sufficient for the task; besides, the wound which he had received in one of his arms pained him exceedingly.

By this time Edgorth Bess was in full possession of her senses, and when Blueskin put her down, she was able to stand without assistance.

Actuated by one impulse, which they found themselves unable to resist, all three turned their eyes in the direction of the burning building.

The fire was now at its height.

The flames encircled the old ruin in every part, and shot up into the sky, illuminating every object for miles around with startling brilliancy.

It so chanced that they had halted in that glade in which so good a view of the whole edifice could be obtained, so that the spectacle upon which they gazed was grand in the extreme.

There is a species of fascination connected with a conflagration on a grand scale which few are able to resist, and our three friends stood gazing upon the burning castle as though they were riveted to the earth.

The flames broke out of the little loophole from which Edgorth Bess had gazed out upon the forest for so many hours, and from the manner in which the turret rocked at its foundations, it was pretty evident that it would fall in the course of a few moments.

They waited for this event in the most breathless suspense.

At last, with a terrific crash, the turret fell.

For a few seconds it appeared to have the effect of extinguishing the fire, but directly afterwards it broke forth with redoubled fury.

Then, one after another, the walls fell, and in less than half an hour there was nothing left of the bandits' stronghold except a mass of smouldering rubbish.

"That is over," said Jack.

"Yes," returned Blueskin. "I never saw destruction so complete. We have certainly done good service in destroying such a herd of rascals."

"There is an end of them now, beyond doubt. But where is the boy who was with us?"

Blueskin uttered a cry.

"In the hurry and confusion I forgot all about him!"

"So did I."

"He has perished, then, beyond a doubt. I shall always reproach myself for this!"

"I am at a loss now to imagine how it was that we could possibly forget him."

"It is all over now. You may depend he must by this time be burned to a cinder."

Just as he spoke, a slight rustling among the bushes attracted the attention of all three, and then, to their surprise and joy, the deformed boy appeared before them.

He seemed badly scorched and burnt, and he was literally begrimed with smoke.

To all appearance, however, he had received but little injury.

"By what chance did you escape?" asked Blueskin.

"We had just come to the conclusion that you had perished!"

"I had a narrow escape," was the reply, given with a shudder. "I had lost all hope, when suddenly the action of the fire threw down one of the walls of the chambers in which I was confined. I gave one rush through the flames, and managed to escape."

"You were fortunate."

"I was; and now, what is your pleasure? If you will take my advice, you will get away from this as quickly as you can."

[BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGORTH BESS EMBARK FOR ENGLAND.]

"We intend to do so, and you shall be once more our guide."

"To what place?"

"To Amsterdam; and when we arrive there, rest assured you shall be well rewarded for all the danger and trouble you have gone through."

"Shall I take you the nearest way?"

"Yes, by all means."

"The road is rough."

"Never mind. It will suit us all the better if it is unfrequented."

The boy nodded his head, and at once took up a position in advance, and upon a signal from Blueskin he began to lead the way.

"Where shall we go now, Blueskin?" asked Jack Sheppard. "What shall we do?"

"I should recommend a return to England. I fancy, after all, we shall be safer there than in any other place."

No. 107.—BLUESKIN.

You must not forget that we have a reckoning to settle with Jonathan Wild."

"I don't forget," said Jack Sheppard; "but first there is Edgworth Bess to be attended to. When we are over there, we shall be able to watch the course of events, and if I can see her in full possession of her rights, the one purpose of my life will be achieved."

"And mine," said Blueskin.

"But will it not be very dangerous to return to England?" said Edgworth Bess, trembling as she thought of Jonathan Wild.

"Surely no more dangerous than it seems to be here."

"Perhaps not. I can assure you I have no wish to stay, for I have not known a moment's peace or happiness since my arrival."

"We shall be better off in England," said Jack Sheppard, "and I fancy, if we are only careful, we shall be easily able to keep out of the way of the officers."

After much more conversation, it was eventually agreed upon that they should proceed to Amsterdam, and then find out by what means they could secretly reach England.

Their journey was a long and toilsome one, for the road was very rough, but they contented themselves with the reflection that it would save several miles.

Without any incident happening to call for special remark, they arrived at their destination late on the following night.

The poor widow was much rejoiced to see her only son return in safety, for his lengthened absence had filled her with the greatest alarm.

Edgworth Bess was almost prostrated with fatigue.

At the little inn, however, they met with every accommodation, and it was deemed advisable to remain there for several days—at any rate, until they had all thoroughly recovered from their exhaustion.

This was evidently the wisest thing that could be done.

The few days of their sojourn at this inn were the happiest that Jack and Edgworth Bess had passed for a long time, and they almost dreaded the hour to come when they would have to set out for England.

To have taken a passage in one of the ordinary vessels plying between the ports of London and Amsterdam would have been nothing short of insanity, and when he came to make the trial, Blueskin discovered that they would have very great difficulty indeed in getting over to England secretly.

As there was no great hurry, and as they were perfectly comfortable and apparently safe in their present quarters, they resolved to wait until a chance presented itself.

In this manner several weeks elapsed, and in the end, Blueskin managed to make terms with a fisherman who owned a good-sized boat.

He agreed to take them some night, and land them on the coast of Essex.

For this service the fisherman demanded five hundred thalers, which, after having paid the landlady and rewarded her son, was almost all the money they had left.

They were compelled, however, to agree to his terms, for it seemed to be their only chance of getting back.

All was arranged in a short space of time, and one dark, rainy night the three fugitives got on board of the fisherman's boat.

It was a frail old vessel, and seemed scarcely seaworthy, although the owner of it assured them that it was strong enough to weather a heavier storm than they were at all likely to have on their voyage.

With this assurance they were compelled to content themselves, although they had many misgivings.

The large sail was hoisted, and the little craft stood out to sea without the occurrence of any accident, and this inspired the three fugitives with a little more confidence.

CHAPTER DIX.

BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGWORTH BESS REACH LONDON IN SAFETY.

WITH a heavy, rolling movement, the fishing-boat made its way over the rough waves in the direction of the shores of England.

The motion was exceedingly unpleasant; and when they got further out to sea our friends' fears returned, for they fancied every moment that the vessel would founder.

But it kept above the water bravely; and at length, after a most tedious passage, during which nothing of any particular interest occurred, the coast of England came in sight.

Blueskin directed the captain of the boat to put them ashore on some lonely part of the coast of Essex, where there was little likelihood of their arrival being noticed.

This was an easy enough matter, and eventually the lumbering craft was brought to an anchor at a spot from which no habitation or human being could be discerned.

As he had fulfilled his contract, Blueskin paid the fisherman the five hundred thalers which he had promised him, and they were landed in a little boat.

"I am glad we have reached thus far in safety," said Blueskin, as he led the way in a direct line from the sea; "and if we can only manage to gain London without being recognised by anyone, I think we shall have little to fear."

"It will be difficult," said Jack Sheppard.

"It will be toilsome, for we shall have to perform the whole journey on foot. It would never do for us to travel in any public conveyance."

"Certainly not."

"And on foot we are less likely to be taken notice of."

This was true enough, and the only obstacle in the way was that the distance to London was very great, and it was questionable whether Edgworth Bess was equal to walking so many miles.

She expressed her willingness to make the attempt, and so they travelled onwards.

Knowing pretty well in what direction his destination lay, Blueskin avoided the high-road, and, as far as he was able to do so, took his course in a straight line.

They broke their journey by halting at lonely roadside public-houses, where they obtained rest and refreshment.

A great change had taken place in the appearance of our three friends, and there was little fear of their being recognised by anyone, save those who were exceedingly familiar with them, and this made it all the more easy for them to adopt a disguise.

No incident of any kind befel them on their way to London; and at last, when they entered the great metropolis, weary and footsore, Blueskin wisely determined to make a stay in some place where he was not known; and he trusted, by the use of a few precautions, to be able to keep their identity a secret.

There were many places in London where Blueskin and Jack Sheppard would have met with a hearty reception and been carefully concealed; but if they had gone to one of these places, it would have been necessary for them to disclose themselves, and they were unwilling to do this to a single being.

They walked through the streets of London one dark night, Blueskin leading the way towards Westminster, for in this locality he believed he should be able to find the kind of shelter that he required.

He was not mistaken.

In one of those quiet, dismal streets which are to be found at this day in the neighbourhood, they obtained lodgings, and satisfied the landlady's scruples about references by paying her a month's rent in advance.

Here they settled down, resolved to watch the progress of events, and to be prepared to take advantage of any favourable accident that might occur.

They kept close within doors for three days; and as they had not been disturbed during that time, they felt more than ever sure that their return was unknown and unsuspected.

On the following night they resolved to sally forth in quest of information, and so, wrapping themselves closely in large cloaks, they strode off in the direction of the city.

"I don't think we need fear much in the way of recognition," said Blueskin to Jack, "so I should like for us to go into some public room where there are many persons assembled, and listen to their conversation."

"Agreed," said Jack. "I was going to propose the same thing. We cannot fail to hear something."

"No; and I am exceedingly anxious to know what has taken place in London since our departure from it, as you know not one atom of intelligence has reached us."

"It is impossible to say what changes may have taken place."

"I am most impatient to hear more, especially what has happened to Jonathan Wild; he was uppermost in my mind; but I am most anxious to find out something respecting Edgworth Bess."

"Let us enter here and sit down; people seem to be continually going in and out. At any rate, we will take our chance of picking up something."

The two friends entered a kind of public-house as they spoke, in the large room of which some eighteen or twenty persons were assembled, all engaged in talking busily.

They followed closely behind two other persons who entered, and by this means they succeeded in almost entirely eluding the observation of those who were seated, for those who were first were gazed at most.

Selecting the darkest corner they could find unoccupied, our friends sat down, and, having called for refreshment, prepared to listen.

For a long while the conversation turned upon topics in which they felt but little interest. They wanted to know something about Jonathan Wild, but they were not bold enough to make any inquiry concerning him themselves.

At last the landlord happened to come in, and a man who was sitting by the fireside said:

"Well, governor, is there any news of late? Have they caught Jonathan Wild yet?"

"I haven't heard of his capture as yet," replied the landlord, "but I do know they are searching for him in every direction, and for his companion, Mr. Noakes. They will have them sooner or later—his race is almost run."

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard both started when they heard these words; and well they might, for this was the first intimation they had received concerning the change in Jonathan Wild's lot.

At first they thought they must be dreaming, or had misunderstood what had been said.

They waited impatiently to hear more upon this subject, but, to their disappointment, the landlord was called away, and the conversation was changed.

Blueskin and Jack then whispered rapidly to each other, and presently the latter said:

"I am determined to run a little risk to hear more upon this subject. Can it be possible that Jonathan Wild's career is come to an end?"

"Be careful, Jack!"

"I will, depend upon it!"

The man who had addressed the landlord was looking towards our two friends, so Jack said:

"You were speaking a little while ago, sir, to the landlord concerning Jonathan Wild."

"Well, what of that?"

"I was much surprised at what you said. I have been absent from England for a long time in foreign lands, but I remember Jonathan Wild before I started. He was a very clever police officer, a great thief-taker, and found out all the robberies, and had the people hanged."

"Ha, ha!" said the man, "that's a good joke! His little game has been found out, and you haven't heard any of the particulars?"

"No, that I have not."

"Well, you see, they have found out that Jonathan Wild was the biggest thief in the world, and that, so far from bringing robbers to justice, he employed a whole gang of them."

"Good gracious!" said Jack. "I should never have thought of such a thing!"

"Well, he did it; and it was after the execution of Jack Sheppard—"

"What! said Jack, "has he been brought to Tyburn?"

"Oh dear, yes! I knew very well they would have him some day or other! He broke out of Newgate three times, but they caught him again, and held him tight, and hanged him."

"And so there was an end to Jack Sheppard?"

"Well, not quite, for we heard some talk about him for a day or two after. His body was claimed by some of his friends, and they buried it secretly at midnight in Saint Martin's churchyard."

"Well, that is strange! But what were you going to tell me about Jonathan?"

"It was just after the execution of Jack Sheppard that they found out all his roguery; so they took him prisoner, tried him, and the first time he got off; but they tried him the next day for something else, and he didn't; he was brought in guilty, and sentenced to death."

"Yes—yes!" said Jack, feverishly.

"Well, somehow or other—no one knows exactly how, —he made his escape from Newgate, and took the Governor with him. From that time all efforts to capture them have been in vain, though the police have been searching night and day. A very large reward is offered for their apprehension."

"You quite surprise me!" said Jack—"that is, I should say, about the last thing I should have thought of."

"Ah! strange things do happen—that's certain! I should not have thought of it myself; and you hear up to the present time they have not been able to catch him, but when they do once get hold of him, I'll warrant he don't cheat the gallows another time!"

Some more conversation followed, but as the reader is already acquainted with the substance of it, it is not worth while to detail it.

A few more particulars were elicited relative to Jonathan Wild, but nothing of any great importance.

Our friends then took the first opportunity that offered itself to leave the room.

They walked along the street for some moments in silence, and then Blueskin said:

"I think we have heard enough for to-night, Jack—don't you?"

"I do. I am impatient to get back to the lodgings, in order to tell Edgworth Bess that she has no longer anything to fear from Jonathan Wild."

"I was certain his villainy would be found out, and yet I scarcely thought so much could have happened in such a short time. Well, Jonathan Wild has hunted many a person about the country until the death, and now he will be able to see what it is like."

"He will not find so much pleasure in being hunted as he did in hunting," said Jack; "but do you remember what we both took an oath to do?"

"Certainly. Do you imagine I could forget it?"

"Well, then, it seems that chance or fate, or whatever you like to call it, has performed part of it—part of our purpose."

"Yes."

"Still, something remains. Will you consent to join with me in pursuing the miscreant? It would be a sort of satisfaction to me, which I could never forget, if I could only be the means of handing him over to the officers of justice."

"Give me your hand, Jack!" said Blueskin. "We will do it—we will devote ourselves to the task of hunting him down! We will track him as none of the others can, for they will not have such powerful motives as we have."

"Very true! We will set about it, then, to-morrow. Let me once get but the slightest clue as to where he is, and I will warrant I don't lose it."

"We shall get the clue easily enough, but you must not forget our intentions with regard to Edgworth Bess."

"Do not fear that I shall forget that; we can make our inquiries concerning her at the same time, and when once Jonathan Wild is out of the way, the course will be plain before us."

"It will; but it seems to me that revenge is within our reach—that we have only to stretch out our hands and grasp it. We have a long reckoning to settle with him, and the time has now arrived. Could I but have foreseen this, nothing would have tempted me to leave England."

"Why not?"

"Because I should have entered the court. I would have feasted my eyes by gazing upon him as he stood in the felon's dock. If I had to pay for doing so with my life, I would follow him to Tyburn!"

"It is quite as well that you did leave England," said Blueskin. "If you had remained, your identity would have been discovered. As it is, all the world believes you dead, and if you act with only a moderate amount of caution, you will never be discovered."

"I will be cautious, for I am not yet tired of my life. But here we are at our lodging. I am impatient to let Edgworth Bess know that Jonathan Wild will be unable to do her an injury again."

"It will be a great relief to her mind, for she has the greatest dread of him and his power. But before we go in, let us renew our compact."

"With all my heart!"

"We will dog his footsteps—we will follow him everywhere—we will hunt him from place to place, allowing him no rest, nor will we cease until we have seen him safe in the custody of the police officers."

"We will not, and after that will come his execution; and when I see him dangling from one of the cross-beams of Tyburn Tree, I shall feel that I have had my revenge."

"And I," said Blueskin. "We shall be quits."

They then made their way to the chamber in which they had left Edgworth Bess.

The poor girl was delighted beyond measure at seeing them return in safety.

During the whole time of their absence she had been in a state of great suspense and alarm, dreading that they had been recognised and captured.

When they first told her the intelligence concerning Jonathan Wild, she was unable to believe them; and even when they had related all that they had heard, she was unable to realise it fully.

"I ought not to rejoice," she said, "for he is not fit to die; but he has been a bitter foe to me, without my having done one single thing to provoke his enmity, and I am glad that the time has come for it to be out of his power to do me any further injury."

"It is out of his power," said Blueskin. "The officers are chasing him night and day. He has quite enough to do to look after his own safety, without thinking of anything else."

CHAPTER DX.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN PERCEIVE A BILL OF EXTRAORDINARY INTEREST AFFIXED TO THE HOARDING IN FRONT OF JONATHAN WILD'S HOUSE.

"AND," said Jack Sheppard, with an air of determination, "I shall take care that he knows no rest!"

Edgworth Bess looked at him inquiringly.

"You wonder at my words," he said, "but I will tell you what I and Blueskin have resolved to do. Don't attempt to turn us from our purpose; it will be in vain for you to utter one single word. If you will listen, I will tell you all."

"Do so, then," said Edgworth Bess, faintly, for something like a presentiment seemed to tell her that Jack was about to encounter some new and great danger.

"We have sworn to hunt him down. We will go to the place where he was last seen, and from there we will track him step by step, and never relax in our endeavours until we have seen him safely in the custody of the police."

"But why should you do this?" said Edgworth Bess—"why should you incur this extra and unnecessary peril? If you will leave him, the officers will capture him without your assistance."

"I don't know that. Perhaps the villain may escape; besides, he has been a foe to me, to you, to Blueskin, to my father, and to many others whom I hold dear, and I feel I am called upon to avenge those manifold injuries."

"We will be careful enough of ourselves," said Blueskin. "There is but little fear that we shall be recognised. Sufficient time has elapsed to cause us to be quite forgotten. The only danger there is—and that we need not take into consideration—is that Jonathan may do us some severe injury when he is captured."

Edgworth Bess was silent, but was not convinced. For her own part, she would much rather have left Jonathan Wild to himself, and let the punishment which should overtake him suffice for her revenge; but she knew that when her companions had firmly decided upon any particular course, it was useless for her to attempt to persuade them to act differently. She had tried and failed on many occasions, and in the present instance she had not the heart to try again.

"We will remain here until dusk to-morrow night," said Jack, "and then we will sally forth on this all-important errand. Rely upon it, in three or four days, at the most, Jonathan Wild will once more be the tenant of a cell in Newgate; and when he is once there, such a close watch will be kept over him that he will stand no chance of making his escape."

Nothing further was said beyond this, and Blueskin and Jack Sheppard retired to rest, for on the succeeding night they were sure they should require all the energies which they could call forth.

They slept heavily for several hours, and then rising, waited impatiently for night to come.

Although she had been told that it was useless to make the attempt, still Edgworth Bess tried to dissuade them from their enterprise.

But they would not listen to her fears, and earnestly requested her to remain where she was, and on no account to stir abroad.

Tears streamed from her eyes when they took their departure for of course it was not possible for Blueskin and Jack to say at what hour they would be back.

As soon as ever it was dark enough to make objects confused and indistinct, they quitted their lodgings in search of information concerning the thief-taker.

After much deliberation, they resolved to visit Wild's house in Newgate Street. This would, at any rate, form a point from which they could begin to make their researches.

No one cast even a second glance upon them as they walked at an easy yet rapid rate towards their destination.

Looking up, they saw that the house was in the same condition as it had been some time past, namely, the outer walls alone remained, the interior having been wholly destroyed by the fire.

A boarding had been erected in the front of the lower part of the house, in order to keep out all intruders.

As Blueskin and Jack stood on the opposite side of the way, they noticed that rather a large crowd of persons was collected round this boarding, but for what reason they could not exactly make out.

No disturbance was going on, for the people were perfectly quiet, only they were all pushing and striving to get foremost.

Caution made our friends hesitate a moment; then banishing it, they pulled their cloaks a little closer around them, and crossing the road, joined the throng.

They then discovered that the people were collected round a large bill which had recently been stuck up.

Several minutes elapsed before Jack and Blueskin could get near enough to read what this bill was about, though they made out that it was headed with "one hundred pounds reward."

Judging from the position in which it was placed, our friends had come to the conclusion that the bill related to Jonathan Wild, and it was partly from curiosity to gaze upon the bill, and partly because they hoped to obtain some intelligence that would aid them in carrying out their plan.

When they got near enough to peruse the bill, they were astonished to find that its contents were of a different, though, if possible, still more interesting nature.

They ran their eyes rapidly over it, and then perused it steadily.

The bill offered a reward of one hundred pounds to any person who would give such information as would lead to the whereabouts of the daughter of — Donnull, who was the heiress to the title and vast estates, but who had in some manner been spirited away.

It concluded with a very good description of Edgworth Bess.

When they had fully mastered the nature of this placard, Blueskin took hold of Jack by the arm and led him away.

Before relating the conversation that took place between them, it will be necessary for us to give a brief explanation of the causes that led to the appearance of the bill.

In the first place, we must remember that the papers fully proving who Edgworth Bess was, and comprising also the full confession of her uncle, the late Lord Donnull, had been taken possession of by Steggs while Jonathan Wild's house was in flames.

It will doubtless live in the recollection of the reader how Steggs escaped from the fire, carrying with him the papers—how he was taken to the hospital—and, upon recovering sufficiently, how he made his way to the residence of the Secretary of State.

It was in consequence of the revelations made by him, and by the papers he produced, that Jonathan Wild was indebted for the active steps that had been taken against him.

We have already described how Jonathan Wild's capture was brought about, just at the moment of his greatest triumph.

The Secretary of State gave orders that every attention should be paid to Steggs, whose testimony would be most important.

The poor fellow was indeed in a most precarious state, and but for the attention he received he would in all probability have perished. As it was, he recovered rapidly, and, when he was well enough, repeated the statements he formerly made, going into all the circumstances with greater minuteness.

From his story, and from the papers, it was not possible to entertain a doubt that the heiress to the Donnull property was no other than Edgworth Bess.

In the meanwhile, the entire property was thrown into the Court of Chancery, and then close search was made in every direction in order to discover her.

But in spite of all their efforts they were unable to obtain the least clue as to her whereabouts, for it must be borne in mind that her departure from England was a profound secret.

These measures having failed, it was thought necessary to put forth the bill our friends had seen, and which offered a reward of one hundred pounds to anyone who could give such information respecting the heiress as would lead to her discovery.

It had been issued for some time without producing any effect, and Steggs began to fear that in some mysterious way or other the poor girl had fallen a victim to the violence of the thief-taker.

Yet no trace could be found of any such deed, and so, chiefly through his pertinacity, a second edition of the bills was struck off, and they were posted throughout the kingdom as before.

It was one of the second supply of bills that Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had been so fortunate as to catch sight of.

"Blueskin," asked Jack of his companion, as they walked slowly along a deserted street, "what do you think of this? Under the circumstances, what would you advise?"

"I am willing to take time to consider, but at first sight it seems to me that what we ought to do is to make known at once the fact that we can produce the heiress."

"That's what I think. I wish, however, that I could find out how they have obtained the information they have already got."

"I am afraid we stand but a poor chance of succeeding in doing that."

"Well, then, can you see any reason why we should not communicate the knowledge we possess?"

"No—none, except the danger."

"What danger?"

"Of our recognition. Did you notice where the information was to be given?"

"Yes—to the Lord Chancellor."

"Well, then, how are we to give it? If we attempt to see him, don't you think we should be running into a fearful amount of danger?"

"No, I don't. There is danger—I admit that,—but not more than we ought to incur."

"Then you are resolved to go?"

"Quite!"

"And how about Jonathan Wild?"

"We will let him be for a short time."

"Why not pursue him first?"

"No—I don't wish to do that. Cannot you see how much more it will be to our advantage if we can feel sure that Edgworth Bess is in a place of safety?"

"It will."

"We should then be free from all anxiety on her account, and be able to turn the whole of our attention to a pursuit of Jonathan Wild. By not having her to look after, we shall be very much more likely to succeed than when our attention was divided."

"I can see the force of that."

"Well, then, if you like, I will call on the Lord Chancellor to-night."

"It is a bold idea, Jack."

"Not for me. I have done bolder things than this."

"True."

"You can either accompany me into his residence—that is, supposing I am able to gain admission—or you may wait outside on the watch. Which do you think would be the best plan?"

"I don't know. I will keep watch on the outside willingly, if you wish—and yet I think by lingering about one place for a length of time I should run a risk of being recognised."

"So you would—I forgot that. We had better both go in together, and you will be able to bear out the truth of what I say."

"Exactly. But there is one difficulty which I fancy you did not foresee."

"What is that?"

"In making your disclosures to the Lord Chancellor, how shall you manage to preserve your identity as a secret?"

"Of course it would not do to say who I am."

"Of course not,—that would be certain destruction. Nor could I say who I am."

"That is a difficulty."

"It is, because, if we give false names and we are found out, we may be the means of getting Edgworth Bess into trouble, and discredit may be thrown upon our whole story."

"We must chance all that, Blueskin. My mind is fully made up. I consider it is our duty to make known all that we are acquainted with."

"I am quite willing, Jack, for I feel that when my old master's daughter is instated in her proper position the chief purpose of my life will have been achieved."

"Come on, then! Why do you hesitate? We were always careless about danger, and why should we change now? Come on! Don't stay to have any further thoughts about it!"

"I will not; but we must get this matter over quickly, and then—for a time, at any rate—forget it, and turn the whole of our attention to Jonathan Wild. If we are not careful, he will succeed in leaving England, and then who knows whether he will ever be brought to justice?"

"As soon as ever it is possible," said Jack, "I will set out on this excursion. Nothing, save what has occurred to-night, would have made me change my purpose."

"I fancy not."

"But is it not your opinion that the disclosures we shall be able to make, if we can see the Lord Chancellor, will be sufficient to cause him to take Edgworth Bess under his protection?"

"I hope it will."

"If so, we shall be free from any fear on her account. She will be safe, and no source of anxiety to us."

While this conversation was going forward, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard were rapidly making their way in the direction of the residence of the Lord Chancellor.

Jack had obtained the address from the foot of the bill.

At last they paused before a mansion, and ere they attempted to knock for admission they by instinct proceeded to reconnoitre it.

The first thing that attracted their attention was that none of the windows were lighted up, but from one on the first floor a faint glimmer came, as though within there was some lamp which burned with a subdued lustre.

All around seemed very silent,—not a single living creature was in sight; and, reassured by this, our friends ascended the steps leading to the wide doorway.

They hesitated, listened again, and then finally Jack Sheppard summoned up his courage, and seizing the knocker, gave a vigorous rat-rat.

CHAPTER DXI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD HAVE AN IMPORTANT INTERVIEW WITH THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

No notice was taken of Jack's summons for admission, and so, after waiting a little while, he knocked again.

This time the door opened, and a sudden alteration took place in the countenance of the domestic, who stood upon the threshold, when he saw who the late visitors were.

He was about to slam the door to in their faces, and would have done so had not Jack adroitly slipped into the hall just in time.

"I want to see the Lord Chancellor at once!" he said, in a loud voice.

"Oh, goodness!—the very hidea! What will things come to next, I wonder? Do you think 'is lordship can be disturbed by the likes of you?"

"Tell him that we are here. We must see him."

"Must? Very good!"

"Tell him that we are here."

"Now, hark you, my fine fellow," said the servant,— "I don't want to kick hup a row, nor soil my fingers by touchin' you, but if you don't quit the 'ouse at once I'll call the police."

"No, you won't! Tell the Chancellor I am here with the information that he offers a hundred pounds reward for."

"You?"

"Yes."

"Then why didn't you say that at once, confound you? Come in 'ere. Thomas," he added, addressing one of his fellow-servants, "go and tell 'is lordship that these two persons 'ave brought the information."

Thomas ascended the stairs, and almost immediately came down again, and desired Blueskin and Jack to follow him.

Our two friends felt strangely enough in that magnificent abode, and while they were determined to go on, yet they felt the strangest desire to retreat.

Thomas led the way to the door of a chamber, which he opened, and ushered them into a luxuriously-furnished apartment, on the centre table of which a lamp was burning.

Seated at this table was a cadaverous-looking man about fifty years of age.

Before him was spread a quantity of papers, and he had evidently been engaged in writing, for he laid his pen down and desired his visitors to be seated and state their business.

While he spoke the words, he rose to his feet and removed the green shade from the lamp by which the light was concentrated upon the table.

As soon as he did so, the whole of the apartment was lighted up, and he was able to see our two friends distinctly.

He did not recognise them, nor did he appear to see anything peculiar in their exterior.

He leaned back in his chair, and fixing his eyes upon them, waited for them to commence.

"We are here," said Jack, speaking in a hushed voice, "in consequence of having seen a bill offering a reward of one hundred pounds."

"And do you bring the desired information?"

"We do, my lord."

"Proceed, then."

"The girl you want is called Edgworth Bess. I know where she is, and can either take your lordship to her or bring her here."

"You can?" ejaculated the Lord Chancellor. "Then how is it that you have not made your appearance here before? Why have you kept back your knowledge until this moment?"

"Because we have only just seen the bills."

"How is that?"

"We have been absent from England for some time, and so has Edgworth Bess. We only returned a week ago, and I did not see your bill until to-night, about an hour since. I fancied it had only just been posted up."

"A second supply of bills went out this morning—but that does not matter. You say you have been away from England, and that's the reason you knew nothing of all this?"

"That is the reason, my lord."

"Then you are friends of this girl?"

"Well, not exactly that, my lord,—we are only acquainted with her."

"Why did she leave England?"

"To escape Jonathan Wild."

"That sounds reasonable, and you have clearly earned the reward as soon as ever you say where the girl is to be found. In the first place, however, do you know anything of her early history?"

"Very little, my lord."

"Still, tell me what you do know."

Jack thereupon described how, when he first became acquainted with Edgworth Bess, she worked as a shroud-maker at the house of a woman named Roblet—how an attack had been made upon her—and followed up with a brief description of all those facts in connection with the young girl with which the reader is already acquainted.

When he concluded, there was an evident expression of satisfaction upon the countenance of the Lord Chancellor.

All that Jack had stated entirely corresponded with the account that had been furnished by Steggs, so there could be no doubt about the identity of the heiress.

Lord Donnull had confessed how he had caused his brother's only child to be kidnapped by a villain in his employ—how he had offered this man a reward to slay the infant—and then described how it had afterwards come to his knowledge that the man had not kept his word; he had received the money, but his brother's child still lived.

It will be recollected that it was Steggs who heard the dying confession made by the man Williams, who stated the child he was to have murdered was now grown up into a woman, and was working as a shroud-maker at Mrs. Roblet's.

Everything was quite correct.

"There is only one thing that I desire to know," said the Lord Chancellor,—“that is, your name.”

Jack paused, but Blueskin came to his assistance.

"My name is Joseph Blake, and the reason I take an interest in this affair I will now show to you.

"When I was a very young man—about eighteen years of age—I lived as a servant with Lord Donnull, the father of the girl about whom we are talking."

"Indeed!" said the Chancellor, with redoubled interest.

"Go on with your story,—you may have important information."

"I think not, my lord," said Blueskin. "When this little girl was born, Abel Donnull—the one who usurped his brother's title—was on the best of terms with the brother he so cruelly injured. He was in the house when the child was born. The mother died. Time passed on, and the child disappeared. Abel appeared to feel the loss as deeply as his brother, and was unsparing in his exertions to discover what had become of the lost little one. He alone knew where she was. He had bribed a man to murder the little infant, and succeeded, with diabolical ingenuity, in fixing suspicion upon myself and one of my fellow-servants, who was my friend.

"There was nothing but suspicion against us, however. With all his cleverness, Abel was powerless to bring any proofs against us. Still, he raised the doubt, and we were dismissed from the service of our much-loved master."

"What you say is quite true," said the Chancellor.

"I do not know whether you are aware of it, but the Abel Donnull of whom you are speaking is dead. He left behind him a full confession, and what you have just said is embodied in it."

"Then perhaps my story will be believed now; but it is too late. I have suffered under that doubt for the whole of my life, and now I shall not benefit by its removal. However, that is neither here nor there. I made up my mind, when I was discharged, to try and find the child; but years passed without my hearing anything of her, and so I came to the conclusion that she was dead. Accident alone brought her in my way. Since that time I have scarcely ever lost sight of her."

"You have earned your reward," said the Chancellor, "and something more. I am glad the lost heiress is found. The testimony you have given is so important, as corroborating other evidence, that you are entitled to something more. Within reason, you shall have all that you demand."

"We want no reward at all," said Blueskin. "What we have done has been merely out of affection to the persecuted girl. She has all the time been a victim to Jonathan Wild's villany, who hoped, by obtaining possession of her, to gain possession of the estates also."

"I know that."

"It is the truth, my lord, and what I have done has been to shelter her and protect her as much as I could from him. If, however, your lordship would interest yourself on my behalf, I have something to ask."

"Speak freely."

"Well, then, after I was discharged in the manner I described, I tried in vain to get a living by honest means. With such suspicion attaching to me, no one would employ me, and so I was forced either to starve or else to get my living in defiance of the laws."

"Then you wish to obtain a pardon?"

"I do, if it is possible. I have been guilty of many crimes, yet none serious, and many things are laid to my charge of which I am entirely innocent."

"You say your name is Joseph Blake?"

"Yes, that is my name, but I am better known by another."

"What is it?"

"Blueskin."

The Chancellor pushed his chair back, until the back came in contact with the wall; so there he stopped.

"Do not be alarmed, my lord," continued Blueskin.

"I shall do you no harm. You will see no change in me after having made this declaration."

"But—but," stammered the Lord Chancellor, "you are sentenced to death!"

"I know that; but the evidence upon which I was found guilty was that of Jonathan Wild, who was at once my witness and my prosecutor. I was saved from the gallows by little short of a miracle. Up to this moment I have kept myself clear of the officers. No one suspects me, and I could have kept my secret much longer. I could have kept it even from you, but I did not fear making the disclosure to you, because you would not take advantage of it. You would not call in the police officers to arrest me?"

"No—no!" said the Chancellor. "I cannot say that I should!"

"I knew that, and so I spoke. I escaped to a foreign land, and might have remained there in safety to the end of my days, but I returned simply that I might endeavour to place the heiress in her true position."

The Chancellor was silent for some moments, and then he said:

"Your conduct does you great credit. I will inquire into what you have said."

"You will find it all true," said Blueskin—"every word of it. When I leave here no one will know me. When I have seen the heiress once under your protection, I shall be content. I shall depart, and no one probably will hear of me again. If, however, your lordship thinks proper to interest yourself to obtain my pardon, you may depend I shall come forward as soon as ever it is proclaimed."

"I will try to obtain it," said the Lord Chancellor. "Whether I succeed, is more than I can say. I must make further inquiry."

"Do so, your lordship, and that is the only reward I crave."

"And your companion?"

"He desires nothing more."

"Does he desire a pardon?"

"No."

"Well, then, he shall have the reward. It has been promised, and it shall be paid. Now tell me where the girl is to be found."

Blueskin gave the address of the house in which they had taken lodgings in Westminster.

"This matter requires a little careful management," said the Lord Chancellor, with a smile. "Your position is peculiar. It will not do to confide your secret to another person. To betray you to your enemies, after the manner in which you have acted, would have been base to a degree."

"I felt sure your lordship would think so," said Blueskin.

"I do think so, and I will tell you how we can get out of the difficulty. I presume you will feel quite satisfied when I take the girl by the hand?"

"Quite satisfied, my lord."

"Well, then, I will tell you what I will do. I will call my carriage, and I will go with you to the address you have given. You can hand the girl over to me; you may see me place her in the carriage, and then I shall drive off. Will that content you?"

"Perfectly; there could not be a more admirable arrangement, or one better calculated to ensure my safety. I did not like to make so bold as to suggest it to your lordship."

The Lord Chancellor rang the bell, and, as soon as the servant appeared, he ordered his carriage to be got ready instantly.

There was a brief delay while the vehicle was being prepared, but the Lord Chancellor took advantage of the interval to make some further inquiries, but he elicited no fresh fact of any importance.

One thing was quite evident—he had not the least suspicion as to who Jack Sheppard really was.

At last the servant announced that the carriage was ready.

The Chancellor hastily donned his cloak and hat, and descended the staircase.

Our friends followed closely in his footsteps, concealing their countenances as well as they were able from the inquisitive glances which the servants in the hall below bent upon them.

The Lord Chancellor insisted upon Blueskin and Jack Sheppard entering the carriage with him.

It may seem strange that he did so, but he had a motive.

All they had said was straightforward enough, but still he had no particular guarantee as to their good faith, but while they were in the carriage with him he knew that all was right.

He gave the requisite directions to the footman, and the carriage was soon rolling rapidly along the dark, deserted streets in the direction of the house at Westminster.

CHAPTER DXII.

JOYATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES FIND THE PUBLIC-HOUSE TOO HOT TO HOLD THEM.

WE now return to Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes, the ex-Governor of Newgate.

It will be remembered that when we saw them last they were in a rather ticklish situation.

They were seated in a room in a public-house, along with many other persons, when they heard the clattering sound produced by the sudden halt of several horsemen before the front door.

The man who had been addressed as Luke had said that they were police officers outside, in search of Wild and Noakes, and that they, the officers, had stopped him, and announced their intention of searching all the public-houses in the vicinity.

This was alarming news for Wild, and he was, for a moment at least, completely taken aback.

As for Mr. Noakes, he seemed ready to expire with terror, and he gasped for breath in a manner that could scarcely fail to attract the attention of those who sat near him.

Jonathan glanced into his companion's countenance with the utmost scorn, and then he rose to his feet.

He grasped Mr. Noakes by the collar, saying, in a rapid and impressive whisper:

"Follow me, and you will be safe!"

These few words were uttered with the utmost confidence, and consequently they had a great and immediate effect upon Mr. Noakes.

To a certain extent he forgot his fears, and shook off his shrinking timidity.

He rose, and followed Wild across the room.

As soon as ever the two comrades in iniquity moved, the eyes of all the company were turned full upon them.

Jonathan looked steadily towards the door.

"Hallo!" said Luke, in a loud voice, springing from his seat as he spoke, "I'm blest if I don't think the varmint are here! Help me! Here is Jonathan Wild!"

Mr. Noakes uttered a loud yell, and gave himself up for lost.

With an oath, Wild drew his sword and made a slash at the oil lamp hanging from the centre of the ceiling, and whence most of the illumination proceeded.

It was only suspended by a rope, and Wild's sword divided it instantly.

Down came the lamp with a fearful crash, and then the chamber was plunged into comparative darkness.

The thief-taker well knew that a certain amount of confusion and dismay would be produced by this proceeding, and he was in readiness to take advantage of it.

Seizing hold of Mr. Noakes, he dragged him into the passage.

But just at this moment, the police officers, having dismounted from their steeds, poured in at the front door of the inn.

They were able to see at a glance that something of an unusual and suspicious character was going on.

"Forward!" cried the one in command.

There was an oil lamp hanging in the passage, and by the aid of this they saw Wild and Noakes running at full speed, and they called out for them to stay.

But, encouraged by the success which he had met with in his attack on the other lamp, Wild made a desperate cut at this one.

Down it came at once, to the consternation of all.

Mr. Noakes was almost paralysed with fear, and it was a great trouble to Wild to drag him along.

It may seem strange that Jonathan should choose to encumber himself with anyone; on the contrary, one would think he would have left him to his fate, and turned all his energy and attention towards making his own escape. But he had a motive for what he was doing, as will be seen in the sequel,—the ex-Governor was too valuable to be parted with easily.

So, much against his inclination, Mr. Noakes was compelled to accompany his companion in crime.

Jonathan dragged him into the yard at the back of the inn.

Just as he passed out of the back door, Wild perceived two men run hastily across the road in the direction of the gates.

From their manner, the thief-taker came at once to the conclusion that they had been stealing something, and that his sudden appearance had disturbed them.

At the very same time that he came to this conclusion, he saw how he might turn this fortuitous occurrence to his own advantage.

He glanced round for some place of concealment,—he required somewhere to hide in quickly, before the officers could recover from the confusion caused by the fall of the lamp.

His eye rested on a flight of wooden steps, which seemed to lead up to a loft.

These he resolved to ascend, and no sooner did he determine to do so than he compelled his companion to follow him.

The wooden steps were only about twelve in number, so the top was soon reached.

Wild found himself standing upon a small, square, wooden platform.

Just in front of him was a door.

He pushed it, and found it yield to his touch.

He passed through quickly, and closed the door behind him.

He was only just in time, for the officers came pouring into the yard.

They heard and saw the two men running that Wild had disturbed, and, as the thief-taker imagined, they jumped at once to the conclusion that these were the two men they wanted.

Uttering a loud cry, they rushed onwards, and the two thieves, finding themselves pursued, ran off with redoubled speed.

The officers followed, and in less than a minute the whole were out of sight.

The room, at the top of the steps, into which Jonathan Wild had intruded was situated over the brewhouse in the rear of the inn, and was used for storing malt.

Many bags of this article were contained in this place, and the fugitives would not have had much trouble in concealing themselves among them had a close search been made.

But for this there was no necessity, for the officers never came near.

Wild went to the window and looked out.

He saw the officers run across the yard and disappear.

He uttered a low chuckle.

Mr. Noakes was by this time half dead with fright, and had sunk upon the sacks quite helpless.

Jonathan shook him violently.

"Escaped again!" he said—"escaped again! Get up, you fool! We have nothing to fear! I tell you we have escaped again!"

Mr. Noakes only groaned.

"Come on!" continued Wild. "We can't stop here; it isn't likely! We must get further away, or the officers may discover their mistake and return!"

"I will give up," said the ex-Governor. "I would sooner die at once than live a life of terror like this—I would sooner die at once!"

"Would you?"

"I would indeed!"

"Then I don't intend to allow you the opportunity! This way, I say! Ha!—we have lingered too long!—the officers are returning!"

Mr. Noakes collapsed again.

Jonathan seized him again by the collar, and made him stand upon his feet.

The thief-taker was perfectly correct when he said that the officers were returning.

By dint of hard running, they had managed to come up with and to capture the two men.

They saw directly that they had made a mistake, and called upon the prisoners for an explanation.

One of them then stated that they were about to steal some malt out of the malt-room, and had already got the door open for the purpose, when they were disturbed by two men coming into the yard, and had run off in the hope of being able to make their escape.

Upon hearing this statement, the commanding police officer uttered an oath.

He saw well enough how the mistake had been made, and hastily returned to the inn yard, for he was not altogether devoid of the hope that he should even yet be in time to secure those he so much desired to capture.

Jonathan, however, acted with great promptitude and resolution.

Through the window of the malt-room there came a faint, feeble kind of light, and by the aid of this Jonathan was able to see about him, for his eyes had grown accustomed to the obscurity.

Up in the roof Jonathan could see a trap-door. He was able to distinguish it because it did not fit properly into its frame, and in consequence he could see a faint line of light running round it.

Through this he determined to make his way, but as a preliminary step he secured the door through which he had entered, and then with inconceivable rapidity piled up a number of sacks of malt before it.

He viewed his work with great satisfaction, but he had hardly finished when the officers, having searched the yard and guarded all the outlets from it, ascended the flight of wooden steps.

When the officer reached the door and found it fast, he was forced to come to one of two conclusions.

Either the man he had captured had not spoken the truth, or else those he wanted had concealed themselves in the place and fastened the door.

This was the most pleasing view of the case, and so the officer adopted it.

"Down with this door!" he cried,—"the rascals are inside, and have fastened it!"

While they were attacking the door, Wild was busily engaged.

He found that the trap-door was situated just above a malt-mill.

To climb on to the top of this mill was by no means difficult, and by standing on the upper portion of it he was able to reach the trap-door.

He lifted it off in a moment, and seizing hold, with both hands, of the frame into which it fitted, Jonathan drew himself up on to the roof.

"Now, Noakes," he cried, "up with you! Make haste!"

"I cannot!"

"Fool, you must! I am at liberty above! Climb up on the mill, and all will be well! Quick, I say, and be silent!"

Somehow or other, Mr. Noakes, felt compelled to obey Wild's imperious commands; so he climbed up on to the top of the malt-mill with more agility than one would have thought he was in possession of.

Having reached so far, Jonathan helped him up on to the roof.

The officers were still hammering at the door. They could not get it down, in consequence of the sacks of malt that Wild had piled up against the inner side of it.

When he got out upon the roof, Wild seemed as far from safety as ever, for there was no means visible by which he could descend.

But the thief-taker did not despair.

On the contrary, he was overjoyed at having succeeded so far, and augured from it that he should complete his escape.

With admirable presence of mind he replaced the trap-door, so as to leave no more trace behind him than he could help, and then crawled along the tiles in the hope of being able to find some point from which he might descend in safety.

Mr. Noakes followed him with great difficulty.

The villain was in mortal fear that he should fall to the ground, his feet slipped so when he tried to crawl along after his companion.

Mr. Noakes was unused to these adventures, and they were a great punishment to him.

Of course all will say that it served him right.

In this he cordially agrees.

Wild looked about him, but was still unable to see how he was to descend.

[JONATHAN WILD FELS THE TOLL-KEEPER WITH HIS BLUDGEON.]

He made the entire circuit of the roof of the malt-room, and there was only one side which furnished him with the smallest particle of hope.

Here it seemed madness to attempt to get down, for it was some distance to the ground.

About half-way, however, there was another roof, and Wild's scheme was to lower himself down until he hung the full length of his arms, and then drop upon it.

Mr. Noakes trembled at the idea.

But Jonathan was inexorable, and compelled him to lower himself at the same time as he did.

"Now," he cried, in a suppressed voice—"now let go, and be d—d to you!"

He saw Mr. Noakes let go his hold, and as soon as he did so he permitted his own fingers to relax.

Down they both fell with alarming velocity.

Then there was a crash—a frightful crash, which was enough to alarm everyone within a mile of the place.

Then came a shriek.

This was from the lips of Mr. Noakes.

No. 108.—BLUESKIN.

In looking down on the roof below, Jonathan had failed to notice that in the centre of it was a skylight.

Full upon this did both he and Mr. Noakes fall.

This produced the crash.

After passing through the skylight and utterly demolishing it, they came down upon a table, or some similar article.

It was this that had wrung the shriek of pain from Mr. Noakes.

Both were partially stunned, but Wild was the first to recover himself.

He seized his companion, who was almost breathless.

"Come on!" he said. "It won't do to linger here; and I don't intend to suffer myself to be made prisoner after running all these risks and enduring all these hurts to procure my liberty! This way, I say!"

"I am done for, Mr. Wild."

"Bah!"

"I cannot go any further."

"You must!"

"I cannot."

Jonathan dragged him forward.

"Idiot," he cried, "you would succumb just when you are safe! Look, here is the door—here is the open air. We have got the level ground beneath our feet, and shall be able to make good speed!"

Mr. Noakes was rather encouraged by these words and the open door, so he staggered onwards.

"It's no good," he cried before they had gone many yards. "Look, here they come! They will capture us after all!"

Wild uttered an oath.

Looking back, he saw the police officers coming on at a rapid rate from the direction of the inn.

CHAPTER DXIII.

JONATHAN WILD ELUDES THE OFFICERS BY PRACTISING A CLEVER STRATAGEM.

JONATHAN WILD and Mr. Noakes were in a kind of kitchen garden surrounding the building upon which they had fallen, and as they looked across it they saw the police officers running at the top of their speed.

The terrific crash caused by the demolition of the sky-light was quite enough to let the officers know that the prisoners were making an escape, and to direct them to the spot, and the brief interval of time during which Jonathan Wild and his companion lay half stunned upon the table had been sufficient to enable the police officers to hurriedly descend the steps and make their way round into the garden.

A loud shout which they set up indicated that they had caught sight of the fugitives, and now that it came to a fair run over ground, they did not doubt for a moment that they should succeed in capturing them.

Wild seized hold of Mr. Noakes by the hand, and both ran onwards at a wonderful rate; but then they were both flying for their lives, and under such circumstances men will make very great exertions indeed.

Mr. Noakes shook off some portion of his fears, and bent all his energies upon running as swiftly as he could, and he was further encouraged by Wild, who continually urged him to make more speed.

Chance seemed to favour them to a very great extent, for without making a single false step they traversed the garden, broke through a hedge, crossed a meadow, and then, after leaping a ditch, found themselves in another field.

The police officers, however, were not so fortunate, and they also tried as well as they could to keep together.

There were many good runners among them, but the others were indifferent, and those who could run swiftly did not possess sufficient courage to attack Jonathan Wild single-handed.

They had all got a kind of superstitious fear of the man; and well they might have, for his deeds in the past had been quite sufficient to make the boldest hearts tremble.

To these circumstances, then, may be attributed the ease with which the thief-taker contrived to out-distance his pursuers.

Had one of the police officers been bold enough to run forward and seize him, and wait till his companions came up, Wild's fate would have been sealed, but in all probability the officer would have forfeited his life for the attempt, and there was not one magnanimous enough to feel inclined to sacrifice his life that his comrades might reap the benefit of the reward.

Moving in a compact body, almost as a small body of soldiers, they hastened after Wild.

The speed at which they went was one that they would be able to maintain for a considerable length of time, and eventually they might run the fugitives down, but in the meantime there was a danger that they would be able to double upon their course, or conceal themselves somewhere, or otherwise throw them off the scent.

"On—on!" cried Wild, panting for breath between every word. "We are distancing them rapidly! We shall soon be out of their reach altogether! On—on!"

Mr. Noakes tried to speak, but his tongue stuck to the roof of his mouth; his knees trembled beneath him, and he felt for a moment as though he must inevitably sink to the ground.

Had not Wild retained his grasp upon his hand, and so dragged him onwards, the probability is that he would have done so.

Encouraged by his success so far, Jonathan Wild seemed to receive at every step a fresh accession of strength, and he bounded on in a manner that was really wonderful to behold.

Every now and then he would turn round and look back upon the way he had come, and each time he saw that his pursuers were further off.

Then, suddenly breaking through a hedge, the two fugitives rolled down a bank and found themselves in the high-road.

Wild scrambled to his feet and assisted the Governor to rise.

"Quick!" he said—"be quick, I say, or we shall lose the advantage which we have gained with so much difficulty! Up!—up! We can run along this road at a good speed!"

Once again, then, they resumed their flight, Jonathan Wild running as fresh and unexhausted as though he had not run a yard.

Mr. Noakes, however, was scarcely able to drag one leg after the other, and Wild, looking at him, was aware that it was quite useless to expect that he would be able to run for a much greater space of time.

It was necessary, then, that he should find some hiding-place, and devise some means by which he could throw his pursuers off the scent.

This seemed an impossible task; but whenever there was a difficulty, Wild seemed to rise superior to it.

He found how rapidly his companion's strength was leaving him, and so he said:

"One more effort—only one more effort! Be quick, and then we shall be able to rest—the danger will be past! The officers are not in sight; they have missed us somehow; but they may soon find us—that is, if we do not hide! Come on, I say, and in a few minutes I will find you an excellent hiding-place!"

The prospect of an escape and the hope of being able to elude his pursuers, and, above all, of obtaining a rest, operated as a stimulant upon the Governor's physical powers, and he ran hastily along by the side of his companion.

The road curved round to the right; and upon passing round this bend, Wild suddenly came in sight of a toll-gate.

It was placed quite across the road, and the gates were shut.

The moment he saw it, a fresh thought darted into his mind, and he glanced back to make sure the officers were not in sight.

Not a vestige of them was to be seen, however, and, with a chuckle, the thief-taker said:

"All right, Noakes, my boy—I shall do them at last. Slacken your speed a little and recover your breath, for I shall want you to speak."

Mr. Noakes willingly obeyed this command, and in a moment afterwards Wild stopped at the toll-gate.

He clutched Mr. Noakes by the arm and whispered in his ear:

"Knock at the door of the toll-house, and when the keeper appears tell him that you have lost your way. Ask him the road to London—get him out of the house by some means or other, and leave the rest to me!"

Mr. Noakes nodded, and Wild concealed himself in the shadow of the toll-house.

The Governor knocked at the door, and it was immediately opened by the tollman, who unsuspectingly stepped out on to the footpath.

He looked rather surprised upon seeing Mr. Noakes, and gruffly asked what he wanted.

But ere he could frame a reply, Jonathan Wild, who was on the watch, crept behind the toll-keeper unobserved.

He had his thick heavy bludgeon raised in the air, for he had kept possession of it during his recent adventures.

He brought it down with a sickening crash upon the head of the toll-keeper, who fell like a log into the road.

Mr. Noakes was overcome with horror when he saw this deed perpetrated, for it had come upon him quite unexpectedly.

Just then, however, a trampling of footsteps became audible, and Wild, who was about to give vent to his exultation in one of his hideous laughs, stopped short and looked in the direction he had just come.

"The officers are here!" he said. "Be quick, or after all we shall be caught! Into the toll-house with you, and leave the rest to me!"

With the greatest fright depicted on his countenance, the Governor obeyed, and Wild, stooping down, seized hold of the insensible body of the tollman, and by an effort of strength dragged him inside the little wooden house, and closed the door.

With the rapidity of lightning he tore off the upper portion of the clothes which the toll-keeper wore and placed them over his own garments.

He had just finished when there came a tremendous banging at the door.

The interior of the toll-house was quite dark, and in an impressive whisper Wild said:

"On your life, keep still!—do not speak or move, or our lives will pay the forfeit!"

At the same moment he flung open the upper portion of the toll-house door, which was so formed that the lower half could remain closed and bolted while the upper half was open.

"Hallo there! What's the matter?"

The officers were all clustered round the gate, and one of them said:

"Have you seen a couple of men run past this place?"

"No, I have not," returned Wild, in the same tones and with perfect self-possession. "The door was shut; how could I?"

So perfectly did he perform the part he had so suddenly assumed that the police officers had not the slightest suspicion of the actual state of affairs, and the one who had before spoken added:

"Well, the place is quiet enough, and perhaps if you have not seen them you have heard them?"

"Ah! that's another thing altogether," said the toll-keeper. "About two minutes ago, I should say—or perhaps it might be three—I heard somebody run past the door, and off down the road; but whether there was one man or two, or whether there was a woman among them, is more than I can tell you."

"But you heard footsteps, you say?"

"Oh yes, quite plainly!"

"And some one was running?"

"Yes, and at a wonderful speed, too, I can tell you; they seemed to be out of hearing in less than no time."

"Can you tell which way they went?"

"No, not for certain."

"Which way do you think? I will tell you why we ask. We are police officers, and are in search of that notorious villain Jonathan Wild and his companion, the late Governor of Newgate. We have tracked them thus far, but have lost sight of them."

"Jonathan Wild, did you say?" exclaimed the thief-taker, with well-affected astonishment. "Do you mean to say that Jonathan Wild is down about these parts?"

"Yes, that he is, for certain! We almost had our hands on him once, but he slipped through our fingers."

"Oh, law! I wish you had not told me. I shall be afraid to sleep in my bed now, for I sleep in this place all by myself. I should not wonder if Jonathan Wild was to cut my throat!"

"I think he will have quite enough to do in looking after his own safety," said the officer; "but it is no good stopping here, we are losing valuable time. If you can tell us which way the people you heard pass by appeared to be running, you will render us a good service."

"Well," said Wild, "if what I tell you don't turn out to be true you must not blame me, because I didn't see them, you know; but I heard 'em, and I might go so far as to say that I would take my oath that they ran straight on down the road."

"That will do; and now, Mr. Tollman, one word more."

"What is it, sir?"

"If Jonathan Wild and the man who is with him should turn back and think to escape us that way, you get your blunderbuss ready, and if they run by your house shoot them with it!"

"All right, Mr. Officer; but will you stand by me for doing it?"

"Certainly! my orders are to take them dead or alive—your understand?"

"Quite."

"Then forward, my lads! it seems we are on the right track after all, and this bit of a rest has allowed us to recover our breath. If we keep on their trail we must bring them down sooner or later. Come on—follow me! I wish with all my heart that we had our horses with us!"

As he spoke these words the officer set off at a sharp trot, and the others followed at his heels.

Wild watched them until their forms were lost to view in the darkness, and then closing the door, he said:

"Now, Noakes, what do you think of that?"

"Wonderful!" was the gasping reply.

"What would you do without me, I wonder?" continued Wild, with great self-complacency. "You would have been captured long ere this."

"I should—I should; but I can't stand this sort of thing long, my constitution won't bear up against it. Can't we get right away from England, and give them the slip altogether?"

"Yes," said Wild, "that's what I intend to do, but I have a little business on hand which I must transact first. When that is done we will go, and then we can pass the remainder of our days in absolute safety."

"What business is it?" asked the Governor, with a whine.

"Nothing to you—it will be time enough for you to know when you see it. Wasn't it a bold plan to take possession of this house and act the toll-keeper?"

"It was! I didn't know you were going behind him like that—you gave me quite a turn. I believe you have killed him."

"And what does it matter if I have?" said Wild. "He will only make one more. Serve the fool right—we shall have no more trouble with him!"

As he spoke, a faint smothered groan came upon his ears.

CHAPTER DXIV.

JONATHAN WILD PLAYS THE PART OF A TOLL-KEEPER TO GREAT PERFECTION.

"Who's that?" said Wild.

"Not me," returned the Governor.

"Then it is our friend the tollman, not dead yet. I see he is bent upon giving us some trouble. Where is he?"

"On the floor."

"Stick the corner of my felt hat into his mouth, then, and make him hold his noise! If the officers should happen to return, all will be discovered."

Another groan came.

"Why don't you do it?" cried Wild.

"I cannot!"

"Cowardly fool! You would get us into trouble on such a point as this? Where is my hat?"

Jonathan groped about in the darkness, and found the object of which he was in search.

It was close beside the prostrate body of the unfortunate toll-keeper.

Rolling it up into the smallest possible compass, he thrust it violently into his half-opened mouth.

The tollman was just recovering his consciousness, but he now stood in imminent danger of suffocation.

Scarcely had he done this than Wild's quick ear caught the sound of horses' hoofs.

He started, and for a moment his heart beat violently.

But regaining his calmness almost instantly, he said:

"There's somebody else coming! Can you hear them?"

Mr. Noakes was too terrified to reply.

"Hark! Can you hear the clatter of horses' hoofs? They are coming on at a gallop!"

"What is to be done?" gasped the Governor.

"Leave it to me. All you have to do is to remain perfectly silent, and to take care that that fellow on the floor don't make an outcry. If he does, the rope is as good as round your neck—so beware!"

"But what shall you do?"

"I shall have to open the gate for them, I suppose. I wonder where the devil he kept the key of the padlock?"

Wild searched in the pockets of the garments he had so hastily donned, and almost immediately discovered a bunch of keys.

There were several on an iron ring, and which was the right key, or whether any one of them was right, he could not tell.

Any bungling, however, would be fatal, and he knew it.

He had no further time for search or reflection.

With a dash, the troop of horsemen drew up before the toll-gate.

A succession of sharp knocks were rained upon the door.

Wild waited a moment to make sure that all was right, and then opened it.

"Hullo!" he said, disguising his voice in the same way as before. "What's the matter?"

"Open the gate, and be quick about it!" said the voice. "We are in a hurry."

"All right, sir! I'll attend to you in one moment."

"Now!" said the voice. "We are officers, and can't wait! We are in pursuit of Jonathan Wild!"

"Then I'll open the gate for you with all the pleasure in the world!" said Wild, and anyone to have heard him speak would have fully believed that he meant just what he said.

So saying, he opened the lower half of the door, and, taking care to bolt it after him, went to the gate with the bunch of keys in his hand.

"I believe Jonathan Wild and that chap he has got with him went past here only a little while ago," he said.

Choosing a key at random, he thrust it into the lock, or rather tried to do so, for it was much too large.

"Indeed!" said the police officer who had formerly spoken. "What grounds have you for believing that?"

"Why, some more police officers on foot passed by only a little while ago. They have gone straight on down the road. If you make haste you will overtake them!"

During this speech, Wild had tried three more keys, but with no better success than at first.

Yet he spoke with perfect calmness, though a cold perspiration broke out upon his forehead as he wondered whether he should be detected by simply being unable to unlock the gate.

The officer did not notice his fumbling, so interested was he in the conversation.

"Did you speak to these officers?" he said.

"Oh, yes!" replied Wild, with an inward curse as he tried another key and failed again. "They asked me if I had seen two men run by. I told them no, for I had not; but I said I had heard some one running past, and so they concluded that Jonathan Wild had gone on further down the road."

"No doubt of it," said the officer; "and as we are on horseback we shall soon come up with them, and in all probability capture the villain. Why the devil don't you open the gate?"

"I am opening it, sir," said Wild, almost in despair, and in his confusion trying the same keys over again.

"You've been long enough, in all conscience. What are you doing?—why don't you unlock it?"

"It's the wrong key."

"The wrong key!" repeated the officer. "You're a don-key, you mean!"

The officer was fond of a joke, and at times perpetrated some horrible ones.

The men under him, however, always laughed to the utmost, and Jonathan Wild, taking his cue from them, roared more heartily than any, and, desisting from his attempt upon the lock, he pretended to hold his sides, and fairly shook with laughter.

"Ho, ho, ho!" he cried. "Well, that's good—it's the best thing I have heard for many a long day! What a wit you must have, to be sure! Wrong-key—don-key! That's very good!"

Of course the officer was pleased to see the toll-keeper enjoy his jest so much, and he grew quite good-tempered.

At last their laughter subsided, and the officer said:

"Now, my good man, make haste and open the gate!"

"All right, sir! I've got the right key this time, but, you see, there's a lot on the bunch, and when you rode up, the fact is I was fast asleep, and not being properly awake was the reason I could not tell one key from another."

"All right! Make haste, I say, because every moment is of the greatest importance."

The key which he now held in his hand was Jonathan's last hope.

If that failed to do its office he would be obliged to confess his inability to open the gate, when suspicion would be at once excited, and discovery ensue.

It was really wonderful how, under such trying circumstances, he could preserve his self-possession at all; but he did preserve it, and in a most admirable manner.

Not the faintest shadow of a suspicion entered the officer's mind.

Who could imagine Jonathan's feelings when about to try this key, and when he knew how serious the consequences of failure would be?

His heart stood still, and then suddenly commenced to beat at a fearful rate as he found the key slip easily into the keyhole.

He turned it round, and the wards yielded.

"It's all right now, sir," he said, as he pushed the gate open. "It was not the wrong key, after all. Some rascal must have put something into the keyhole. However, it's all right now."

The officers, who were impatient at the delay, now that they learned Jonathan Wild was only a little before them on the road, without speaking another word, trotted swiftly through the gate.

With perfect coolness, Jonathan Wild closed it after them, and locked it.

He then made his way into the toll-house.

"Where are you, Noakes?"

"Here, Mr. Wild," replied the Governor, in a trembling voice.

"You heard what took place, didn't you?"

"Yes, every word."

"Then there's another danger over; but I think we had better leave this place at once. If we stay in it much longer, it will be too hot to hold us."

"With all my heart," said Mr. Noakes. "I shall be glad indeed to leave it."

"Come on, then! I will show you how I shall throw these officers off the scent!"

Mr. Noakes was glad enough to emerge on to the high-road, for the company of the toll-keeper in that little house was far from being agreeable to him.

But he was horrorstruck when he found Wild turned in the direction of London.

"Where are you going?" he asked, in the greatest fear.

"Are you mad?"

"Not a bit of it."

"But this is the way to London!"

"I know that."

"Surely you wouldn't go there?"

"Listen to me! Have we not been in the greatest peril?—and have not I found an easy way out of it in every case?"

"You have. You're a wonderful man, Mr. Wild!"

"Never mind that. Let the success I have had up to the present be a guarantee for you in the future. You will find it easiest to place yourself implicitly in my hands, and do just as I direct."

The Governor was silent.

"I suppose you consent; but whether you do or do not, matters little. I shall not lose you, never fear. You will go wherever I choose to take you."

Jonathan took hold of his companion's arm as he spoke, and led him onwards at a rapid rate.

Mr. Noakes's terror increased as they drew nearer and nearer to London.

He ventured to make another remonstrance.

"Surely you will not go walking on? By the time we reach London it will be daylight! Look!—there is the east before us already. I can see indications of the coming dawn."

"So can I," growled Jonathan. "Who said I was going to London?"

"I thought you were."

"Well, wait and see."

Jonathan strode on, and soon the Governor began to recognise the various objects they met with.

At last they paused on the brink of the gravel-pit where they had already found safe shelter.

"Are you going down here again?"

"Yes. Go first—you know the way."

"I would rather follow."

"Go first, I say!"

"Very well—very well! I'll go first, if you wish it, of course."

"Go on, then, and I will follow in your footsteps. Now do you understand what I am going to do? This place has already afforded us safe refuge, and will do so again. They will not think of looking for us here, so much nearer to London. They will think, as a matter of course, that we shall try to get far away into the country. Go on, I say, and make no noise about it!—and mind you don't slip; if you do, you will not be worth picking up when you reach the bottom."

The descent into the gravel-pit was rugged and dangerous, and Mr. Noakes proceeded in continual terror of his life.

The bottom, however, was reached without the occurrence of any accident, and then Jonathan led the way to the little wooden shed under the roof of which they had before concealed themselves.

"Here we are," he said, "and here we shall be safe enough,—they will not find us here. We have had something to eat and drink, though we have had some peril in obtaining it. Now, lie down and rest, for when night comes you will find there will be fresh fatigue to undergo."

"Why keep me in the dark as to your intentions?" whined Mr. Noakes. "I am faithful—I would not betray you."

"Very likely, but I prefer to keep you in the dark—I have good reasons for doing so; besides, it is less trouble to yourself—you have not so much to think about. Now, lie down and go to sleep, and allow me to do the same. Don't bother me by talking."

Jonathan Wild flung himself down upon the damp ground which formed the floor of the hut, and Mr. Noakes, with a heavy sigh, followed his example.

"I can't stand this much longer," he said, "I am sure I can't! I'll kill him! Oh! what can I do for the best? How shall I escape from his clutches? Without him, I fear I should be captured instantly, and yet to remain in his company is worse than death. Let me think. If I was to kill him, or take him prisoner, perhaps they would pardon me. It is very likely. But how shall I do it? I might wait till he is asleep, and then beat his brains out with his own bludgeon. It is an effective weapon. I'll wait till he is asleep, and then I'll do it!"

"What the devil are you muttering about, Noakes?" asked the thief-taker, with an angry growl.

"Nothing—nothing!"

"Well, be quiet, for I want to go to sleep, and I can't while you are making that murmuring noise."

"I am silent, Mr. Wild,—I will be quite silent."

CHAPTER DXV.

JONATHAN WILD BEGINS TO FIND HIMSELF A VICTIM TO THE PANGS OF REMORSE.

MR. NOAKES lay profoundly still, keeping his thoughts to himself, and waiting patiently until his companion in crime should sink off into a sound slumber.

Jonathan did not speak again, and a silence that made the Governor feel anxious and uncomfortable pervaded the little shed.

After the lapse of about half an hour, which seemed to Mr. Noakes like a whole night, he determined to make the desperate attempt he had resolved upon, for during the time we have mentioned the thief-taker had neither moved nor uttered a sound.

Slowly and stealthily, Mr. Noakes raised himself to a sitting posture, and then remained perfectly still, in order to assure himself that as yet he had given no alarm.

The unbroken silence reassured him, and, by slow degrees, he got upon his feet.

Then, holding his breath, he ventured to take a step nearer to the spot where Wild lay slumbering.

He could hear his heavy, stertorous breathing, and felt certain that all was well.

The intense darkness of the place, however, baffled him.

Not one single ray of light penetrated into the shed, and he was obliged to trust to his sense of touch alone for guidance.

It was necessary, first of all, that he should gain possession of the bludgeon.

This article he surmised would be lying somewhere near the thief-taker's right hand, so that he could seize it at any moment.

The heavy breathing indicated tolerably well where Wild lay, and at length Mr. Noakes paused, for he felt sure he was standing by his side.

Stooping down, he felt cautiously about him, and at length his fingers came in contact with Wild's coat.

Rapidly passing his hand upwards, he reached the shoulder, and then it was perfectly easy for him to follow the direction of the arm.

The Governor's spirits rose, for Jonathan Wild did not show the least signs of consciousness.

"I will not kill him," he thought. "I will hit him hard enough to deprive him of consciousness, then I will make him secure, and hand him over to the authorities."

As he came to this mental determination, Mr. Noakes laid his hand upon the thief-taker's bludgeon.

Jonathan held it tight in his grasp, and Mr. Noakes began to wonder whether he would be able to take it away without awaking him.

He pulled gently, and, to his joy, Wild's hand gently relaxed.

The next instant he was holding the bludgeon.

He knew just where the thief-taker's head was, and so he raised the formidable weapon in the air, with the intention of bringing it down with full force.

It was even in the act of descending, when he felt himself seized by the ankle, and with such force that he lost his footing and fell heavily to the earth.

Mr. Noakes almost expired with fright.

The first thing that came upon his senses was the harsh sound of the thief-taker's voice.

"Hallo, Noakes!" he said, "what are you about now? Thought to find me napping, did you? But I am not so easily caught. I have found you out, Noakes, so now beware!"

Wild got up, and the Governor shook fearfully from head to foot.

He made sure that his last moments had come, for that Jonathan would sacrifice him in his rage he had not the least doubt.

Jonathan grasped him by the collar.

"So you were going to knock my brains out, were you?" he said.

"No, no!" was the hurried reply—"I was not!"

"B you were, I say, and it is no good to deny it! When I heard you muttering, I knew you meant something, and that is why I kept myself on my guard; and a lucky thing it was for me, as things have turned out!"

"You are mistaken," said the Governor, hesitatingly.

"Mistaken be d—d!" said Wild,—"it is too plain for that. I heard you creeping stealthily towards me, and pretended to be asleep, just to find out what you were going to do. I knew when you laid your hand upon the cudgel, but I wished to make quite sure of what you were about, and that's why I relaxed my fingers and allowed you to take possession of it. I stopped you just in time, for the bludgeon was descending. Can you deny that?"

The Governor was silent.

"Of course you can't! And this is the return you make to me for having done you such important service as I have during this night. I have saved you from your enemies when I might have abandoned you to your fate and escaped myself. So far from doing so, I incurred an extra amount of danger by encumbering myself with you, and this is my reward. Villain, prepare for death! Before you quit life, you will wish a thousand times over that you had perished at Tyburn Tree!"

The Governor writhed about, and uttered frantic shrieks for mercy.

Wild took hold of the cudgel, and struck him a severe blow upon the shoulder with it, which made the Governor shriek out with real pain.

"That is the first instalment," said the thief-taker. "You shall suffer dearly for this! Wretch that you are, you would have murdered me in cold blood!"

"It's all a mistake!" persisted the Governor, with chattering teeth. "I tell you it is all a mistake! I never meant anything of the kind!"

"But I know better! What do you think I can do but slay you at once? My own safety demands it. If I could hand you over to the police, I would; but I can't do that without running my own neck into a noose; so I shall put you out of the world myself."

"Mercy—mercy!"

"Yes, you shall have just as much mercy as you intended to show to me. Now that I have discovered this, it will be impossible for us to remain longer in companionship together. I shall not be able to sleep in peace."

"Yes, you will, Mr. Wild. I will solemnly swear never to interrupt your rest again. Spare me this time—only this once! I was mad—I did not know what I was about! Have mercy! Spare me this time, and I will for ever afterwards be your most humble and devoted slave!"

"I can't attach any importance to your protestations," replied Wild—"I can't believe them. My own safety requires that you shall die!"

"No, no, Mr. Wild! I will confess that I had thought of disabling you and giving you into the custody of the officers, but if I had done such a thing I should have bitterly repented it; and although I am in such danger now, I rejoice that you should have prevented me from doing that which I should have regretted during the rest of my life."

"And if I spare you," said Wild, "what guarantee shall I have that you will not take the first opportunity you have to carry out your intention? No, no—I must slay you; and yet I wish that you had not forced me into the commission of this act. It will be so lonely for me without anyone to bear me company while I am hunted from place to place! You have served to rob solitude of its terrors, and that's why I aided and protected you; and, much as I dislike being by myself, yet it is much better that I should be than always be in momentary dread of the attack of an assassin."

"Oh, Mr. Wild!" said the Governor, piteously, "do reflect again! Do not you believe it possible that upon a sudden impulse a man should be tempted to do something, and then ever afterwards regret it? It is so with me, Mr. Wild. It is a great deal to ask your forgiveness for; but if you will look over this, I will be your slave for ever, and obey you in all things!"

"I would grant your request," said the thief-taker, "if I had any guarantee that would protect me from the risk I shall run."

"Think again. I will swear by the most solemn oath you think fit to impose, that I will never attempt anything against your life and liberty again!"

Wild paused.

"I will think it over," he said. "I confess I am undecided; but I am more likely to resolve upon your death than not; still, I will consider. Be prepared for the worst!"

Wild strode away, and seated himself upon the ground, with his back to the shed.

The attack which his companion had made upon him disconcerted him greatly.

For the future, he could never feel safe, for Jonathan Wild was not the man to put faith in the professions of anyone.

Yet the idea of parting company with the ex-Governor of Newgate was scarcely less disagreeable to him.

Wild had a horror of being alone.

This is always the case with guilty minds, and he had so many black and awful crimes upon his soul, and when he was alone they would so throng into his mind, that it made him anxious to have the society of anyone.

In being thus hunted about from place to place, as he had lately, Wild felt how dreadful it would be to be deprived of a companion.

It was chiefly this which had induced him to run so many risks by encumbering himself with Mr. Noakes, and he had never suspected for one moment that his life was in danger at his hands.

The Governor might be sincere, and might never make such an attempt again; but it seemed like tempting Providence too far to place any belief in what he said.

Yet, as Wild pondered the matter over, and as he tried to pierce the black darkness which surrounded him, he felt that he would rather run any risk than be alone, for that would be worse than a thousand deaths.

Mr. Noakes remained trembling in every limb, while Jonathan was making up his mind what he should do.

It was awful for anyone to be conscious that his life hung upon the caprice of a man like the thief-taker.

But the tenor of his reflections will show that Mr. Noakes was not in quite so much danger as he had anticipated, and if Wild could only have made sure that no second attempt would be made upon his life, he would have forgiven him—that is, he would forgive him for the present, but so soon as he was useless to him, then the grade would be remembered.

"I will run the risk," said Wild to himself at last. "If it is my fate to be slain by him, strive as I will, I shall not be able to avert my doom. To be alone by myself for any length of time would, I am sure, be sufficient to drive me into madness. It would be much worse than a continual state of doubt and dread that I shall now be in. I will impose upon him a most fearful oath—I will awake his superstitious or religious fears, if he has any, and if I can succeed in doing that, I may be safe."

"Noakes!" he cried, raising his voice.

"Yes, Mr. Wild, I am here! Have mercy upon me!"

"If I do," added the thief-taker, "will you take the oath I shall propose, that you will never make a second attempt upon my life?"

"I will take ten thousand oaths," said the Governor, eagerly, "for such a thing is furthest from my thoughts. Be under no fear—I shall not make the attempt again. I most heartily regret having done so!"

"Well, well—that may be, and as you said some time back, it is possible for a man to determine to do something upon the impulse of the moment and then afterwards bitterly regret it."

"That's my case, Mr. Wild."

"Well, we have been companions for many a day, we have assisted each other in many a little plan, and I do not care about murdering you in cold blood. I have crimes enough to bear without having that added to the number. I will spare your life, but upon the condition that you take the oath I shall propose."

"Dictate it to me, Mr. Wild!" cried the Governor, almost frantic with eagerness—"dictate it to me; I will follow you word for word!"

"Listen, then," said Wild, who then proposed to his companion an oath of the most terrible character which it is possible to conceive.

The Governor shuddered when he uttered the last adjuration.

From what we have said, it will be seen that Jonathan Wild experienced some twinges of remorse. It is probable that they were chiefly caused by the consciousness that he had had a very narrow escape indeed from an unexpected death; and he was unnerved too, not only by the various adventures he had had since his escape from Newgate, but by the intense darkness which filled the shed, and Jonathan Wild, though bolder than the boldest in any scheme of villany, was more frightened than a child to be in the dark.

It was then that horrible and distorted countenance would seem to start out of the gloom by scores, all with their horrible glassy eyes fixed upon him—all seeming to accuse him of having cut short their lives.

But, strangely enough, if anyone was with him—if he knew that a human being was within a short distance—he was not the victim of these fantastic visions, and so he extended his forgiveness to his comrade in crime.

For some time after Mr. Noakes had taken the oath a profound silence reigned in the hut, which was broken only by the breathing of its two occupants, and an occasional movement of their limbs.

At last it began to grow lighter and lighter, and through the crevices in the shed, where the boards had been imperfectly or carelessly joined, there came feeble gleams of light.

Suddenly, however, the sharp report of a pistol came upon their ears.

The weapon had evidently been discharged somewhere near at hand, and both Mr. Noakes and the thief-taker started to their feet with a half-suppressed ejaculation upon their lips.

CHAPTER DXVI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS ARRIVE UPON THE BRINK OF THE OLD GRAVEL-PIT.

JONATHAN WILD and Mr. Noakes both started, for the sound had taken them completely by surprise.

There was something alarming in it too, for they jumped to the conclusion that no one would be firing in the vicinity save police officers.

They listened intently, expecting, of course, to hear something more.

But a profound silence followed.

"What does that mean?" asked Jonathan, in a faint whisper.

"I don't know, Mr. Wild—how should I? I am afraid——"

"Of what?"

"That it is our foes!"

"Hush—be silent! Let us listen!"

They did so.

But nothing further reached their ears, and the silence that reigned in the hut, profound as it had seemed to be before, now appeared to have increased.

The stillness was as remarkable as it was oppressive.

"That means something," said Wild, in a whisper; "there can be no doubt about that, and it may concern us."

"But how are we to find out whether it does or not?"

"That we must consider. I cannot remain here in suspense like this! I must know who it was that fired!"

The thief-taker walked towards the door of the shed as he spoke, and, opening it cautiously to the extent of about a couple of inches, he looked out.

Day had just dawned, and the recesses of the old gravel-pit were revealed by the faint grey light.

A kind of white mist hung over all objects, and the thief-taker, shading his eyes with his hands, strove to pierce it.

He could see nothing, however, of an unusual nature, nor could he see any symptoms of a recent disturbance having taken place.

"Very strange!" he murmured, still gazing around him.

"Can you see anything?" asked the Governor.

"No."

"I heard a shot—I am sure of that!"

"So am I. We have not been both deceived by our senses! I must, and will, find out what it means! It may be of the utmost importance."

"But how?"

"There is no one about," replied the thief-taker, "and all is silent as the very grave itself! I will creep out stealthily!"

"You may be seen."

"I think not,—the place is surely quite deserted—there is no one about save our two selves."

As he uttered these words, Wild crept stealthily out of the shed, and, stooping down behind the rank vegetation which had sprung into existence about that spot, crawled towards the little precipitous path leading to the brink of the excavation.

Up this he slowly climbed, pausing every now and then, and using every precaution he could think of to guard against being seen, in case anyone should be lurking about on the watch.

At last he reached the brink of the excavation, and, raising his head slowly, peeped over.

He could see no one.

He glared around on every side, and then, quite sure that no human being was in sight, raised his head a little higher.

Some object close at hand then attracted his attention.

After starting violently—for the discovery came upon him unexpectedly—he beckoned to his companion to ascend.

Mr. Noakes would gladly have been excused, although his curiosity was strongly raised, but just then, especially, he could not afford to run the risk of offending Wild, and so he put the best face he could on the matter, being resolved, as far as possible, to make a virtue of necessity.

Up he climbed, then, and in a few moments reached the top, for Wild made signals to him to be as speedy as he could.

"Look there!" exclaimed Jonathan as soon as he joined him.

Mr. Noakes obeyed, and saw, lying half hidden in the rank grass, something which resembled a human being.

"Who is that?"

"How should I know? But I mean to find out!"

"But we may be seen!"

"Bah!"

"It is broad daylight!"

"There is no one about. Don't be a fool, but just do as you are told! Follow me, and be d—d!"

Jonathan scrambled out of the gravel-pit, and then Mr. Noakes, looking terribly apprehensive, came after him.

Wild went direct to the spot where the object lay, and, upon a closer approach, it became quite clear that it was no other than a human being.

Not a word was spoken until they reached the body, and even then they did not speak until about a moment had elapsed, for they were both occupied in noticing its appearance.

"Here is the one who has been fired at!" were Wild's first words.

"Yes; but where is the one who fired?"

"Gone!" replied Jonathan, once more taking a long and careful look about him.

But he failed to perceive the least signs of the presence of anyone.

"We have the place all to ourselves still," he added.

"But keep a sharp look-out, Noakes! Do you hear?"

"Yes, I hear, but why not return to the shed?"

"Look out, I tell you, and leave me to manage matters! Can't you see by the clothes that this is the body of a gentleman?"

"Yes."

"Then we shall find something worth while in his pockets!"

"Shall you rob him?"

"I shall take what I can find."

"He may not be dead."

"True! I did not think of that. Yet he lies still enough."

"But he may be only badly wounded."

"He is either insensible or dead. However, you keep watch, and I will make a close examination."

Jonathan stooped down over the body as he spoke.

It was that of a very young man.

His age could not certainly have been more than twenty, and his attire was of a very rich description indeed.

It must be remembered that at the time of which we write the distinction between the noble and the plebeian was much more strongly marked than now. The aristocracy had a dress of their own, and could be distinguished by it.

Wild was thus enabled to state with certainty that the young man belonged to the upper section of society.

Many valuable ornaments glittered here and there about his person, while his fingers were covered with sparkling rings.

One hand was pressed tightly upon his breast, and was covered with blood.

The ensanguined fluid welled up continually between his fingers.

His face was contracted into an expression of great agony.

Jonathan's impression was that the man was dead.

Nevertheless, he took hold of the blood-stained hand and raised it up.

The moment he did so, a kind of convulsive spasm seemed to shoot through the apparently lifeless form, and the eyes unclosed.

At first they were bright, but they suddenly became dull and glassy.

Jonathan released the hand, and in a moment afterwards it was pressed to the heart again.

The young nobleman—for such by title he evidently was—gasped for breath, and appeared to be endeavouring to speak.

He tried, too, to raise himself, but had not the power to carry his intention into effect.

Wild hesitated a moment, and then changing his position, slightly raised the head of the wounded man.

Some painful gasps was the result, and then in a hollow, broken voice, he murmured:

"I—I—am dying!—yes, surely dying! This is my death wound. I feel sure of it. The villain—to—to lure me to this place, and then to—to shoot me down like a dog! I—I—"

"Who?" asked Wild, whose curiosity was much excited by the few words he had heard. "Who shot you?"

The dying man made some desperate attempts to articulate something, but failed completely.

The syllables seemed to be hanging upon the very tip of his tongue, and yet he lacked the power to pronounce them.

"Who are you?" asked Wild. "Tell me your own name."

A series of attempts, every one more terrible than that which had preceded it, then ensued.

But Wild was fated not to know this.

With a gasping, choking kind of sob, that sounded more like a groan, the young man expired.

His head hung back, and the thief-taker was conscious at once that life had fled.

"It's all up!" he ejaculated.

"Is he dead?"

"As a nut. Is there anyone in sight?"

"Not a soul."

"Then, as we are badly off, we will see what he has got about him, and pocket it. We shall save somebody else the trouble, eh?"

"Very likely."

"Whoever finds him would certainly perform that service, and the money would be of great use to me just at the present time. We cannot tell what we may want."

While speaking these words, Jonathan Wild had not been idle.

With busy fingers, he transferred the contents of the young man's pockets to his own.

He was well paid for his trouble, for there was a large sum in money, and many valuable jewels.

"Be quick!" said Noakes, suddenly,—"I fancy I can see some one."

"Where?"

"Yonder!"

Wild was on his feet in a second, gazing eagerly in the direction to which his comrade pointed.

"It's officers!" he said. "Well, we are just in time. Down with you, and crawl to the gravel-pit! We shall not be seen if we are speedy. All is well! I have the booty! On with you, and don't stop to be over-particular about getting down!"

The Governor was terrified, and made great speed.

Wild kept close behind him, anxious in the extreme to gain the cover of the shed.

Once there, he believed he should be safe.

The officers would never seek for him in such a place.

And yet as he mentally uttered the words an uneasy feeling came over his heart, for he wondered how it was they were there at all.

Could it be possible that they had trailed him?

This thought was of too dreadful a character to be entertained for a moment, and so he banished it.

The depths of the old gravel-pit were very quickly reached, and the two villains hastened to conceal themselves in the shed.

Having entered it and closed the door, they stood still, panting for breath, and listening for any sound which might reach them from above.

In the meantime, they endured a thousand terrors, for their hiding-place had never seemed so poor a one as it did at that moment.

The reason was they were menaced by danger.

Mr. Noakes had given the alarm not a second too soon.

As Jonathan Wild had truly said, they were police officers who were approaching.

They were in rather strong numbers too.

They galloped on in almost a straight line for the gravel-pit, nor did they pause until within a few yards of the brink.

Then one of them said:

"This is the place!"

Something more would then doubtless have been added, but another uttered an ejaculation, and pointed to the dead body of the young nobleman lying on the grass.

CHAPTER DXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS THE GRAVEL-PIT BY NO MEANS THE SAFE PLACE OF REFUGE HE TOOK IT TO BE.

WHAT is nowadays called "a sensation" was excited amongst the police officers when this discovery was made, and they looked at each other in a bewildered sort of way, for the sight was one they by no means expected.

They saw at once by the richness of the dress that it was a person of distinction.

"Hallo!" cried the one in command. "What is the meaning of this?"

He rode forward a few paces as he spoke.

"There's been murder here!" he exclaimed in an emphatic tone of voice. "We must investigate this before we go any further."

He slipped off his horse while speaking, and then, stooping down by the side of the dead man, commenced to make an examination in a very business-like way.

"Shot in the breast," he said. "Mortal wound of course. Who can it be, I wonder?"

He hastily searched the pockets, but found nothing of any importance.

"Robbery as well as murder," he said. "The pockets have been cleared out. The deed has been done recently, for the body is quite warm. This is one of Jonathan Wild's tricks, I'll be bound!"

"I said I thought he was here, sir!" said a police officer, who had formerly been an agent of the great thief-taker's.

"And it seems you are right, for if this is not a trace of him, it's very odd to me! One of you get down and mind the body, and we will look for the rascal!"

It was only natural that the police officers should judge by what they saw before them that Wild was guilty of the murder of the young gentleman.

The reader, however, being in full possession of the facts, knows very well that this was a little mistake, in consequence of which the thief-taker would suffer.

"Now, then, Gregory," said the chief officer, "which is the place you were mentioning?"

"Here it is, sir!" said Wild's ex-myrmidon, pointing, as he spoke, to the old gravel-pit.

"And do you think he is here?"

"I do."

"Why?"

"I have good reasons," said the man, with an air of great embarrassment.

"Then, why don't you tell them?"

"I don't like, sir."

"Why not?"

"I don't."

"But that is no answer."

"It is the best reason I can give."

"But I shall not be satisfied with it."

The man looked about him imploringly.

"We have good proof," he said, at length, "that he has been at no great distance."

"Yes, so we have."

"And, then, there is this body."

"Yes."

"That points to his presence."

"Yes."

"Then here is the gravel-pit."

"I know that."

[JONATHAN WILD OBTAINS A HORSE BY A SUMMARY PROCESS.]

"And he may be concealed in it."

"He may be; but I have not forgotten, my fine fellow, that you mentioned this place before you saw the dead body lying yonder!"

The man was silent.

"I insist upon being satisfied on this point!" said the chief officer.

"Then," replied the man, with an air of desperation, "if you will stand aside I will make a clean breast of the whole matter."

"That will be by far the best plan. Come this way."

The chief and his subordinate withdrew to a little distance, and then the latter said:

"It is some time ago now when what I am going to tell you happened, and I trust you will never use it against me."

"I will give you my word of that."

No. 109.—BLUSKIN.

"Then I don't mind telling you—in fact, it will ease my mind a good deal."

"Go on, then, and don't be more long-winded than you can possibly help!"

"I won't, sir; but if he is down there, he can't get away without our seeing him."

"Go on."

"Then, as I said, it's a good many years ago, and I was then in the pay of Jonathan Wild."

"I know you were, and now you have joined the regular police force."

"Just so! Well, I will tell you how I left Wild. One night he came to me, and said he had a little business on hand, and wanted my assistance."

"I asked him what it was, but he told me not to bother, and said that if I would wait I should see."

"He was rather short-tempered, so I said no more, and he ordered me to go and fetch a light cart, that he used sometimes to carry swag away in.

"Well, I got it, and we drove off to a fine-looking house on the Oxford Road, and when he had been in a minute or two, he came out with a bundle in his arms.

"I did not ask what it was, and he threw it into the back of the cart himself, and sat up beside me again, and off we went, this time in the direction of Kensington Gravel-pits."

"Where we now are?" said the chief officer.

"Just so. Well, when we got here I stopped the cart and Wild ordered me to get down.

"I obeyed, and then, going to the back of the cart, he let down the tailboard, and said, 'Now, Gregory, help me out with the parcel.'

"I did so at once, for I wondered what it could be, and fancied if I laid hold of it I should be able to tell.

"It was wrapped up in a coarse sack, and the moment I touched it, something seemed to tell me that it was a corpse that was inside.

"I shuddered and felt very sick, but Mr. Wild called out, 'Come on!' in a very loud tone of voice, so I felt that I dared not hold back.

"Well, he took hold of one end of the sack, and I took the other, and he led the way to the brink of the gravel-pit.

"Mind how you descend, Gregory," he said. "If you fall you will break your neck—not that that would be of any particular importance, for it's sure to be broke one day or other, but you will break my neck as well!"

"I will be careful, Mr. Wild," I said.

"Mind you are—the path is very steep."

"Down we went, and every now and then my hair would stand on end, for look, there is the path, and you may guess it was rather dangerous to walk down that place carrying a load on a night that was as dark as a coal-hole."

"Never mind that—go on!"

"I am as fast as I can. However, it will be enough if I tell you we reached the bottom in safety."

"What happened next?"

"Mr. Wild went to a particular spot, and there he stopped.

"Let go!" he said, and before I was aware of it he let go his end of the sack, and down it went, with a sound that I hope I shall never hear again.

"I dropped my end pretty quick, and looking up, I saw Mr. Wild was lighting a lantern.

"I watched his motions in silence.

"The lantern was soon alight, and he cried:

"Come this way, Gregory."

"Must I bring the sack?"

"No; leave it where it is."

"With this I followed him across the bottom of the pit, my chief guide being the lantern that he carried.

"I had many narrow escapes of falling into deep holes that seemed to lie around me on every side, and which in some cases were almost full of water. You can see some of them, sir, from here, if you look down over the brink."

"Confound you—yes! Go on with your tale, and don't be so circumstantial!"

"So what, sir?"

"So roundabout. Come to the point at once!"

"I am coming to it, sir. I followed him, as I said, across the pit, until at last we came to an old ruined wooden shed. Mr. Wild pushed open the door and went in, so I followed.

"It was a shed and nothing more, and when I got inside I made so bold as to say:

"What kind of place is this, Mr. Wild?—what was it used for?"

"A tool-house, of course," he said. "What else could it be used for? Look there, in yonder corner, and you will see a spade and a pickaxe."

"I looked, and sure enough there were the articles he had mentioned.

"Pick them up," he continued, "and follow me."

"I picked them up, and we went out of the shed, and Mr. Wild he stopped just where we had put the sack.

"Gregory," he said, "there's something in that sack which must never see the light of day any more; so you must dig a deep hole. You begin, and when you are tired I will help you."

"It was more than my life was worth to disobey any of Mr. Wild's commands; so I began to make a hole, and worked till my back ached, and then he took his turn, and so we went on, until at last the pit was so deep that it was as much as we could do to scramble out of it.

"Mr. Wild had a large flask of brandy in his pocket, from which he drank every now and then and handed it to me—and very strong brandy it was too, for it took quite an effect, and I felt quite ready to do anything he wanted.

"Now, Gregory," he said, when we had scrambled out of the hole, "we shall soon have this job over, and you will be well paid for it, mind that—providing, of course, that you hold your tongue and never say a word about it to a living soul."

"I won't," I replied, "nor to the dead ones either."

"Mr. Wild laughed, and then he took hold of one end of the sack, and I took hold of the other, and Mr. Wild he says:

"One, two, three!" and when he said 'three' we let go, and down it fell into the pit."

"What was it?" asked the officer, who could not help feeling deeply interested in the man's singular narrative.

"It was a dead body, sir—a corpus."

"How do you know that? Did you see it?"

"No, I did not see it; but when I had hold of my end of the sack I felt the feet plainly; but whether it was a man or whether it was a woman I can't tell, for as soon as he let go, Mr. Wild he said:

"Shovel the earth in, Gregory, and make haste! When we have done that we shall be able to leave this place!"

"Well, sir, I shovelled the earth in, and at last we made an end of the job, and Mr. Wild he made me take the tools back into the shed and put them in one corner.

"Good hiding-place this would make, sir," I remarked, "in case anybody was wanted—nice and snug, and out of the way."

"Very," said Wild; "but it's very few people that know it, and those that do would not think of venturing down."

"Why not?"

"Why, there was a foul murder committed here not many years ago, and the people imagine the ghosts go stalking about, and so they are frightened to come near the place; but I take no notice of such folly; it is not worth notice, is it?"

"I don't know, sir," said I; "my conviction is, that spirits are best let alone—leastways, those kind of spirits;" so Mr. Wild he laughed, and we had another swig at the brandy, and afterwards left the place."

"And is that all?" asked the officer.

"Every word, sir, as well as I can remember it."

"And you remained with Wild until the break-up of his establishment?"

"Yes, sir, I did, and then became a police officer in earnest, and I hope that during the time I have been under your command I have given you satisfaction."

"Yes, pretty well; but I can promise you if it was not for that dead body yonder, and my own convictions concerning it, I should not place much importance upon what you have told me."

"Shouldn't you, sir? Well, that's all as people may think. Now, I thought to myself this way:—Mr. Wild being somewhere about these parts, and being run after pretty close, would bethink himself of the gravel-pit being a good hiding-place, and would creep down into it, and I should not wonder if we find him there at the present moment."

There was a great deal of plausibility and probability about what Gregory said, and the officer, after a moment's reflection, exclaimed:

"Well, we have quite lost the scent, and he's nowhere in sight, and we might be much worse employed than in searching the recesses of this old place—I will do it at once."

The officer summoned his men around him, and disposed of them to the best advantage, some of them remaining to keep watch at the top, and the others following him down into the recesses of the gravel-pit, the man Gregory leading the way.

The precipitous nature of the path made the descent a tedious affair, but at last the bottom was reached without accident.

The man Gregory then raised his arm, and pointing before him, said :

"Look! there is the shed I told you about,—he may be hiding in it."

The police officers all fixed their eyes upon the wooden shed with the greatest possible amount of interest, and having done so, proceeded to get their firearms a readiness, for they knew that if the thief-taker was within, the encounter would be a sharp and severe one.

"Come on, my lads!" said the chief officer; "let there be no flinching,—if he's inside we'll have him! Remember, our orders are, 'dead or alive,' and it's my belief it will be the best plan for us to take him dead, and the reward will be all the same."

The officer walked boldly in the direction of the door of the shed, and his men followed closely behind him.

For aught he knew, he might be walking to certain death, for if Wild was within it would be the easiest matter in the world for him to fire upon the officer when he drew near.

But a most suspicious silence reigned about the bottom of the gravel-pit.

At last the door was reached, and the officer, dashing it open, rushed inside, pistol in hand.

But a cry of disappointment came from his lips.

He saw at a glance that the shed was empty, and that there was not the slightest trace of the presence of human beings in it.

Gregory, too, looked very foolish, for in his own mind he felt confident that Jonathan Wild would be found in the shed.

It was empty, however, there could be no doubt about that, nor did it require even a moment's search to show that there was no hiding-place in it whatever, nor was there any mode of exit, save the one by which they had entered.

CHAPTER DXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD IS VERY HARD PRESSED BY HIS PURSUERS.

THE disappearance of Jonathan Wild and his companion in guilt seems not a little mysterious, but, like many other mysteries, the explanation was simple enough.

When Mr. Noakes had given the alarm about the approach of the police, and when the thief-taker had satisfied himself by a scrutinising glance that his foes were approaching, they both upon the first impulse descended the gravel-pit and shut themselves up in the shed.

Jonathan Wild had not been in the darkness and silence of this place more than two minutes before he came to the conclusion that he had acted very unwisely indeed.

He said not a word to his companion, however, but opened the door and listened.

The silence about the place was most profound, and directly after he commenced listening, the thief-taker heard plainly enough the sound produced by the approach of his foes.

He also heard them halt up above, and he heard the shout which they gave upon making the discovery of the dead body.

When he had heard this, his mind was made up.

"Noakes," he said, "this won't do—we must get out of this!"

"How?" asked the Governor. "Where can we go?"

"That I will tell you in a moment. Hush!"

The murmuring of voices came to their ears.

"We must not stop here, Noakes,—they will find us if we do!"

"They will not come down into this place."

"They will, I tell you!"

"But how can they know we are here?"

"They will guess it."

"But we can't leave without being seen."

"I don't know that. We had better make the attempt, anyhow. Do you remember the dead body up above? When they see that, they'll very likely set it down to my account, and, as you know very well, I have had a share in the matter. It's clear enough to me that the officers are above. They have found the body, and the next thing they do will be to look down the gravel-pit for me, because this is the only hiding-place there is."

Mr. Noakes groaned, as he ejaculated :

"Then we are lost!"

"Not a bit of it!" said Wild. "It strikes me in a most forcible manner we shall be found."

The Governor did not much relish the joke, but Wild continued :

"Just be in readiness to follow me. When I dart out, you follow me, and keep my back just in front. Never mind where I go. Keep straight on—if you don't, your neck will most likely suffer."

Mr. Noakes remained silent, and Jonathan fixed his bloodshot, tiger-like eyes upon the brink of the pit.

He soon satisfied himself that not one of his enemies was looking down, and, believing that he should never have a better opportunity than the present, he cried :

"Now!"

He made a bound across the bottom of the gravel-pit as he spoke, and Mr. Noakes, being under the dominion of fear, followed closely at his heels.

As soon as ever they gained the side of the excavation, they were quite secure from the observation of those above, because the ferns and other vegetation that grew rankly all around made it impossible for anyone to see direct down from the top.

Jonathan did not speak a word, but kept pushing steadily onward, until presently he paused before an indentation.

It looked like the entrance into some rude kind of passage, and was, indeed, a kind of tunnel which had been made by the workmen when following out a particular vein of gravel of finer quality than the rest.

How far this working might penetrate, the thief-taker had no means of ascertaining, but just then he heard the officers about to commence their descent, and, feeling that he could not possibly make his position worse than it was, he entered, and strode boldly onward, although the darkness was intense.

The passage wound in and out in a tortuous fashion, for in making it, the men had followed the course which the vein of fine gravel took.

As he kept going on and on still further, without meeting with any signs of a termination, Jonathan Wild's hopes began to rise, and he felt as though he was about to elude his pursuers once more.

As for Mr. Noakes, he was conscious that he was going somewhere, and that was about all, except that he was painfully aware that the police officers were not very far behind him.

Jonathan walked boldly onward at a very rapid speed, and by the adoption of a very simple precaution, he was enabled to save himself from coming in contact with rough walls.

He extended both his arms as he walked on, and by so doing was enabled to touch both sides of the passage.

Of course, had there been anything in the centre, he would have run against it with considerable force.

Although, as we have said, his hopes began to rise, there was but little to encourage him, for although he had come thus far, he might reach the termination of the passage in a moment, and the officers would not have much trouble in following him.

He would then be able to take his choice either to die at once or surrender himself a prisoner.

In the meanwhile, the officers, finding that Wild was not in the shed, were preparing themselves to take their departure, when the man Gregory, who clung to the idea he had conceived with praiseworthy tenacity, discovered, while looking about, the imprint of a foot upon a portion of the ground where the soil was softer than it was elsewhere.

He gave a loud cry, and called the attention of the others to it, and upon searching narrowly upon the ground, they quickly discovered many other footmarks, which, however, would have escaped any but the most rigid search, and they did not find one so distinct as that which had first attracted Gregory's attention.

These footmarks showed clearly enough that the gravel-pit had been recently visited, and the officers began to think that, after all, Wild was concealed somewhere about it.

By looking closely, and comparing the nature and size of the footprints, they at length arrived at the conclusion that the footmarks were those of two persons, and eventually they traced them to the little passage which the thief-taker had entered.

They now imagined that they had run the fox to earth, but when the officer looked down the passage, and saw how very narrow it was, the thought occurred to him how easy it would be for Wild to stand at a little distance and fire at them as they entered.

Every shot in such a case would be effective, for it would be like firing down a tube.

Before proceeding further, he resolved to try an expedient.

Raising his voice to its highest pitch, he cried: "Jonathan Wild, we have tracked you to this spot! Come forth at once, and surrender yourself a prisoner, or we fire! I will give you one minute to reflect, and if you don't appear at the end of that time, I shall order my men to fire a volley, and in such a confined space as this you cannot escape!"

Having thus delivered himself, the officer turned round, and ordered his men to have their pistols ready, so as to fire at the very moment he gave the word.

The time mentioned expired, but all remained as silent as before.

Not the slightest notice was taken of his highly-specific speech, and, probably enraged by the contempt by which he imagined he was treated, the officer cried to his men:

"Fire!"

They obeyed, and a terrific report was the result.

The bullets went crashing into the gravel, and the concussion of the air caused by the discharge of so many firearms loosened the earth which formed the sides and roof of the passage, and for several minutes there was a continuous fall of small stones.

The trifling sound this produced died away, but there were no signs of Jonathan Wild.

"He's in here—I'm convinced of that!" said the officer. "Perhaps ere we go many yards we shall stumble over his body. Follow me! This passage is clear for some distance—that's quite certain!"

"Had not we better have a light, sir?" said Gregory. "In the turnings and windings of this place he may escape."

"A light would be better; but how are we to get one?"

"There's plenty of wood about that would burn well and form capital torches."

"Light some, then. Be quick! I am anxious to explore this place!"

As Gregory had said, there was plenty of wood lying about that would answer the purpose, and in a very short space of time indeed the greater part of the officers had provided themselves with these rude torches.

They burned but dimly at first, though their brilliancy soon increased.

The officer in command of the police was a bold man, for, instead of keeping in the rear, as most commanders do, he led the way.

This inspired his men with courage, and they pressed eagerly after him.

Every now and then, as they pushed on along the passage, they would pause to listen, but on no occasion did the faintest sound come to their ears.

But as they met with no obstruction or opposition, they continued to press onward, and under the excitement of the moment were scarcely aware of the distance to which they had penetrated.

Suddenly, however, they perceived in the distance something which looked like a tiny twinkling star, but as soon as he perceived it, the officer knew what it meant, and so he cried aloud:

"Look—look—yonder is the end of the passage! There's the opening from it! The villain has escaped! Let us make all speed, and we may yet be able to overtake him!"

Fixing his gaze upon the speck of light before him, the chief officer ran at full speed along the passage, and at every step he took, the opening appeared to grow larger and larger.

At last he emerged into the open air.

He looked about him, but was unable to see the least signs of those of whom he was in search.

He found himself in another gravel-pit, of a character similar to the one he had left, only it was not so deep, nor was it so great in area.

Very rationally the chief officer came to the conclusion that the fugitives would embrace the opportunity of leaving the underground passage, and so, without stopping to search whether there were any other passages branching off from this second gravel-pit, he ran at a reckless speed up the narrow winding path that led to the upper earth.

Upon gaining the top, he dashed the perspiration from his forehead and looked around him in every direction; but there was no sign of Mr. Wild and Mr. Noakes to be seen.

What to do now he scarcely knew, and he stopped to reflect.

While his thoughts were thus occupied, we will take the opportunity of returning to Mr. Wild.

He, too, saw the faint speck of light in advance, and, knowing what it meant, felt a fresh accession of vigour.

Onward he went at a speed that Mr. Noakes could scarcely keep up with, although he was urged forward by terror.

Upon reaching the second gravel-pit, Mr. Wild espied the path leading to the top, and ran up it with the agility of a squirrel.

He panted for breath when he reached the brink of the gravel-pit, for his exertions had been very great indeed.

Being familiar with the locality, he knew in a moment where he was, and that he had nothing to fear from any of the police officers who might be on the watch at the brink of the other gravel-pit, for a small clump of trees intervened between them.

"Now, Noakes," he cried, "give me your hand; we must make a run for it this time! That's our only chance. Everything depends upon our getting shelter somewhere before our pursuers can see us! It's worth an effort. Rouse yourself—summon up all your energies, without you wish to become a prisoner!"

Mr. Noakes was influenced in a great measure by Jonathan Wild's example, and put forth his very best speed.

Unfortunately for the fugitives, the general character of the ground was flat, so that they would have to run a long way before they could get out of sight.

Wild did not look back many times, yet, whenever he did so, he made certain he should catch sight of his foes.

But they did not appear, for, as the reader will understand, the police officers had lost a great deal of valuable time after descending into the gravel-pit.

All this time the thief-taker had been in motion, so he gained a considerable advantage.

It was yet very early in the morning, and there scarcely appeared any signs of human beings having left their homes.

This made Jonathan still more inclined to think he should be able to hide himself somewhere before his pursuers could see him.

He looked all round in search of some place or other, but for many miles the only object he could perceive was a windmill, the sails of which were flying round somewhat rapidly as they were urged by the fresh morning breeze.

This did not promise to afford a very good chance for concealment, since they could scarcely hope to gain the interior without being seen by some one who was occupied about it.

But this was his only hope, and, rendered desperate by this knowledge, the thief-taker made his way in a straight line for it.

He looked back, but the officers were not in sight, and he already believed that he had got to such a distance that even if they traced him to the second gravel-pit, and reached the top of it, they would be unable to perceive him.

Being under this belief, he slackened speed a little as soon as he got near the windmill.

With straining eyes he looked at every part of it, and at the ground surrounding it, but he saw no one.

This inspired him with fresh confidence, and he accelerated his pace a little, though his limbs almost refused obedience to his will, he was so fearfully exhausted by the tremendous exertions he had made.

CHAPTER DXIX.

JONATHAN WILD HIDES FROM HIS PURSUERS IN A WINDMILL.

"Now, Noakes," said Wild, "we have only to make one more push! We must hide!"

"Where?"

"There!"

"In that windmill?"

"Yes."

"But we shall be seen."

"There is no one about."

"Perhaps people are within."

"We must chance that. Come on! Quick! There—that will do!"

While this conversation was in progress, Jonathan wild dragged his trembling comrade towards the windmill.

He paused near the foot of a flight of wooden steps that led up to a door that was standing partly open.

The grinding of the machinery could be heard plainly enough, but that was the only sound that reached their ears.

Wild listened in vain for the murmuring of voices.

"I don't believe there is anyone inside, Noakes," he said. "However, we must run the risk. It is the only chance we have."

The Governor looked up at the door of the mill with a terror-stricken countenance.

"We shall be seen if we linger here," said Jonathan, in an energetic whisper. "Besides, the police are not very far off—you may depend upon that."

"Can you see them?"

"No; they are not in sight yet, but we can't tell how soon they may be. Up with you! Ascend the steps! I will follow!"

After all that had happened, Mr. Noakes was less than ever in a position to disobey the commands of the thief-taker; and so, with a half-suppressed groan, he ran up the wooden steps.

Jonathan kept close behind him, and it might be said that both passed through the door at the same moment.

The interior seemed very dark in comparison with the light outside, but Jonathan noticed that there were some sacks of grain or flour in one corner.

There was no one in this part of the mill, though there might be in some other portion of it.

Wild was aware that if he was speedy he should be able to conceal himself here, and he led Mr. Noakes towards the sacks.

"What are you going to do, Mr. Wild?"

"Hide behind those sacks. Now then, be quick! I will follow. I fancy I can hear somebody coming now."

This was enough to frighten Mr. Noakes into motion, and he scrambled off over the sacks, and not without some difficulty squeezed himself down behind them.

The thief-taker did likewise, and though their hiding-place was of a very artificial character, yet if their presence was unsuspected, as they believed it was, they would be tolerably safe.

After they had been behind the sacks a few minutes, they became more comfortable, for the grain yielded, and allowed them a little more space than they had at first been able to obtain.

In the greatest dread and alarm they remained here, expecting every moment to receive some indication of the approach of their pursuers.

But as time passed on, leaving them undisturbed, their courage began to rise.

Jonathan began to congratulate himself upon having made another escape, and settled himself more comfortably than ever.

"We will remain here till night," he said, in a whisper, to his companion. "Rely upon it, we shall never be found."

"I hope not."

"Hush! Don't say another word!"

"Why?"

"I fancy I hear some one."

Mr. Noakes was silent instantly, and straining eagerly to catch the slightest sound.

Wild had not suffered his fancy to deceive him.

There was the tread of a foot-step without, and then the steps began to creak, as they always did when anyone ascended them.

Somebody was going to enter the mill.

Wild came to the conclusion that it was a person connected with the premises, for he knew his enemies would not approach singly.

It would have been a satisfaction if he could have peeped at the door of the mill.

But that was not to be thought of.

If he raised his head ever so little above the level of the sacks, he would be in great danger of being seen.

So he crouched down instead, which was by far the wiser proceeding of the two.

The footstep was a heavy one.

It paused just inside the door, and Wild could imagine just how the new comer was gazing about him.

He held his breath almost.

It was only for a moment that the man paused.

He continued on towards the interior of the building.

It was a source of deep joy to the two fugitives when he took his departure.

About a quarter of an hour elapsed, during which all remained perfectly silent, and then the fugitives heard a rumbling sound, which was produced by the approach of some heavy vehicle, such as a waggon.

Nearer and nearer it came, until at length it stopped just outside.

The rumbling of the wheels and the jingling of the bells on the horses' heads ceased, and then some one called out, in a loud, drawing voice:

"Hullo, Mr. Miller! Be ye within? Hallo, there!"

"What is it?" asked another voice from the interior of the mill.

"I ha' brought the wheat from Farmer Giles's!"

"All right! I will be with you directly!"

Jonathan began to grow uneasy, and, as will be seen, his uneasiness rapidly grew greater.

The man who had entered the mill came to the door, and the waggoner ascended the steps.

"Where would you like the sacks put, Mr. Miller?" asked the latter.

"Well, I don't know!" was the reply. "You see, these sacks here will have to be ground first, and so they will all have to be shifted!"

"Will they, though?"

"I am afraid so."

"Is there nowhere else it can be put?"

"No."

"It will be a devil of a job to move all that lot, master!"

"It will; but it can't be helped."

Can the reader imagine Jonathan's feelings while he listened to this brief conversation?

Can he judge the state of Mr. Noakes's mind?

Both broke out into a cold perspiration, and after the last words spoken by the miller, they quite gave themselves up for lost.

The removal of the sacks would of course ensure their discovery, and then what could they say for themselves?

Under the best circumstances, suspicion would be excited.

But the miller might insist upon detaining them, or he might recognise them, or have been put upon his guard by the police officers.

In either of these cases, the consequence would be serious.

Or the position might be complicated by the arrival of the officers while the dispute was going on.

All these things passed through Jonathan's mind, and made his heart turn cold within his bosom.

The waggoner was very unwilling to assist in the removal of the sacks, or to wait while they were moved.

A good deal of time was wasted in talking the matter over without any definite conclusion being arrived at.

At last they ended where they began, for the miller consented to allow the sacks to be placed upon the others.

Jonathan and his companion were now somewhat relieved, though they were by no means out of danger.

The unloading of the waggon now commenced, and as the sacks were brought into the mill, they were placed on the top of the others.

It was rather dark inside, and this was lucky for the two fugitives.

If it had not been so, their discovery would have been certain.

As it was, some sacks were placed over the space where they had concealed themselves.

In a few moments, they were so piled up that all fear of discovery was at an end.

But another danger manifested itself.

The pressure of the mass above was almost more than they could sustain, and, moreover, they were deprived of the amount of air that was requisite for free respiration.

They were within an ace of suffocation, until they managed to move a little.

The waggon contained a great number of sacks, and, as they were placed higher and higher, the sound of voices grew less audible, until at length it was only with the greatest difficulty that Wild could distinguish what was said.

Suddenly he heard the trampling of horses' feet, and immediately afterwards a loud voice cried:

"Hallo, there! Is there anyone within?"

Both the fugitives were made aware by this that a troop of police officers had arrived.

Their fears again assumed the mastery over them, but after a little reflection Wild grew calmer as he remembered that the miller would most probably say he had seen no one.

But even if so, the officers might not be satisfied with the reply.

How was it that they had ridden up to the mill?

Was it by chance, or as a part of a general search they were making, or had they received some precise information?

These were questions that Wild tormented himself with in vain.

He was unable to reply to them, for there was nothing that would serve him as a guide.

Hearing the noise caused by their horses, and also hearing the loud shout, the miller and waggoner both hastened to the door of the mill.

To their astonishment they beheld a tolerably numerous body of police officers, who all looked as though they had been engaged in rather hard service.

Their clothes were covered with the light-brown dirt which had clung to them while making their explorations in the gravel-pits, while their horses were in a perfect foam.

"What's the matter?" asked the miller, not without some trepidation, for the sight of so many well-armed and mounted police officers was calculated to excite alarm.

"Have you seen any strangers about this place?" asked the officer in command of the troop.

"When?"

"This morning."

"No, I haven't."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite! Might I make so bold, sir, as to inquire who you are after?"

"Yes, and then you will be on your guard. We are after Jonathan Wild and another man he has with him."

"Jonathan Wild?" repeated the miller.

"Yes."

"Why, I thought he was a thief-catcher?"

"So he pretended to be, but he has been found out. I have a warrant against him, to take him dead or alive."

"Is he about this part?"

"Yes, we have traced him to within about a mile of this place."

"Oh lor! I feel frightened to death!"

"Pho—pho! Don't be alarmed. Have you such a thing as a gun about your premises?"

"I have an old musket here, loaded with small shot, that I keep to drive the sparrows off with, drat 'em!"

"Then when you see Jonathan Wild, all you have got to do is to put your musket to your shoulder and fire just as you would shoot a sparrow."

"But shouldn't I get into trouble?"

"Devil a bit!"

"How's that?"

"How's that!"

"Yes, isn't killing murder?"

"Not in this case. Don't I tell you there is a warrant out against Jonathan Wild and the man with him, empowering anyone to take them dead or alive, it doesn't matter which?"

"Oh, that's it!"

"You understand now?"

"Oh yes!"

"That's right, then; and now I will give you a description of them, and if you should see them you will know what to do."

The officer then gave a very good description of the two fugitives, and concluded by saying:

"It is impossible to say just where they are hid. I am sure they are close at hand, so keep a sharp lookout."

"Never fear, sir! If I see him, I'll pepper the vagabone!"

"Do!"

"I will, depend upon it."

"You are certain you have not seen him?"

"Oh yes!"

"How long have you been unloading this waggon?"

"A goodish bit."

"How long?"

"I can't say the precise time, because I don't know, but you see we are almost done."

"They haven't hidden themselves in the mill, have they?"

"Oh no!"

"Have you been in it all the morning?"

"Very nearly."

"But not quite?"

"No, not quite."

"Then," said the officer, with an air of sudden determination, "as this is the only building for miles, and the only place where they could possibly find shelter, I will just make so bold as to look over your premises. Now, my lads," he added, "get ready, and if you catch sight of him, fire!"

The police officers alighted from their steeds, and, pistol in hand, followed their commander up the steps that led to the interior of the mill.

CHAPTER DXX.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES FIND THEIR SITUATION IN THE OLD MILL GROW MORE AND MORE UNPLEASANT.

Not a single word of this terrible conversation had escaped Jonathan Wild's ears, and when he heard the trampling sound produced by his foes ascending the stairs, he endeavoured to resign himself to death.

Mr. Noakes was so overcome with fright that he fainted, so that he remained unconscious of his danger.

Perhaps, so far as their own safety was concerned, it was better so, because the Governor did not possess the same firmness of nerve as his companion, and in his terror he might give vent to some exclamation that would have the effect of making their enemies acquainted with their hiding-place.

The thief-taker, however, could be depended upon.

We ought to state that the reason he heard all that was said with so much distinctness was owing to his pressing his ear against the wooden walls of the windmill.

Everything now depended upon the rigour with which the officers conducted their search.

Of course, if they pried into every corner, as they ought to do, the fugitives would be discovered.

They might, however, shrink from the task of removing so many sacks of grain, which would require a very large expenditure of labour, and this was Wild's only chance.

He comforted himself with the reflection that it was not as though the officers had seen him enter the mill, or even as if they had tracked him to it. In either of these two cases they would not have rested until they had made a thorough search.

Having nothing but a suspicion that he might be there, might perhaps make them less careful.

However, that remains to be seen.

The officer in command showed, by the precautions that he took, that he quite understood the best way to proceed in matters like the present.

"Two of you remain here," he said, addressing his followers. "Don't stir from the spot, and if you see or hear anything unusual, raise an immediate alarm."

"All right, sir!"

"And now, Mr. Miller," added the officer, "perhaps you will be good enough to show us the way to the top of the mill."

"The very top?"

"Yes—we will begin our search there, and then come gradually downwards, until we reach the very bottom. Lead the way, for I don't want to waste time!"

"Very good, sir—I'll show you the way with great pleasure."

"Perhaps you would not mind letting me go with you," said the waggoner. "If so be the vagabones are here, I should like to see them caught, and perhaps I might lend a helping hand."

"By all means!" said the officer. "Come on, and if we capture the rascals, of course you will come in for your share of the reward!"

"And me?" asked the miller.

"Yes."

"Come on, then! Don't stop talking any longer—come along!"

It was wonderful what a difference it made to the miller when he learned that he stood a chance of taking a share of the reward.

He led the way to the top of the mill, and then the officer commenced his search in the manner he had announced his intention of doing.

But, as we know just where Wild is, we cannot feel much interest in the details of their search—therefore we pass over them.

They were absent an intolerably long time, Wild thought, who began to fear that his companion would recover his senses, and so give the alarm.

The two officers who had been left on guard seated themselves on the sacks, and made themselves as comfortable as they could under the circumstances.

At last the others returned.

They looked hot and tired, and disappointment was written legibly on all their countenances.

"When you have searched this place you have searched all the mill!" exclaimed the miller.

The chief officer looked around him.

"How long have those sacks been there?" he asked.

"Some of them a fortnight, and the others we have put there this morning."

"Humph!"

"Should you like to look if he is hidden behind them?"

"I don't know."

"He might be."

Jonathan felt at that moment what exquisite pleasure it would give him could he but have strangled the miller for making such a proposition.

The officer looked at the sacks in silence.

No doubt he was calculating how long it would take to move them, and deliberating as to what probability there was of Jonathan being hidden there.

"I wish you had come a little sooner," continued the miller.

"Why?"

"Because before the waggon was unloaded there wasn't half so many sacks, and I wanted them moved, because, as the wheat had been in the mill some time, I wanted to grind it before that which has just arrived."

"I don't think he is here," said the officer. "I have not been able to find even a trace of him. Good-bye, Mr. Miller—we will look elsewhere."

And, indeed, there seemed nothing left for the officers to do but to take their departure.

Jonathan began to breathe more freely when he heard these words spoken, and directly afterwards the officers began to descend the steps.

He pressed his ear as close to the woodwork as ever he could, and listened with more eagerness than he had ever listened before.

He heard his foes mount their horses—he heard the word of command given—and then, finally, the clatter of their horses' hoofs as they rode away.

The danger he now believed was past, but he soon found himself mistaken.

The waggoner and the miller watched the officers until they were out of sight, and then resumed their task of unloading the waggon.

While doing so, they whiled away the time as well as they could by conversing with each other.

"Who'd ha' thought, now," said the miller, "that that villain, Jonathan Wild, should be about these parts?"

"It's very strange, ain't it?"

"It is—to be police officer one day, and hunted like a thief the next! But I know what I shall do if I catch sight of him again!"

"What?"

"Why, I shall up with my gun and shoot him as I would a rook! Didn't the officer say he would stand by me for doing it, and the reward was all the same whether he was alive or dead?"

"He did?"

"Yes; and I want money badly, I do, for trade isn't what it used to was. I shall watch to-night, in case he might take it into his head to come about here, and if he does, pop—down he goes! I shouldn't stand on no ceremony!"

"Well, Mr. Miller, it's no concern of mine, but being as we have finished our job, I vote we take a drop of ale together, and after that I'm off!"

"Come along, then! I have got a drop of home-brewed in my cottage!"

The pair then, to Wild's extreme satisfaction, left the mill.

As soon as he was quite sure that they had gone, he turned his attention to his companion, who, he found, was just recovering his senses.

He determined he should hear good news at once.

"It's all right, Noakes!" he said, in as loud a tone of voice as he dared to use. "I tell you it's all right! We have done them again! The officers have been and gone, and now we are safe!"

Mr. Noakes did not at first understand what was said to him, but by degrees he comprehended it.

"Is it really true?" he said.

"Yes, quite true. You need be in no doubt about it. We are ten times safer than ever now!"

"How do you make that out?"

"Why, they have searched this place, and not having found us, have come to the conclusion that we are not in it, and so they won't trouble themselves any further about it."

"But the miller?"

"Oh, never mind him! Leave me to deal with him!"

"This life will kill me!"

"Not a bit of it!"

"I tell you it will!"

"Don't be a fool, Noakes, but listen to me!"

"What have you got to say?"

"I'm worn out. I want sleep. We shall have to stop here some hours, for it will not be safe to leave till nightfall. In the meantime, I should like to take the opportunity of having some rest, for I may go a long while without having another chance."

Jonathan Wild did not think it necessary to say any more, but composed himself to sleep as well as the nature of his hiding-place would allow him.

In a little while he was soundly slumbering.

Mr. Noakes sat still in an agony of fright, dreading every moment that they would be discovered.

The miller came back, and almost terrified the Governor into a swoon again by taking down his gun and withdrawing the charge.

He substituted another that was likely to do a great deal more damage than its predecessor.

He then resumed his daily labours.

Very slowly indeed did the hours pass away—that is, to Mr. Noakes, for Wild was unconscious of the flight of time.

The thief-taker did not awake until just after sunset.

The mill was rather rudely built, inasmuch as no pains had been taken to make the timbers join closely enough together to exclude the draught.

There were numberless chinks in every direction, and it was by noting the colour of the light that came through these that the thief-taker was able to form some idea of the flight of time.

At last it grew quite dark.

The miller left the mill, and then, for the first time, Wild discovered that he had to grapple with a difficulty of rather a stupendous character.

He had found a secure hiding-place—had with great trouble squeezed himself into it.

Since then, however, some scores of heavy sacks of grain had been piled up on the others, and they formed a miniature mountain above his head.

How, then, was he to get out?

This was a problem indeed, and he taxed his brain vainly in order to find a solution to it.

They were literally prisoners.

Mr. Noakes quite overlooked this circumstance, and he asked:

"When shall you try to leave, Mr. Wild?"

"I should like to go whenever I could," was the reply.

"But how are we to move the sacks on the top of us?"

As soon as he found they were prisoners, Mr. Noakes was in a dreadful state of mind.

Jonathan was silent for nearly half an hour.

Then he spoke.

"We have one chance, Noakes, and only one!"

"Have we one?"

"Yes; but it is as good as none!"

Mr. Noakes, whose hopes had risen considerably, was much depressed.

"What is it?" he at last ventured to ask.

"It is to push out one of these planks that form the side of the mill."

"And why can't you do it?"

"I daresay I could do it, for the place seems old and rotten, but I should make a noise. I couldn't do it without."

"Ah!" said Mr. Noakes, in a dejected tone.

"And then, that confounded miller is on the watch, and would hear us!"

"And he has got a gun! I heard him load it!"

"D—n his gun!"

"So say I! How can we get out, Mr. Wild? You are a cleverer man than I am, and I leave it for you to say how the thing is to be done. We can't stay here all the while—can we?"

"Not exactly."

"Well, then, what's to be done?"

"We must wait till the night gets more advanced. It would never do for us to be discovered now."

They did wait, until Wild's patience was quite exhausted.

When this took place he painfully turned himself round and began feeling the different planks, in order to find out which one would be likely to give way with the least trouble.

He presently found one that was very loose indeed, and which apparently would require but little strength to remove.

Jonathan took a clasp-knife from his pocket, and, by the aid of this solitary tool, commenced his attack upon the plank.

He had to pause every now and then to listen, in order to ascertain that all was well.

At length, being satisfied upon this point, he began to work with greater vigour and determination.

By dint of using his knife, sometimes as a lever to force out the rusty nails, and sometimes to cut away the wood, he finally succeeded in displacing the plank altogether.

He could not avoid making a little noise, and the crash with which the plank fell to the ground sounded in his ears as something terrific.

"Now, Noakes," cried Jonathan, "quick! It won't do to linger! Follow me—this is the way!"

While he spoke these words, the thief-taker slipped with great celerity through the opening which he had made.

Mr. Noakes followed with all possible speed, for he by no means desired to be left in the mill by himself.

Scarcely, however, had his feet touched the ground than there was a bright flash and a loud report, and a loud voice, which they at once recognised as the miller's, roared out:

"Pepper for one, I hope!"

Mr. Noakes heard it too, but upon him an opposite effect was produced.

The miller had kept well upon the watch.

The slight sound which Wild had made in displacing the board had not escaped his observation, and at first when he heard it he was very undecided as to what he should do.

After a little reflection, however, he resolved to say nothing to anyone, and to seat himself upon the ground in front of the mill, taking up such a position as would enable him to command the spot where Wild was at work.

To use his own expression, "he covered that plank!"

Wild did not get on with his work very rapidly, as we already know, and the miller began to grow weary of having his attention kept on the stretch for so long.

The fall of the plank was a thing he had not expected, and the crash with which it came to the ground quite alarmed him.

For a second he was unable to pull the trigger, but his presence of mind returning to him, he fired.

But he was just a second too late.

Wild sprang up and gave one bound on to the miller like an enraged tiger.

That individual was by no means prepared for the attack, and was indeed in a great deal of frustration altogether.

He had a very wholesome dread of the thief-taker, who, somehow or other, had managed to obtain the reputation of being more than a match for any other man.

This proved a fortunate thing for Wild, and more than once he owed his life to it, and to nothing else.

Wild's eyes fastened like a hawk's upon the gun.

He seized it in an instant, and whirled it round his head with lightning-like rapidity.

Down it came upon the crown of the unlucky miller.

A most ominous crash was the result, and the next instant he was lying on the ground as though utterly bereft of life.

Wild waved the musket round his head, and seemed about to deal another blow.

But if such was his intention, he changed it.

Had he struck a thousand blows, the man would not have felt one of them.

Uttering an exclamation, Wild turned round, and was surprised at being unable to see anything of his companion.

"Hallo, Noakes!" he cried. "Where are you, you d—d coward? Where are you, I say?"

This question met with no response, and, looking in the direction of the mill, Jonathan fancied he could perceive some dark, huddled-up mass lying near it.

Concluding that this must be the body of his companion, he took his way towards it with long strides.

Upon coming closer, he found that his conjecture was a correct one.

"Noakes!" he said—"Noakes! Get up, will you?—get up, and be d—d!"

There was no reply.

"I wonder if he is dead?" was the thief-taker's next exclamation—"I wonder if he is dead? Perhaps he has received the contents of that gun, and yet I don't think so; the shots passed too close to me!"

By way of ascertaining whether his companion was dead or not, Wild gave him a by no means gentle blow in the ribs with the butt of the musket.

A deep groan followed.

"Then you are not dead yet?" said Wild. "Then get up, will you?"

Another blow followed.

"Get up!" he continued, "or you will be black and blue! Don't lie there like a fool!"

With many dismal groans and half-suppressed shrieks, Mr. Noakes rose to his feet.

"Now, how are you?" asked Jonathan.

"I'm shot!"

"Gammon!"

"I am!"

"Where?"

"I don't know."

"Then find out, will you?—I don't think there is anything the matter!"

CHAPTER DXXI.

JONATHAN WILD RESOLVES TO HAVE A HORSE, AND ADOPTS SUMMARY MEANS FOR OBTAINING ONE.

WILD heard the report of the gun, and so knew he was all right, and his presence of mind never deserted him.

[JONATHAN WILD DASHES THE ALE MEASURE IN THE OSTLER'S FACE.]

Mr. Noakes shook his head dismally, after which he came to the conclusion that that portion of his anatomy was in its accustomed place.

He then worked his arm about in a most extraordinary and comical manner, and then his other arm.

He treated his legs in a similar fashion, and then, with another hideous groan, he exclaimed:

"Oh, I am badly hurt!"

"Where? I don't believe it!"

"Feel my back!" cried the Governor—"feel my back!"

"I will; but it will be with the butt end of this musket!"

"No, no—don't!"

"It is all imagination!—I don't believe you are hurt at all!"

Mr. Noakes worked all his limbs about for some time longer, and finally came to the same conclusion.

"Now then!" cried Jonathan, who was as full of energy as ever—"now then, come on, without you desire to be captured! The report of that musket could have been heard a mile off, and how can we tell whose ears it may have reached—there may be officers about for all we can tell! Come on, I say, or I will go without you!"

No. 110.—BLUESKIN.

Wild seized hold of the Governor's arm, and dragged him forcibly forward.

Mr. Noakes had lately had so many proofs of Jonathan Wild's powers, that he was terrified to death at the idea of being left alone; for, by himself, he well knew he should be no match for his enemies.

Therefore, when Wild gripped hold of his arm, the Governor bounded forward at a speed that was really quite remarkable.

Jonathan looked all around him with considerable apprehension, and he stopped every now and then to listen.

He was under the impression that his foes were lurking about in the vicinity, and, as he had truly said, the report of the gun could be heard for an immense distance over the silent fields.

No alarm, however, appeared to have been given, and, with something like satisfaction about his heart, the thief-taker strode forward.

He felt the change in his position keenly, and more than ever he thought how many poor wretches he had hunted about the country, even as he was being hunted.

Nevertheless, on this night he felt fresh and vigorous, and now and then the idea would vaguely come over him that, at some distant period, he should once more occupy his old position.

The prospect of again possessing the power he once had was indeed a great consolation to him, and it buoyed up his hopes exceedingly.

With a savage feeling of delight, he would promise himself how he would use his power if he once had it.

What a full and deadly vengeance he would have upon all those who had in any way raised their hands against him!

He amused himself by naming them one by one, and deciding what kind of punishment should be awarded to them.

We all have day-dreams, by which we while away and make more pleasant the dull monotony of our existence, and those were the day-dreams of Jonathan Wild.

The most sanguine person, however, would fail to see any likelihood of their fulfilment.

At a rapid rate, the fugitives took their way in a direct line across the fields.

Mr. Noakes was well aware of the futility of making any inquiries of his companion as to where he intended to go, and so he saved his breath for a better purpose.

During the time he had been sojourning in the mill, Wild had arranged his immediate proceedings.

He did not dare trust himself to look far into the future, for a thousand chance circumstances might arise which would have the effect of deranging all his plans.

At last, tired and out of breath, he came to a halt.

Mr. Noakes was glad to stop, for he was not equal to the exertions he had recently been called upon to make.

It was behind a hedge that Wild stopped, just on the other side of which was a broad high-road.

Mr. Noakes immediately sunk down on the grass, where he lay gasping for breath.

Jonathan himself was somewhat winded, but, as soon as he could recover his breath, he said, with a grin at his comrade's distress:

"You seem knocked up, Noakes?"

"I am—I am!"

"You will get used to this in time."

"Never—never!"

"But you will!"

"Mr. Wild!"

"What?"

"Do give heed to what I say! I am in earnest—indeed I am in earnest!"

"What about?"

"This scampering over the country, and fighting police officers continually!"

"Do you mean to give in?"

"I don't know about that, but I can't stand it! I must have rest!"

"Bah!"

"I must! If you are iron, I am not!"

Wild smiled grimly at this allusion to his own endurance.

"I can stand a great deal!" he said.

"Much more than I can—much more than I can! I am dead beat now!"

"Noakes!"

"What?"

"Can you ride?"

"On horseback do you mean?"

"Yes."

"I can manage to stick in the saddle."

"That is all that is required, then. You would sooner ride than walk, I suppose?"

"Rather!"

"Then we will!"

"But where are our horses?"

"We must obtain some."

"How?"

"Never mind! Leave that to me!"

"You will get two?"

"Yes."

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild!"

"I would have had two before if I had had the least idea that you were master of the accomplishment of riding. Are you better now?"

"Yes, a great deal!"

"Then we will look after the horses next thing. Get up!"

With a groan, Mr. Noakes obeyed.

"Now follow me!" continued Wild. "Before many hours are over, we shall have a horse apiece!"

Mr. Noakes had no idea how this was to be done, but he had learned to place implicit faith in his villainous companion.

When Wild uttered the words "Follow me," he walked up to the hedgerow, and coming presently to a gap in it, he pushed his way through.

Mr. Noakes came after him.

They were now standing in the Oxford Road, and at a point not very far distant from the metropolis.

The Governor looked about him apprehensively.

It seemed to him such a daring feat to venture to enter the high-road at all.

Wild looked about him also, but there was no terror about his heart.

"Hush!" he cried, suddenly—"hush!"

As he spoke he suddenly laid himself at full length upon the earth.

He pressed his ear close to the ground, and listened for nearly a minute, every second of which seemed an hour to Mr. Noakes.

Then, springing to his feet, he said:

"Back—back! Creep through the hedge again—be quick!"

"What's the matter?"

"Officers are coming—or a large body of horsemen at all events! They are not more than a mile off, and will soon be here! They are coming on at a fast trot!"

The Governor did not wait to hear the conclusion of Wild's speech.

With one bound he dashed through the hedge, perfectly heedless as to the scratches and other hurts that he received.

Jonathan followed him quickly.

As is generally the case, the hedge which divided the meadow from the highway was planted on the top of an artificial bank about two feet in height.

Mr. Noakes laid himself down at full length, pressing himself with all his might against the foot of the embankment.

Jonathan, however, stood upright, because he knew very well that there was little or no fear of him being seen.

After the lapse of a few moments the beat of the horses' hoofs upon the hard road became distinctly audible.

As Mr. Noakes laid down, the clattering of the iron-bound hoofs seemed to shake the very earth.

He was greatly alarmed.

"What the devil are you trembling for like that?", asked Wild.

"Hush—hush!" gasped the Governor, in a whisper.

"Are you frightened?"

"The officers are coming!"

"I know that; but we are in no danger! They have no means of telling that we are hidden here! They will never suspect such a thing if you, with your d—d foolery, don't do something to betray our hiding-place!"

"I will be as still and silent as the dead!"

"Then, if so, we have nothing whatever to fear. Hush—do not speak again or move until you hear me speak to you! That will be when all danger is past."

Mr. Noakes was silent at once.

The officers, if such they were, came on quickly.

Jonathan had not much doubt upon the point, for at that hour of the night it was not likely that a large body of horsemen would be journeying along the road.

The thief-taker sank down on his knees so that his face was close to the bottom of the hedge.

He was then able to command a view of the road before him, as it was perfectly easy to peep through the interstices of the hedge, though it was next to, if not quite, impossible that he should be seen by the officers.

On they came without any abatement of speed, which increased the feeling of security in Wild's breast.

A few moments passed, and then they came in sight.

Wild tried to count them as they went by, but they were too numerous.

Still he guessed their number to be about twenty.

They were officers.

He could tell that by their accoutrements.

They passed by the spot where the fugitives were hiding without either accelerating or diminishing their speed.

Evidently they had not the least suspicion that Wild and Noakes were concealed so close to them.

The last officer passed, and then Wild had the pleasure of listening to the abatement of the sound as they got further and further off.

He waited until the hoofbeats had become almost inaudible in the distance, and then, but not till then, did he venture to address his still-terrified companion in crime.

"All right once more," said Wild, as he touched the Governor with his foot.

Mr. Noakes raised his head.

"Get up!" added Wild.

"Is the danger past?"

"Yes, the officers are far off down the road."

"What a relief! You are sure none have been left behind to lurk about?"

"Quite. I watched them too closely for that. Get up! The next thing that we have to do is to get a couple of horses already saddled and bridled; I don't think we need fear of being disturbed, as we have seen the officers so recently!"

"But how shall we get the horses?"

"Come through the gap in the hedge again, and when you get on to the high-road you will see."

CHAPTER DXXII.

JONATHAN WILD COMMITS A COLD-BLOODED AND TREACHEROUS MURDER ON THE HIGHWAY.

NOT without many misgivings, Mr. Noakes made his way into the high-road once more.

"Crouch down," said Wild, "in the shadow of the hedge, and remain perfectly quiet—that is all the share I want you to take in the little transaction!"

"Very good!"

"And don't be frightened, because you have really nothing to be alarmed about—all is well!"

Mr. Noakes crouched down in the dry ditch under the shadow of the hedge, and remained silent, as he had been bidden.

Wild placed himself by his side, also crouching down in the darkness so that he could not be seen.

His next proceeding was to look to the priming and loading of a pistol.

Mr. Noakes looked on and observed all these proceedings with mingled wonder and fear.

He was yet at a loss to know how Wild intended to achieve his purpose.

Having seen that his pistol was in proper order, Wild held it in such a manner as to be able to make instant use of it if required.

He then remained perfectly still, though his attitude was a listening one.

In this manner nearly half-an-hour passed by, and the Governor began to feel terribly cramped, by being forced to retain his awkward position for so long.

He was about to move, when a faint sound struck upon his ear.

Wild heard it too, though he did not show it either by word or act.

The sound soon resolved itself into something distinguishable, and after a short time, unused as he was to such matters, Mr. Noakes could tell that a single traveller was approaching.

He was coming from the direction of London, and was rapidly nearing the spot where Wild lay in ambush.

Mr. Noakes fixed his gaze upon the thief-taker.

He could see his eyes shining like those of some predatory animal.

He held the pistol to a level.

Noakes wondered what were the thoughts of the man who was riding on so quickly.

Were there any strange feelings about his heart?—did the invisible essence of his being feel that some danger was about to overtake the physical frame?

Whether the traveller felt any misgivings or not, would, however, be hard to say.

If he did experience any presentiment of coming evil, he regarded it not, and came riding on at the same steady rate as before.

Both villains had been long enough in their hiding-place for their eyes to become accustomed to the gloom. They could see every object within a reasonable distance with perfect distinctness.

At last the traveller came in sight.

At first it was but a moving, shadowy mass that they beheld advancing rapidly towards them, but soon it resolved itself into the outlines of a horse and rider.

Gradually they became more and more distinct, until they could even see that it was a young man who was thus hastening to his doom.

His coat was richly embroidered, and many diamonds glittered here and there upon his person, sending out faint scintillations of light like mimic stars.

Slowly Jonathan Wild rose to his feet.

The pistol was extended to the full length of his arm.

Then he waited until the traveller was opposite to him.

As soon as ever this was the case, Wild took one step forward.

At the same moment he pulled the trigger.

There was a bright flash and a report.

Wild's aim was accurate.

A wild, unearthly kind of shriek came from the lips of the ill-fated traveller.

It mingled strangely with the report of the pistol.

The instant he had fired, Wild bounded into the road and seized the terrified horse by the bridle.

It was a splendid, high-spirited creature, and no sooner did it feel Wild touch the reins than it reared and struck out desperately with its fore feet.

But Wild was on his guard, and so escaped injury.

Not so the traveller.

When his horse reared he fell with a crash into the roadway, where he lay to all appearances bereft of life.

Mr. Noakes experienced a shock to his nervous system when he beheld this cold-blooded, treacherous murder.

Even he shrank from obtaining a horse by such means.

Jonathan, however, had but one feeling in the matter.

That was delight at having so well succeeded in effecting his purpose.

In less than a moment he managed to quiet the horse, and then, in a suppressed voice, he said:

"Noakes—Noakes! Where are you?"

"Here!" was the trembling reply.

"Come this way, then!"

Mr. Noakes approached.

"What do you want, Mr. Wild?"

"Just stoop down and see whether he is dead. If he is, all well and good! Then feel if he has anything in his pockets!"

Had he been allowed any choice in the matter, Mr. Noakes would rather not have had anything to do with the assassinated traveller; but he felt constrained to obey Wild's commands.

Staggering forward until he came to the prostrate form, he stooped down, and after a momentary hesitation placed his hand upon the traveller's breast.

He was unable to feel the slightest pulsation.

"Is he dead?" asked Wild.

"I think so."

"And a good job!"

Mr. Noakes shuddered.

"It is awful!" he ejaculated.

"Bah! Be quick, and search his pockets! Take whatever you can find of any value, and I will help you to kick the body into the ditch! Make haste, without you want us to be discovered by some passer-by!"

With trembling hand, Mr. Noakes searched the pockets of the murdered traveller.

He had evidently been of some distinction, for he carried about him many articles of great value, such as would be found only on the person of a rich man.

These articles Mr. Noakes transferred to his pocket with rather extraordinary rapidity.

Probably he thought the best thing he could do was to get a disagreeable job over as quickly as possible.

It is, however, certain that in something less than a minute he completed his task.

"Have you done?" asked Jonathan.

"Yes."

"Into the ditch with him!"

"You promised to help me to do that!"

"Into the ditch with him, I say! D—n it, do you promise to disobey my orders?"

"No; but—"

"Into the ditch with him, then!" cried Wild, furiously. "Can't you see I have enough to do to keep this infernal horse still?"

And indeed the thief-taker had great difficulty in quieting the traveller's horse.

The noble creature seemed to be aware that some evil had befallen its rider, and that Jonathan was the cause of it.

It plunged and reared, and paid not the least attention to Wild's caressing words and gestures.

This tried Jonathan's temper not a little, and he would have perpetrated some brutal trick, only he happened to be aware that in such cases violence would be sure to fail, and that the only chance he had of overcoming the creature was by using gentle means.

But he patted and stroked all to no purpose.

With a heavy groan the Governor prepared himself to carry out Wild's further mandate.

He liked this less than anything he had done; but he dared not say no.

Jonathan's violence already terrified him.

Taking hold, then, of the unfortunate gentleman by the feet, he dragged him along the road towards the ditch.

It so happened that he had not many feet to go to the nearest hedge, which was on the side of the road opposite to that upon which they had placed themselves in ambush.

This ditch, then, was unlike the other, for it was wide, apparently deep, and filled with water, upon the surface of which floated that strange vegetation which is found covering stagnant ponds as with a coating of green slime.

Mr. Noakes dragged the traveller quite to the edge of this ditch, and having done so, he stooped down.

With one vigorous push, then, he sent the body into the stagnant ditch.

The green coating was disturbed, and the water which showed itself beneath looked inky black, and emitted a most horrible stench.

In the twinkling of an eye the body disappeared.

But just as it came in contact with the filthy water, a deep, gurgling, half-smothered groan came from the traveller's lips.

Mr. Noakes echoed this groan with a loud cry, for he had fully believed the man was dead.

That such was not the case was, however, quite evident; but that he could survive while lying at the bottom of the ditch, powerless to make the least movement, was simply impossible.

Jonathan uttered an oath as Mr. Noakes's shout fell upon his ears, for not only was it calculated to attract discovery, but it had the effect of materially adding to the terror under which the horse was already labouring.

He threatened to become quite unmanageable, and the thief-taker feared that after all, now he had got the horse, he would turn out no use to him.

"He wasn't dead!" gasped Noakes, in defence of himself.

"And if he wasn't, what the devil did you make that row for? Come and try if you can help me to pacify this horse, and don't stand there like a d—d fool!"

"But it gave me such a turn!"

"Bah! If he wasn't dead, he soon will be! The ditch-water won't agree very well with the contents of his stomach!"

Mr. Noakes thought so too, but, bad as he was, he could not help shuddering at the atrocity his companion displayed.

He went towards him, though, and after a great deal of trouble they succeeded in calming the frightened horse.

"Wait till he is out of this fright," said Wild, savagely. "Wait till I am on his back, and I will be even with him!"

"Be careful, Mr. Wild,—he seems a vicious creature!"

"Does he?"

"He does."

"You are glad, then, that I am going to ride him and not hand him over to you?"

"I am, and I would advise you to be careful."

"Bah! there is no horse alive that can throw me if I once get on his back. Then you would rather trust to your own legs for a little while longer?"

"Decidedly."

"Then you shall do so! Hold his head while I mount," Mr. Noakes obeyed, and Wild tried to put his foot in the stirrup.

It was in vain, however.

The horse resolutely refused to allow him to mount.

Jonathan cursed and swore in a most frightful manner.

"If you will take my advice," said Mr. Noakes, who had great difficulty in retaining his hold upon the bridle, and preventing the horse from running away—"if you will take my advice, you will let the brute go!"

"You be d—d!" rejoined Jonathan. "Do you think I am such an idiot as to allow myself to be mastered by a horse? Not a bit of it."

Jonathan made several more attempts to mount, but they were all utter failures.

Mr. Noakes again entreated him to desist from the attempt.

Wild refused to listen.

"Hold him a minute!" he cried. "If I don't get on the brute's back, it's d—d odd to me!"

Jonathan was quite furious with rage at being thus set at defiance, and by a dumb animal, too—one that he believed he could easily hold in subjection.

Casting his eyes round, he saw not many paces off a tree that grew by the wayside.

From this tree one branch projected across the road in a remarkably horizontal manner.

No sooner did his eye fall upon this than he was seized with a fresh idea.

The branch was about seven feet—perhaps rather more—from the ground.

Running forward with impetuosity, Wild gave a spring into the air.

He managed to grasp the branch with his fingers, but by a second effort he improved and strengthened his hold.

Mr. Noakes watched all these proceedings with astonishment, and apparently so did the horse, for it was much quieter than it had been.

Its expanded eyeballs were, however, fixed upon Jonathan Wild.

Towards Mr. Noakes it did not manifest near so much dislike.

Jonathan, having seized hold of the branch in the manner we have described, drew himself up by the aid of the muscles in his arms until his breast was on a level with it.

"Now, Noakes," he cried, still in furious accents, "bring the horse along!"

"Where to, sir?"

"Why, to me, of course! Lead him under the branch of this tree, and when I am just over the saddle, stop him and hold him tight."

These words were quite sufficient to let the Governor understand what it was that Jonathan intended to do.

Accordingly he led the horse forward, and though he lost no time in doing this, yet Wild cursed him bitterly for his delay.

The horse suffered Mr. Noakes to lead him onward without offering much resistance.

He shrunk back, however, when he came near to the body of Wild hanging from the tree.

By speaking in encouraging accents, and patting him upon the neck, Mr. Noakes managed to lead him on.

The very moment the body of the horse was beneath him, Jonathan Wild, who had stretched out his legs in readiness, dropped with a heavy and sudden shock into the saddle.

The horse uttered a snort of terror, and broke from the hold of Mr. Noakes, who was dashed to the earth.

But now he was mounted, Wild did not care.

He could safely defy the horse to throw him.

Gripping the saddle with his knees, he just took hold of the reins lightly, making no effort to restrain the animal's headlong speed.

He vanished from the view of his comrade instantly.

The thoroughly terrified and half-maddened creature made many abortive attempts to throw its rider.

They were all in vain, for Jonathan kept his seat in a manner that would have done credit to a trained jockey.

In his mouth Jonathan held a stout stick.

Taking hold of this in his right hand, he belaboured the horse with it in a perfectly brutal manner.

He was now gratifying himself by a little revenge.

Very soon the horse showed symptoms of being vanquished.

It trembled and became obedient to the rein.

Wild still continued his beating, nor did he cease until his arm ached so excessively that he had not strength to raise it and give another blow.

When this was the case, he turned the horse's head round, and trotted him gently to the spot where had left his companion.

The horse was perfectly docile and obedient.

CHAPTER DXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD HAS SOME DANGEROUS ADVENTURES ON THE HIGHWAY.

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild!" ejaculated Mr. Noakes, in tones of genuine admiration—"you are a wonderful man!"

"What! for mastering this brute?"

"Yes."

"There was nothing in that!"

"How came you to think of that ingenious way of getting on to his back?"

"I saw the trick once done by a jockey, and I luckily remembered it. Will you have the horse, or shall I look out for another one for you?"

"Look out for another one? But, Mr. Wild——"

"What?"

"Don't—don't!"

"Don't what, idiot?"

"Don't deprive a man of his life simply that you may get a horse!"

"You are growing considerate, Noakes! Bah! Don't be a fool! Another horse we must and will have, and we are not the right sort to stand upon trifles,—it would be folly for us to do so!"

"But you could get a horse without murder."

"We shall see. Come on a little further down the road. We won't perform two exploits in the same place. I will walk the horse slowly, so that you will easily be able to keep pace with him."

To this Mr. Noakes assented, and the villainous pair took their way along the road in the direction of Oxford.

After they had gone about a mile they came to a very shady piece of road, and here Wild halted.

"Now, Noakes," he said, "I will get you a horse. All you have to do is to keep out of sight—to hear, see, and say nothing! I will manage the little affair alone!"

"But not by murder?"

"Hold your row! Can't you hear somebody coming?"

Sure enough, a traveller was coming along the road.

He was journeying towards London, and in a few minutes would reach the shady piece of road where the two villains were.

Jonathan was seated on his horse in perfect readiness to ride forth as soon as ever the traveller should arrive opposite to him.

In a little while he saw him.

Darting forward, Wild cried, with great suddenness:

"Pull up!—stop, or you are a dead man!"

The traveller reined in his steed with great abruptness, and before Wild had the least idea of what he was about or what he intended to do, fired a pistol point-blank in his face.

Jonathan's hat was blown off his head, and for a minute or two he scarcely knew whether he was dead or alive.

Nor did the traveller wait to see, for as soon as he fired he clapped spurs to his horse's flanks, and was out of sight in no time.

So suddenly did all this happen, that for once in his life at least Jonathan Wild was completely taken by surprise.

When, at length, he recovered himself, the traveller was out of sight, and the clattering of his horse's feet upon the roadway could only be faintly heard.

Mr. Noakes could not tell whether Jonathan was dead or alive.

How it was that he managed to escape all injury from the shot that was fired at him is a mystery.

He never could explain it himself.

The bullet must have passed him in unpleasantly close proximity—there can be no doubt about that.

As soon as ever he found that he was unhurt, the first thing he did was to pour out a most awful string of curses.

Mr. Noakes prudently kept out of sight until Wild's passion somewhat abated.

At length he stepped forward, and in a hesitating voice he said:

"You have had a narrow escape, Mr. Wild! I made sure you were killed!"

"And if I had been, what should you have cared?"

To have answered truthfully, Mr. Noakes would have been compelled to pronounce the word "Nothing."

Upon all occasions, however, it is not good policy to tell the exact truth, and Mr. Noakes was right in thinking that this was an occasion when a little subterfuge would be beneficial.

"I should have cared a great deal, Mr. Wild," he replied, in a wheedling tone of voice.

"Don't believe it!"

"It's true, Mr. Wild! What could I do without you? Had I been alone, I should have fallen into the hands of the officers long ago, and you know that!"

"It will be a serious thing for you when you do lose me!" replied the thief-taker.

"I know it—I know it! Are you sure you are unhurt, Mr. Wild?"

Jonathan was not quite sure, but he was certain his injuries were slight.

He felt his head carefully, and discovered that the bullet from the traveller's pistol had ploughed up the skin at one side of his skull.

"It's nothing," he said—"nothing at all!"

"How I rejoice!"

"Hold your hypocritical row, do! But wait till the next man rides by! I'll have his horse, or it's odd to me!"

"Don't murder him!"

"Shut up!"

"I could not ride a dead man's horse!"

"Then use your own legs if you are so damnable squeamish. Perhaps you'll get a horse yourself?"

"I cannot!"

"Will you run by the side of mine?"

"I cannot!"

"Then, d—n you for a fool, let me get one for you!"

Mr. Noakes said no more.

Almost immediately the trampling of horses' hoofs became heard, and Jonathan cried out:

"Back into the ditch with you!—back, I say!"

Mr. Noakes retreated, and Jonathan compelled his horse to walk backwards until his hind legs were in the ditch by the roadside.

Another traveller was coming.

Wild was in readiness, determined not to be taken by surprise this time, as he had been before.

A few moments passed away, and then they caught sight of the approaching horseman.

He was urging his steed both by whip and spur to make its utmost speed.

It almost looked as though he was aware danger was lurking in the vicinity, and that he was making haste to get past it.

So pleased was Wild apparently with his first attempt, that he determined to repeat the same plan of operations.

He had his pistol in readiness, and, as soon as the traveller was near enough, he fired.

As Wild waited until the unfortunate man was close to him, it was scarcely possible that he could miss his mark.

He did not.

With a groan the rider fell to the ground, and Jonathan galloped forward just in time to catch the horse by the bridle.

The two villains were now in possession of a couple of capital horses.

Mr. Noakes was dreadfully shocked at this second murder.

Wild's shot was not instantly fatal, for the man lay writhing in the roadway uttering many dismal groans, and making many abortive efforts to rise to his feet.

Jonathan secured the horse, and then cried:

"Now, Noakes, just look after the pockets, and then mount. I will hold your horse the while."

The Governor uttered a groan, but came tremblingly towards the prostrate man.

He stooped down and strove to catch a glimpse of the traveller's countenance.

He was an old man, with a profusion of silvery hair, which streamed in confusion over his countenance, giving to his distorted features an aspect of peculiar ghastliness.

"Help—help!" he cried, faintly, upon seeing the Governor bending over him—"help!—help!—I am dying!"

Mr. Noakes shook like a leaf.

"Help!" cried the wounded man again. "Oh, heaven, —I die!"

"Noakes, you d—d villain!" roared the thief-taker—"why don't you search his pockets? Do you intend to stand there like a fool till the officers come?"

"I am a-doing of it, sir—I am a-doing of it, Mr. Wild!"

As he spoke, Mr. Noakes placed one hand upon the breast of the murdered traveller.

"Help—help!" was the same cry, and he writhed on the ground like a snake. "Ellen—Ellen—my own dear, much-loved Ellen! I die! Farewell! I shall see you now! My bitterest curse upon my murderers! I was told highwaymen were on the road. Help—help! I—"

"Noakes," cried the thief-taker, "do you set me at defiance?"

"I can't do it!" replied the Governor, and as he spoke he rose to his feet and made a rapid retreat. "He's alive, and cursing his murderer. I can't touch him!"

Jonathan uttered a cry of mingled anger and contempt.

"Alive, is he?" he asked, "and cursing his murderer? Bah! We will soon put a stop to that!"

So saying, Wild struck his spurs deeply into his horse's flanks, and caused him to bound forward.

The body of the traveller lay exactly in the horse's path, so that he could not avoid placing his hoofs upon it.

No sooner did he find that the traveller was beneath his horse's feet than Wild pulled the rein violently, causing the terrified animal to rear high up into the air.

Down it came on to its feet again, but the iron-bound hoofs came into violent contact with the head of the ill-fated man.

There was an awful, blood-chilling cry of agony, and then all was over.

The traveller was dead.

"Now," said Wild, with a demoniac laugh, "he won't trouble you any more by cursing his murderer. He is as dead as a nut. Will you empty his pockets now, d—n you?"

But Mr. Noakes was quite overcome by this last specimen of the thief-taker's bloodthirsty ferocity.

He shrank from the crushed and mangled body with ten thousand times more horror and loathing than before.

But so great was his dread of what his villanous companion might do—so thoroughly was he awed by what had taken place—that he found his terror obtain the ascendancy over every other feeling; and so, with faltering steps, he approached the spot upon which the dead body lay.

"Quick, you cowardly villain!" cried Wild,—"quick, or you will be too late! Every moment I expect to hear the sounds of the approach of the police officers. Be quick, I say!"

Once more did Mr. Noakes stoop down over the blood-stained corpse.

Averting his eyes from the awful spectacle, and guided solely by his sense of feeling, the Governor performed his horrible task of feeling in the pockets for any articles of value.

There was not much to recompense him for his trouble.

A purse containing a few guineas, a pocket-book, some loose silver, and a watch; but this last was irretrievably damaged by the horse's hoofs.

It was a great relief to the Governor when this was over, and he uttered a sigh of satisfaction as he said:

"It is done!"

"Now pull him to one side of the road,—roll him into the ditch: then mount. It is time we were off! We should have been miles away if you had not been such a d—d fool and coward as you are!"

Mr. Noakes could not, with all the influence that fear had over him, bring himself to touch the body with his hands.

But the body must be moved, so he kicked it with his feet.

There was no convenient ditch with plenty of water in it, so he was obliged to leave the body by the wayside.

"Mount!" said the thief-taker, impatiently—"mount!"

Mr. Noakes felt terrified at the thought of getting upon the back of the horse whose master had met with so cruel a fate.

Had he said so, however, he would have done nothing but provoke the derision of Jonathan Wild, and perhaps bring down upon himself some personal ill-usage.

Overcoming, then, these scruples in the same manner as he had had to overcome many more, Mr. Noakes, with serious misgivings about his heart, placed his foot in the stirrup and mounted.

"Off and away!" cried Wild. "Off and away!"

He turned his horse's head in the direction of the country as he spoke.

Mr. Noakes observed this with joy, that was none the less because it was not manifested.

"This has been an awful night!" he said.

"Bah!"

"I wonder who that last gentleman was? Poor fellow, —I am sorry for him!"

"What business is it of ours who he is? We have got what we want. Is not that sufficient?"

Mr. Noakes made no precise reply, but he remarked:

"It has been a night full of horrors, and I hope I shall never know another like it!"

"Wait, and you will see! I rather think posterity will remember Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER DXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD THINKS FIT TO TAKE MR. NOAKES A LITTLE MORE INTO HIS CONFIDENCE.

THERE can be little doubt that a great deal of the cold-blooded atrociousness that Jonathan Wild exhibited on this occasion was assumed in consequence of a certain savage delight he might feel at noting the behaviour of his less callous companion.

For the sake of common humanity, let us hope that this is the true solution of his conduct, for surely it would be impossible to find a parallel to such barbarity.

After uttering the words with which the last chapter concluded, Jonathan Wild dug his spurs into his horse's sides with savage pleasure at finding there was yet some living object that he could inflict pain upon.

With a snort of pain, the magnificent creature flew off at a gallop.

The horse which Mr. Noakes bestrode appeared called upon by instinct to do as the other did, for, without any incentive on its rider's part, it galloped on by the side of its companion.

In this manner several miles of roadway were passed over in a very short space of time indeed.

Suddenly, Jonathan Wild drew rein.

Headlong as his course appeared to be, he nevertheless had all his senses about him and in full operation.

Hitherto they had met with no obstruction whatever, but now Jonathan leaned forward in the saddle, and, placing his hand behind his ear, listened eagerly.

Mr. Noakes listened too.

"There is some one on the road," said Wild; "I can hear them plainly."

"So can I."

"Then if that is the case, it is only reasonable to assume that they can hear us. I hope they have not done so. If they have, we shall be in an awkward fix."

"What shall you do?"

"Hush!"

Wild listened again.

"Yes," he added, after a brief pause, "they are coming—they are surely coming! They are officers! Follow me! We may have to run for our lives!"

Mr. Noakes heard this intelligence with a groan.

"This life will kill me!" he murmured,—"I feel sure of it!"

In the meanwhile, Jonathan stood up in the stirrups, in order that he might be the better able to see about him.

A few paces further on down the road, he saw a finger-post with arms pointing to four different directions.

"Walk," he said, addressing his companion, "and get your horse to tread as lightly as you can. Hush!"

Jonathan set his companion the example of what he was to do.

As soon as he reached the finger-post he paused.

It was easy to ascertain in what direction the officers were coming; and having done so, Wild chose that road which led off into the heart of the country.

The police officers were coming along in slashing style, and the sound made by their horses' hoofs grew more and more distinct with alarming rapidity.

"Walk your horse for a few moments," said Jonathan, hurriedly, to his companion, "and keep close under the hedgerow where the grass is growing. They won't be so well able then to tell where we are."

Mr. Noakes nodded his head, to show that he fully understood and acquiesced in what his companion had said. This mode of proceeding was adopted.

It was certainly a wise one, though, at the same time, there was a degree of risk attached to it, because it allowed the officers to get nearer and nearer.

Still Wild was by no means sure that they had heard anything—if they had, the sound could only have been faint and indistinct.

Had he put his horse to a gallop, however, the clear, ringing sound which in the country is audible for such a long distance, would have reached the ears of the officers, and, guided by it, they would have commenced an immediate pursuit.

But when they reached the spot where the roads intersected each other, the chances were all against their being able to hear anything at all.

As is frequently the case in cross-country roads, there was a space at each side under the hedge, upon which the grass grew in great luxuriance.

On this soft turf the horses' feet made scarcely any sound.

But as they proceeded, Jonathan and Mr. Noakes could hear the officers approaching with disagreeable plainness.

At last Wild heard them halt, and when he did so, he thought it was time to halt too.

He listened, for, of course, all depended upon which way the officers took.

If they continued on towards London, all well and good—he would be out of danger.

The impatience and anxiety with which he waited for the result may therefore be imagined.

The officers did not remain stationary more than a moment.

They set themselves in motion.

Wild scarcely breathed.

"Fortune favours the brave!" he said at last, in tones of suppressed exultation. "They are off towards London! The danger is past!"

"Are you sure?" asked Mr. Noakes, as a man might put the question after receiving the intelligence that he was relieved after having been sentenced to death—"are you quite sure?"

"Yes, they are off to London. Hurrah! they have missed us!"

Jonathan could scarcely restrain his glee.

"What are we to do next?" the Governor at last ventured to ask. "I do not like being kept in the dark like this. We cannot keep this game up, I'm sure of that."

"What game, idiot?"

"This dodging about the country. We shall be nabbed at last."

"Bah!"

"It is all very fine for you to treat the matter with affected contempt."

"Have we not escaped as yet?"

"Yes."

"Then let that content you."

"It does not and will not, because each escape that we have had has been more dangerous and narrow than the one which preceded it."

Jonathan Wild could not help admitting to himself that there was a great deal of truth in what his companion said, but although he felt this conviction his only reply was:

"You are a d—d coward, Noakes!"

"I am not so courageous as you, I admit. It would be impossible to find anyone more heedless of danger than yourself!"

Jonathan grinned.

This was one of his weak points, and he was susceptible to flattery.

"Well—well, Noakes!" he replied, in a mollified tone.

"We may as well have matters pleasant between us as not."

"A great deal better."

"As you say, a great deal better. So we will try to argue. Our position is much improved. You have a good horse and so have I. We are consequently now better able to cope with our foes than before."

"Very true; but for all that we sha'n't be able to keep the game up. What we have done to-night will cause no slight commotion. Officers will be sent out in greater force than ever, and the upshot of the whole affair is, that we shall be surrounded—hemmed in on all sides by them, and then—why then it's nabbed we should be to a dead certainty!"

Mr. Noakes worked himself up to quite a pitch of desperate excitement, though he shuddered visibly when he mentioned the transactions of the evening.

Jonathan put his finger by the side of his nose in an attitude of profound thought.

At last he spoke.

"Noakes," he said, "you have a great deal more sense than I ever gave you credit for possessing. I don't scruple to say it, because it's a fact."

"I am glad you think so."

"We will be more amicable in future. I can foresee that we shall get on well together. I don't want to be nabbed."

"Nor I."

"Of course you don't, and I have a great deal to do. But it will keep, and, what is more, it won't spoil by keeping."

"What do you mean?"

"Never mind. It is no concern of yours. But the pursuit after us will be made very hot indeed, and, as you say, we are only two against a very great many."

"The odds are overwhelming."

"I will tell you what we will do."

"I hope you will, for I can assure you it is far from pleasant to be dragged about hither and thither, and kept all the time in the dark as to the nature of our future proceedings."

"Well, well—all that shall be altered. Will you listen to what I have to say?"

"With pleasure."

"Silence, then. My proposition is a very simple one. It is, that we withdraw into the country for awhile and remain in some secluded spot until the energy and determination of the police abate somewhat. There are hundreds of places that would suit us in this respect."

"A very wise proposition, I am sure, Mr. Wild, and one that I heartily agree to!"

"Then we will start at once."

"With all my heart."

"If we keep ourselves quiet for a little while, we may perhaps be able to induce in our foes the belief that we have left the country."

"If we can—that, then all will be well."

"I have no doubt we shall succeed."

"It does me good to hear those words. It does not suit me to be hunted after, and to be murdering people continually."

"Don't be chicken-hearted, Noakes. I consider we have got two horses very cheaply indeed. We re now in a position to offer our enemies defiance, and be on equal terms with them when they commence a pursuit."

"I can hear nothing of them now."

"No, they are far enough away upon the London Road. Come, touch your horse with the spur. Forward—forward!"

Mr. Noakes did not happen to have any spurs, but he struck his heels very fiercely against his horse's sides, and off they went at a gallop that would soon take them into the heart of the country, where doubtless they would be afforded many opportunities of concealing themselves.

There can be no doubt that this was the wisest determination Jonathan could have come to.

Unquestionably Mr. Noakes was quite right in all that he urged upon the subject.

It was a wonder, though, that Wild admitted it.

The thief-taker took upon himself to choose their route, and he chose that which would take him to a position north of the great metropolis.

In a little while they began to perceive in the east some indications of the coming day.

Owing to the speed at which they had travelled, their horses were much exhausted, and it became apparent that they required a brief rest.

But Jonathan did not feel inclined to come to a halt just at present, and he applied whip and spur more vigorously than before.

They continued on their journey over the country, choosing lonely, out-of-the-way cross-roads, until long after the sun had risen.

"I am infernally dry, Noakes!" said Wild, at last. "We must stop and have something to drink at the next inn we come to. I am choked!"

"So am I; and our horses are completely knocked up!"

"They are."

"But won't it be running a very great risk to stop anywhere?"

"Not very great, I think. You must remember we are a long way from London now."

"True."

"And therefore there is less fear of our being recognised."

"I leave it to you, Mr. Wild."

"Then we will stop. I don't think it will be altogether prudent to dismount, however."

"What shall you do, then?"

"Why, the first roadside inn I come to that seems likely to answer our purpose, we will stop before the door of. We can then call for something to drink, and the ostler will give our horses a mouthful of hay and a bucket of water."

"I think that will be best myself."

"There will not be so much risk, at any rate, as there would be if we were to sit down in a room and take up our quarters there for some time."

"Certainly not!"

"Then the sooner we come across such a public-house the better. After we have had our wants supplied, we will push on still further into the country. Then we will wait. I can afford to do so, for my revenge will ripen. I have swept my worst foe from the face of the earth, and the others will follow! I will lull them into a state of false security, and when they imagine all is well, I will come down upon them like a tiger!"

CHAPTER DXXV.

THE OSTLER OF THE ROADSIDE INN DISCOVERS THAT IT IS SOMETIMES UNWISE TO KNOW TOO MUCH.

AFTER speaking these words, Jonathan Wild rode on for some distance without making any further remark.

But if he was silent his thoughts were busy, and in imagination he was gloating over the injuries which he should be able to inflict upon those persons whom he was pleased to style his foes.

Mr. Noakes, however, felt inclined to be talkative, and, emboldened by his companion's apparent good humour, he exclaimed, suddenly:

"Mr. Wild!"

"What?"

"I have just been thinking."

"Well?"

This style of reply was not very encouraging,—nevertheless, the Governor persevered.

"I was thinking about what you had last been saying. I mean with respect to having got rid of your most troublesome foe."

"Well," said Wild again, as gruffly as before.

"I suppose you meant Jack Sheppard?"

"Of course I did."

"Well, he's dead and gone now. He will never trouble you any more!"

"I know that! What do you want to trouble about him for?"

"Oh, nothing! Only it struck me as being a very singular thing that your own troubles began when he was executed, and have continued ever since."

"You be d—d!"

Wild spoke thus to conceal his real feelings.

What his companion had said had long been patent to him, and very often he had wondered to himself whether he had not acted foolishly in consigning Jack Sheppard to the scaffold.

There was a strong undercurrent of superstition in Jonathan Wild's nature, and therefore it is not surprising that anything of this kind should make a deep impression upon him.

Strive as he would, he could not banish from his mind the idea that all his troubles and difficulties had resulted from his persecution of Jack Sheppard.

"If he had only been for me instead of being against me," he would murmur to himself, "how differently everything would have turned out."

Mr. Noakes relapsed into silence.

He could tell directly by Jonathan's manner that he was in an ill humour, and consequently it would be perilous in the highest degree to aggravate him.

Suddenly they came in sight of one of those rustic roadside public-houses, which in those days were often met with, but which now are rarely to be seen.

As soon as ever he perceived it, Jonathan Wild drew rein, in order to reconnoitre before he went any further.

He was pleased enough with what he saw.

An aspect of particular calm and contentment prevailed over the whole of the place, which came with a soothing effect upon the jaded senses of the thief-taker.

The inn had a thatched roof, upon which many birds were clustering, while others were wheeling round in giddy flight, or resting on the ground.

In front there was the usual trough filled with water for horses to drink, and adjacent to this was the tall post surmounted by a swinging sign resplendent with gold devices.

All this Jonathan saw from the distance, and the prospect pleased him greatly.

"Come on, Noakes!" he cried. "In this out-of-the-way place we shall be unknown, depend upon it! Come on!"

Once more they set their steeds in motion, and in less than two minutes afterwards the front of the inn was reached.

Truly did the presence of these two villains upon this fair spot seem like some foul blot upon it.

What right had two such miscreants to interrupt the harmony of the scene?

With a boldness for which he was remarkable, Wild bawled out at the top of his lungs:

"Halloa—halloa! House, there—house! Halloa!"

He well knew that by adopting such behaviour as this he should be disarming suspicion.

They would not have the appearance of proscribed fugitives which they otherwise would.

In response to this loud call, two individuals made their appearance.

One was the landlord of the inn.

The other the ostler.

"What do you please to want, gentlemen?" asked the former.

"A couple of mugs of ale," replied Wild, in a loud voice, and with an offhanded manner, "and something for our horses—a bit of hay and a drop of water."

"All right, gentlemen. Happy to accommodate you. Will you dismount? Your horses look tired."

"They are, but we can't halt yet!"

"Then you won't dismount?"

"No, we will take the ale here."

"As you like, gentlemen. I am at your commands."

The landlord turned into the inn, and the ostler hurried off for the hay and water.

MR. NOAKES HAS A SUDDEN DOWNFALL.

While they were gone, Jonathan looked all about him.

But not a living soul was in sight.

All was silent save the chirping of the birds and the thousand and one murmurs which in the country all combine into one drowsy hum.

Reassured by this, Jonathan Wild waited with considerable impatience for the reappearance of the landlord.

He was very thirsty, and the ale which he had ordered would be welcome in the extreme.

His patience was not put to a very severe trial.

"There's some of the finest October ale you have ever tasted, gentlemen," said the landlord, as he handed the mugs to the thief-taker and his companion.

Wild blew the froth off the top and emptied the vessel at one draught.

Drawing a long breath, he wiped his mouth with the sleeve of his coat, and holding the mug towards the landlord, said:

No. 111.—BLUESKIN.

"Fill it again."

The ostler now came up with the hay and water, for which the exhausted horses seemed extremely grateful.

But while he was engaged in feeding the animals, the ostler continually cast furtive glances upon Jonathan Wild, and it was not long before the thief-taker noticed it.

He concealed his uneasiness as well as he was able by drinking the second mug of ale which the landlord brought.

The ostler, however, who had been up to London only the day before, and had there heard the news with respect to Jonathan Wild, and also that a large reward was offered for his apprehension, recognised him.

He had seen Jonathan Wild many a time, and if he was at first in doubt as to his identity it was owing to the alteration which had taken place in the thief-taker's appearance.

Just as Wild finished drinking the ale, he felt certain that the ostler knew him and would raise an immediate alarm.

But Wild determined to prevent this.

The ostler, who now doubted no longer, was about to place his hand upon the bridle of Wild's horse and then endeavour to drag the thief-taker from the saddle.

Before he could accomplish his purpose, Jonathan suddenly raised his arm and flung the heavy earthenware mug out of which he had been drinking full into the ostler's face.

The crash was terrific, and the ostler, after staggering about for a second or two like a drunken man, finally dropped to the earth, uttering howls and shrieks of pain.

The landlord was so astonished by this occurrence that he stood as if changed to stone.

Wild laughed horribly and exultingly when he saw how successful he had been.

"Off and away, Noakes," he cried, addressing his companion,—"off and away,—it won't do to stay here!"

He struck his horse sharply as he spoke, and the high-spirited creature, unused to such treatment, darted off at a violent pace.

The landlord, although much bewildered by the suddenness with which these unexpected events had taken place, nevertheless made an attempt to stop Mr. Noakes's horse.

He was hurled to the ground and trampled underfoot for his pains.

He was hurt, but not seriously, and lying still a moment, he scrambled to his feet and went towards the unfortunate ostler.

He found him uttering heavy groans.

His face was covered with blood, for such was the violence with which the mug was thrown at him that it was smashed to atoms.

"Wait a moment, and I will fetch some water."

He returned and bathed the poor fellow's face with the pure fluid.

As a matter of course, this had a reviving effect, but the pain he suffered was so great that he could not subdue his groans.

He also uttered many curses and revengeful threats.

"What does it all mean?" said the landlord, who was quite in the dark with regard to the whole transaction. "What were you doing to make him fling the mug in your face like that?"

"Doing? I was doing nothing—only I know'd him!"

"Know'd who?"

"Why, the villain that served me like this!"

"Who was it?"

"Why, Jonathan Wild, that I told you about. Didn't I say, when I came back from London, that a large reward was offered for his apprehension, dead or alive?"

"You did, Joe—you did; but was that really him?"

"It was. Bless you, I have seen him more times than I could count! He is altered a great deal, and that made me doubtful at first; but at last I felt sure he must have guessed what I was about to do, by the look of my face, for, before I was aware of it, he served me like this. Oh, curses!"

A fresh accession of pain from his bruised and mangled face caused the ostler to give vent to a volley of execrations, that strangely intermingled with groans and shrieks.

"But I will be revenged upon him for this!" he continued, as soon as the pain abated sufficiently to allow him to speak. "He shall wish his hand had dropped off before he flung the mug at me!"

"What shall you do, Joe—what shall you do?" asked the landlord. "It strikes me it will be a long while before you are able to move about!"

"Does it?" cried Joe, with sudden energy. "Then you'll be deceived! Where's the water?"

"It's all gone. I will fetch you some more."

"Do so—bring the stable bucket full—or stay! There's no need—the horse-trough will do as well!"

Very much, then, to the surprise of the landlord, the ostler sprang to his feet.

He could not have accomplished this feat had not rage lent him strength.

Staggering forward till he came to the horse-trough, he clutched it tightly with both hands, and plunged his head into the water.

It bubbled pleasantly about his ears, and the pain he suffered was lulled as if by magic.

He kept his head under the water as long as his breath would allow him, and then he turned round, looking and feeling much better.

"There's no time to be lost," he said. "Curse the villain! He shall not escape! I'll set the officers on his track, even if it costs me my life!"

In a frantic manner the ostler ran towards the stable, and in the twinkling of an eye emerged, leading by the halter a strong, good-looking horse.

"What on earth are you going to do, Joe?" asked the landlord.

"Fetch the officers!" replied the ostler, as he scrambled up on to the back of the horse.

As soon as he was seated, he struck the horse's flanks several violent blows with his heels, which caused him to set off at a gallop.

He had no saddle, and nothing to guide the horse with except the halter; but, in his present frame of mind, the ostler was not likely to be very careful, but rather inclined to take things as they came.

Away he flew, then, down the road, and was out of sight in a very short space of time.

It is probable that never before had anything happened with so much rapidity, and the landlord consequently was rather confused, and at a loss to understand the rights of the matter.

At a furious gallop, which caused him and his steed to be continually enveloped in a cloud of dust, the ostler hastened along the cross-road.

Presently, however, he heard the sound of other horses' feet, and looking before him, he saw a strong body of mounted police officers approaching.

He uttered a loud cry of gratification, and urged his horse to still greater speed.

When the officers saw him coming along the road at such a furious rate they separated and drew to each side of the road, so as to allow him a clear passage through their midst; but instead of continuing in his headlong career, the ostler pulled up with a sudden jerk.

"Jonathan Wild!" he shrieked, in an excited voice—"Jonathan Wild!"

Upon hearing this name the officers all pricked up their ears and gathered round the ostler.

"What's that you say about Jonathan Wild?" said the officer in command of the troop—"speak again!"

"Are you in search of Jonathan Wild?" asked the ostler.

"Yes, we've tracked him as far as here!"

"Follow me, then, and I'll show you which way he has gone!" cried the ostler. "Look at my face—can you see it? Jonathan Wild did that, and I'll have revenge!"

"You have seen him, then?"

"Yes, not a half an hour ago."

"And you know which way he has gone?"

"Yes, follow me! If we make good speed we shall overtake him! Come on, I say! I know all the roads for twenty miles round, and if we don't capture him it will not be my fault! Come on, I say—come on!"

"We are coming," said the officer, "and we shall be very glad of your services, which shall not go unpaid; we are determined to catch the brute! He committed no less than two murders last night!"

"And he nearly murdered me!" cried the ostler.

"Here are a couple of pistols," said the officer in command; "take them, and make use of them; the orders we have received are to take him dead or alive, it don't matter which—the former may be the best, for it will save a great deal of trouble, not only to us but to others, for if he is caught alive the country will be put to the expense of having him executed at Tyburn."

"Only let me get near enough, and I'll settle his business, never fear!"

At the word of command, the police officers all set themselves in motion, and at a very swift gallop they flew down the road, the infuriated ostler leading the way.

CHAPTER DXXVI.

JOE, THE OSTLER, AND MR. NOAKES BOTH MEET WITH A MISHAP.

MR. NOAKES beheld his companion's attack upon the ostler with much astonishment, and he was quite at a loss to conceive what the reason could be for such a proceeding.

He apprehended some danger, however, and, without pausing to reflect or speculate, followed Jonathan as soon as he was commanded to do so.

Wild did not permit his horse to relax his speed until he had gone several miles, when, coming at length to a very long and very steep hill, he allowed him to proceed at a walk.

Mr. Noakes also drew rein, and as his curiosity was strongly aroused, he took this opportunity of inquiring what was the motive for his sudden attack.

"The rascal recognised me," said Wild, "and was just about to seize me, so I flung the mug in his face, for that was the handiest weapon I had!"

This intelligence alarmed Mr. Noakes greatly, and he asked:

"Are you sure he recognised us?"

"Yes, I am sure I am not mistaken. It was the easiest matter in the world to read his countenance."

"You didn't kill him!" said Mr. Noakes, stammeringly.

"How do you know?"

"Because I heard him shriek and groan."

"Well, I wish I had—that's all!"

"So do I, for if he recovers, he will be filled with revenge, and will set the officers on our track."

"Make yourself easy about that," returned the thief-taker. "It will be some time at any rate before he is able to move about, even if he recovers at all, and by the time he can put the police officers on our track we shall be miles and miles away!"

"Where do you think you will be able to find a place of refuge, where the officers will not discover your retreat?"

"I can't answer that question, for I have really no idea. I shall have to trust entirely to circumstances."

"I feel very uneasy about that ostler," said Mr. Noakes, after a pause. "I should not wonder, now, if he does not manage to communicate with the officers."

"Wait till we get to the top of the hill," returned Wild. "We shall have to pause then to allow our horses to breathe a little, and from that elevation we shall be able to command a view of the road for miles, and if the officers are on our track, we cannot fail to see them."

They were already nearly three parts of the way up the hill, and Mr. Noakes could not resist turning his head round in order to look behind him.

Directly he did so, he uttered a shout:

"They are here," he said—"they are here—close behind us! Look!"

Jonathan turned round like lightning, and, to his dismay and surprise, saw, within a short distance of the foot of the hill, a large and well-mounted troop of police officers.

It was evident that the officers saw the fugitives, for something like a faint and indistinct shout reached Wild's ears, and all waved their arms, and incited their horses to increased speed.

Jonathan looked piercingly behind him, and as the day was clear, he was able to see with great distinctness.

Foremost in the throng of police officers was the ostler.

A bitter curse came from the lips of the thief-taker when he beheld him, and he wished most fervently from the bottom of his heart that he had hit him only just a little harder.

It was indeed the troop of police officers with the ostler at their head which had managed to get so close to the two fugitives.

It was mainly through the example which Joe, the ostler, set that the officers had performed the journey in such a short space of time, and when they once caught sight of the thief-taker and his companion, they were all eager in the extreme to press onward.

But not one of them could keep up with the ostler.

Mr. Noakes was in a terrible state of fright, and on this occasion made sure that nothing could save them from capture.

The officers were very close behind indeed, and had gained upon them in an incredible manner.

The Governor knew that his own horse and that of Wild's was knocked up, and the steepest portion of the hill lay before them.

How they were to escape he had no idea.

As for Jonathan, he did not seem to look upon their position in quite such a serious light.

"We must make our horses carry us safely out of this," he said—"that's our only chance! Don't spare yours, but keep up with me!"

The poor animals were dreadfully jaded, but the hard blows which they received seemed to infuse fresh vigour into their frames, and they went at a hard gallop up the hill.

Reaching the top, Wild saw stretching before him a long road, gradually sloping down.

It was a road upon which the utmost speed could be made; but then they would have no advantage over the officers, so that it really made little difference.

At a headlong rate, however, the two fugitives flew down the hill.

Joe, the ostler, was the first to reach the top, and he uttered a cry of anger and disappointment when he saw what a long way they were from him.

But the speed which the fugitives made in descending the hill was nothing in comparison to that made by Joe, the ostler.

He distanced the officers completely, who, while they urged their own cattle onward, looked after him with the greatest wonder.

Turning round, Jonathan saw that one of his pursuers was gaining rapidly upon him, but that caused very little uneasiness.

The ostler did not now even hold the halter to control his horse, but with a pistol in each hand rushed madly on.

Imagining himself to be near enough, he presently raised one of his pistols and fired.

No effect, that he could see, was produced by its discharge, except that his own horse was terrified at the sound and galloped more furiously than before.

He was gaining very rapidly upon them, and when only a few yards in their rear he raised his other pistol and fired again.

He fancied he heard a cry mingled with the explosion, but he was not quite sure, for just at that moment his horse, happening to entangle his feet in the rope belonging to the halter, stumbled and fell with a crash to the earth.

So suddenly did the horse fall that Joe had no chance of saving himself, and he was jerked from his seat with great violence.

He came down with full force upon his head on the hard roadway, and after a few convulsive struggles lay there either insensible or dead.

Jonathan laughed exultingly when he witnessed the catastrophe.

"We sha'n't be troubled with that fellow any longer!" he said. "On, Noakes—spur your horse hard!"

"I have got no spurs!" roared the Governor, almost failing to obtain breath enough to speak.

"Use your stick, then!" replied Wild. "Do anything so that you make greater speed!"

The horses were already going at full gallop, and it did not seem possible to make them go any faster.

Of course the officers were aware of the fate which had overtaken the ostler, for it had happened in full sight of them.

They seemed to be compelled by some irresistible instinct to slightly slacken their pace. It was a caution to them, and showed them the consequences which might result to any of them from such a furious rate of riding.

They did not pause, however, when they reached the spot where he had fallen, and as soon as they had passed they once more spurred their horses, for they saw that the fugitives were getting further and further off.

Jonathan Wild was not long in perceiving the advantage he had gained, and endeavoured to avail himself of it to the utmost.

The road stretched out before him as far as he could see.

His chances of getting away were therefore much diminished, and he was soon made alive to the fact that his only chance of escape lay in his succeeding in getting out of sight of his pursuers.

While he kept on the high-road this could not possibly be, for the officers would be able to discern him when nearly a mile distant.

Finding how much he had gained upon his pursuers, he determined to take the very first turn upon either his right or left hand—it did not matter which, as they each led into the heart of the country.

About two hundred yards further on he perceived a long line of trees on his left hand, stretching out at right angles to the road.

This seemed to indicate the presence either of a lane or a cross-country road.

Mr. Noakes was not on a level with his companion, but yet he was very close indeed behind him, and Wild bawled out:

"You see those trees yonder? That's a lane. I am going to turn down it, so prepare!"

Having said this much, Wild troubled himself no further, and in a minute or two afterwards, coming to the place he had mentioned, he suddenly turned down it.

Mr. Noakes followed.

The fugitives were now out of sight of the police officers, and Jonathan Wild hastened along the lane with all the speed he could make, because he was anxious to avail himself of any other turning.

Fortune favoured him greatly, for ere he had gone more than a quarter of a mile he found another narrow lane branching off.

It was very zigzag, and this pleased Wild all the more, for the hedgerow on each side was of unusual height, and, even when his pursuers were comparatively close behind him, he would be out of their sight.

Hope now began to take very firm hold upon Wild's heart, for he imagined that the probability was he had already baffled his pursuers.

They had certainly seen him take the first turning, but not the second; and when they arrived at it, they would be in doubt as to whether he had kept straight on or not.

Wild founded his hope chiefly upon the contrariety of all human affairs. Like everyone else, he knew that there were but two ways of doing anything, important or unimportant, and equally certain that anyone in doubt or ignorance would choose the wrong in preference to the right way.

For all that, he did not relax his speed, although his horse several times shook beneath him, and seemed as though he would certainly fall to the earth.

He fully believed in the wisdom of getting as far away from his enemies as he possibly could.

Fancying that Noakes lagged behind somewhat, he cried:

"Courage—courage! We shall be able to number this among our many other escapes—we shall, depend upon it! Faster!—come on faster! Why do you lag behind?"

Turning half round in the saddle as he spoke, he was just in time to see his companion swaying backwards and forwards on his horse in a highly dangerous manner.

The Governor's face was absolutely colourless.

Wild pulled up a little as he cried:

"Hallo, there! What the devil is the matter with you? Why don't you sit up on your horse as you ought to?"

At the very same moment these words issued from his lips, the Governor gave a terrible lurch on one side, and fell with a crash to the ground.

His horse bounded forward, and would probably have escaped, only Jonathan was fortunate enough to catch hold of it by the bridle as it was galloping on.

Mr. Noakes lay upon the ground, just as he had fallen, in a very peculiar attitude, and he seemed to be quite bereft of animation.

This sudden downfall of his companion was quite inexplicable to Wild.

He could not imagine what was the cause of it.

He was very angry, too, and he thought once of galloping on, and leaving the Governor to shift for himself; but that intense dread of solitude which he had, made him pause, and resolve to ascertain what was the cause of his present condition.

It was no motive of compassion—no friendly feeling—no desire to be of the least service to his companion—that made Wild dismount from his steed, and, at the risk of losing the advantage he had gained with so much difficulty, stoop down over the prostrate form to ascertain the extent of the injuries received.

The motive was a purely selfish one, though mingled with it there was a certain amount of curiosity.

The Governor presented a perfectly lifeless appearance, and at the first glance Jonathan came to the conclusion that he was dead.

Such was not the case, however.

Turning him over, Wild found that the Governor's apparel was soaked in blood.

Hastily tearing it aside in order to find out where the wound was situated, he discovered a slight furrow in his left side.

It had evidently been produced by a bullet, and then Jonathan recollected the two shots which the ostler had fired.

He believed both had been ineffectual, but it was quite clear that one of them had wrought the mischief.

"What shall I do?" asked Wild of himself, as soon as he made this discovery. "I am almost certain he is not dead; that wound could not possibly be sufficient to cause death—it is only a superficial hurt. What shall I do with him? Leave him here, I suppose, and be off myself! It won't do for me to run any extra risk for the sake of such a contemptible wretch as this!"

A deep groan came from the Governor's lips, almost seeming like a reply to what Wild had said.

CHAPTER DXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD DETERMINES NOT TO DESERT HIS COMPANION IN CRIME.

It will be remembered that Joe, the ostler, fancied he heard a cry mingled with the report of his second pistol, and he was not mistaken.

That cry came from the lips of Mr. Noakes.

His first impression was that he had been shot, but as he felt no pain or inconvenience from the wound, and as he sat in the saddle without any difficulty, the Governor believed that this was an error.

He was much excited, and his blood was heated to an extraordinary degree by the great exertions he had been compelled to make, and this was how it was that he felt nothing of the wound in his side, from which the blood streamed in prodigious quantities.

It was in a great measure owing to the excessive flow of blood that he experienced no pain.

The rapid motion caused the blood to flow with more rapidity than it otherwise would have done, and at every step the Governor grew weaker and weaker, for the life was being drained out of his body.

Still, in some mechanical way, he retained his seat in the saddle.

In a vague, confused fashion, he was aware that his consciousness was leaving him.

There was a mist before his eyes, and he felt like one partially under the influence of a narcotic.

By mere instinct his horse had kept by the side of that one which Wild bestrode, and the turnings were taken without any guidance on the Governor's part.

He had almost relapsed into total insensibility when Wild shouted out to him.

The accents of that much-dreaded voice seemed to recall his failing faculties, though he could not wholly shake off the drowsy influence he felt.

At last, as we have seen, owing to his having lost such a quantity of blood, his bodily strength failed him utterly, and he tumbled headlong into the road.

Fortunately his feet did not get entangled in the stirrups—if they had, his injuries would have been more severe than they were.

Jonathan Wild found himself unable to decide what he should do with him. To linger, however, was only to court destruction.

A brief struggle took place in the thief-taker's mind as to whether he should leave the Governor or not; but eventually he made up his mind not to do so.

But he did not come to this resolution until after he had laid himself down in the road and pressed his ear close against the ground.

He listened attentively, and by this means satisfied himself that his pursuers were nowhere in the vicinity.

Springing to his feet, Jonathan Wild, by exercising the extraordinary strength which he possessed, lifted the body of his companion and placed it across his horse.

There was a broad belt round Mr. Noakes's waist, and by the aid of this the thief-taker strapped him to the saddle.

He lay across his horse very much as a sack of grain might have done.

Having done thus much, Jonathan Wild looked about him, wondering where he should go and what he should do next.

A few yards further on he saw that the lane intersected a wood which appeared to be of considerable extent.

The idea that he might be able to conceal himself somewhere in its recesses at once occurred to him, and he bent his steps towards it without further hesitation.

The wood, preserve, or plantation, whichever it might be called, was bounded by a stout wooden paling more than six feet high, and Jonathan Wild was quite at a loss to know how this obstacle was to be surmounted.

When he saw this, however, it only made him more determined to penetrate into the wood by some means or other; so, leaving the lane, he made his way along one side of it, in the hope of being able to come to some place where it was not so high, or to a gate through which he could pass.

In this expectation he was, however, disappointed, and he kept going on and on for what seemed to him to be an intolerably long time, without being able to find what he sought.

Every moment he grew more and more apprehensive of being seen by the police officers.

As far as ever he could see, however, the palings were of one uniform height, and formed an unbroken line.

At last he stopped, for he could not see that it would be any advantage to proceed.

Stretching out his hand, he took hold of the top of the paling in order to ascertain its strength.

He found it much weaker than he had dared to anticipate, for some green parasitic moss which grew thickly over the wood-work had had the effect of rotting it to a very serious extent.

By a little strength and patience, Wild thought he should be able to pull down a portion of the fence large enough to allow the horses to pass through.

He tugged with right good will, and the rotten wood-work gave way before the pressure he applied to it.

In a few moments he had made a space large enough to answer his purpose, and although this success was unlooked for, he felt vexed rather than delighted, inasmuch as he regretted that he had not made the attempt before.

Leading the horses through the opening, his next care was to endeavour to repair the damage he had done by restoring the fence to its original condition, so that none would notice it having been pulled down except by a close examination.

This was a work of a little time, but it was time well spent.

When he had finished, Wild took hold of the bridles of the two horses, and led them at once into the thickest part of the wood.

At rare intervals, groans came from the throat of Mr. Noakes, but each one was fainter than its predecessor.

"He will certainly die from excessive loss of blood," said Wild, to himself, "unless I can find some means of checking it! Hush!—what's that?"

Wild stopped the horses, and listened intently.

The murmuring sound produced by the progress of some little stream now came clearly and sweetly upon his ears.

As soon as he had satisfied himself that water was close at hand, the thief-taker directed his course towards it.

After going rather more than fifty yards, he forced his way through a barrier of trees, and found himself upon the banks of one of the most beautiful woodland streams that could possibly be imagined.

The water was as clear as crystal, and meandered gracefully among the trees, making a pleasant plashing sound as it surmounted the various obstacles in its course.

Had not Wild been so brutalised as he was, and so dead to every ennobling feeling, he would have been charmed by the rare picturesque beauty of the scene.

So far, however, from dwelling upon it with delight, he merely saw, by glancing around, that he was surrounded by trees, and that there was water at his feet.

To him they were trees and water, and nothing more.

The horses were glad to halt on the banks of the stream, and as soon as ever Wild released his hold upon the bridles, they both bent their heads, and commenced drinking eagerly.

Wild was parched and dry, and felt as though he would have liked a draught of something.

"If it was anything but water," he said, "I should be tempted."

With this remark, he unfastened the belt by which he had secured Noakes to the saddle, and allowed that unfortunate individual to slip to the ground.

He lay on the turf a huddled-up mass, apparently bereft of life.

The thief-taker, however, had not lived the strange life he had for so long without becoming acquainted with the nature of wounds, and, desperate as the condition of the Governor seemed, he did not doubt that he should be able to restore his vitality.

The bottom of the stream was composed of fine firm sand, and the depth of the water only between three and four inches.

As a speedy means of recovering his companion, he determined to lay him down at full length in the brook.

He did so, and it was not long before the restoring powers of the cold water made themselves manifest.

Mr. Noakes shuddered several times, and finally opened his eyes.

They had a dull, glassy look, and he fixed his gaze in a dreamy fashion upon the thief-taker's hideous countenance.

He closed them again almost instantly.

But Wild was satisfied.

"There's life in him yet," he muttered, "and if the officers will only let me alone for a little while, I shall be able to recover him."

With these words he stooped, and dragged his companion out of the stream.

He laid him down, however, close to the margin of the water, and then removing his clothing from the wound, he bathed it thoroughly, and bandaged it up afterwards in a very skillful manner.

He took off the long neckcloth which the Governor wore round his neck, and tore a square piece from one end of it.

This he thoroughly soaked in the water and folded over and over into many thicknesses, until it was of just such a size as would cover the wound made by the passage of the bullet.

Placing it thus, he fastened it into its position by tying the neckcloth round the Governor's body.

This done, he took some water up in his hands and poured it down upon the bandage, so as to make sure that it was thoroughly soaked.

The probability is, that if a surgeon had been called in he could not have rendered the wounded man any more effectual assistance.

Turning him over, Jonathan Wild sprinkled some water upon Mr. Noakes's face, and by this means once more restored him to his senses.

The Governor was rendered thoroughly helpless by the quantity of blood he had lost.

So prostrated was he that he had not the power to lift one of his hands.

With careful attention, it would be some time before he could recover from this desperate condition—certainly much longer would be required than the time during which Wild might count upon remaining undisturbed.

At any moment the officers might make their appearance, and if they once suspected their presence in the wood, they would not rest until they had thoroughly searched every square inch of it.

Therefore, although he had succeeded in restoring his companion to life so far, Jonathan felt the conviction steal over him that even now he should be obliged to leave him to his fate.

From the cause we have mentioned, he was extremely reluctant to do this, and, rising to his feet, he once more took a long look around him.

Nothing but trees met his gaze.

Then he glanced up towards the sky, in order to note the position of the sun.

"I'll push on through the wood," he said to himself at last. "It won't hurt Noakes to carry him on the horse in the same way as I brought him here. If I hear anything of the officers behind me, and I come to any place that offers a chance for shelter, so much the better; if not, I cannot do wrong by emerging on the opposite side of the wood."

Having come to this determination, the thief-taker once more picked up the body of his companion and placed it with as much care as he possibly could upon the back of the horse.

He strapped him there just in the same manner as before, and he was careful to do this in such a manner that nothing could chafe that side of the body where the wound was situated.

As it would be inconvenient to mount his own steed and ride, in consequence of the many low-lying branches, sometimes extending in a horizontal direction from the trunks of the trees, the thief-taker proceeded on foot as before, leading the horses by the bridle.

Even in this way he had some difficulty in forcing a passage, but each step that he took inspired him with fresh hope, as he was unable to hear any sound indicative of the approach of his foes.

He began to believe that he had indeed been successful in entirely throwing them off the scent, and his self-congratulation grew greater accordingly.

By continually looking up at the sun, he was enabled to make his way through the trees in a tolerably straight line.

There was no fear that he would unconsciously double upon his course and emerge upon the same side of the wood as that he had entered, which might have been done by anyone less careful than himself.

There was a deep silence all around, and the wood bore an aspect of the greatest possible solitude, and Wild felt that if he was alone, and his companion was not with him, it would be positively unendurable.

He looked upon the insensible body of Mr. Noakes as company, though what consolation he could possibly derive from having him with him in this condition, is something we are unable to explain.

CHAPTER DXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD UNEXPECTEDLY FINDS A PLACE OF REFUGE.

As he continued to pursue his way through the wood, Wild found the obstructions to his progress grow more and more numerous, until they threatened in a short time to become insurmountable.

That the vegetation should grow denser as he penetrated more into the centre of the wood was no more than might be expected, and presently Wild found himself confronted by such a wall of high prickly shrubs that he was compelled to halt.

It was madness to think of forcing his way through such a mass, but it was with the greatest reluctance that the thief-taker turned aside from his direct course.

He looked closely on his right hand, in the hope of being able to perceive some opening or glade, along which he might make his way, but this hope was completely frustrated.

Very much to his surprise, however, he noticed what looked like a rude footpath, which, though it did not seem to have been trodden much, had nevertheless had sufficient traffic over it to leave a distinct mark by which it could be traced.

It wound in and out among the trees for a considerable distance, but it did not appear to lead in the direction Wild wished to take.

Yet, when he saw it he came to a halt, and considered deeply for a few moments.

At last he determined to proceed along it, and ascertain to what place it led.

It might take a devious course, and by skirting the denser vegetation in the middle of the wood, take him out upon the opposite side.

To speak the truth, the open path was a great temptation to him, after having been compelled for so long to force his way through the branches and underwood.

As he proceeded he found the traces of the footpath grow less and less distinct; in some places they would be scarcely discernible, and in others the path, though narrow, would be well defined.

It wound in and out in a very tortuous manner, but in spite of this Jonathan made much better progress than he had hitherto been able.

Suddenly his attention was attracted by a thin wreath of whitish smoke, which ascended in an almost perpendicular direction, for there was no wind.

At the sight of the smoke Jonathan stopped again, for he knew it betokened the presence of human beings.

From what source the smoke proceeded, whether from a cottage or whether from a fire lighted on the ground, he had no means of ascertaining, for the trees hid all objects from his view.

Certainly, his most prudent course appeared to be to strike off in another direction, and not to venture to approach this fire and the human beings who were in all probability near it; and at first this was what the thief-taker determined to do.

A second thought, however, caused him to change his intention.

He could not help suspecting the smoke he beheld came from the chimney of some woodman's hut, or it might be a keeper's, and if so there was a possibility that he should be able, by offering them a liberal reward, to obtain rest and shelter beneath its roof.

Mr. Noakes would stand a better chance of having his wounds attended to, and by this time, as he had heard nothing of his pursuers, Jonathan came to the conclusion that they had altogether lost the track.

He resolved to push forward with the utmost circumspection, and if things looked favourable, then he would endeavour to carry out his intention.

With this view he walked on at a slower rate than before, and by making the horses walk upon the soft grass at each side of the footpath his approach was almost inaudible.

At last, peeping through some trees, he saw before him a rude building, to which no other designation save that of "hut" could be applied.

Its walls and roof were composed of rough wooden planks, some of which seemed like the fragments of an old boat, but the whole was plastered over with clay, which the continual action of the sun had converted into a substance almost as hard as stone.

This singular dwelling had but one little chimney, and it was from this that the wreath of white smoke ascended.

Wild was surprised not only at the general appearance of the building, but at its strange situation.

He did not for a moment believe that it was the residence of any keeper, and he wondered greatly what human beings they could be who had chosen such a spot for their abode.

He listened, but could hear no sound, and had it not been for the smoke he would have come to the conclusion that the hut was untenanted.

If some one was not actually within at the present moment, they could not have been long absent, for from the condition of the smoke Jonathan came to the conclusion that fresh fuel had recently been placed upon the fire.

A kind of struggle went on in Wild's mind as he continued to gaze upon this cottage.

For the life of him he could not make up his mind whether it would be best for him to push on or try to take up his quarters there.

He was strongly tempted to the latter, for he was terribly fatigued; and who can wonder at it, considering the number of hours he had sat in the saddle without intermission?

He was so stiff as scarcely to be able to move his lower limbs; and after a few minutes' more deliberation he walked boldly up to the door of the hut and kicked it with his heavy boots.

No notice whatever was taken of the summons, and Wild, who did not feel inclined to wait long, repeated his assault with additional vigour.

Then he stopped, and listening, he fancied he could hear a scuffling noise going on inside.

His curiosity was greatly roused by this circumstance, and he kicked again.

Then the door was opened, and a little, shrivelled old man, whose hair would have been white but for the coating of dirt there was upon it, made his appearance.

He seemed to be trembling, as though from the effects of extreme fear.

"I am sorry to disturb you, old gentleman," said Wild

"but if you feel inclined you may be able to earn more money during the next few hours than you could if you were to work hard for a whole twelvemonth!"

The old man's countenance lighted up with a strange, sinister grin, as he said:

"What do you want?"

"I want shelter," said Wild, "and assistance for my companion, who has been wounded, and I fear is at the point of death."

The old man shook his head.

"I can't accommodate you," he replied.

As he spoke, he made an attempt to close the door, but Wild effectually frustrated it by placing his foot against the door-post.

"Consider," he said, in a tone and gesture that seemed to awe the old man; "I am not one to be lightly put off! I tell you, if you will find me shelter I will pay you for it!"

"It is impossible," said the old man—"impossible!"

"Not at all! We can none of us tell what we can do till we try! Stand aside! You see it's possible, after all!"

While he was speaking, Wild suddenly pushed the door open with his shoulder, and led the two horses inside.

"Shut the door!" he cried, in a commanding voice—"shut the door, and then listen to what I have to say!"

Tremblingly the old man obeyed.

Jonathan looked about him with considerable curiosity.

The interior of the hut was much larger than he had imagined it could be, judging from the appearance of the outside.

In a primitive kind of fireplace a few faggots were burning, and as he gazed upon them, the idea occurred to him that they were insufficient to cause the amount of smoke which he had seen.

Trifling as this was, it was strange, and the conviction came over Wild's mind that there was some mystery about the place that he could probably unravel.

The floor appeared to be composed of a number of old planks, simply laid upon the ground without any attempt at order or regularity.

They were loose, and moved slightly when they were trodden upon.

After he had closed the door, the old man made an attempt to speak, but Jonathan would not listen to what he had to say.

"Hark you!" cried the thief-taker, in an imperious voice, "we may as well come to an understanding in a few words as not! I have been pursued for many miles by a party of police officers, and my companion, as you see, has been wounded, I fear, to the death. With a great deal of trouble, I have succeeded in throwing my enemies off the scent. I have now eluded them entirely. Chance brought me to this place. All I want you to do is to allow us to remain here for a short time, so that I may attend to my comrade's hurts."

"I can't—I can't!"

"For what reason?" asked Wild, as he glanced around. "There is no one here! We have the place all to ourselves, have we not?"

"Y—yes!" replied the old man, stammeringly.

"Very well, then! You don't seem to be in very flourishing circumstances. Look—here are a couple of guineas! You shall have eight more, provided you do as I require."

The old man took the coins, and glanced at them inquisitively.

The promise of so large a sum had produced a palpable effect.

"You say you have been pursued by police officers?" he said, as he consigned the coins to his pocket.

"Yes."

"Well, they are no friends of mine, and never have been. Be caudic, and tell me what it is that you have done for them to be after you."

"You are asking too much. I have done more than most men dream of; but never mind that! I have escaped the triple tree at Tyburn by a hair's-breadth, and every effort is being made to recapture me!"

"Who are you, then?"

"As you don't know, I shall not think of giving you that information."

"And your companion?"

"His situation is precisely the same as my own."

"It's almost more than my life is worth to have admitted you into this place; but you are here, and if I only knew one thing——"

"What?"

"If you were a member of the family all would be well, and I would pour out my blood to the last drop in saving you from the grabs."

Wild listened to these words with the greatest astonishment.

He knew perfectly well what the old man meant by the word "family."

It signified the whole of that class who obtain a livelihood by preying upon society.

The idea of finding any member of the fraternity of thieves in this out-of-the-way place astonished the thief-taker exceedingly.

But his astonishment did not last more than a second.

"The family!" he said. "Do you mean to say that you are a member of it? If so, you must recognise the sign."

Wild made a curious sign with his hand upon his breast.

It was a means by which members of the family, though strangers, could recognise each other.

That Wild should be acquainted with this secret sign is no more than might be expected, for during his long and infamous career he was the companion of thieves of every class.

The old man showed not only that he recognised the sign, but that he was himself a member of the family, by giving the countersign.

"I see I have found a friend," cried the thief-taker. "Well, I am glad of it!"

"You have. You can please yourself whether you tell me who you are and what you have done. At any rate, the grabs are after you—that is enough!"

"Then we will attend to my wounded friend," said Jonathan.

"Yes; but first of all, are you perfectly sure that you have thrown the police officers off the scent?"

"I judge so, because I have not heard anything of them for some time before I entered the wood."

"They may have lost the track for a time, then, and perchance may recover it."

"There's just a chance that they may do so."

"Well, it doesn't matter; for, if they were to come to the door at this very moment, I could conceal you where you would never be found."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed the thief-taker, glancing around him, and being unable to discover any signs of a hiding-place.

"It is perfectly true," replied the old man; "and if you have any doubts upon the matter, I will hide you at once."

"No—no! For the present I believe I am perfectly safe. We shall hear something of the officers before they arrive."

"So we shall. I shall be able to give you timely warning of their approach."

"Well, now then to see to my wounded friend!" said Wild, as he proceeded to unstrap him from the saddle.

The old man came forward to lend his assistance, and when the belt had been removed, the Governor was laid down at full length in front of the fire.

So skilfully had the bandage been tied that it had not been shifted from its position in the least, but it was no longer cold and wet.

"Have you any water?" asked Wild.

"Yes."

"Bring it here, then!"

The old man fetched a pitcher of water from one corner of the hut, and Wild poured the greatest portion of its contents on to the bandage, so that it was once more thoroughly soaked.

This process would at the same time prevent inflammation, and cause the wound to heal.

"The wound is little more than skin deep," said Wild, "though it has bled profusely. That is what has brought him to this stage of weakness. Have you any wine or brandy in the place?"

"No; but I have gin."

"That will do, then," said Wild. "Fetch some at once."

"I will, but first of all I must take a peep outside, in order to make sure that the officers are not about. They may have tracked you."

Jonathan offered no opposition to the old man doing as he proposed.

He fully expected that he would have gone to the door and opened it; but in this he was mistaken.

CHAPTER DXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS THE OFFICERS ARE NOT SO EASILY DECEIVED AS HE IMAGINED.

Going to that part of the hut which was opposite the fireplace, the old man raised his arm above his head and took hold of a piece of iron that had been fixed against the wall.

He took hold of another similar projection with his other hand, and placed his foot upon one that was about two feet from the ground.

Then looking up, Wild saw that there were a number of these projections in the wall, but owing to their being of the same colour, and being plastered over with clay like the woodwork, they would escape any but the closest observation.

By the aid of these the old man ascended to the roof of the hut with an agility that was most remarkable considering his extreme age.

The hut was not very high, so he soon reached the top. Holding by one hand, he, with the other, removed a small plank forming part of the roof.

Then, thrusting his head through the aperture, he took a hasty and inquisitive look around.

He drew in his head with a suddenness that made Wild think there was something amiss.

Hastily putting the board into its former position, he made his way down to the floor again as though he was quite reckless of personal consequences.

"You made a mistake," he said. "You have not thrown the officers off the scent—on the contrary, they have tracked you to this spot. They are close at hand!"

"Impossible!"

"Impossible or not, I saw them just outside," returned the old man. "They are evidently coming, and if you are not quick, I shall not be able to place you where I intended."

"I can scarcely believe it," replied Wild; "but if the officers really are here, lose no time in concealing us. But what shall you do with our horses?"

"Leave them to me," returned the old man. "I can hide your horses as well as yourself and companion. Swear, however, never to disclose what you see!"

"Willingly," said Wild—"it will never be to my advantage to tell tales."

"That is sufficient, then. Now be quick!"

When the old man had closed the door after Wild's entrance he had placed across it a wooden bar, by which it was habitually secured, so that there was no fear of the officers being able to effect a sudden entrance.

Jonathan could scarcely bring himself to believe that he had really failed to throw his foes off his track.

"Some chance circumstance," he muttered, "must have directed them. I am sure it can be nothing more!"

Then, in a louder voice, he added, addressing the singular old man:

"How far off are they?"

"Close by!"

"Are you sure they are coming here?"

"Yes!"

"Be quick, then!"

"I will!"

Wild had the greatest possible amount of confidence in the old man's ability to hide him.

He was sure that he was a member of the family.

But Jonathan was not.

He was at war with most of them.

A fresh thought now occurred to him, and caused him to feel no slight amount of uneasiness.

The old man, being under the impression that Wild was of the family, was willing to afford him every protection; and providing that he (Wild) could preserve his identity a secret, all would be well.

But how was this to be done?

The officers outside would at once proclaim him, and then Wild doubted not that the old man would change from a friend to an enemy.

He would betray him without hesitation.

Wild set his teeth hard as he made this reflection.

It was a new danger, and one which he had omitted to take into consideration.

It was with the rapidity and suddenness of the lightning's flash.

In the meanwhile the old man, with surprising nimbleness, set about making his preparations to conceal the two men and their horses.

We have said that the floor of the hut was composed of a number of rude, time-worn planks, which had the appearance of having been merely placed upon the earth.

Such was the case.

It was really wonderful to see the expedition with which the old man pulled up a number of these loose planks.

A huge cavity in the earth was then disclosed.

"Haste—haste!" he cried, addressing Wild. "Pick up your comrade and carry him down here—I will lead the horses! Be quick, or we shall be too late; and it is not only your presence here that will be discovered, but something else of infinitely greater importance!"

"Look here!" said Wild, thrusting both hands into his pockets and pulling them out with as much gold in them as he could grasp—"look here! Take these!"

The old man's eyes glittered with a strange light as he held his pocket open to receive the coins.

"You receive those," cried Wild, "to keep my presence here a secret, and as a reward not to betray me to my foes! Never mind who they say I am! Take the money, and let that content you!"

"All right! I swear I will keep your presence here a secret! Down with you!"

Tolerably well satisfied that he was safe, the thief-taker picked up his companion, as he had been bidden, and staggered towards the opening in the floor.

Just as he reached the brink of it there came a succession of bangs upon the door.

The old man's countenance became expressive of the utmost alarm, and he again implored Wild to be quick.

The thief-taker darted down.

He found that the earth sloped downwards somewhat precipitously.

There were no signs of any steps.

The old man took hold of the horses and forced them to descend.

Then, as soon as they were low enough to enable him to close the opening, he began to place the planks in their former position.

He left Wild to look after his own safety, to attend to his wounded companion, and to look after the horses as well.

Never in his life, probably, had the old man replaced the planks so speedily.

Indeed it was marvellous to behold him.

All the while he was thus engaged, the officers were pounding away upon the door.

At length the floor of the hut was restored to its ordinary condition.

To have looked at it no one would have dreamed that it had been so recently disturbed, or have suspected the existence of the deep, cavernous place.

As soon as ever he could, the old man went to the door, and, placing his mouth close to it, said, in shrill, piping accents:

"Who is there? Who is it that knocks so loud? What is it you want?"

"So you have woken up at last, have you?" said a voice from without.

"Who are you?"

"Officers of police; and I call upon you, in the sacred name of his most gracious Majesty the King, to open this door and allow us to enter! We are armed with a proper search-warrant!"

"Indeed, Mr. Officers, you shall come in! I am unfastening the door! You shall come in directly."

The old man removed the bar, and then the door was rather roughly thrust open by the officers.

"Why did you not open the door when we first

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES IN THE SUBTERRANEAN PASSAGE.]

knocked?" asked the chief officer, glancing suspiciously around him.

"You frightened me almost to death, good sir!"

"Then you have been doing wrong."

"How so, sir?"

"Or you would not be frightened."

"But, good sir, I am old and timid, and when you knocked so suddenly and loudly, I did not know for a minute where I was."

"I don't see why you should be frightened."

"I thought you were robbers, or something of that sort—I did indeed, good sir;—but what did you please to want?"

The old man looked at least twenty years older than he did a few minutes before.

No one could have believed, judging from the appearance of his bent and aged frame, that he had the strength or power to move a straw.

No. 112.—BLUESKIN.

The officers looked all about the cottage.

"Have you seen anyone about here lately?"

"No, good sir, I have not."

"Are you sure? You had better speak if you know anything. If you can give us any information about two men, you will be well rewarded."

"What two men are they, sir?"

"One is Jonathan Wild."

"Who?" asked the old man, drawing himself up to his full height, and speaking in a tone that made the place ring again—"who?"

"Jonathan Wild."

"The thief-taker?"

"Yes."

The old man clasped his hands together, and bending down, at once assumed his former aspect.

The officer looked keenly upon him.

"Why did you change like that?"

"Change?"

"Yes; you seemed to throw off your age at once."

The old man was silent.

"Was it the name of Jonathan Wild that produced such an effect upon you?"

"It was."

"Why?"

"I could not help it."

"Do you know him?"

The old man uttered a groan as he said:

"Heaven help me!"

"Speak out—your conduct is suspicious!"

"No, no;—but—but—Jonathan Wild——"

"What of him?"

"He is the bitterest foe I have on earth!"

"Indeed!"

"And in truth, good sir! He has made me the miserable thing you see! Shall I tell you my tale? It is long, but when you have heard it you will not wonder at my drawing myself up in the way I did, and speaking with so much more force."

"You need not tell your tale; but, if Jonathan Wild is your bitter foe, you have now an excellent chance of having your revenge."

"How—how?"

"He is now hunted for his life! He has been tried and condemned to death, but he escaped. I suppose, though, that you know all this?"

"No, sir—no, sir; and it is so strange that I can hardly bring myself to believe it."

"It is true, every word of it. He has with him, for his companion, Mr. Noakes, the late Governor of Newgate."

"Is it possible?"

"It is perfectly true."

"You amaze me beyond measure!"

"We have traced them to this wood."

"This wood?"

"Yes—and to the vicinity of this hut. We should not have found you out else."

"And is Wild wounded?"

"No—his companion. If you have seen anything of two men answering to the description I have given, tell me all you know about them. You shall be well rewarded, never fear. Have you seen anything of them?"

The old man shook his head.

"I have not seen them," he said.

"I believe you speak the truth."

"I do indeed, good sir!"

"Well, we must look elsewhere for our men. If, after this, you should happen to come across them, follow on their track, and don't lose sight of them on any account."

"You may depend I shall do that."

"You say Wild is your foe?"

"My bitter, lifelong foe!"

"Then by bringing him to justice you will have a full revenge upon him, for when he once again gets into the hands of the law, I will guarantee he does not escape, but will soon perish on Tyburn Tree."

The old man rubbed his hands together, and looked quite delighted.

"I will keep a sharp look-out," he said, "and if I am lucky enough to catch sight of him, I will follow in his footsteps like a bloodhound."

The chief officer gave one more glance around him, and then prepared to depart.

"I have but poor accommodation to offer you in this humble hut," said the old man, "but what there is you are welcome to. Would you like to stay a little while and rest yourselves?"

"No, no," replied the chief officer; "we must attend to our work first; we must not rest until the two villains are securely made prisoners."

"As you will."

"Bear in mind all that I have said. If you know Jonathan Wild, you must not expect him to look as he did when you saw him last; he is wonderfully altered."

After thus speaking, the officer and his men took their departure from the hut, in order to pursue their researches.

The singular old man stood upon the door-step of his crazy habitation, and watched them until they were out of sight.

When they had all disappeared among the trees, he turned round and closed the door behind him.

Once more he put up the heavy wooden bar.

Having done this, he did not venture to proceed to Wild's hiding-place, but climbed up to the roof of the hut by means of the ingenious contrivance we have described.

Very cautiously he pushed aside the plank that did duty for a trap-door, and, thrusting his head through the aperture, took a long and steady look about him.

From the elevated position he now occupied, he was able to catch sight of the officers as they wound their way in and out among the trees, and he smiled oddly when he saw what pains they took to search closely the tangled underwood, so as to make sure that those they sought were not concealed beneath it.

At last their forms quite disappeared in the distance, and as soon as the old man had satisfied himself that they were not within half a mile at the least, he descended from his post of elevation.

Going to that part of the floor from which he had lifted the boards, he listened.

Hearing nothing, however, from below, he slowly and cautiously again removed the planks, and commenced a descent into that subterranean region the mouth of which they formed a covering to.

CHAPTER DXXX.

MR. NOAKES RECOVERS HIS SENSES, AND JONATHAN WILD MAKES SOME EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERIES.

It is now time that we took a glance at Jonathan's own proceedings.

He found that the ground beneath his feet shelved gently downwards; and carrying the body of Mr. Noakes in the best way he could, he groped his way through the intense darkness.

Suddenly, however, the sound of voices reached his ears, and he paused.

Evidently these sounds came from above, and the desire took strong possession of him to creep back to the spot from which he had started, and listen to what was going on.

He listened again, and heard the voices more plainly than before.

Stooping down, he placed the body of his still insensible companion on the ground.

Terrified by the darkness, he had no difficulty in inducing the horses to remain perfectly still; and when he had done this, the thief-taker, with the stealthy step of a tiger, made his way to the floor of the hut.

When very close to it, he stopped.

The conversation that was going forward was that which we have already placed in full before the reader.

Can anyone imagine what was the state of Wild's feelings when he heard the tone of the old man's voice change so suddenly, and when he afterwards heard him declare that he (Wild) was his deadly foe?

Jonathan set his teeth hard, and prepared to resign himself to his fate.

He quite gave himself up for lost. There was no avenue by which he could escape, and after such a declaration as the old man had made it was tolerably certain that he would disclose the secret of the cleverly-constructed hiding-place.

To the thief-taker's unutterable astonishment and relief, this was not done, and then he set to work to rack his brains in order to find out why it was that the old man declared he had seen nothing of the fugitives.

Had Wild known the purpose for which that hiding-place had been contrived, or could he but have guessed to what place it led, his surprise would have instantly disappeared.

But the fact was, it was more than the old man's life was worth to make the officers acquainted with the secret opening in the floor.

It was not solely his own secret, but that of others, whose safety, it may be fairly said, entirely depended upon it.

Therefore, had his desire to surrender Wild to the officers been a thousand times greater than it was, he could not, and dared not, have yielded to it.

All this the thief-taker was profoundly ignorant of, and as he continued to feel very doubtful whether his hiding-place would escape a search, provided the officers made one, he came to the conclusion that the very best thing he could do was to explore the recesses of that subterraneous place.

It might be that he would be able to find some mode of exit by which he could gain the open air, and, inspired by this hope, he turned round, and, with the same secrecy and caution as before, crept downwards to the spot where his companion lay.

Ere he had gone many yards, a faint groan struck upon his ears.

It came from the Governor's lips, no doubt, and was the first symptom of returning consciousness.

Fearful that the sound might be heard by those above, Jonathan hastened forward.

As the subterraneous passage was profoundly dark, of course he could not see whereabouts Mr. Noakes lay.

But he was guided to it not only by the faint moans which he gave utterance to with but little intermission, but by the recollection he had of the precise spot upon which he had deposited him.

Reaching him at last, Wild stooped down and took hold of his hand.

"Hush—hush!" he said. "If you are well enough to understand anything, obey this injunction! Officers are within a few yards of us, and we have had another hair-breadth escape. We are cunningly concealed, and, provided we make no noise, there is little fear that we shall be discovered."

After this, Mr. Noakes could not have been more silent had he been dead.

How to carry out his original purpose—namely, that of exploring the cavernous place—Wild scarcely knew.

To leave Noakes where he was might be full of danger. A sudden accession of pain might cause him to forget his caution and utter a groan.

Of course, if the officers heard any such sound, their suspicions would be awakened instantly.

Yet, to take his insensible companion with him was quite impossible.

Mr. Noakes could not walk, and Wild was not equal to the task of carrying him.

But his dreadful impatience would not allow him to remain still; so, sinking his voice to a whisper, he said:

"Noakes—Noakes,—can you hear what I say? Are you better?"

"No better! I feel I have received my death-wound!"

"Pho—pho! Your case is not so bad as that! I will give you my word for that, for I have dressed your wound myself. You will get better in a very little while. You are suffering from nothing but loss of blood."

"I feel as though I was already in my grave," was the dejected reply.

"You can smell the earth," Wild replied, "for we happen to be in an underground place; but it is not a grave, for all that. Do you think you could manage to get up and walk a little way by my assistance?"

"No, no—I could not! It would be impossible!"

"Nay, make the effort!"

"I would rather not! Leave me here—let me die in peace! Seek your own safety in what way you will."

"You fully understand all that I am saying, Noakes—do you not?"

"Perfectly well."

"Then I will tell you what I will do."

"What?"

"If you will promise me to remain here, and make no attempt either to move or to speak—if you feel that you have sufficient control over yourself to subdue a groan should you be attacked by a sudden pain,—I will endeavour to find a way out of this gloomy place."

"It is gloomy and dark too."

"Very dark! We are fairly beneath the surface of the earth. There is no clink or creak through which light can penetrate. This is absolute darkness."

"It is."

"But can you promise me—may I rest confident that during my brief absence you will remain totally silent?"

"You may; no sound louder than a breath shall come from me."

"That will do, then. If you breathe only, you need not fear being heard."

"How long shall you be away?"

"Probably not more than two minutes—perhaps ten. Unluckily, we have not the means of procuring a light. If we had, I would at all risks endeavour to find out what kind of a looking place this is."

"But that will not matter."

"No, not much. I will creep onward, guided by my sense of touch, and when I have made a discovery I will instantly return."

As a matter of course, this conversation between the thief-taker and his companion was carried on in the faintest possible whisper.

He spoke hastily, so that the delay amounted at most to a few seconds only.

Having thus, as he imagined, made matters quite right with his companion in crime, Jonathan Wild, stooping down upon his hands and knees, began to crawl cautiously along the passage, for such he imagined it to be, though he could not make sure of it.

He groped his way onward for some distance, when all at once his hand came in contact with something soft.

Upon touching this object, whatever it was, his first impulse was to shrink back.

Recovering himself, however, and with a smile upon his lips at what he termed his own weakness, the thief-taker proceeded to ascertain what was the nature of the obstacle.

Feeling over it with both hands, he at length came to the conclusion that it was a large, heavy curtain, formed of some peculiar material, but what kind he could not recognise by his touch alone.

It is possible that he might have been at fault had he been furnished with a light.

At any rate, this curtain was very thick and very heavy, and well calculated to deaden all sounds.

Wondering for what purpose it had been placed there, and feeling more convinced than ever that he was upon the brink of making some discoveries of an extraordinary and mysterious description, Wild raised the curtain a sufficient height from the floor to enable him to crawl underneath it to the space beyond.

Then he fancied that he could hear a peculiar clanking, hammering sound, as though some species of manufacture was being carried on at no great distance.

This, however, was so unlikely to be the case, that he discarded the idea at once.

He crept onward for about a couple of yards and then stopped, for the sound which had before attracted his attention became more and more unequivocal.

"What is it?" he muttered to himself, after listening intently. "Some manufacturing process is going on—I am sure of that—in my youth I have heard similar sounds often enough. What can it be?"

He listened again, and while he was doing so a fresh thought occurred to him.

"I'd forgotten, in all this whirl of events, the circumstance of the quantity of smoke that I saw escaping from the chimney, and which first led me to the hut; no doubt it is from some underground apartment, close to the entrance of which I unquestionably am. The smoke that ascended from it did not come from that paltry fire on the hearth, that is quite certain."

Had Jonathan Wild's mind been in a less agitated condition than it was, the probability is that he would have had some suspicion as to the nature of the discovery he was about to make.

But he was not, as may be easily imagined, in exactly the state of mind that was calculated to assist him in coming to an accurate conclusion.

Continuing to grope his way onward, he presently found his further progress barred by an obstacle which he quickly made out to be a strong wooden door.

Slowly he rose to his feet, and was in the act of considering within his own mind whether he should make any attempt to pass through this door, when his speculations were put an end to in a summary fashion.

Suddenly some one from within flung the door open, and such a glare of light came from within, that at first, having come out of such profound darkness, Jonathan Wild was not able to see anything.

But he heard a roar of surprise and ejaculations from many lips.

Fortunately the thief-taker's presence of mind did not desert him, and, remembering the sign which the old man had made, he repeated it

Then some one seized him by the coat and dragged him forcibly forward, and a voice cried:

"Who are you? What's your business here? Speak—speak at once! Say at once who you are!"

Jonathan Wild gave a glance around him.

It was a hasty, hurried one, and occupied only a fraction of time; nevertheless, he saw a very great deal, and he was enabled by it to understand everything.

The scene was a very strange one, and we will endeavour to convey an idea of the place to the reader's mind by means of a description, but we shall not be able to do this with the same rapidity that Jonathan Wild took his one comprehensive glance.

CHAPTER DXXXI.

JONATHAN WILD SUCCEEDS IN HOODWINKING THE COINERS.

It was a large, irregularly-shaped underground apartment, if such a word can be applied to a place of this description.

The roof varied in height, and was composed of nothing but earth, which was held up by means of numerous planks that in their turn were supported on upright posts planted firmly in the floor.

The walls, too, were nothing but earth, and so was the floor, which, nevertheless, was hard and solid underfoot, having either been hammered hard or else worn by continually being trodden upon.

The consequence was that the whole place wore an inconceivably cheerless aspect, which would have been a thousand times more manifest except for a glowing furnace, which was situated in the centre, and from which there came a brilliant glare of light, that was, however, tinged with a red hue.

This light, falling on the rough walls and upon the supporting timbers, imparted a picturesque effect.

This was the light which had so dazzled Wild's eyes when it first fell upon them.

In this underground chamber four men and one woman were assembled.

In the furnace was a large crucible, filled nearly to the brim with molten metal, while, scattered round about, were numerous moulds of singular shape, and on a rude kind of table or bench, the only article of furniture visible, was a heap of glittering coins.

All this Wild saw at a glance, and he comprehended immediately that he had come across a nest of coiners.

That such was the occupation of the people in the cavern there was abundant proof.

When the man who opened the door first caught sight of a stranger standing on the threshold, he uttered a shout of astonishment.

The cry was quickly echoed by the others, and, beyond all doubt, the thief-taker would have been dealt with in a very summary manner had he not been fortunate enough to remember the signal the old man had given.

The coiners then understood that this stranger had not discovered their secret, and crept into the passage in a surreptitious manner, with the intention of betraying them.

On the contrary, they saw that he was one of the initiated, as the signal fully proved, and they were only anxious to know who he was, and to learn the circumstances that had brought him there.

With one reservation, Jonathan told them the precise truth.

He said that he and his companion had been hunted by the police officers—that with great difficulty they had thrown them off the scent, that they had entered the wood and discovered the hut, and he had sought within it shelter for himself and succour for his wounded comrade.

He explained how, upon showing the old man that he was a member of the family, he concealed him beneath the planks when the officers drew near, and how he had left his wounded comrade in the passage, and had crept forward until he reached the door.

This, and all other particulars, he made them acquainted with, reserving only the secret of his own identity.

It was highly necessary, for his own safety, that this secret should be preserved.

If they once knew who he was, they would be ready to tear him limb from limb.

The reader will doubtless remember what a violent crusade Jonathan Wild instituted, some time back, against coiners, and how he had been the means of dispersing the most formidable gang of these wretches that had ever been known.

There was some hope that he derived from the circumstance that none of those present recognised him.

This might be because they had never seen him before, or it might be owing to the extraordinary alteration which had taken place in the thief-taker's outward appearance.

How he was to get over the difficulty which would arise when the old man made his appearance, he could not very well see, for he stopped listening long enough, as we are aware, to hear the chief officer say that it was Jonathan Wild of whom they were in search.

"The old man above," said Wild, addressing the strange beings by whom he was surrounded, "promised me and my wounded companion safe shelter from our enemies."

"Where is this wounded companion of yours?" asked one of the coiners.

"You will find him some distance off in the passage, and near him are our two horses."

One of the men at once set off with the view of ascertaining how far the statement was correct.

Strangely enough, just as he passed out of the doorway leading into the passage from the underground chamber, the old man, having satisfied himself that the officers were not likely to return, lifted the planks and began to make the descent.

As the body of Mr. Noakes lay about half-way between these two places, the two men met close to the body.

Mr. Noakes was half conscious of what was going on around him, and although he strongly objected to the proceeding, yet he was powerless to offer any resistance when these two men picked him up, one by the head and the other by the heels, and carried him swiftly along.

The prominent idea in the wretched Governor's muddled mind was that they were police officers, and he groaned most dismally.

The coiners placed the wounded man on the floor, and by the strong light there was in the place they found that in this particular, at least, the new comer had not deceived them.

Jonathan bent a scrutinising glance upon the countenance of the old man, and he noted with alarm the angry look there was about his eyes.

The moment of peril was now at hand, and Jonathan strove to nerve himself for it as best he could.

"You look to me, no doubt," said the old man, addressing his companions, "for some explanation regarding the presence of these two men. I will give you a truthful account of all. A piece of information has since come to my knowledge, however, which, had I but possessed a short time before, would have entirely altered the aspect of affairs, for on no consideration would I have held out a helping hand to that man!"

He pointed to Jonathan Wild as he spoke.

"Why—why?" asked the others, eagerly.

"Because," replied the old man, with angry energy—"because he is my mortal enemy, and yours as well!"

It was with great misgivings that the thief-taker noticed how, as if actuated by a common instinct, the coiners suddenly plunged their hands into the breasts of their apparel, as though in search of some concealed weapon, as soon as the old man spoke thus.

"Who is he?" they asked, fiercely.

"Jonathan Wild!" screamed the old man, at the very top of his lungs.

Jonathan Wild, of course, had fully expected this announcement; but, what was more, he had decided in his own mind as to just what he should do.

As soon as the denunciation had been uttered, the coiners all rushed forward; but they failed to surround their foe, for Jonathan Wild, almost before the words had left the old man's lips, had given a sudden bound forward, and with one leap stood upright on the table.

At the same time he drew his sword, and waved it round him with such rapidity and determination that the coiners shrank back appalled.

"Shoot him!" screamed the old man—"down with him!—murder him!—kill him!—don't let the villain live!"

"Stand back!" thundered Wild, in a voice that immediately commanded the attention of all present. "Hear, first, the few words I am about to say; don't be guided only by that old man yonder, who labours under a mistake!"

The coiners seemed inclined to attend to this demand, and as they were silent, Jonathan Wild took the opportunity to continue:

"The fact is that I and my companion have been made the victims of a mistake—I repeat, a mistake! Do you understand what I mean?"

The coiners muttered some words in a dissatisfied tone by way of reply.

"We have been pursued by the officers," continued the thief-taker, "under the supposition that we were two different persons, namely, Jonathan Wild and the Governor of Newgate, or I should say the late Governor of Newgate. The officers have told the old man this, and he has believed it; but it is entirely incorrect, though that we are both members of the family I can prove to your satisfaction."

The men did not seem very well pleased with this explanation, and continued to mutter threateningly.

Wild went on:

"The point can easily be settled!" he said. "Who is there here that has seen Jonathan Wild?"

There was no reply, and Wild felt his hopes were beginning to rise.

"Have you ever seen Jonathan Wild?" he repeated, addressing himself more particularly to the old man.

"I have," was the reply.

Jonathan Wild had not expected this, and he felt that a time was coming when he would have to call more nerve into exercise than ever.

"Come forward, then!" said one of the coiners—"come forward, Lawson, and have a good look at him! Tell us whether this is Jonathan Wild, and mind you make no mistake!"

Now came the critical moment.

Wild hoped to pass through the ordeal in safety, because no one was better aware than himself how greatly he was changed.

He added increased effect to this alteration by screwing up his countenance in a peculiar manner.

As though he was exceedingly anxious to have the disputed identity settled, Jonathan Wild turned his face towards the light.

The old man came forward, and, shading his eyes with both hands, looked at him attentively.

"Is that Jonathan Wild?" asked one of the coiners presently.

"I—!"

"You see he hesitates," cried Wild in a triumphant voice, not allowing the old man to go any further. "Ask him whether he will swear that I am Jonathan Wild. If he cannot do this without hesitation, do not believe him! You need not fear that I shall ever disclose this place to a living soul, and if you will only afford me shelter for a little while (and I ask it not so much on my own account as upon that of my wounded companion) I will reward you liberally for your trouble. Look here—here!"

As he spoke, Jonathan pulled out of his pockets a great number of very valuable articles, for the reader will bear in mind that he carried about his person the greater portion of the booty he had taken since the escape.

He could tell by the expression visible on the faces of all the coiners that they beheld this wealth with the greatest possible amount of pleasure and satisfaction.

"Here is the swag," said Wild; "my companion and myself have collected it all upon the road—that's how it happened we got mistaken for Jonathan Wild and his associate. I am willing to divide this swag among you all if you will only give me the shelter that I require."

"Come, old man," said one of the coiners, "can you swear that this is Jonathan Wild, or have you been taking what the grabs said for gospel?"

"I am puzzled," said the old man; "my eyes are dim with age, and it is many years now since I last saw the villainous thief-taker;—this may be him, and it may not."

Wild saw that things were going on favourably for him, and he did what he could to increase the impression.

"Should you ever have guessed that I was Jonathan Wild if the grabs hadn't put the idea into your head?" he asked. "Answer that question truthfully, and I will be content."

"I should never have thought it," was the somewhat reluctant reply.

"Then," said Wild, calmly, "I imagine that quite settles the business. I am no more Jonathan Wild, and my companion is no more the Governor of Newgate, than any of you are; and, as I said before, all that we have between us—and it's a fine lot, I cantell you, for we have had a wonderful run of luck—shall be divided amongst you all, but in return for it I shall want you to attend to my companion's hurts. Are you agreed?"

"We are—we are!"

"All's well, then!" said Wild, in a voice which concealed the extreme amount of exultation which he felt. "All's well, and I hope that everyone present is perfectly satisfied that I am not Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER DXXXII.

JONATHAN WILD AND THE COINERS BECOME FAST FRIENDS.

It has been stated that Mr. Noakes had partially recovered his senses when he was picked up in the passage by the two coiners.

But his brain was confused, and he was unable to judge properly the nature of the events that were going on. His mind was in a perfect turmoil, yet the most prominent idea seemed to be the intense dread he had of being captured by the police officers.

If he once fell into their hands, he could hope for no mercy.

As he lay upon the ground, where the two coiners had deposited him, he began to grow much calmer.

At first, all that was going on around him sounded in his ears like some hoarse murmur.

By slow degrees, however, the sounds separated themselves, and became distinct.

With the greatest wonder, not altogether unmixed with astonishment, he heard Wild stoutly deny his own identity.

But he never for a moment believed that the coiners would allow themselves to be imposed upon so easily, and he waited the result with very great apprehension, for when the attempted deceit was discovered he concluded that very summary steps would be taken.

To his great relief and surprise, he found that the coiners were completely deceived.

After they had settled with Jonathan in the manner we have described, several of them came towards the wounded man, and one of them, stooping down, said:

"Will you swear that you are not the Governor of Newgate, and that that man on the table yonder is not Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker?"

That was a trying moment for Wild.

He had no means of judging how far Mr. Noakes had recovered his senses, nor did he know whether he had heard his recent declaration.

His fate hung upon the next few seconds, and it can be guessed with what intense anxiety he waited for his companion's reply.

"What a strange question to ask!" said Noakes, with more presence of mind and assurance than one would have believed he was capable of exhibiting. "You want me to swear that I am not the Governor of Newgate?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, of course I'll swear to it, for I never was and don't want to be! My name is Tom Price; but, I say, where's my pal?"

"Who's he?"

"Why, Joe Williams, to be sure!"

"Here I am," said Wild, as he stepped off the table.

"I am glad to find you are so much better."

"Yes, yes! But I am very weak."

"I hope," said Wild, "now that we have come to such a good understanding with each other, that you will, in return for the swag you have received, do what you can to restore my unfortunate companion to health."

"Is the wound serious?"

"No," replied Wild; "it's little more than skin-deep—in fact, so trifling that it was unnoticed, and all that ails him is weakness from loss of blood."

"We can soon put that all right, then."

"Now, old 'un," said one of the coiners, who seemed to have some kind of command over the rest, "go on upstairs, and mind you keep the place all right!"

It was the old man that he addressed, and, without the least hesitation, he left the underground cave, and made his way to the surface.

The coiners had some capital wine concealed in a little recess, and producing it, they administered some rather large doses of the stimulant to the wounded man.

Its effects were visible immediately.

New blood seemed to fill the veins of the unfortunate Governor, and after awhile he fell into a sound, heavy sleep, which the heat of the fire, close to which he lay, in some measure produced.

Jonathan soon made himself at home with the coiners; he laughed and chatted, and behaved in a manner that was most surprising, considering the dangers and difficulties of his position.

But he had been so critically situated lately that he looked upon this as perfect security.

Finding that the account of any desperate exploits on the highway was much relished by his new friends, he drew largely upon his imagination in order to amuse them.

They looked upon him as quite an excellent acquisition, and the thief-taker showed that he was well up to the mysteries of their business.

As the metal was in a fluid state, and as the moulds were all in readiness, the process of coining was proceeded with, and when anything was wanted, Jonathan Wild's hand was always ready.

"You have been up to this little game before!" said one of them.

Wild nodded his head as he replied:

"There are few things that I have not tried at one time or another of my life; and if, you keep to your word of finding us both shelter until my companion recovers from his wound, I will show you something well worth your attention!"

"Do you mean in coining?"

"Yes. I will show you how to put a few finishing touches, which will make the coins so perfect that they would deceive the most experienced!"

This was excellent intelligence.

Money was cast in prodigious quantities.

"You must have a good demand," said Wild, "or are you making a quantity to last you for a length of time?"

"This will all be gone in a couple of days or so," said one of the coiners, pointing to an immense heap of silver coins of all denominations.

"What shall you do with them?"

"We pack them up and send them off to London; we don't attempt to pass them off as the real coins, but sell them for what they really are. As a matter of course, we don't get very much for them; but then we don't run the risk we should if we attempted to utter them ourselves."

"I see; and you find it better not to run the risk?"

"Much better; because, by a little industry, we can get together a large amount."

"And whereabouts in London is it that you send them?" asked Wild.

The coiner smiled.

"Excuse me if I keep that secret to myself!" he said. "If you stay with us you will probably know, but I don't think it prudent to tell you just at present!"

"I admire your caution!" said the thief-taker. "I should act just in the same way myself!"

"You would if you had had the same amount of experience as we have."

As soon as the casting operation was over, the fire was allowed to go down, which was a great relief to all present, for, as the ventilation was very trifling, the heat was almost more than could be borne.

The coins were then removed from the moulds and placed along with the others in the heap.

They required a great deal of labour yet in the shape of finishing, for they were now in what they called "the rough."

It would appear, however, that they considered enough was done for the present.

The large table we have mentioned was cleared, and several small casks were rolled out of distant corners and placed round it.

On the top of these casks some planks of wood were put, so that capital accommodation was provided in the shape of seats.

Wine and spirits in unlimited quantity were then produced, and a regular carouse commenced.

Songs were sung, tales told, and Jonathan Wild appeared in quite a fresh character, for he did what he had never done in his life before.

That was, to try to make himself agreeable.

He fully succeeded, for he had a number of flash songs by heart, with which he treated the company, and many little circumstances continually suggested themselves to his mind, which served as a foundation upon which to erect some very extraordinary narratives.

All the coiners were delighted that they should have been so fortunate as to fall across so excellent a companion.

Not the least suspicion had a place in the minds of any of them.

Mr. Noakes still lay by the fire, slumbering profoundly.

We cannot do better than leave them while they are in such a comfortable situation as this, and other events were happening close at hand, such as the coiners and the thief-taker little dreamed of.

As his conduct must have amply shown, the police officer who headed the little party that had pursued Wild for so long was a very determined man, and his knowledge of the circumstance that he had been so nearly successful stimulated him to still greater exertions.

The reader will remember how surprised the thief-taker was when he found he had failed in baffling his pursuers.

As he had quite expected, the officers came round the first turning that he had taken, and as the fugitives were not in sight, they kept still ahead, for they imagined those of whom they were in pursuit had gone straight on.

But when, after proceeding some distance, they came to a portion of the lane which stretched itself out in a straight line for a mile at least, and as they looked forward they were unable to see the least signs of the fugitives, the suspicion first crossed their minds that they had been coming in the wrong direction.

So strong a hold did this take of their minds, that the commanding officer ordered his men to turn their horses' heads round and follow him.

They did so, and presently reached the turning which Wild had so artfully taken.

Whatever doubts they might previously have had were now completely set at rest, for, as they all pulled up at the corner of this turning, the head officer, looking down upon the ground, saw a large spot of blood about the size of half-a-crown.

He uttered a shout, and, bending towards it, he said:

"Behold, here is proof enough that they have come so far! I thought one of them was wounded, but I was not sure! Now, however, that point is quite set at rest,—we shall be able to track them easily enough!"

"Yes," said another police officer, "I can see several spots upon the ground."

"We ought to have noticed this before," said the one in command; "but I question whether we should have seen it now, had it not been for our happening to stop."

While the officers were going at a gallop, it was a matter of impossibility for them to see such a thing as a spot of blood upon the road.

"Dismount!" said the one in command. "You, Wilson, get down and look about you, and see which way the spots go."

The officer obeyed, and went prying about.

He went about a hundred yards down the lane without seeing another spot, and he was just about to turn back, under the impression that the fugitives had not gone that way, when he was ordered to try a few yards further.

He did so, and then set up a shout which brought all his companions immediately around him.

On one side of the road there was quite a large pool of blood, and a mark as though some one had lain there.

By looking closely the officers managed to discern many marks of horses' feet.

"Here is proof positive that they have come as far as this," said the one in command. "Can you trace the marks any further?"

There was a great deal of blood near where the Governor had fallen, but after that there was none.

Coming, then, to the little plantation or wood which we have mentioned as being situated on one side of the road and bounded by strong palisades, the officer paused and divided his men into two portions, in order to make a complete circuit of it.

It so happened that that portion of the troop that he remained with followed exactly in Wild's footsteps.

Presently they came to another crimson spot.

This was where the horses had stood still for a few minutes, while Jonathan pulled down the paling.

It was not long before they found the woodwork had been displaced, and the fractures showed that they had been recently made.

They pulled a piece of fence down instantly, and entering the wood, they found another spot.

This was where the thief-taker had stopped the horses while he replaced the fence in its original position.

That they were now on the right track was perfectly clear, so the officer summoned the other half of his troop.

Having united once more, they pushed on through the wood, but though they looked about them with the greatest care they were unable to discover any further indications.

At last, however, they emerged near the brook, and here again they got upon the track.

The next thing they saw was the smoke curling up from the chimney of the hut, and they made their way towards this, partly in expectation of getting some assistance should it prove to be a keeper's lodge, and partly because they imagined they might glean some intelligence.

What passed upon their arrival at the hut we have already described, and also how they went on searching among the trees and undergrowth.

The wood was not of any great extent, and the officers were not long in searching it thoroughly, but they could find no more signs of the fugitives, which is not to be wondered at.

The commanding officer was in a great state of exasperation.

It seemed very hard to be baffled after having been so very near to effecting his purpose.

He ordered a halt, and commanded his men to keep perfectly silent.

Dismounting from his steed, he clasped his hands behind his back, and, with his head bent forward and his eyes fixed upon the ground, he paced up and down for several minutes, endeavouring to decide upon his future plan of operations, and also reviewing the whole of the occurrences that had taken place.

It was while he was thus engaged that a dim suspicion entered his mind that there might be some mystery connected with the hut.

The old man might have been bribed by Jonathan Wild to hold his peace, and yet this suspicion seemed hardly a well-grounded one, and the real fact of the matter is that he only fixed upon it because he could not think of anything else, and account for the disappearance of the two fugitives in any other way.

This, however, furnished him with a basis, and by dint of hard thinking he presently elaborated a scheme which he imagined would entirely set at rest his doubts.

What that scheme was we shall now proceed to describe.

CHAPTER DXXXIII.

THE CHIEF POLICE OFFICER HAS HIS SUSPICIONS CONCERNING THE OLD HUT IN THE WOOD.

In the first place, however, we must more particularly advert to the general arrangements which had been made by the coiners in order to avoid detection.

The hut itself, then, was a mere blind.

It was occupied by the old man, who ostensibly obtained a livelihood by gathering firewood.

But this was a mere pretence.

His duties were to guard against any sudden discovery.

Had it not been for the hut above, the coiners would soon have been detected, for they could not by any possibility carry on their trade without the aid of a fire.

A fire entailed smoke, and if this had been allowed to ascend it would certainly have attracted suspicion.

But this difficulty was got over by very simple means.

A large pipe conveyed the smoke which arose from the furnace into the chimney of the hut above, and the old man was instructed never to omit making a fire in the grate in the hut, so that if anyone entered they would not be surprised at seeing the smoke.

It will be seen, then, that the post the old man held, and the duties he performed, were rather important.

He had chiefly been selected on account of his age, which, while it disabled him from taking any active part in the manufacture of the spurious coins, yet enabled him to sustain the part of a woodman to very great perfection.

After leaving the cave, as he had been bidden, the old man ascended to the hut and carefully replaced the wooden planks, which formed at the same time a flooring to the hut itself, as well as a covering for the secret entrance to the cave.

Knowing that the furnace was in full operation down below, he piled up a quantity of green boughs on the hearth, which sent forth a considerable quantity of very dense smoke as soon as the fire began to make an impression.

This done, he drew a little stool close up to the hearth, and, sitting down upon it, he bent his head upon his hands, and apparently gave himself up to deep thought.

The subject of his meditations was the events which had recently taken place.

He felt that he would have given much to make certain whether the man to whom he had given shelter was really Jonathan Wild.

Upon this point, however, he could not decide, and he tried hard to recall to his aged and wandering recollection the precise appearance of the thief-taker.

He succeeded tolerably well, but upon comparing the two he was reluctantly compelled to admit that there was but a slight—very slight—resemblance.

While thus engaged, his quick ear suddenly caught the sound of an approaching footstep.

He listened, throwing off in an instant all his pre-occupation.

The footstep which came towards the hut was a feeble, halting one, and the old man began to wonder who it could possibly be.

It was an unusual thing for anyone to approach this lonely habitation, but already on this eventful day he had had two visits, and now there seemed every probability that he was about to have a third.

Whoever it might be that was approaching, it was quite certain, for some cause or other, walked very, very slowly, and, in fact, the old man began to lose all patience.

At last, however, there came a strange, blundering kind of knock against the door, and a voice cried out feebly:

"Help, help! Save me, or I die!"

The old man listened to the words with great surprise.

At first he could neither move nor speak.

Then there came upon his ears a feeble groan.

"Who is there?" he at length managed to ask. "What do you want?"

"Help, help! I am badly hurt! Help, help!"

The old man went towards the door and opened it.

Crouching down on the ground he saw the figure of a man.

A second glance showed him that he was attired in the costume of a police officer.

This made the old man draw back.

The officer perceived the movement, for he added:

"Have mercy upon me, old man!—have mercy upon me, or I perish!"

"I—I cannot help you! I am a poor man, all alone in this hut!"

"Let me crawl beneath your roof! I much fear that I shall die! Oh, I am badly hurt! My head—my head!"

While speaking, the police officer, with a slow and apparently very painful movement, dragged himself along until he was fairly beneath the roof of the hut.

The old man looked down and saw that the officer had got a large handkerchief soaked in blood wound many times round his head.

It gave him a most horrible and ghastly look, more especially as some of the blood had trickled down his visage.

These crimson tears all left their mark behind them.

Now that he was inside, there was no help for it, so the old man closed and fastened the door.

Evidently, he was rather puzzled to know what to do, and whether he was acting rightly.

At any rate, he considered he had better try to get rid of him as soon as possible.

"Are you badly hurt?" he said.

"Very!" replied the officer, with a hideous groan.

"Shot?"

"Yes, in the head!"

"Are you not one of the officers who called here some time back?"

"Yes, I am."

"Then, have you seen those of whom you are in search?"

"Alas, no!"

"Then how is it that you are hurt?"

"I have hardly breath enough left to tell you! We were searching about after the escaped prisoners——"

"Yes——yes?"

"I separated myself from the rest——oh, fool that I was! My companions heard me among the trees, and, not knowing who I was——"

"Fired upon you in mistake, I suppose?"

"That is it."

"Why did they not aid you?"

"They left me for dead. I recovered my senses to find I was alone. With much pain and difficulty I dragged myself to this place, and——and you see I am here!"

"But," said the old man, "I am afraid I can be of little assistance to you."

"Alas, then, I must die!"

"Nay, not so," replied the old man.

In his heart, nothing would have pleased him better than for the officer to have given up the ghost there and then; but, for the sake of avoiding suspicion, he was compelled to dissemble.

The officer continued to groan most hideously.

"Ahem!" said the old man. "If you will take my advice——"

"I will do so, gladly!"

"Then you will muster up what strength remains, and I will lead you the nearest way out of the wood, and not leave you until I see you deposited in some place where your hurts will be properly attended to."

"Many, many thanks!"

"Will you make the trial?"

"Nay, I fear——"

"What?"

"That I have not sufficient strength."

"Try!"

The officer made an attempt to rise from the ground, but failed.

He fell back heavily.

"Water——water!" he gasped. "Bring me water, or I perish! Oh, I burn—I burn! Fire and fury! Water——water!"

"I will get some!"

"Pray do, and you shall name your own reward!"

The old man went to his pitcher, but it contained no water.

Wild had emptied it.

"Alas!" he said, "I have none!"

"No water?"

"No."

"Then I die! But surely there is water close at hand! Surely for the sake of a dying man you will fetch some! I myself saw a brook at no great distance from this place."

"And that's the nearest water there is."

"It is not far! Go, go——pray go! Oh, heaven! I burn—I burn! Oh, what would I not give for a little water!"

The officer seemed to be in a very bad way indeed.

The old man was in a bit of a fix.

It was almost more than his life was worth to allow anyone to remain at the hut alone——much less a police officer——because of the risk there would be of the secret entrance being discovered.

But when he looked down and saw to what a helpless condition this officer had been reduced, the old man thought there would not be so very much harm in leaving him there while he repaired to the brook.

He could be back in a moment or so, and if the officer had a good draught of water he might recover sufficiently to be led away.

This was what the old man most devoutly wished, and it was with this hope that he took up his pitcher and went towards the door.

The officer now seemed to be so far gone as to be quite unconscious of what was happening around him.

With all possible speed the old man passed through the door and hurried off towards the brook.

He turned round once or twice, and, as he had taken the precaution to leave the door open behind him, he was able to see the officer still lying immovable upon the floor.

But he could not see with what a burning eye the officer glared after him.

As soon as ever the trees concealed the old man from his view, the officer sprang to his feet.

"Curse the old fellow!" he said. "I thought I was never going to get rid of him! Well, he's off at last——that's some comfort! I rather think I have managed to carry out my plan pretty well. This blood and the handkerchief, and all that sort of thing, has quite taken him in! There is some mystery connected with this place, I am certain!"

These words will be sufficient to let the reader know that the individual who uttered them was no less than the chief officer.

He had carried out his plan so far, but what he intended to do eventually remains to be seen.

He had resolved to gain shelter in the hut, and keep a sharp look-out about him, so as to decide whether his suspicions had a good foundation.

The easiest and best means he could think of for the accomplishment of this purpose was to simulate being badly wounded.

In order to carry out this idea to its fullest extent, he had made his way to that particular spot on the margin of the brook where Jonathan Wild had dressed Mr. Noakes's wound.

There was quite a pool of blood and water here, and in this the officer soaked his large handkerchief until it was stained through and through.

One of his subordinates bound this disagreeable bandage round his head, and tied it tight.

When these preparations with regard to himself had been completed, the officer issued his instructions to his men.

These were to the effect that they should conceal themselves among the underwood as close to the hut as they possibly could.

Here they were to wait for his signal.

As soon as they heard if they were to break into the hut by main force if necessary, and make all speed to his assistance, for he announced his intention of not giving the signal until the very moment when he required their aid.

Having made these preparations, the officer crawled towards the hut, practising on the way the part he had to perform.

He had knocked and gained admittance, as we have already described.

His men saw that his manoeuvre had so far been crowned with success, and as they fully shared in his suspicions concerning the hut, they waited the final result with the utmost anxiety and impatience.

CHAPTER DXXXIV.

DESCRIBES WHAT SUCCESS THE OFFICER MET WITH IN MAKING HIS RESEARCHES IN THE HUT.

THAT this police officer was a very courageous man all our readers will allow.

No ordinary amount of nerve would be required to enable anyone to carry out such a scheme.

He resolved to make the best of the opportunity which the old man's temporary absence afforded him, and so, with great haste, he looked about him.

[THE CHIEF POLICE OFFICER THREATENS THE OLD MAN IN THE HUT.]

After a hasty glance at the interior, his first act was to feel round the walls, for his idea was that there was a secret doorway somewhere.

In this he was mistaken, but presently his hand encountered one of the projections which we have mentioned as having been made use of by the old man in making his ascent to the roof.

Looking up, the officer saw more above his head, and instantly guessed the use to which they would be put.

But he did not guess that they merely led up to a movable plank in the roof, which, when removed, would allow anyone to reconnoitre without.

This he fancied must surely be the secret.

He was, indeed, strongly tempted to make the ascent, but just then he heard the old man returning.

To lie down in his former position was the work of an instant, and for fear he should not have hit upon the exact spot, he writhed about as though he was suffering very great pain.

This was a ready and capital thought, since it would effectually disarm any suspicions that the old man might have.

"Here is the water!" he cried.

The officer only groaned and writhed about more than ever, and then became silent.

"Here is the water! Dear me, I do believe he's gone at last! Well, I hope he's died in peace, and all that sort of thing."

The officer groaned again, and at once put an end to the old man's hopes concerning his decease.

"Water—water!" he gasped.

He poured some roughly down the throat of the supposed wounded man.

The officer pretended to revive.

"Thanks—thanks!" he murmured. "That cool draught has filled me with new life! You shall be well rewarded for this, never fear. I will reward you, old man."

"Can you rise, think you?"

"I will try."

After several abortive attempts, the officer rose to a sitting posture.

"Oh, my head—my head!" he cried. "I am afraid it is a case with me!"

"Drink a little more water!"

"I cannot!"

"It will do more to revive you than anything else—try!"

As he spoke, the old man held the pitcher to the officer's lips, who drank a small quantity, but not much, for he preferred a stronger beverage.

"Are you better now, sir?" asked the old man, anxiously.

"Very little."

"Let me assist you to your feet; I can show you a very near way out of the wood, and will take you to a public-house where you will receive every attention. Come, sir—come!"

The anxiety of the old man to get rid of his visitor was too palpable to be overlooked, and while he spoke these last words he endeavoured, with what strength he had, to raise the officer.

That individual prolonged the scene, however, in the hope that something or other might turn up.

But the silence of the grave prevailed in and about that place.

As he rolled his eyes around, as though he was suffering great agony, he took particular notice of every portion of the interior of the hut.

With the exception of the projections in the wall, which we have before mentioned, he saw nothing of a suspicious character.

Therefore, it was only natural that he should make up his mind to the effect that they were connected with the secret he so much wished to discover.

The old man tugged away at him in a desperate manner, and the more desire he showed to get rid of his visitor the greater became the officer's suspicions.

At last, as he had no longer any pretence to offer, he stood up.

The old man's eyes brightened, for he really thought he was about to see the back of this troublesome officer.

He was never more mistaken in his life.

As soon as he was fairly on his feet, the officer seized the old man by the throat with a grip of such tightness that he found himself unable to utter a single cry for aid.

The officer shook him backwards and forwards until he was within an ace of strangulation; then, suddenly releasing his hold, the man fell, and lay in a confused heap upon the floor of the hut.

The officer sat himself down in a moment by the old man's side, and drawing his cutlass, he flourished it in a furious manner.

The old man had received a very sudden shock, for the thought that his visitor was only playing a part and was not wounded at all had never once entered his mind.

He could scarcely believe in the reality of the sudden change that had taken place.

His faculties were quickened and his convictions strengthened, however, by the glitter of the cutlass, which induced some very uncomfortable feelings indeed.

The officer turned the point of the sharp weapon against the old man's breast, and then he said in a stern but suppressed voice:

"Utter a single syllable above a whisper, and I will run you through instantly—beware!"

The old man's eyes rolled fearfully, and he gasped painfully for breath.

"Do you hear?" said the officer, pressing the point of the cutlass against the breast of his coat—"do you understand what I say?"

The old man nodded violently.

"That will do, then."

"You—you—you are not wounded?" said the old man, stammeringly.

"Certainly not," replied the officer, with a grin.

"Then why are you here?"

"Because I have my suspicions, or rather something more than suspicions."

While he spoke these words, the officer fixed a peculiar glance upon the old man, who quailed beneath it.

He tried to laugh it off, and said:

"Suspensions of a poor old man like myself? Nonsense!"

"Don't speak quite so loud, my friend," said the officer.

"Tell me, then, of what you are suspicious."

"I will, and something more besides. I have searched this wood thoroughly with my men, and we have failed to find a trace of the men we seek."

"What of that?"

The old man spoke half defiantly.

His first fear, when the officer spoke, was, that he had suspected the existence of the underground place, where the coining operations were carried on.

Now, however, he found that the officer's suspicious extended only to the disappearance of the two men of whom they were in search.

Such being the case, he felt his courage reviving, for he had the greatest possible amount of confidence in the opening in the floor escaping detection.

Some very cunningly-contrived place would have been in much greater danger of discovery, for the floor of the hut was, as we have already stated, covered over with loose planks, which had the appearance of having been laid upon the ground in order to obtain a dry and firm flooring.

The officer noticed the manner in which the old man had asked the last question, and wondered what could be the meaning of the alteration in his behaviour.

This he hoped to ascertain; so he said:

"It amounts to this, my friend—we have tracked these two men very close to your cottage, and I feel almost certain that you have secreted them somewhere."

"Oh, do you?"

"I do; and if you have, you will best consult your own interests by telling me where they are, and take your share of the reward; provided you do this, I will take care that not a word is said about your having secreted them—you shall get into no trouble on that account."

"You are very kind, and very liberal in your promises," replied the old man, "but I can't avail myself of them; I don't like the manner in which you have set about this; but I suppose that is neither here nor there."

"Neither here nor there, as you say," repeated the officer. "Now, look here—I will give you one more chance; tell me where you have hidden the two men, or which way they have taken!"

"I know nothing about them!" returned the old man, doggedly. "I told you so at first, and you might have believed me."

"I did not believe you, and that's plain truth! Take it for all in all, this is a very suspicious-looking place indeed!"

"Suspicious?" faltered the old man, for these few words caused him to lose his self-possession again.

"Yes, suspicious!" answered the officer. "Let me advise you to make a clean breast of the whole affair; if you don't, why, you will get into trouble along with the rest!"

"I can tell you nothing, because I know nothing! What is there suspicious in this place?"

The old man's voice quivered as he asked this question. He put it because he wished to hear the worst at once.

"Many things," replied the officer. "In the first place, I may mention those projections in the wall."

The old man smiled.

"Why are they there?" asked the officer.

"Can't you guess?"

"I guess there's something secret connected with them; I don't know what at present, but I am determined to find out!"

"If that's all," said the old man, "I can explain it easily enough."

The officer watched him narrowly.

"They only enable me to climb to the roof of the hut; there's a trap-door just above."

"But what do you want to climb up for?"

"Various reasons—various reasons! This is a strange and lonely place for a man to dwell in, and many villainous characters—such as poachers, for instance—are often abroad."

"Then I understand you that you use that place to reconnoitre from?"

"Just so—just so! And what is there suspicious in that, I should like to know?"

"Nothing, only you see I don't happen to believe a word of it. Once more—will you tell me where these men are? I feel more and more certain that they are somewhere close by every moment!"

"I am sorry you have taken that idea into your head," said the old man. "I don't know how I shall disabuse you of it."

"I will have a search round the place, then," said the officer, at length. "Sit where you are. If you move, it will be at the peril of your life!"

"But you have no right to treat me in this manner!"

"Yes, I have. I suspect you of harbouring and abetting felons, and if I can prove it against you, you shall suffer dearly for your obstinacy!"

These words let the old man know that the officer was a bold, determined man, and by no means inclined to be trifled with.

"If you attempt to move hand or foot from where you now are," said the officer, "you're a dead man! I warn you, and if you refuse to take notice of it you must abide by the consequences!"

So saying, the police officer crossed the hut towards the projections in the wall, concerning which he felt the greatest possible amount of curiosity.

He was not at all satisfied by the explanation that had been given.

With considerable agility he climbed up, looking round continually, so as to observe whether the old man offered to move.

But he sat perfectly still, just where he had been left, watching the movements of his visitor.

While the officer was pursuing his researches in that quarter the old man cared little, because he knew very well that he could not find anything out.

The officer reached the top in a moment, and stretching up one hand, easily removed the loose plank.

He then raised his body a little higher, in order to take a good look outside.

While the officer was thus engaged, many thoughts were flitting through the old man's mind.

First of all, he determined to place the utmost confidence in the excellence of the hiding-place, and then, when the officer put his head out of the roof, he thought what a good job it would be if he could put an end to his life altogether.

No sooner did this thought occur to him than, without further reflection, he proceeded to put it into execution.

In the breast of his coat he carried a pistol.

Drawing this with great rapidity, he hastily levelled it at the bulky form of the police officer, pulled the trigger, and fired.

In that confined space the report was rather stunning.

With a crash the officer fell to the earth.

The old man sprang to his feet with an exultant cry upon his lips.

Very soon, however, it changed its character, until at last it became a yell of horror.

The hasty rushing of many footsteps outside came upon his ears.

Then the door was burst open, and in a second the hut was filled by police officers.

CHAPTER DXXXV.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS HIMSELF MENACED BY A DOUBLE DANGER.

THE signal agreed upon between the officer and his men was the report of a pistol, and this explains how it was that they all rushed pell-mell into the hut as soon as the old man fired.

He little thought when he committed the rash act that such would be the result, or assuredly he would not have pulled the trigger.

Nor did he even have the consolation which would have been afforded him had the officer been wounded.

It so happened, however, that he entirely escaped the bullet, although it passed very close to him indeed.

He had scarcely put his head out and glanced over the roof before he became conscious of the imprudence of which he had been guilty.

The old man was out of his sight, and there was no knowing what he might be tempted to do.

Such a thought as this was quite sufficient to make him lower his head and take a peep into the interior of the hut.

He saw the old man with a pistol in his hand aiming at him.

With admirable presence of mind, he then relaxed his hold of the projections in the wall, and allowed himself to drop to the ground.

Although he was severely bruised and shaken by the process, yet there can be little doubt that he entirely owed his life to it, for at such a short distance, with anything like a reasonable amount of care, the old man could not fail to hit his mark.

The officer struggled to his feet.

He was in pain, but nevertheless he cried out in a clear voice:

"Secure that man, and see that he attempts no further mischief!"

The idea of resisting so many well-armed men did not for a moment enter into the imagination of the owner of the hut.

So he gave in as peaceably as his captors possibly could wish.

The chief officer came limping towards him.

"You hoary old wretch!" he cried. "Is this the return you make for the forbearance I have shown towards you up to this moment? But you shall suffer for it! My suspicions are now changed into certainties, and if I can, I most certainly will have a halter put round your neck!"

The old man looked dogged and sullen, but could not, for the life of him, say a word in his own behalf.

Whether the existence of the underground apartment was discovered or not, he would certainly be marched off a prisoner, and this prospect filled him with the liveliest dread.

Moreover, his opinion as to the probability of the coining operations being discovered considerably changed.

The officers were impressed with the opinion that there was something mysterious in the place, and so many of them searching about in so circumscribed a space could scarcely fail to discover the secret of the floor.

Two officers were bidden by the chief to keep the old man safe prisoner, while the others were instructed to disperse themselves about the building, and closely examine every square inch of it.

They went all round the walls in the first place, examining them in various ways, but in a very little while they were unwillingly forced to come to the conclusion that there was no secret in connection with them.

Nor could there be any secret with respect to the roof, for the rafters upon which the planks had been placed were plainly enough visible when they looked up.

Nothing more remained but the floor, and, strange as it may appear, they did not once show the least suspicion with regard to it.

At length, however, when they found there was really nothing more for them to do, and nothing left to examine, they, more with a view to occupying themselves than anything else, began to lift up the planks.

That they should happen to pitch upon the precise spot where the opening was is scarcely reasonable to suppose.

Consequently, the first half-dozen planks or so that they lifted up disclosed nothing but the bare ground.

This happened to be sticky and damp, which at once gave them a reason why the planks had been laid down.

The chief officer all the while kept his eyes riveted upon the countenance of the old man.

Such being the case, he noticed that when the first planks were lifted up the old man trembled and changed colour.

Who can wonder at this, however? for he quite gave himself up for lost.

Most bitterly did he curse the hour when Jonathan Wild arrived at the hut and besought his shelter.

Most bitterly did he curse himself for having acceded to the request.

But for this, it was easy to see that all would have been well.

Perceiving the change which took place in the old man's demeanour, the chief officer drew his conclusions therefrom, and at once instructed his men to lift up the whole of the planks.

This was a task easily performed, and one that consumed a very small quantity of time, for the hut was only a little place, and, as a matter of course, did not require many planks to cover it.

In something less than a minute, then, after he had issued this command, his subordinates set up a shout, which indicated an important discovery.

"Silence!" said their commander, instantly; "raise no alarm. What is it you have found?"

"An opening in the floor, leading somewhere underground."

The old man uttered a sound, something between a scream and a groan, and then relapsed into entire insensibility.

While in this condition he was easily kept prisoner, and the chief officer, no longer having any apprehensions on his account, hastened to the large opening round which his men stood.

"This is the secret," he cried, as soon as he beheld it. How blind I must have been not to have thought of it before! We are on the right track at last, and, who knows? we may find out something else, the discovery of which will amply reward us."

These words were uttered at random, but shortly afterwards they were strangely confirmed.

Looking more closely on the sloping path that led to the coiners' cellar, the officers detected the prints made by horses' hoofs.

Leaving the two men who had charge of the old man to keep guard in the hut, the officer commanded the rest to follow him as closely as they could.

Believing that they had at last run the fox to earth, the officers were all highly elated.

The capture of Jonathan Wild and his companion seemed certain.

Down the sloping path the officers crept as noiselessly as they could, until presently their commander, finding how rapidly the darkness increased, ordered one of them to procure a light.

This was easily done, for all carried dark lanterns about their persons.

One was lighted, and only one, for the officer did not wish to have so much light as would give the fugitives warning of their approach, but only just sufficient to enable them to avoid running against any obstacle or falling into any snare.

The bottom of the descent was soon reached, and then the passage spread out before the officers which led to the door of the coining apartment.

First of all they came to the curtain that had been hung before the door so as to obstruct sound.

This was a contrivance that made the officer suspect they were going to find out something of a singular nature.

They had found the same means used in many flash kens in the metropolis.

The curtain was dashed aside, and then the murmuring of voices could be plainly distinguished.

In between the space formed by the curtain and the door the two horses had been left.

Here they were found by the officers, who took possession of them immediately.

Having found the steeds, it was but reasonable to conclude that their riders were not far off, and indeed the discovery of the door was instantly made.

"Now, my lads," said the chief officer, in a whisper, "I don't know how that door is fastened, or whether it is fastened at all; however, we must not stand upon ceremony. Get all of you together and give one rush, so as to bear it down at once, and we shall take them by surprise then."

All the officers were in a state of the greatest possible excitement.

They did not require twice bidding.

Closing together in a dense body, they dashed impetuously at the door.

It was a strong one and well secured, but there were few doors calculated to withstand such an assault as that.

It cracked ominously, shook in its frame, and showed every symptom of giving way.

A loud shout reached them from the interior.

Then came a confusion of voices and the trampling of many feet.

"Again—again!" cried the chief officer. "One more rush, and all will be over! Down with it!"

The men uttered a faint hurrah, and once more precipitated themselves against the door.

Down it went with a terrible crash, and such was the violence which the officers had made use of that they were carried into the very centre of the apartment before they could bring themselves to a standstill.

The strange and unexpected sight which met their view took them completely by surprise, and for a few seconds they could do nothing more than glare around them.

As before, the apartment was brilliantly illuminated by the fire in the furnace, though a hasty attempt had been made by some of the coiners to extinguish it.

"A nest of coiners, by Jove!" cried the chief officer, as soon as ever he could recover himself sufficiently to speak. "Hurrah, my lads! we are in luck's way, and no mistake! Down with them all!"

The elation of the police officers was extreme, for, as we have previously had occasion to remark, the manufacture of base coin was carried on about that period to an extent that was truly alarming.

A universal panic threatened to be the result of it, and the most strenuous efforts were made to bring the offenders to justice.

In spite of this, however, the trade flourished; and to such perfection had these men arrived that none but a well-practised person could detect the spurious from the genuine coin.

Large rewards were offered for the apprehension of all who were in any way engaged in the nefarious traffic; and not a single Monday went by without many wretches—men, women, and even children too—being executed at Tyburn for this offence alone, for in those days the manufacturing and uttering of base coin was punished by death.

This the officers, of course, knew very well, and consequently they looked forward to making quite a golden harvest.

Before we proceed further, however, it will be necessary for us to return to Jonathan Wild.

It will be understood that Jonathan Wild remained with the coiners for several hours before he was disturbed by the police officers in the manner we have just described.

There came at last an end to the conviviality in which they had been indulging.

Mr. Noakes woke up and felt wonderfully better.

A slight feeling of lassitude was the only effect he experienced from his wound.

He was supplied with food and another prodigious dose of wine, which seemed to be instantly transformed into new blood.

Once more he lay down to slumber, and this time Jonathan Wild followed his example.

The coiners seemed to sleep likewise; but no sooner had they made sure that their two guests were slumbering soundly than they rose, and forming into a dense group, conversed earnestly in rapid whispers.

"I have my doubts," said one, "and the general safety requires that they should be set at rest either one way or the other."

"Right!" said another voice. "I have my doubts too!"

"Did you notice," added a third, "how his countenance changed at times, and what an alteration there would be in the tones of his voice?"

"Yes—yes!" they all cried, eagerly.

"No one could fail to notice it," said the one who had first spoken, "and that was what first had the effect of arousing my suspicions."

"He may be what he professes," said another, "but my own opinion is that we have given shelter to Jonathan Wild."

"If we can only prove that, he shall die!"

"He shall—he shall!" they all cried, as if with one voice.

"I wish we had one of our London hands here, as we have at times," exclaimed another—"he would, ten to one, be able to get us out of our difficulty."

"Stop!" said another. "I have just recollected something, and now I have done so, I am surprised I should have forgotten it."

"What is it?"

"Hush, and I will tell you. Don't you recollect hearing that some time ago, when Blueskin was going to be brought up for trial, Jonathan Wild aggravated the prisoner, who, seizing a knife, suddenly rushed forward and stabbed the thief-taker in the throat?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Of course you all know that Jonathan Wild had as narrow an escape for his life as any man possibly could have, but he recovered."

"He did."

"Well, of course you know now what I am driving at. No man could possibly receive such a wound as that without carrying the marks of it to his grave."

"That's true enough."

"Then it is perfectly easy," said another, "for us to set our doubts at rest. All we have to do is to creep up to him gently as he lies there slumbering. If we can see the scar of a serious wound upon his throat, then I think we may safely conclude that what he has told us has been nothing but lies, and that he is really and truly Jonathan Wild, as we first of all suspected."

This did indeed seem a ready means of solving the difficulty.

Cautiously, two or three crept forward.

The two fugitives were lying down close to the furnace, slumbering heavily.

There could be no doubt about it. One glance was quite enough to show that in this, at least, the thief-taker and his companion were practising no dissimulation.

It was always Wild's practice to wear a very thick neckcloth wound many times round his throat.

He used to do this long before he received the fearful wound that Blueskin gave him.

It will no doubt be recollected that it was to this circumstance he owed his life; for, had his neck not been protected in such a manner, Blueskin would certainly have accomplished his intention of ridding the world of such a monster.

Ever since that time, Jonathan had worn a thicker neckcloth, and wound it round his neck more times than ever.

Perhaps, after his experience, he thought that it might be the means of saving his life a second time.

When the coiners stooped down over him, they saw how closely his neck was enveloped in the folds, and one glance was sufficient to show them that it would be necessary to remove the neckcloth before they could ascertain whether or not a scar existed.

This was a delicate operation.

The coiners were light-fingered, however, and most of them had, at some time or other, varied their present employment by picking pockets.

One of them held up his hand, and said, in a whisper:

"I will try if I can't manage this. I don't think I shall wake him."

"No, no," said the others, with a smile. "Nimble Ned can do it if anyone can."

"It's all right," said the one who had been called Nimble Ned. "Don't you make a noise, and I won't disturb him."

"I don't think you need be much frightened," said another. "He has drunk a tremendous amount of wine, and he seemed greatly fatigued. It wouldn't be a trifle that would rouse him from his slumber."

Nimble Ned made no other reply to this speech than to hold up his finger as a request for silence.

The demand was immediately complied with, and then he set to work about his task.

Jonathan was lying in a very awkward position for the accomplishment of his purpose, and Nimble Ned set about making him move in a very ingenious manner.

He tickled his neck with one hand.

Jonathan immediately made a restless movement.

Nimble Ned repeated the operation, and the same result followed.

Still the thief-taker did not lie conveniently for his purpose, so he ventured to tickle him once more.

This time the result was perfectly satisfactory, for Wild struck out with his arms, and finally rolled over on to his back, where he lay as still as death.

Nothing now remained to be done but to untie the neckcloth, which was a very simple operation indeed to the practised fingers of Nimble Ned.

The unwinding of it, however, from all its complicated convolutions was not so easy, and more than once he had to desist, for he feared the thief-taker would awake.

Presently, however, the last fold was removed.

Wild's neck was exposed.

Just at this instant, one of the coiners standing near, finding that the fire did not give out a sufficient quantity of light, stirred it vigorously.

A bright flame shot up, which revealed everything with what might be called painful distinctness.

"Look!" said Nimble Ned, in an energetic whisper—"look—there is the scar, and a dreadful one it is! Why, the place is not half healed as it ought to be! Look—there can be no doubt about it! Now we know who he is! There lies Jonathan Wild!"

What would have been done at this juncture is hard to say, had not something of an unexpected character occurred.

The thief-taker made a sudden movement and uttered a cry.

The coiners started back.

All were impressed with the idea that the thief-taker was about to awake.

Such was not the case, however.

Wild was dreaming one of his old dreams, which made slumber a hideous torment to him.

The manner in which he had been disturbed had probably had some effect upon his vision.

He seemed to be struggling desperately with some invisible foe, and indistinct, half-uttered words came from his lips.

Their first alarm having subsided, the coiners with the greatest curiosity listened, in the hope of being able to make out what was said.

Some words only met their ears.

"Noakes—Noakes!" Jonathan cried, in accents that could not be mistaken—"Noakes, you damned coward! why don't you come to my assistance? Help, help! Oh, curses!"

CHAPTER DXXXVI.

THE COINERS ARE DEFEATED IN THEIR LITTLE SCHEME FOR MAKING THE THIEF-TAKER PRISONER.

EVEN if the coiners had failed to discover the scar upon the neck of their strange guest, the unguarded words which came from his lips during his uneasy slumber would have gone far towards confirming their suspicions and establishing his identity.

Considered in connection with the discovery, however, they formed an irresistible proof.

The coiners did not proceed to take any immediate steps, although their doubts were completely dispelled.

Once more they all grouped together, and, with anxious countenances and bated breath, commenced a hurried whispered conversation.

"You see I was quite right," said the coiner who had expressed his doubts so strongly from the first. "All is confirmed!"

"Yes, yes! There is no doubt about that!"

"Yonder," he cried, "lie the forms of Jonathan Wild and Noakes, the ex-Governor of Newgate!"

"It is so!" cried Nimble Ned. "I would stake my life upon it; and what we have to do, is to decide upon the steps that will be best for us to take."

"That's a difficult matter," said the first, "and one that ought not to be decided upon too hastily."

"I think the quickest and best plan," said Nimble Ned, with a grin, "would be to slip a rope round both their necks and strangle them."

"It would be a good deed done," said another, approvingly.

"No," said the first, "we can do better than that."

"How?"

"By your proposal we shall reap no benefit by their death. Now, I propose to turn it to our advantage."

"Do you mean by surrendering them to the police?"

"Yes—why not?"

"It is dangerous!"

"Not if we are careful. If you are inclined to listen, mates, I will tell you what my idea is, and when I have done so, I think you will agree with me in concluding that this will be the best night's work we have done for a long time."

Eager and curious, the others clustered around him, and bade him proceed.

"Let us take advantage of their slumbers to bind them securely hand and foot with ropes, in such a manner that it will be totally impossible for them to shake a finger in their defence."

"And what then?"

"Patience, and you shall hear. When we have secured them in this manner, I should propose that we carry them to the police officers and claim the reward."

"That's a good idea," said another; "and moreover, I am much mistaken if they have not many valuable articles concealed about their persons, although they professed to empty their pockets before us."

"Very likely," said Nimble Ned; "but whether that is so or not, we have their horses."

"Yes," cried another, "and they are worth no trifle. They are a couple of as fine steeds as ever you would wish to see. I wonder where they got them from!"

"That is no concern of ours. But now, my comrades, I want to know whether you are agreeable that the plan I have proposed be carried out?"

"Quite—quite!"

"Come on, then,—let us proceed about it at once, for fear they should awake. It is not worth while to delay."

They nodded, and then stole on tiptoe closer to the spot where the fugitives lay.

Jonathan had moved slightly since they left him.

He still lay upon his back, with his limbs extended, but now one arm was raised in such a manner as to cast a shadow over his face.

The fact was, he had awoken.

His slumber, having been disturbed, and vexed moreover by a dream in which was enacted all that had lately happened, came to an end.

After he awoke, however, he lay quite still, for at first he was unable to remember precisely where he was or what had last happened.

This might partly be ascribed to the multitude of events which had recently befallen him, and partly to the immense quantity of wine he had drunk before he laid himself down by the side of his companion.

After gently opening his eyes, the first thing of which he became conscious was a low, murmuring sound.

He closed his eyes again, for he fancied he could then hear with greater plainness.

Of course this was only fancy.

The coiners had taken the precaution to get as far away as possible, and, as they conversed in tones not louder than a whisper, the thief-taker had to stretch his sense of hearing to the utmost degree.

The mere fact of their being thus collected together and speaking in whispers was more than sufficient to arouse all his suspicions.

It so happened, then, that he heard the proposition which had been made as to the manner in which he was to be disposed of.

Still he lay, showing no signs of being awake, though he did not intend to allow matters to proceed too far.

He had been artful enough to move his arm in the manner we have described, in order that they might not discover he was feigning sleep, as they might have done had the firelight poured full upon his features.

Now all was shadowy and indistinct.

Probably because they considered he was the most dangerous of the two and the most difficult to capture, Nimble Ned came towards Jonathan Wild with a stealthy step.

In his hand he held a nice piece of strong, thin rope, by the aid of which he hoped to make the villainous thief-taker securely captive.

For this purpose he stooped down, and was in the act of gently slipping the noose over Wild's head, when, with a shout, the thief-taker started up and clutched him by the throat.

"What are you at, you villain?" he cried.

Then, as he pretended to notice for the first time the threatening countenances of the coiners, he asked:

"After telling me I was welcome, would you murder me in my sleep?"

Strive how they would, the coiners could not shake off the fear which settled upon them as soon as over they found that Jonathan was awake.

His name had so long been such a dread to them that it was no wonder they should shrink from him with awe and apprehension.

Nimble Ned, who was perhaps as courageous as any of the band, dropped the rope and allowed his arms to hang listlessly by his side, not making the slightest attempt to free himself from the grip that Wild had taken upon his throat.

The thief-taker, however, released him quickly, and with the rapidity of thought drew his sword from its sheath.

At the same time that he did this, he kicked Noakes violently with his foot, as he exclaimed:

"Get up!—get up! Defend yourself, or you are a dead man!"

With a scream of terror, the Governor of Newgate sprang to his feet, as though suddenly set in motion by a galvanic shock.

As if by instinct, he drew his sword, and then, dizzy and bewildered, he glared about him, being at first quite unable to decide whether he was dead or alive.

Being in this state of doubt, it was strange to see how he shrank back from the glowing furnace.

Wild saw in a second what an impression he had made, and he hastened to deepen it.

With increased fierceness of tone and violence of gesture, he exclaimed:

"What is it you want? Will nothing satisfy you but my life? If so, come upon me all at once, and those who can may slay me! I don't fear you all, and should not were your numbers double what they are!"

The determined, resolute tone in which these words were uttered did not by any means tend to raise the courage of the coiners.

An attack upon Wild now that he was armed and fully on his guard was a different thing to creeping to him while he slept and binding him with cords.

Their minds were all filled at the same moment with the same regret, which was that they had not taken the opportunity afforded them of sheathing a knife in his heart.

"Speak!" said Wild. "What is it you require?—what is it you demand at my hands? Have I not acted fair and square and aboveboard with you?"

"You have not!" said one of the coiners. "We know you—you are Jonathan Wild!"

"And if I am," replied the thief-taker, ferociously, "you ought to know the consequences of making any attack upon me! You would have found that it would have answered your purpose well to have remained good friends with me. This place would have afforded me excellent concealment, and never fear that I should have failed to pay you liberally for the accommodation!"

Hearing these words, the coiners began to wonder whether, after all, they had not made a mistake.

To all of them came the conviction that it would have been their best policy to have temporised and kept friends with Jonathan Wild.

"That is at an end now," continued the thief-taker. "I regret it, and so will you. I have given up all my booty to you,—keep it; but I shall leave this place at once! I tell you again, I don't fear you, and care not what you may try to do!"

With some greater show of courage than they had yet displayed, the coiners placed themselves before the door communicating with the passage leading to the hut.

Wild no sooner perceived their menacing attitude than he laughed derisively.

"You know our secret," said one of the coiners, "and our secret is our life!"

Wild laughed again.

"After what has happened, you won't rest until you have had revenge! Don't deny it, for your character is too well known, and the wolf doesn't change his nature!"

"If you attempt to detain me, it will be at the peril of your lives! I will cut my way through the whole crew of you!"

The resolute, courageous bearing that Wild continued to maintain made a deeper and deeper effect upon the coiners.

In their own minds they did not doubt that he fully and entirely meant what he said.

It is true that if they mustered up their resolution they might have succeeded in overpowering him.

In this process some lives must inevitably be lost, while others would be placed in the greatest jeopardy; and though they all wished that Wild should be slain or made prisoner, they could not bring themselves to relish that job being achieved for the general good by the sacrifice of their own lives.

Thus it was, then, that Jonathan Wild was able to keep them at bay.

"Stand aside," he cried, "and let me pass in peace! I don't want to harm you needlessly, for I owe my life to having found a refuge in this place! Stand aside—let me pass, and we will ride far away from this spot, never to return to it again, nor breathe a single syllable respecting its existence! If you refuse, I will cut my path through you with my sword, and, upon gaining the open air, will do my worst! Decide quickly which you will do! I would not hesitate and dally with you thus were it not for my wounded comrade! Stand aside once more, and suffer us to depart!"

CHAPTER DXXXVII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS ATTACK JONATHAN WILD AND THE COINERS IN THE CAVERN.

THERE can be no question that Jonathan Wild fully expected that the coiners would stand aside from the door, and allow him to take his departure.

He was just felicitating himself upon the favourable turn affairs had taken and the prospect there was of making his escape.

Ere he was another moment older, however, he was forcibly reminded of the truth of the proverb which warns us not to "holloa till we are out of the wood."

He had seized his trembling companion by the arm, and had advanced a step.

The coiners wavered and seemed inclined to allow them to pass by, when, with a sudden and unexpected dash, the officers came against the door.

The utmost consternation now prevailed in the subterraneous apartment.

The coiners were frightened to death, for they knew that at length all was discovered.

Jonathan Wild even felt a momentary alarm, but, banishing the feeling, he looked all around him so as to be prepared for the worst.

As for Mr. Noakes, he trembled so excessively that he was in imminent danger of falling to the ground.

His teeth chattered, and his sword rattled in his grasp.

He was, however, in a much better bodily condition than could have been expected.

We have before stated that his wound was of a trifling character, and short as was the time that had elapsed since he had received it, and although he had lost such a fearful quantity of blood, yet, owing to the rest and the stimulants that he had taken in such large quantities, he was now in readiness to exert all his physical powers.

He was weak, yet scarcely any weaker than he was before he received his wound.

How long this new-found strength would last remains to be seen.

The coiners were so terrified that they ran hither and thither, from side to side, not knowing what to do.

They were paralysed by the unexpectedness of the attack.

Without scarcely any intermission, the officers renewed their assault upon the door, which gave away completely before them.

Just as it fell, the thief-taker noticed on the other side of the furnace a kind of thick curtain, which covered a space in the wall of the apartment.

By the mere instinct of desperation, Wild rushed towards it, dragging Mr. Noakes behind him.

Dashing the curtain on one side, he found himself in a low, rudely-arched passage, leading he knew not where.

The officers were taken by surprise on finding themselves in such a place, opposed to so many more persons than they had expected, and such being the case, they were much in the condition of the sportsman in the well-known fable, who knew not at which birds to take aim.

Recovering from their first shock of astonishment, however, they laid hold of all the persons they possibly could, and almost in the twinkling of an eye made the whole of the coiners prisoners.

It was this favourable diversion of the attention of his enemies that enabled Jonathan Wild to effect his retreat.

The chief officer, however, who was bent upon securing the thief-taker, happened to catch sight of his form as he disappeared behind the curtain.

Running in this direction, he, with one vigorous snatch, pulled it down from its supports, and then the opening in the wall was disclosed.

Uttering a loud cry, and calling to his men to follow him, the chief officer, sword in hand, plunged valiantly into the dark, narrow passage.

It so happened that no immediate attention was paid to his command, for there was no one of his men who was not busily employed.

Mr. Noakes was overpowered by the bewildering nature of these events.

It was only in a mechanical kind of way that he moved his legs and ran as Jonathan dragged him onwards.

"Quick!" cried the latter, in a suppressed voice. "Fortune is our friend, and if we are only speedy we shall yet manage to escape, although such a thing seems hopeless in the extreme! After me, I say! Why do you lag behind? If you falter, it is death!"

"But you must remember I am wounded—I am weak—I cannot run. This exertion is more than I can sustain!"

"Bah! That is nonsense! When a man knows that he is flying for his life, he can do things that seem utterly impossible! Follow me, I say!"

Mr. Noakes still faltered in his steps.

And no wonder. His brain was clouded and rendered heavy by wine, and spun round and round in a most confusing and agonising manner.

"Hark!" said Wild again. "Will not that put wings to your feet? Listen! We are pursued! Can you not hear footsteps behind us?"

The Governor listened, and responded with a groan.

The sound of rushing footsteps reached him plainly.

"On your speed depends your life!" said Wild, hissing the words fiercely between his teeth. "You must outrun the man who is behind us!"

"I cannot!"

Although he thus proclaimed his inability to make any more exertions, Jonathan Wild continued to drag his companion forward.

It was a frightful thing to run along a passage so dark, so narrow, and so low as that was, and without having the slightest knowledge regarding obstacles that might lie before them.

But impelled by the knowledge that he was flying for his life made Jonathan Wild think nothing of all this.

Suddenly, however, he was brought to a stop, and with a suddenness that was far from pleasant, for it shook almost all the breath out of his body.

He gasped painfully, and Mr. Noakes, closing his eyes, seemed about to fall into a swoon.

On came the footsteps with undiminished speed, and it was quite certain that in a few seconds, at the most, their pursuers would be upon them.

It was while endeavouring to fetch his breath that Wild became aware, by the sound, that only one man was in pursuit of him.

The moment he was sure of this fresh hopes sprang up in his mind.

Even yet he thought he should be able to escape.

With lightning-like rapidity he plunged his hand into the breast of his apparel and drew forth a pistol.

To put it on full-cock and fire along the passage in the direction in which the pursuer was coming, took him but a second.

The report was tremendous.

It was almost like firing down a tube: and the combustion of the gunpowder for a moment illuminated the passage as though by a sudden flash of lightning.

By the aid of that evanescent gleam, Jonathan beheld within a few paces of him the form of a man attired in the costume of a police officer.

It vanished like an apparition, and the darkness in the passage seemed doubly profound.

The last echoes of the shot mingled with an awful groan, as the officer fell headlong to the ground.

Jonathan did not pause, but turned round instantly. He knew that the report of the firearm, although productive of immediate good, would be the means of bringing all the other officers upon him.

Therefore it became imperatively necessary that he should ascertain whether the obstacle which had arrested his progress was insurmountable or not.

If it was, then he had only to stand there with his back against it, and sell his life as dearly as he could.

Not that he imagined that he was in such a desperate predicament as that.

He seemed to know that such a passage would not be created without an object, and almost instantly his hand encountered something cold.

It was a bolt.

With a cry of joy, which he could not repress, the thief-taker drew it from its socket, and then the way was clear before them, for the obstacle was nothing but a door.

Crossing the threshold, and dragging his companion after him, Wild closed the door, and felt about him for some fastening.

Guessing where the centre of the door would be, he stretched out his hand and felt the lock.

But the key was not in it, though he could tell that it was sticking in the other side, for he could feel the end projecting slightly from the upper part of the keyhole.

Despite the danger of doing so, he opened the door quickly and drew the key.

Precious moments, when he ought to have been flying from his foes, were consumed by this operation.

But Wild did not begrudge them.

He could hear his foes running at full speed along the passage.

But now it was in his power to place before them an obstacle which they would not easily break down.

With the quickness of desperation, then, he closed the door, thrust in the key, and locked it.

This done, he felt a far greater assurance of safety, and, catching his companion by the arm, he said:

"Once more all is well, and a little exertion will free us from our foes. I have fastened the door, and before they can break it down, we shall be far from this place. Can you not feel how the fresh air blows upon your face?"

There was a current of air blowing with full force down the passage, which contrasted rather remarkably with the close, pent-up vapour on the other side of the door.

"There's an opening not far off," cried Wild, in encouraging accents. "Come on! Summon up all the strength that you possess! Now is the time to make exertion! Your freedom depends upon yourself!"

Such words as these could not fail to make an impression upon anyone situated as Noakes was.

Had he been ten times as exhausted, ten times as terrified, that would have had the effect of causing him to put forth his greatest efforts.

Along the passage, then, they ran at a speed that was absolutely terrific.

Nevertheless, they had not gone many yards before they heard a succession of hard blows rain upon the door.

They threatened to demolish it if they continued much longer, though Wild had hopes, for when he closed the door, he noticed that it was of unusual weight and thickness.

And, moreover, they were stimulated at every step, for the air became fresher and fresher, and cooler, and they could smell the scent arising from wild flowers.

But the passage grew no higher, no wider, no lighter.

The pure cold air too, entering their lungs, improved the condition of their blood, and made them able to sustain their fatigue better.

Suddenly, they were again brought to a stop, and this time by the soft and yielding earth.

Mr. Noakes, whose strength was utterly spent, sank down in a huddled-up mass.

Jonathan, recovering himself as best he might, felt all around him with his hands.

Nothing but the cold, damp earth, however met his touch.

It was quite certain that the end of the passage had been reached.

How, then, was he to escape?

Whence did the fresh air come which streamed into the passage?

But for this circumstance, Wild would there and then have succumbed to his foes, but the wind still played upon his heated body, indicating plainly enough that there was an outlet somewhere close at hand.

He was terribly exhausted, and panted frightfully for breath.

For a second, or perhaps more, he stood quite inactive.

He was roused into life by a terrific crash.

The door was down.

Then came upon his ears once more the much-dreaded sound produced by the officers' footsteps, as they ran swiftly along.

A few moments at the most would inevitably bring them to where he stood.

This thought, so far from being productive of despair, inspired him with fresh vigour to finish that which he had so nearly accomplished.

He put his hand suddenly to his head, for he fancied it was there that he felt the cold air most.

He looked up, and saw above his head a small piece of clear blue sky, with one star faintly shining in it.

"Hurrah!" he cried, shaking his companion. "We are free at last! Look up—there is the blue sky! If we are quick, even now all may be well!"

Mr. Noakes had somewhat recovered, and, hoping that the end of this terrible adventure at last was reached, looked up.

When he too caught sight of that little piece of blue sky, his hopes rose.

It was really wonderful to see the startling effect that the sight of such a frequently-seen object gave him.

Feeling with his hands, the thief-taker immediately discovered a projection similar in every respect to those in the wall of the hut above, and by the aid of which the old man had ascended with so much agility and care.

Putting out his hand, he felt another.

With hasty words he explained to his companion the means by which the ascent might be accomplished, and, urged on by hope, Mr. Noakes resolved to climb.

With amazing alacrity Wild climbed up.

It was no more difficult than it would have been to mount a ladder.

Mr. Noakes followed bravely, though he could not keep pace with his more active and muscular companion.

At last Wild reached the top, and then what words could possibly express the astonishment he felt when he found he was in a tree of considerable elevation.

CHAPTER DXXXVII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS SUSTAIN A COMPLETE DEFEAT AT THE HANDS OF JONATHAN WILD.

By that good fortune which fell so often to his share, Jonathan Wild had luckily hit upon the secret mode of leaving the coiners' cave, which had been designed and perfected by them with great care, in order that they might avail themselves of it as a last resort if things took a desperate turn.

As their secret might be discovered at any moment, the necessity of having such a means of escape becomes manifest.

With extraordinary labour the passage had been hewn out of the solid earth.

The door was placed some distance within it, and was intended to be a means of baffling their foes in case they should track them so far.

Then the means by which they ascended from this passage to the surface of the earth was most ingeniously contrived.

That it should be discovered by anyone was scarcely possible, for the particular tree which they had made use of for this purpose had nothing suspicious in the look of it.

It may seem strange that Jonathan Wild should have availed himself of this secret passage before the coiners did so.

The reason of this, however, was that, although they considered it quite possible their retreat should be discovered, yet the coiners never anticipated being taken suddenly by surprise.

Their motive for having the old man in the hut above, was that he might be able to give them timely notice of the approach of any danger.

For instance, if the opening in the floor was likely to be found out, or even if enemies in any number came near the spot, it was the old man's duty to place his lips to one end of a tin tube which communicated directly with the cave below.

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES CONCEAL THEMSELVES IN THE RUINED BARN.]

That extremity of the tube which projected from the wall of the coiners' cave was so shaped that when anyone blew violently down the tube from above, a discordant screech or whistle was produced.

Had this warning been given on the present occasion to the coiners, the officers would not have been so fortunate as they really were.

The furnace would have been extinguished by an apparatus contrived especially for that purpose, and the whole gang would have hastened down the passage, and from thence gained the wood, where they would have dispersed, and then all hopes of capturing them would have been at an end.

That police officers should actually penetrate so far without their knowing anything about it, and that the first intimation they should receive should be a heavy concussion against the door, was a thought that never once entered their minds.

After the precautions they had taken, they believed that such a thing would be impossible.

Such being the state of affairs, it will be understood that the coiners were completely paralysed by astonishment and terror when the officers broke in upon them.

Of all their elaborate precautions Jonathan Wild knew nothing, and therefore was not so much surprised that the officers should suddenly appear.

Ever prompt in action when the moment of danger came, he had turned round, and readily availed himself of the only means of exit he could perceive.

When he gained the top of the tree, the thief-taker could not avoid resting a moment to admire the ingenuity of the whole contrivance, although his foes were so very close behind him.

He assisted Mr. Noakes, and the pair seated themselves upon two stout branches projecting from the trunk.

The circumference of this tree was considerable; but whether it had been made hollow by nature or not, was a difficult point to determine.

It was hollow, however, and that fact appeared to make no difference to the vitality of the tree itself, for several branches extended themselves from it, though they were not so well covered with foliage as trees in a natural condition.

Jonathan dashed the perspiration from his forehead as he said:

"Is not this brave, Noakes—is it not capital? I could never have given those coiners credit for so much ingenuity; and I don't believe that this place is of their own contrivance—I am rather inclined to think that they found it ready made."

"Let us descend!" said Noakes, glancing apprehensively about him, and panting for breath as he spoke. "If we are not quick we shall be overtaken, for the officers will be able to ascend the tree as easily as ourselves."

"Will they?" said Wild.

As he asked this question, there came over his face such a truly diabolical look that Mr. Noakes could not refrain from shuddering.

He averted his eyes.

"I don't think they will, Noakes," he continued. "I shall astonish them a little, I fancy! Jump down—be quick! I will sit here the while!"

This command was quite agreeable to Mr. Noakes.

Taking hold of the bough of the tree with his hands, he lowered himself until he hung the full length of his arms, and then dropped.

"Quick, you villain!" whispered Wild. "Do you see that piece of wood yonder—that portion of the trunk of a tree?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Roll it this way, then, and give it to me!"

"I cannot—I am not strong enough!"

"Try—for if you don't, I will shoot you on the spot!"

Either Mr. Noakes had underrated his strength or else this threat held out by his companion stimulated it, for he began to roll the piece of wood towards the hollow tree with very great expedition.

It was a heavy block, about three feet in length, and rather more than one foot in diameter.

It bore the appearance of being a piece of a tree that had been cut down by a woodman, and then sawn into fragments for the convenience of removal.

"What shall I do with this now?" asked Noakes, as soon as he had rolled the block of wood against the tree.

"Lift it up, and give it to me!" replied Wild.

This looked an impossible feat for the Governor of Newgate to accomplish.

Summoning up all his strength, however, he suddenly raised the huge block in the air, and held it above his head at arms'-length.

He trembled excessively while he did so, and seemed in imminent danger of allowing it to fall upon him.

Wild was in a very awkward position to take hold of this piece of wood; but, nevertheless, he managed to do so.

Nothing but the savage delight which the prospect of injuring the police officers gave him could possibly have endowed him with strength sufficient for this purpose.

His intention was pretty plain.

It was to hurl the heavy block of wood down upon his foes.

He was almost too late, however, and by the time he had got all in readiness one of the police officers was very near to the top of the hollow tree.

Wild just caught sight of this man's upturned face within a few inches of his own, and he uttered the most fearful yell that could be conceived.

The officer was not a little startled by it, and made a momentary pause in his ascent.

That pause was fatal to him.

Down, with a hideous crash, came the block of wood.

Wild flung it down with all the strength he could muster.

In the twinkling of an eye the officer disappeared.

It was impossible that he could withstand the force of such a heavy falling weight.

Indeed, the sharp edge of the wood struck him upon the head and killed him instantly.

In the fall he hurled the other officers down, who were following as closely as they could in his footsteps.

A most dismal succession of yells and screams came from the bottom of the tree.

Wild now was more like a demon than a man, and feeling that his vengeance was yet unglutted, he rapidly produced two pistols and fired them down upon the bruised and bleeding mass below.

Then he shrieked aloud with joy to think that at last he had been successful in so completely triumphing over his foes.

How long he would have remained in the tree giving vent to the exultation that swelled his bosom is hard to say.

He was only recalled to the sense of his position by the voice of his companion in crime.

"Come, Mr. Wild!" he cried, "let us fly! I am very weak and cannot run fast—let us embrace this opportunity to get away!"

There was a great deal of common sense in this proposition, and Wild saw it.

Now that the first flush of demoniac joy had passed away, the reaction came on with great rapidity.

The effects of all the exertion and fatigue he had lately undergone made themselves felt.

He was weak and nerveless.

After one more glance down the hollow tree, by which he assured himself that none of the officers were attempting to ascend, Jonathan dropped to the ground in the same manner as his companion.

"Where shall we go now, Mr. Wild—where shall we go?"

"Out of this wood, at any rate. We must then take a good look around us."

The Governor was evidently well pleased at the prospect of getting out of the wood, which, however pleasant and picturesque in appearance it might have been, would never possess any charms for him.

At a half walk, half trot, the two villains made their way through the trees.

The pace at which they went was one that they could keep up for a great length of time without experiencing much exhaustion, and which had the advantage of taking them over a considerable space of ground in a short time.

Mr. Noakes hung back, allowing his companion to take the lead.

At the first open space he came to, Jonathan looked up at the sky, and after having carefully noted the position of the stars, set forward again, with an appearance of great confidence, in a northerly direction.

"Do you see that star, Noakes?" he exclaimed, pointing to one that could be seen twinkling above the tree tops.

"Yes, I see it."

"Fix your eyes upon it, then, and don't remove them! That's the north pole star, and while that shines in our faces we shall be going in the direction I want to take."

Mr. Noakes attended to this injunction rather too closely, for in his anxiety not to lose sight of the star he did not remove his eyes from it.

Consequently, he missed seeing a rather large stone that lay before him in his path.

He stumbled over it, and fell with great violence to the ground.

Jonathan Wild uttered an oath when the crash reached his ears.

Upon ascertaining how it was that his companion had met with the mishap, he could not refrain from laughing aloud.

The Governor, however, failed to perceive anything amusing in the incident, for he had bruised and shaken himself severely.

With many piteous exclamations, he got upon his feet again, and once more they continued their way through the wood.

But in future Mr. Noakes, though he glanced up at the pole-star now and then, took good care to keep clear of any obstacles that might lie before his feet.

It was a few minutes after this that the palings forming the boundary of the wood were reached.

Mr. Noakes began to feel very tired, and repined bitterly about the loss of the horses.

With this loss Jonathan put up with more equanimity. "Hold your d—d row!" he cried, at length losing all patience as Mr. Noakes continued to pour forth his regrets—"hold your d—d row, I say! You ought to think yourself lucky that you have got off so well! Get over the palings, and take care of the nails on the top!"

The humane proprietor of the wood had caused the top of the fence surrounding it to be thickly studded with nails, so that it was no agreeable task that the two rascals had before them.

By being careful, however, they escaped receiving any serious injury.

They were now in a meadow of considerable extent.

Jonathan's course lay straight across it; but before he ventured to start, he paused for a few moments to listen.

Not a sound to indicate that the officers were in pursuit reached his attentive ear.

He chuckled with satisfaction, for now he made quite sure that their overthrow had been complete.

But as he listened, he heard the wind make a strange, sighing, moaning noise among the trees, the branches of which dashed against each other with a strange, unearthly sound.

"We shall have a storm before long!" he exclaimed, "and a severe one, too!"

This was no very pleasant tidings; but upon looking round, every indication of an approaching storm could be perceived.

The clouds had already piled themselves up to a great height; but during their passage through the wood it had been impossible to take notice of this circumstance.

"We are all right!" cried Wild. "I have done for the villains at last! I do think they have been trouble enough! Come on—follow me across this meadow; we shall have a ducking before we go much further!"

Mr. Noakes buttoned his coat tightly, and followed as rapidly as he could in the footsteps of his companion.

The force of the wind much increased, and the clouds swiftly moved until the whole firmament was completely covered.

The darkness, too, became profound, and, but for the fact that Wild's eyes had already become accustomed to the gloom, he would have been unable to see his way before him in the least degree.

In a little while he found it necessary to moderate his pace, so much darker did it become.

Then came one terrific flash of lightning, which lighted up with flitting brilliancy every object for miles round, imparting to all things a strange and supernatural appearance.

Then came the thunder, in a prolonged, rattling peal.

Before its reverberations died away the clouds seemed suddenly to open, for a perfect and continuous sheet of water poured down upon the earth.

CHAPTER DXXXVIII.

THE TWO FUGITIVES FIND THAT THE BARN IS BY NO MEANS A SAFE PLACE OF REFUGE.

JONATHAN WILD and Mr. Noakes were drenched through to the skin in a moment.

The latter still continued to give utterance to complaints as numerous as they were useless.

"Hold your row!" said Wild, angrily. "We cannot be any wetter than we are now; is there not some consolation in that?"

The Governor disdained to reply.

The lightning flashes now became more and more frequent, and the peals of thunder more terrific and continuous.

But in spite of the elementary war, Jonathan pushed onwards at the best speed he could make.

He was pleased, rather than otherwise, that the storm should have broken out, for he imagined it would serve to keep back his pursuers.

Nothing but this feeling would have enabled him to be proof against the terror he always felt at thunder and lightning.

The rain poured down incessantly, showing no signs of abatement.

At last, when they had got nearly two miles from the wood, Mr. Noakes, with a groan, declared that he could go no further.

Wild uttered a curse; but though he did so, he was not proof himself against the fatigue of which the other complained.

"You must go on," he cried, "until we can find some place of shelter! It will be ridiculous to stop here!"

"But we may go for miles across the country like this," returned Noakes, "without meeting with a single habitation."

"Wait till the next flash of lightning comes," cried the thief-taker, "and take the opportunity of looking round. Who knows?—we may find a place where we can shelter ourselves from the rain."

There was some hope in this, and the Governor waited for the next flash with much impatience.

At last it came.

It would almost seem that the brightest flash, and the one that endured longest, had been reserved for this occasion.

The blue glare lit up everything with so much brightness as almost to deprive them of the sense of sight.

Nevertheless, they managed to perceive in the distance the outlines of some rude building, but of what character they could not take upon themselves precisely to determine.

The lightning flickered over it for an instant, and then it vanished.

Wild took care to notice the position of this place, and turning his face towards it, he cried:

"Come on, Noakes! Let this place be what it will, we shall be saved from this torrent of water! I confess that I am tired!"

"I am ready to drop!" replied Noakes, dolefully. "If it was not for the prospect of resting soon, I should not be able to advance another step!"

Before they had traversed half the distance intervening between them and the building in question, another flash of lightning lit up the scene.

Again was the building brought suddenly into view, as if by the effect of some enchantment.

On this occasion, as they were nearer, and as they had some idea of what it was they were going to look at, the two villains saw it with much greater distinctness than before.

It was a large, irregular building of red brick, covered with a time-stained thatch.

"That's either a ruined farm-house or a barn," said Wild, when darkness once more prevailed. "Whichever it is does not much matter. It seems to me that it will answer every purpose we require."

They pushed forward rapidly, inspired by the hope of obtaining a speedy rest, and by the time the lightning flashed again they were close to the wall.

The door appeared a little to their left hand, so they groped their way in that direction.

When the door was reached they found that it was not secured in any way, but was hanging loosely on its hinges.

They hesitated a moment before crossing the threshold; but summoning up his courage, Jonathan led the way.

The interior of the building was very much darker than it was outside; in fact, it was impossible to distinguish anything, however near.

Without penetrating into the interior, they stood by the door, just so as to be sheltered from the rain.

The descending rain came with great violence upon the earth, rendering it almost an impossibility to hear even a loud sound.

For all that, Jonathan listened; but, to his satisfaction, he heard nothing of the police officers, and at last began to think that he had bailed them altogether.

"I believe we have done it this time, Noakes," he said, after a pause.

"Done what?"

"Got rid of the officers, of course."

"I hope so—it's quite time."

"Be thankful that you are yet at liberty," said Wild.

"I almost wish I was a prisoner," replied the Governor, gloomily.

"Bah—stuff!"

"I don't like this place."

"But you wanted to come to it."

"I know I did."

"Then, why don't you like it?"

"It is so dark."

Jonathan affected to laugh.

He was frightened at the darkness himself, though he did not like to confess it.

Had not such been the case, he would have penetrated further into the building.

"If you're frightened at the dark," he said, "I will try and make you a little easier in your mind. I don't think we need frighten ourselves about the officers now. Pull the door shut, and I will get a light."

"How?"

"Don't trouble yourself—I will show you; but shut the door first."

Mr. Noakes obeyed, and Jonathan poured a small quantity of gunpowder on to the floor.

Then, taking some paper from his pocket, he placed it on the powder, and poured some more on the top of it.

A spark produced by striking the flint of his pistol against the steel caused the gunpowder to explode.

The paper buried was alight, but the flame was so feeble that it threatened every moment to go out.

By care, Jonathan at last got it to burn fairly and brightly.

Close by, he caught sight of some straw, and he placed this over the flame.

A bright blaze was the result.

It endured for little more than a moment, but yet long enough to enable Wild and the Governor to look well around them, and ascertain the character of the place they were in.

Little more than four rough brick walls met their gaze upon which rested the clumsy contrivance upon which the thatch was laid.

The barn—for such it unquestionably was—bore a most deserted and melancholy aspect.

The bright light shining upon the brickwork showed that it was slimy and glittering with damp.

The beams which crossed and recrossed it were blackened by time, and it was evident that, for some reason or other, a long time had elapsed since it had last been visited.

Cheerless as all these indications would have been to most people, they had an exactly opposite effect upon the thief-taker.

It made him feel all the more confidence in the excellence of the hiding-place he had chosen.

All this he was enabled to see, and then the fire went out.

After the illumination the darkness seemed doubly profound, and both would have been much delighted if they could but have had a fire.

For many reasons, however, this was impossible, chiefly because the light would not fail to draw attention to the spot, and what they had to do was to try their best to avoid discovery.

"This is an old ruined barn," said Wild, turning to his companion.

"It's uncomfortable enough for one."

"Never mind that; I would prefer it any day to the most comfortable cell in all Newgate. It would not be wise to sleep; nevertheless, we can rest ourselves by lying down upon the ground, and if we keep near the door we shall have timely knowledge of the approach of any of our foes."

"I shall be glad enough to lie down," replied Mr. Noakes, and he immediately suited the action to the word.

"You can go to sleep if you like," said Wild; "slumber will do you good. I will keep awake and watch."

"Who could sleep in such a storm as this?"

"That's no affair of mine. I don't intend to try."

The thief-taker threw himself at full length upon the ground, as close as he could to the doorway without being soaked by the rain, which still continued to fall with unabated violence.

While the storm continued to rage as it did then, there was, in reality, little to fear from their foes, who, however ardent they might be to effect a capture, would naturally shrink from exposing themselves to the fury of the elements.

But Wild knew very well that the storm would soon be over.

At length the rain began to fall more gently, and the thunder to peal at longer intervals than before.

Gradually the sky cleared, and as the clouds were driven over to the windward a beautiful expanse of blue was disclosed.

The moon was at a considerable elevation, and as the air had been purified and cleared by the storm, her beams seemed ten times brighter than usual.

The door of the barn was partly open, and when the beautiful moon shone out in such splendour over the landscape an angry curse came from Jonathan's lips.

Moonlight was above all things what he least wished to see.

The country for miles round was beautifully lighted up, and from the doorway of the barn a most enchanting prospect was visible; but the thief-taker closed his eyes to all its beauties.

"I suppose I may expect the officers now!" he growled out. "And if I see them coming, what am I to do? If I attempt to quit this place I shall be seen, and if I remain I shall be discovered."

Wild's situation did indeed seem to be a dangerous one.

That the police officers would make their appearance was very probable.

Those who had not been injured would feel redoubled resentment against the fugitives, and so far from pursuing them from duty or the hope of obtaining the reward, they would now be actuated by the much stronger feeling of revenge.

Still, as he listened, the thief-taker was unable to catch a single alarming sound.

Hope began to take the ascendancy in his breast.

"I will go to the door and have one glance, just to satisfy myself that all's well," he said; "after that I shall be able to lie down in peace."

He rose as he spoke, and stood just within the threshold.

No sooner had he taken up this position than he stepped back.

"D—n their perseverance!" he exclaimed. "Somehow or other they have tracked me thus far! Look!"

There was no occasion for Jonathan to utter this injunction.

No sooner did he catch these alarming words, than the Governor hastened to his feet, and cautiously peeped out.

"It's as light as day!" was his first exclamation, uttered in a tone of despair.

"Of course it is. Can you see them?"

"Yes; and they seem to be coming in a straight line across the meadow to this barn."

"They are!"

"Have they tracked us?"

"It looks like it; and yet I can't think how they have managed to do so."

"Perhaps," suggested Mr. Noakes, "some vivid flash of lightning betrayed us when we were near this spot."

This was a very likely supposition indeed, and Wild's uneasiness increased.

As usual, Mr. Noakes turned to his companion for advice.

"Curse me if I know what we shall do!" replied the thief-taker. "I'm afraid the game's up at last!"

Mr. Noakes groaned.

"Don't make that dismal noise, you fool, but try to think of some way by which we can get out of this scrape!"

"I can't—I can't! It is better that we should resign ourselves to our fates at once! Surely any death is preferable to the life we have of late been leading!"

"I don't know that," said Wild. "I promise you that I shall not surrender until I am deprived of all hope and all chance of escape!"

"Are we not in that position now?" said Mr. Noakes, in a gloomy voice. "The officers have only one hedge to cross and then they are in the very meadow in which this barn is built. We cannot quit the place unseen, and if we remain we shall be found, for there is no place where we can hide!"

"I don't know that," said Wild. "Whereabouts are the officers now?"

He returned to the door as he spoke.

His enemies he saw at a glance were alarmingly close at hand.

"We have no chance whatever, except that of hiding ourselves."

"But there is no place—this barn is like a shell!"

"That's the worst of it; nevertheless, good or bad, we must find a hiding-place of some sort. We shall have to make haste about it, too!"

"This useless to think of hiding," said Mr. Noakes; "the officers are coming direct to the barn! You may depend that they already know for certain we are here."

"That remains to be seen. The worst hiding-place is better than none."

Although he spoke thus about concealing himself, Jonathan Wild at the time had not the remotest notion as to how it was to be done.

Now that the sky had cleared, and the moon was shining with so much brightness, Jonathan Wild, whose eyes were quite accustomed to the darkness, was able to make out the rude outlines of the interior of the barn.

Glancing upwards, he could just discern the heavy wooden beams of which we have already spoken.

"We might hide up there," he thought. "Who can tell? We might find a place where the woodwork will conceal us from the view of anyone below. All depends whether the officers know for certain that we are here. Even if they do, we shall be better off up there, and we shall have the advantage."

"Prepare to give up," said Noakes—"they are close by now!"

"Hush!" cried the thief-taker—"they will hear you speak! Come this way—I have found a hiding-place at last!"

The blood returned to the Governor's heart as he heard these words, and he hastened to stand by his companion's side, for he was all anxiety and impatience to ascertain the nature of the hiding-place.

"Where is it, Mr. Wild—where is it?" he asked.

"There!" was the reply. "Look up—do you see those beams?"

"Yes."

"Then, I think we may conceal ourselves among them; at any rate, I am going to try. Help me to get up, and then I'll bend down and assist you to follow me."

"It is no good, Mr. Wild—it is no good! You might just as well save your pains!"

CHAPTER DXXXIX.

TO THE CONSTERNATION OF JONATHAN WILD, TWO POLICE OFFICERS ARE LEFT TO KEEP WATCH OVER THE DEAD BODY IN THE RUINED BARN.

"You are a cowardly fool, Noakes!" was the reply. "Place yourself under my orders, and do as I tell you, and all will be well!"

"I always do."

"And do you not find it to your benefit? Now help me up! There, that will do!"

By the aid of his companion, Jonathan succeeded in catching hold of one of the cross-beams.

The grasp with his hands was all that he required. By the exertion of considerable strength and agility, he swung himself astride the beam.

Then, bending down, he lowered one hand, and assisted his companion to place himself by his side.

Very dimly Jonathan could see about him.

Creeping along the beam, he made his way to the place where it rested upon the wall.

Here he stopped, and felt about him for a moment with his hands.

"Hush, Noakes!" he cried—"not a word, for your life! I have found a hiding-place at last!"

"Where?"

"Here—just between the thatch and the wall! If we squeeze ourselves closely against the straw, we shall be perfectly invisible to those below."

"But they know we are here, and will search till they find us."

"How can you be sure of that? Come, conceal yourself as I direct! It is necessary for my own safety that you should do so."

To speak the honest truth, Mr. Noakes did not require much urging to follow the injunctions of his companion.

The top of the wall was of considerable width—at least, it was sufficient to allow a man to lie down at full length, and by pressing close against the thatch in the manner Wild had mentioned, it would be quite possible to remain invisible to any persons below.

To be sure, in the daylight they might have been detected, but it must be remembered that it was now night, and that, in spite of the moonbeams, the interior of the barn was very dark.

Wild and Noakes had only just time to dispose of themselves in this manner when the trampling of feet and the sound of voices reached them distinctly.

The police continued to make for the barn in a direct line, and in less than a moment now they reached the door.

"A light!" said a voice—"we must have a light!"

A cold sweat broke out all over the Governor's body when he heard these words.

A dark lantern was lighted, and then the same voice that had spoken before cried:

"Look sharp, my men! If they are here we shall have them. Two of you remain at this door, and cut them down if they attempt to escape!"

Two officers were posted outside the door of the barn, while the remainder entered.

"This place seems quite empty!" exclaimed the one who carried the lantern, as he waved the light about him. "There's certainly no one here!"

This was the conviction of all present, for the light of the lantern only revealed the bare brick walls.

"They cannot be hiding here—that's certain! Ah! what's that?"

The officer who spoke pointed to a heap of rubbish in one corner.

"Bring the light, and let us see."

The light was brought, but it showed nothing more than that in one corner of the building was an accumulation of rubbish of every imaginable description.

"They may be hidden in that," said one.

"We will soon find out if they are," said the one who issued the instructions.

Speaking these words, he plunged his sword several times into the heap, but without producing any result.

"They are not there," he said; "and yet, take the light. Does not that look like a piece of cloth?"

The officer pointed to something that was sticking up from the heap.

"It is not cloth, sir," said the one with the lantern.

"What is it, then?"

"It looks to me like a part of a shawl, or something of that kind."

The curiosity of the officers was immediately excited by this circumstance, and they all gathered themselves round the mass of rubbish.

Every little discovery, no matter how trifling and unimportant it seemed, might lead to important results.

The fragment of apparel was dragged forth and examined more closely by the aid of the lantern.

"It is a piece of a shawl—that is quite certain," said the officer; "and it's new, too. It has not been among that rubbish very long. Pull the heap to pieces. We may find something now well worth our trouble."

By means of their swords, the police officers easily demolished the heap of rubbish by scattering it about the floor of the barn.

"Hallo!" cried one suddenly, in a voice that showed he was considerably startled. "Why, here's somebody's head!"

A beam of light was at once directed upon this object, and then it became evident that the officer had spoken the truth.

Lying upon the top of the rubbish that remained was a human head.

The hair, which was long and flowing, was matted together with blood, and indeed presented so horrible an appearance that we are unable to describe it.

Familiar as they were with terrible sights, the officers were quite appalled by this unlooked-for discovery.

Before them was the ghastly, indubitable evidence of the perpetration of a foul murder.

"Don't stand stock-still like that!" cried the officer assuming an anger which he did not feel, in order that he might thereby conceal his own discomfiture—"don't stand stock-still like that, I say!"

"There's been murder done here, sir!" said one.

"It looks like it. Remove the head carefully, and then search further among the rubbish."

This was a task that the officers did not seem to relish at all.

Not one ventured to move, but occupied themselves in glancing at their commander.

"Do you hear my orders?" he cried. "You, Johnson, move the head, and take charge of it."

It appeared that Johnson was the name of the officer who happened to stand nearest.

He did not dare to disobey the commands of his superior, though he would gladly have done so.

Advancing a couple of paces, he gently moved the repulsive-looking object, and as he did so, he said:

"It's a woman's head!"

"What does it matter whether it's a man's head or a woman's? You seem all of you to be as frightened as though you were children. Turn the heap over, I say!"

This was done without any more ado, and in less than a moment the trunk was found.

It bore no marks of mutilation, and, so far as could be seen at present, death seemed to have resulted from the severance of the head from the body.

There was every indication, too, that the unnatural deed had been committed recently.

"It's a murder, safe enough!" said the chief officer. "I didn't think to make such a discovery as this when I entered the place; but certainly it seems just suited to the commission of such a crime."

To this all agreed, and such was the intense interest excited by the affair that, for a little while, they were forgetful of the object which had brought them there at all.

The one in command was the first to recollect himself, and he said:

"We have made discoveries enough for the present. Let the rest be until daylight—to-morrow. By searching carefully about, we shall probably find something that will enable us to identify the murderer."

"What shall we do next, sir?" asked one. "It seems pretty certain that those we are in search of have not taken up their quarters here."

"Assuredly they would not do so," was the reply, "if they had any idea of this. Have you searched well about?"

"Yes, sir; but it is so confoundingly dark, and the place is full of odd nooks and corners."

"Well, some one must remain here and watch the body, so as to prevent anything being disturbed, while we will go on with our search."

For this announcement the police officers were quite prepared, since it was part of the usual routine of duty.

But if the task of simply moving the head was so disagreeable to them, how much more so must be the prospect of sitting during the remainder of the night keeping watch over the murdered remains.

They all looked in each other's faces doubtfully, each hoping in his heart that he should not be chosen for the duty.

The one in command perceived the irresolution, and knew the cause of it, so he at once proceeded to put an end to the affair.

"You, Johnson," he said, "since you have already removed the head, had better remain on guard. You understand what you are to do?"

Johnson was silent.

"You will stay here," continued the officer, in a louder tone of voice, "and see that no one touches this body or anything in the barn. In the morning you shall be relieved."

Johnson looked sullen and unwilling enough, but he was obliged to submit.

The others then moved off, in order to search the barn more thoroughly than they had yet done.

Somehow or other they did not seem very well disposed for this service. Perhaps they shrank from exploring the gloomy recesses of the building from the fear that they might make some other unpleasant discovery when they least expected it.

They searched all round the walls, and directed the beams of the lantern up among the timber supporting the roof, but they failed to catch sight of Wild and Mr. Noakes in their capital hiding-place.

"It is perfectly certain that they are not here," said the commanding officer at length, in a tone of decision. "We must look further afield."

"Are you going to leave me here by myself, sir?" asked Johnson, seeing that they were about to depart.

"You are not afraid, are you?"

"Well, no, sir—not exactly that. Nobody could say that of me."

"What do you want, then?"

"Shall you not leave me with a light?"

"You have your own lantern, have you not, and the means about you of igniting it?"

Johnson was confused and silent, for in the alarm he felt he forgot all about having a lantern.

"I have got my own lantern, sir, of course, only I didn't know whether it was agreeable to you, sir, or not for me to light it."

"Oh yes—you can light it! You can make a fire, if you like, or do anything else in reason, only you must not move that body, or allow anyone else to touch it even."

"Very good, sir! I know my duty, and I will try to do my best to perform it properly."

"That's right! Good night!"

"But, sir—"

"What now?"

"I take it very hard to be kept here all by myself in this place, for of course I am done out of all chance of obtaining my share of the reward."

"I can't help that. Somebody must stay."

"I know that."

"Very well, then, and we may not catch Jonathan Wild after all."

Johnson did not say so, but he fervently wished that they might not.

"Don't be a fool, Johnson!" said the officer; "and mind that you keep things perfectly right; if you don't you will find yourself in trouble."

"I would much rather have a witness that all's straightforward and proper on my part."

"I can trust to you."

"But then I think it is not right to put one man to a duty of this sort."

"Well, if you are frightened, Johnson, some one shall stay with you."

Up to that minute Johnson's companions had been enjoying their comrade's position immensely, and congratulating themselves that they had been so fortunate as not to be chosen.

Now their countenances changed.

The officer glanced at them, and fixed his eyes on the one who seemed least desirous to stop.

He determined to make him, not only for the mere fun of the thing, but because he only wanted to have with him in his expedition after Wild and Noakes courageous, well-trying men.

"Baker!" he cried.

"Y—yes, sir!"

"You will stop with Johnson and bear him company till morning. Go on with you!"

Baker had not heart to attempt to make any remonstrances, but sulkily obeyed.

Finding that some one was about to share his solitude made a wonderful difference to Johnson.

He brightened up exceedingly, and lighted his lantern.

The other officers then moved off once more, in the hope of being able once more to get upon the track of the notorious thief-taker.

As it was quite impossible for them to do this, there could be little or no interest in detailing their proceedings, and so we will confine ourselves with what took place in the barn.

Johnson sat himself down on the ground with his back to the body, and placed the lantern close by his side, with the door open, so that the beams might be diffused over as large a space as possible.

"Come on, Baker, old fellow!" he said. "Sit down! Let us make ourselves as comfortable as we can! It's no good being miserable! Come along, old boy, and sit down!"

"You be d—d!" growled Baker.

"Now, don't make things unpleasant!" continued Johnson. "Why don't you resign yourself to circumstances, like I do? I always make up my mind to be as comfortable as I can!"

"It's d—d easy for you to talk like that, you cowardly sneak!" rejoined Baker. "You are all right now, of course. You were frightened to stop by yourself, and now you've got somebody with you you don't care!"

"It's the way of the world!" said Johnson, philosophically. "It's no good being ill-tempered. I might just as well be one to grumble and growl myself, but I don't."

"Well, I ain't going to make matters pleasant with you—that's flat! for I'm blowed if I should like to sit with my back to a dead body like you are! How do you know but what it might come to life again, or something?"

"Pooh—pooh! Baker, you are a fool! What harm can there be in sitting with your back to it? It's better than your face; and how could anybody come to life again after their head was off?—just answer me that!"

Although he spoke thus, Mr. Johnson took care to change his position, so that his side was turned to the corpse.

"Oh, it's no concern of mine," growled Baker, pacing up and down. "I only said what I shouldn't like to do. If there's one thing I do hate, it's dead bodies!"

"So do I."

"Give me a live man or a live woman," said Baker, "and I don't care a pin's head; but when it comes to bones and meat it's horrid, and I can't stand it!"

"Don't talk in that awful way!" ejaculated Johnson, in a trembling voice. "It's enough to make anybody's flesh crawl up and down on their bones!"

"You be d—d!" retorted Baker. "You got me here, and I shall say what the devil I like!"

CHAPTER DXL.

RELATES THE EXTRAORDINARY EVENTS WHICH TOOK PLACE IN THE RUINED BARN.

BAKER uttered these words in a tone of voice that plainly enough implied that he had made up his mind to say as many disagreeable things as he possibly could.

Johnson, however, having effected his purpose, exerted himself to get his companion in a better humour.

"Now, I say, Baker," he cried, "don't make things so disagreeable. You're in for it!"

"Yes—thanks to you!"

"We have been good friends hitherto," continued Johnson, "and I hope that this little affair won't make any difference to the good feeling between us."

"Oh, hold your d—d row!" exclaimed Baker, still unappeased, and striding up and down as he spoke.

"But won't it be pleasanter to talk than be silent?" asked Johnson.

"What can we talk about, I should like to know? You must be uncommonly fond of cold meat to keep so close to it as you do!"

"Don't—don't!" cried Johnson. "Keep your mouth shut if you can't say anything else but that!"

"I will be even with you for this!" said Baker. "I will wait my time, and I will have you!"

"That isn't right of you."

"Yes, it is. Who the devil would like such a job as this?"

"I don't like it."

"But you might have put up with it, and not insist upon my losing my share of the reward."

"It isn't right of you to blame me. I didn't pick you out, Baker. I didn't say, 'Can Baker stop with me?' How could I help your being chosen? It might just as well have been some one else."

"And a d—d deal better, I should think!"

"I have got as much cause to grumble as you have, Baker. Come here, Baker, old fellow, and sit down, and let us make an end of our differences!"

"Shan't!"

Johnson uttered a sigh, and began fumbling about in his coat pocket in rather a furious manner.

He was evidently trying to pull something out of a pocket in the skirts of his coat, which fitted very tightly.

The light of the lamp shining upon this object as he tugged away to get at it showed that it was a brown stone bottle with a cork in it.

From the exertion required to pull this bottle out, it was evident that much difficulty must have been found in thrusting it into it.

Having nothing better to do, Baker, while pacing up and down, occasionally gave a glance at his companion, to see what he was about, and presently he became interested—so much so, that his countenance began to assume quite a mollified expression.

A grin of satisfaction announced the completion of Johnson's efforts to pull the bottle out of his pocket.

From its size, it was capable of containing considerably more than a quart, and Baker, as he glanced at it—though he pretended not to do so—considered it delightfully suggestive of spirits.

"It's a jolly cold night, Baker!" said Johnson, moving away from the dead body.

"I don't know whether I have got any feet in my shoes or not!" was Baker's expressive reply.

"Ah! it is cold; and the worst of it is my clothes ain't half dry, although we did take shelter from the rain! How are you off in that respect, Baker?"

"Oh, don't bother!"

"Very well—just as you like! Keep up being disagreeable if you prefer it! Perhaps, though, just for curiosity sake, you'd like to know what I was going to say, wouldn't you?"

Baker uttered a growl, and left Johnson to interpret it either as an affirmative or as a negative, whichever he thought proper.

"I was going to say, then, Baker, that if you were as badly off from the wet and cold, and one uncomfortable thing and another, as I am, I'd ask you to have a pull at this bottle of old Jamaiky—it's prime, it is! Talk about fires! why, what's the good of a fire to keep you warm, I should like to know, when you happen to have a bottle of old Jamaiky like this to swig at? I look towards you, Baker—here's your very good health!" whereupon Johnson put the stone bottle to his lips.

A gurgling sound followed, which made his companion's mouth water.

"Oh, my eyes!" said Johnson, at length removing the bottle and smacking his lips—"that's the sort of stuff, and no gammon! Why, dear me, I feel all over as warm as a toast!"

Baker made no reply.

He waited with the hope that his companion would renew his invitation.

He was too proud to give way and ask, but he resolved not to refuse a second time.

"You do look miserable, Baker, and that's a fact!" exclaimed Johnson, after a lengthy pause. "I can't bear to see you so down in the mouth and so wretched, while I feel so uncommonly jolly. Now, just try a drop o' this, will you?—it's prime."

"Well, I don't mind if I do," said Baker, with assumed reluctance. "I must resign myself to stopping here, I suppose. I don't see why I should turn up my nose at a drop of good rum."

"Them's my sentiments to a hair!" exclaimed Johnson, emphatically.

Without more ado, Baker seated himself by the side of his companion, and took the stone bottle from his hands.

"You always were a good sort of a fellow, Johnson, and many's the time I said it! I said some hard things a little while back—but forget and forgive, you know!"

"Exactly! Take a good pull—don't be afraid!"

"I won't. Here's to your good health, Johnson, old boy, and here's hopin' that somebody else'll relieve us before long!"

"Hear, hear!"

Baker placed the bottle to his lips, and allowed the fiery contents to trickle down his throat.

Before he had half satisfied himself, or, as he afterwards expressed himself, before he had well got the taste in his mouth, the profound silence that prevailed in the barn whenever the two officers ceased speaking was broken by a low, deep groan of a most unearthly character.

Where it came from was hard to say.

It seemed to fill the whole interior of the building, and then to die away with a dismal cadence.

During the continuance of this horrible sound, the two officers sat still and rigid as though changed to stone.

Baker still held the bottle to his lips; but he could not swallow, and the spirit trickled down his neck.

As soon as the groan died away, he started up with a loud yell issuing from his lips.

In his confusion and terror he dropped the bottle, which falling on the hard floor of the barn, was immediately broken into fragments, and the precious liquor was completely lost.

Johnson, too, sprang to his feet, but he was so frightened that his legs refused to sustain his weight, so down he went again at full length on his face.

In his fall he overturned the lantern, which, rolling away for a yard or two, became extinguished.

A most profound darkness now reigned in the barn.

Baker, although trembling all over, managed to stand.

But another groan, of a character similar to the first, only rendered ten times more horrible by the darkness, came upon his ears.

The partially-closed door was not far off, and he made a desperate rush towards it, in the hope of getting clear of the building.

But he caught his foot with great violence against the prostrate form of his companion, and down he went with a crash.

He was so terrified that he could not tell what it was he had tumbled over—he only knew that it was something soft.

The next thought that occurred to him was that it was the headless body; and while this horrible idea completely filled his mind, he felt himself suddenly seized with a dreadful clutch.

That it might be his companion never once occurred to him.

But instead, he made sure it was the headless body of the murdered woman which had seized him.

Surely if any thought was enough to drive him into madness that one was, and he struggled and fought like a maniac.

But the more he struggled, the tighter the grasp seemed to be. Endowed with terror with twice his usual strength, Baker still got closer to the door, dragging after him what he was firmly persuaded was the dead body.

At length he got near enough to the door to be within the sphere of the moon's rays, which still continued to pour down upon the earth with undiminished brightness.

So terrified was he, however, and so convinced that his horrible surmise was correct, that he did not dare turn his eyes in the direction of the object he was dragging after him.

The next moment, however, and when his alarm had reached its highest pitch, he heard a voice say:

"Oh, Baker—Baker, is that you?"

The voice was close at hand, and, of course, in a moment he recognised it as that of his companion, Johnson.

This encouraged him to turn round, and then the first glance showed him how needlessly he had terrified himself.

It was his companion who was clinging to him in such a frantic manner, and not the dead body.

The reaction came at once.

"Let go, you d—d fool!" he roared. "What the devil did you lay hold of me in that way for?"

As Johnson neglected immediately to comply with this demand, Baker raised his foot, and gave his companion a sharp kick.

With a cry of pain, Johnson released his hold, and Baker bounded out into the moonlight like a shot.

Grimacing now with pain as well as terror, Johnson followed him with all the speed he was able to make.

The cold night air revived both considerably, and, after a moment's reflection, Baker came to the conclusion that the groan he had heard had been uttered by Johnson with the view of terrifying him.

What led him to this supposition probably was the fact of his having found his companion clinging to him.

Throwing off his terror in a moment, Baker turned round and said:

"What an ass you must be to play me such a trick as that!"

"Trick as what?" asked Johnson.

"You know d—d well what trick I mean! However, you have not got off quite so easily as you perhaps thought you should! I rather think the bottle's broke, or if it ain't, all the rum's run out by this time, and how do you feel after that little salute with my boot, eh? Don't you think you deserve it?"

"I think you're a d—d fool," retorted Johnson, "and don't know what you're talking about! What did you want to make that hideous row for, while we were drinking? I thought it was a groan!"

This attempt to put the blame on his shoulders made Baker in a furious passion.

"You'll find it won't do to play tricks with me, Mr. Johnson. I know you're fond of a practical joke, but you should be careful who you try them on with!"

"What are you talking about?"

"You know what I'm talking about. Why couldn't you let me drink my drop in peace, after I'd agreed to forgive you for your last scurvy trick, eh?"

"How did I hinder you?"

"Why, by groaning in the way you did."

"I didn't!"

"Now, don't deny it. I've two minds now to pull off my coat and slip into you, and I'll do it, too, if you say you didn't groan again!"

"Well, but, Baker, do listen to reason!"

"Reason be d—d!"

"Then, of course, I'd better shut up. I wonder where my lantern is gone!"

"You'd better go and look. I'm not going to trouble about you any further, that's flat! I'm off at all risks, and you can mind the barn now by yourself!"

"No—no, Baker, don't go—pray don't go!" said Johnson, appealingly. "Don't go and leave me here all by myself!"

"I tell you I shall! When you get a good companion you don't know how to treat him, so I'm off, I tell you!"

"But think of the consequences!"

"Oh! d—n the consequences!"

With these words, Baker struck the top of his hat a heavy blow, in order to fix it more firmly on his head, and with such good effect that the brim came quite down to the bridge of his nose.

Then, in spite of the remonstrances of his companion, away he went across the meadow as fast as ever his legs could carry him.

Johnson shouted after him until he was hoarse, and then he felt more than half inclined to follow his example.

But he could not forget that he had been left there upon a serious business, and he knew that if anything happened to the dead body, he would be held responsible.

Nor was he inclined to be heedless of all future consequences, for he had been in the service for a length of time, and was looking forward to promotion, while Baker was comparatively a new hand.

Therefore, in a state of mind which cannot by any possibility be conceived, Johnson remained outside the barn, gesticulating in such a manner that had he been seen by anyone he would have been taken for a madman.

"I will keep watch," at last he muttered, with chattering teeth. "It shall never be said that Johnson forgot his duty and deserted his post! I will watch, but it shall be outside. Oh, if morning would only come, how glad I should be! And what a d—d fool Baker must have been to have dropped the bottle! All the Jamaiky's gone, I'll wager my life! Oh, if I only had a little drop! I do think I could manage it!"

CHAPTER DXLI.

IN WHICH THE OFFICERS SUCCEED IN EFFECTING A CAPTURE.

JOHNSON glanced uneasily about him, but, true to his determination, stood close to the door of the barn.

But the rum kept making a deeper and deeper impression on his mind the more he thought of it, and at last to such a pitch did it carry him that he murmured aloud:

"If—if I could only go in now and see! Maybe there really is a little drop left—there might be; and if it was a spoonful, how I should enjoy it, to be sure! I never thought that old Jamaiky was half so good, and to think that I should have lost a whole quart of it, after only taking one sip myself! Oh, d—n Baker! I wish he'd never ha' stopped!"

The officer, was silent again, but not for long.

He could not banish the thought of the rum from his mind, and every moment he felt more and more tempted to run the risk of entering the barn again.

"I wonder what that groan was, now?" he asked himself. "Perhaps it was only Baker trying to frighten me; but then I can't bear a dead body. And yet, how could a woman groan after her head was off? It must ha' been Baker. Anyhow, whether it was him or whether it wasn't, I'd ha' gone in if I'd only had my lantern with me. D—n Baker! He's not only spilt my rum, but put my lantern out as well, and kicked it nobody knows where!"

[JONATHAN WILD IS ATTACKED BY THE TRAVELLER.]

Johnson shook his head, and came to the conclusion that he was a deeply-grieved person indeed, and that Baker was neither more nor less than an atrocious monster.

"It seems quiet enough," he ejaculated, at length. "I don't hear any groans now. I do believe it was Baker! I'd go in now without the lantern, if I could only make sure there was ever such a little drop of old Jamaiky left,—d—d if I wouldn't!"

It would have been a very aggravating thing for the officer to have made his way back into the ruined barn again, and then been unable to find a single drop of rum to reward him for his trouble; but his only chance was to go in and take the risk.

No. 115.—BLUESKIN.

This was what he evidently wished to do, and a fresh thought occurring to his mind, made him resolve upon it.

"If I could only have one drop of that dear old Jamaiky, I wouldn't care! It 'ould make me so comfortable that I could stop here all night, and then, when they came here in the morning, and found me all by myself, wouldn't Baker be in for it?—and shouldn't I be able to crow over him? Rather! Oh, I should, there's no mistake about that! Why, it will be almost as refreshing as a drop of the old Jamaiky!"

Johnson rubbed his hands together, and, as his terror was rapidly subsiding, he really felt quite pleased.

"Oh lord!" he said—"I can picture them all now! Of course, they'll come in the morning. It will be light then, and I shall be sitting down in the barn—for I don't care for dead bodies by daylight—and they'll come in, and I shall get up, and they'll say, 'Is it all right, Johnson—no disturbance?' 'All right, sir,' I shall say—'everything's here just as you left it.' And then they'll look round, and they'll say, 'Where's Baker?' Then won't I try if I can put him in for a good thing? What shall I say? I think the first thing I'll say will be that he was frightened to stop, and ran away. I shall turn that matter over in my mind. Perhaps I shall think of an answer by morning, and when they find Baker, won't he look more like a fool than ever he did in his life before?"

Johnson rubbed his hands more briskly, and his whole countenance shone with anticipated delight to be derived from Baker's discomfiture.

"If I'd only got a drop of that Jamaiky to start with," he said, "I would make sure of promotion then. And as for Baker, he'd be nowhere! If I'd got a drop of Jamaiky, d—n me if I wouldn't go in the barn again, and sit down where I was before, and keep watch! I'd try to find the lantern; and if I couldn't, why, d—n me, I'd sit down in the dark!"

Higher and higher rose Johnson's valour, but still he had not yet reached the point required to make him enter the barn.

In order to screw up his courage, he had to go through several processes.

First of all, he blew his nose in a very defiant and trumpet-like manner.

Then he fixed his hat firmly on his head, and buttoned his coat up close to the throat.

All these were intended to be outward and visible signs of the amount of determination within.

"Now I will go," he said. "My old grandmother always said that, let things happen how they would, they always turned out for the best in the end. It's mighty hard to see it sometimes, but I believe in it now, and I shall always say the same thing myself. Now, who would have guessed the consequences? I shall be able to make sure of getting that promotion which I have been working hard for for the last fifteen years. To-morrow will see me a happy man. Here goes to keep watch, and now I feel that I don't care a d—n whether I can find the lantern or have a drop of old Jamaiky or not—no, I don't, but I'd rather. However, here goes!"

All this time, Johnson had kept his back to the door of the barn, close to which he stood.

But as he uttered these last words, he turned round very suddenly upon his heels, in order that his courage should not have time to evaporate.

He was about to make a speedy rush into the barn, possibly for the self-same reason, when all at once he stopped, and an unearthly, gasping shriek came from his throat.

His eyeballs glared, and his hair fairly stood on end, notwithstanding the tightness with which he had fixed his hat on his head.

During the time he was giving utterance to the shriek, he stood fixed and immovable close to the threshold of the barn door, in an attitude of the utmost fright.

But as soon as the sound ceased, he turned round and darted away with the speed of a hunted hare, although his knees knocked together in a manner that threatened every moment to bring him to the ground.

A horrible sight had met his eyes when he was about to rush into the barn.

Standing just on the other side of the threshold, and fully revealed by the rays of the moon, which shone upon it with a ghastly and hideous glare, was the body of the woman that he had been appointed to watch over.

It had a horribly lifelike appearance, and it seemed as though the headless trunk was about to rush forth and seize him, while at the same time another low, unearthly groan, similar in cadence to that which had so startled and frightened himself and his companion, came again upon his ears.

Who can wonder that, coming thus upon such an unexpected and frightful sight, the officer should first have been terrified by fear, and then have darted away from the spot as though pursued by a legion of demons?

He was perfectly blind to everything in his path, and rushed on at random.

Coming to a ditch, he fell into it, and was in an instant covered with mud and slime, and drenched to the skin.

Extreme fear, however, made him scramble up and force his way through the prickly hedge beyond, and regardless of the havoc the thorny points made in his skin and his apparel.

The truth of the old proverb which warns us not "to reckon our chickens before they are hatched," was forcibly manifested in the case of Johnson, the police officer.

He counted a little too surely upon what was going to happen, never dreaming that anything could happen to cause him to quit his post with so much abruptness.

On he went across another meadow, and then he heard a tremendous shout.

He almost fancied it was a call to stop, but he never for a moment dreamt of obeying any such command.

On the contrary, he increased his speed, and flew over the grass at an amazing rate.

In a very little while, however, there came upon his ears another sound, which alarmed him more than ever.

This was neither more nor less than the hasty tramping of feet.

Never doubting but that he was pursued by the horrible headless figure he had seen on the threshold of the barn, the officer did not think it worth his while to turn his head, but ran madly on.

Conveniently across his path lay a fallen tree, which had been struck by the lightning during the late storm, and violently pulled up by the roots.

There it lay, a charred and splintered fragment of wood.

Still blind to everything in his path, Johnson ran on as though his life depended upon his reaching that tree in the smallest possible amount of time.

Coming upon it suddenly, he struck his feet against it with a violence that can scarcely be imagined.

Away he went, head first, shooting over the slippery grass as though he had been suddenly projected from a mortar.

Before he could fairly stop himself, and certainly before he was conscious of the accident that had befallen him, he was seized by his pursuers.

These consisted of the other members of the troop to which he belonged.

Failing altogether to find the least trace of Jonathan Wild anywhere in the vicinity, the one who had the command ordered the chase to be abandoned.

Not, however, until he had thoroughly satisfied himself that there was no chance of capturing the fugitives.

He then gave the order to return to the barn with all possible speed, in order that they should make a closer search in it than they had hitherto done, for the impression on his mind was that those he sought were somewhere concealed in it.

It was while on their way to the barn that they saw the figure of a man running at full speed across a meadow.

Finding that no notice was taken of their order to stop, except that the man ran rather faster than before, they gave immediate chase, which terminated in the manner we have just described.

They recognised their companion at a glance.

By the time they had placed him on his feet, the chief officer arrived.

"Who have we here?" he asked.

"Johnson, sir."

"Johnson?" he echoed, in tones of surprise, and scarcely able to believe his ears. "Impossible!"

"Look for yourself, sir," said one of the officers, who kept Johnson prisoner.

"Turn him round to the light, then."

This was done.

The recognition was then instantaneous, and the chief officer said, with a start of astonishment:

"Johnson, what the devil brings you here?"

In reply, the terrified police officer rolled his eyes wildly, and nodded his head.

"Keep him safe prisoner!" said the chief officer. "Now, then, give an explanation, will you?"

Johnson certainly did try very hard to speak, but all his efforts went for nothing.

He couldn't conquer his terror, do what he would; and even if he had been able to use his voice, it is doubtful whether he could have explained properly what he had seen.

"Excuse me, sir," said one of the officers who held him by the sleeve and collar of his coat—"excuse me, sir, but—"

"Go on—why do you hesitate?"

"Well, sir, I rather think Johnson's drunk, 'cause why? he smells of rum."

"Oh, yes, he's drunk—I can see that plain enough!" replied the officer, as soon as this suggestion was started. "Put a pair of handcuffs on him, and bring him along to the barn—we can't afford to lose our time by stopping here!"

This order was carried out without the least compunction on the part of Johnson's brother officers.

On the contrary, they rather rejoiced in it, as being a bit of sport.

The prisoner made no resistance, but suffered himself to be led passively along.

While the whole troop were thus on their way to the barn, Baker was approaching it in an opposite direction.

He ran a long way after leaving Johnson in the determined way he did.

But at length, as he grew bodily exhausted by his exertions, his mind became much calmer.

The consequences of the rash step he had taken rushed upon him in quite an overwhelming flood, and as he dwelt upon them, his pace rapidly slackened itself from a run to a trot, from a trot to a walk, and at last he came to a full stop.

"D—n Johnson!" he said, at last, with great emphasis, and smacking one hand upon the other as he spoke. "I wish he'd been at the very devil before he spoke! He's been the means of doing me out of my share of the reward, and caused me to make a fool of myself! D—n Johnson!"

Baker smacked his hands together again, and oh, how he wished he had Johnson's head within his reach!

"I can see his little game," he continued—"I should be blind if I couldn't! He thought of frightening me by groaning in that hideous manner while I was busy drinking! Oh, curses! I must go back, and yet he'll laugh at me when I get to the barn! Well, I only hope he does, that's all! If he does, I'll punch his d—d head!"

Whereupon, one hand was dashed into the other with more violence than before.

"I'm off!—I'll go back! The worst of it is, he'll have the laugh at me. And perhaps, if I do go back, I shall be the means of doing him out of that little appointment he's been so anxious to get for such a long while. I'll go, and if I'm not down upon him for this trick sooner or later, my name's not Enoch Baker!"

After thus deciding the point in his mind, Baker wended his way towards the barn.

If he had looked straight across the meadows, he would have seen the other officers coming; but he was so intent upon making straight for the barn door, and considering what he should say that would have the effect of extinguishing Johnson if that individual opened his mouth, that he never once turned his eyes in that direction.

As soon as he got round the corner to the front of the barn, he ejaculated:

"Oh, d—n him! He's inside, making himself comfortable, no doubt! I wish I could frighten him—but no, I won't be guilty of one of his tricks! I'll call him!"

Baker carried this resolve into execution, of course without producing the slightest effect, for at that moment Johnson was being led by both shoulders across the next meadow.

"Oh, he's hiding!" said Baker, after a few minutes' reflection. "What a nuisance the fellow is! If I could but find out just where he is hiding, wouldn't I serve him out! Johnson!" he cried, raising his voice, "if you don't come out and show your nose this very minute, I'll punch your head the next time I come across you!"

This threat had no effect, and then, happening to turn round, what should Baker see but the whole troop of officers approaching.

"Oh, here they come!" he exclaimed. "I wonder if they have caught Jonathan Wild? I do believe they have caught one of 'em, any way, for I can see there's a prisoner. Oh, d—n it, it's a case with my share of the reward, I'm afraid!"

This was a bitter pill for Baker to swallow, but presently he seemed to get it down, for he added:

"Don't I hope old Johnson is up to some trick or other! If he is, won't he look like a fool when the chief officer comes? I won't say a word! He sha'n't know of their approach by me telling, I'll take good care! Perhaps he's hiding himself up in some corner, and the moment any one enters, he will shout and jump out! Oh, I shall get the best of the villain yet!"

That Baker would do this seemed very probable, though the manner in which he was to obtain his revenge never once entered Baker's mind.

The police officers were now very close to the barn, and the next moment they all drew up in front of the door.

CHAPTER DXLII.

JONATHAN WILD IS FRUSTRATED IN HIS ATTEMPT TO LEAVE THE BARN.

No doubt the reader already attributes the cause of the officers' alarm to Jonathan Wild.

Such was the case.

When the officers entered the barn, he could not have been human if he had not felt to a great extent the perilous nature of his situation.

All depended upon the excellence of his place of concealment; if he was discovered, it would be all over with him—there was no retreat.

But if Jonathan Wild felt all this, how much stronger must have been the impression produced upon his less courageous companion, Mr. Noakes!

It was most fortunate that the walls of the barn were stout and strong.

If they had not been, the violent manner in which the poor Governor trembled would have shaken them to the foundation.

It was also fortunate that he had wedged himself in so tightly, or in his terror he might have made some movement that would have attracted the attention of the police officers.

All passed off well, however, though the fugitives remained in a terrible state of suspense while the officers were searching about in the barn.

At first Jonathan hailed the discovery of the murdered woman with satisfaction, because he thought it would be the means of diverting the attention of his pursuers.

Undoubtedly it had this effect, but he was ready to gnash his teeth with rage when he heard the chief officer issue the instructions for Johnson to remain on guard.

He began to resign himself to despair when the second officer was appointed to stay. He had hoped that the officers, when they had searched the barn, would have gone away.

If they had done this, he would have had an opportunity of leaving, or he might have deemed it advisable to remain in his hiding-place some hours longer, because, after having searched it, the officers would not suspect his presence in the barn.

Now, however, the case was entirely altered, and he found himself in about as dangerous a fix as he had ever been in during the whole course of his life.

While the two officers remained on guard it was quite impossible for him to leave, and how long they would remain was more than he could tell.

The body might not be moved until it had been seen by the jury.

If this should happen, starvation and thirst would compel them to come down.

Or, what was still more probable, if they remained until morning, when the interior of the barn was fully illuminated by the daylight, there was a strong probability that the officers gazing around would discover some token of their presence.

All these thoughts pressed very heavily upon Jonathan Wild.

When he saw by what an accumulation of difficulties he was surrounded, he was almost ready to abandon the idea of making any further resistance.

Presently, however, when the officers had departed, leaving only two of their number behind, the thief-taker's spirits began to revive.

He had extricated himself from so many perilous positions when his escape seemed as much out of the question as it did at the present moment, that he felt a great deal of confidence in his own powers.

He could not help listening to the conversation of the two officers.

It was possible that something might be dropped by one or both of them that he would be able to avail himself of in some way or other.

He experienced great pleasure in listening to the wrangling that at first took place between them, and it was then that the idea occurred to him of taking advantage of it.

Afterwards, when he noticed how easily frightened Johnson was, Wild cudgelled his brains to find a means by which he could avail himself of the circumstance.

He was yet undecided when he found the two men began to make friends with one another.

This was what he least of all desired; but, in spite of all his mental efforts, he could think of no other mode by which to effect his purpose than that of giving utterance to a low, smothered groan.

This was an experiment attended with a very considerable amount of risk.

Should the officers be proof against such a sound, or should they be able to determine the precise source from which it emanated, he might make up his mind to be discovered.

A consideration of this induced him to take advantage of the time when a slight noise was produced by the Jamaica gurgling down Baker's throat.

Placing his lips rather close to the thatch, Jonathan Wild uttered a groan, the effects of which we have already described.

Owing to his singular position, the sound seemed to ascend to the highest point of the roof, and then to descend, filling the whole building in such a manner as to make it difficult, if not impossible, to say from what corner it came, or whether from above or below.

Although the groan was attended with such beneficial results, Jonathan Wild broke out into a cold sweat, for the thought had all at once occurred to him that Mr. Noakes might be as much terrified by the groan as the officers, and, under the influence of fear, either do or say something that would attract the notice of his foes.

And, indeed, the thief-taker had good cause to be alarmed upon this point.

Had it been possible for the Governor to move, he certainly would have done so, for the hideous groan almost terrified him to death.

But, as he was wedged in between the top of the wall and the thatch of the roof, he was unable to stir hand or foot.

Then he tried to scream, or groan, or, at any rate, to give utterance to a cry of some sort; but terror seemed to freeze up all his faculties.

He opened his mouth widely, but no sound—not even a whisper—issued from it.

Finding his companion was silent, and scarcely knowing the cause, Jonathan Wild began to breathe more freely.

The effects of this groan have already been described at full length.

It succeeded a thousand times better than Jonathan ever expected or hoped it would; and when he saw the two officers at length get outside the building, he was ready to give vent to his delight by a triumphant shout.

Prudence, however, restrained this manifestation.

By listening intently, he managed to overhear the greater part of the altercation that took place between Johnson and Baker while they were in the open air.

He ascertained that the latter had fled, and rejoiced accordingly.

Still, he was disappointed, for after the terror the pair had shown, he had made sure that they would both have taken to their heels, and never ventured to come near the barn for a length of time.

Moving himself slightly from his position, in order to get closer to his companion, Jonathan Wild said, in a faint whisper—so faint that it could not possibly reach the ears of Johnson, who was busy communing with himself outside:

"Noakes—Noakes!"

The Governor endeavoured to reply.

But his tongue clung to the roof of his mouth, and had his life depended upon it, he could not have uttered a syllable in reply.

"Noakes!" said Wild again, a little louder than before, "I don't know whether you are silent because you are afraid to reply; but if you can hear what I say, remain where you are."

That Jonathan was about to leave him was more than Mr. Noakes could endure, and so his tongue was released.

"What is it you want, Mr. Wild?" he asked.

"Oh, so you have found your tongue at last, have you?"

"Yes."

"Don't speak so loud—you'll have that fool outside hear you! Don't raise your voice above a whisper."

"Do you want me for something, Mr. Wild?" asked the Governor.

"Have you heard what has been going on below so lately?"

"Yes, and am almost frightened to death!"

"Bah! The danger now is over, or nearly so! Do you understand what has taken place?"

"I think so."

"Don't you think that groan was very effective?"

"Very—did you hear it?"

"Rather, I think! Were you not aware it came from my lips?"

"No."

"Well, it did; but I must be quick—listen!"

"I am listening."

"That's well, then. I have succeeded in my intention, which, as of course you must be aware, was to drive those two officers away from the barn, in order that we might make our escape from it."

"Are we not safe here?"

"No—we shall be found as soon as ever it is daylight! They cannot fail then to see us from below. However, your best plan is to lie still just where you are."

"But where are you going?"

"Only down on the floor, just to give my friend outside a little extra fright! I think I shall be able to scare him away, and then we must take the opportunity to slip out immediately!"

"Perhaps I can help you, Mr. Wild. Let me come down."

"Very well, do so, but make no sound."

With some difficulty Mr. Noakes released himself from his uncomfortable position, and followed the thief-taker on to the beam.

They then dropped as swiftly as they could on to the floor of the barn.

"Remain where you are, Noakes," said Wild, "and leave the rest to me. If you look out, you will see what I am going to do."

Jonathan did not wait to hear the reply made by his companion, for time was precious, and he was anxious to get out of the barn.

The idea which had occurred to the thief-taker was truly a horrible one, and almost any other person, less brutalised than himself, would have shrunk from adopting such a means to scare away the officer.

Without the least compunction or hesitation, Jonathan Wild crept across the barn to that corner of it where the murdered remains lay.

He could not see with any distinctness, and so was obliged to rely chiefly upon his sense of touch.

As he had noticed the spot where the dead body was found, he had but little difficulty in reaching it.

Stooping down, he took hold of the headless body and dragged it across the floor of the barn.

Mr. Noakes could not for the life of him imagine what Wild was about, and he strained his eyes to the utmost in the hope of being able to pierce the gloom.

It was only a second or so before Johnson turned round, after having made up his mind to re-enter the barn, that Jonathan Wild arrived near the threshold with his ghastly burden.

He placed the corpse in an upright position—that is to say, standing on its feet—while he placed himself behind it, and thus preserved it in an erect posture, and at the same time secured himself from observation.

Some time having elapsed since the storm cleared off, the moon's position had slightly changed.

Still her beams fell with full force upon the ground just over the threshold of the barn.

It will be easily understood how vivid this apparition would appear to Johnson, the police officer, when he turned round so suddenly and beheld it.

It produced scarcely less effect upon Mr. Noakes, upon whom the sight came quite as unexpectedly.

The Governor, however, did not manifest his terror by shouting aloud, but his senses deserted him, and he fell down at full length.

The extraordinary effects produced by his former groan induced Jonathan to repeat it.

With what success we have already seen.

With such a horrible sight before his eyes, and such a horrible sound ringing in his ears, who can wonder that Johnson should have run on so blindly and so heedlessly?

Generally, Jonathan Wild dealt in a very summary way with anything that had ceased to be of service to him.

The dead body was no exception.

As soon as the officer fled, he flung it carelessly to one side, and hastened to the door.

Johnson was already a long way off, and, chuckling to himself with the satisfaction he felt at having succeeded in dispersing the two officers, Jonathan called aloud upon his companion.

He believed no time was to be lost, and that the sooner they quitted that place, the better it would be for them.

No response was made to his call, owing to the Governor having swooned.

Furious with rage, Jonathan at length discovered him, and dealt poor Mr. Noakes two such violent kicks in the ribs that he opened his eyes at once.

"Get up, you infernal idiot!" roared Wild. "Get up, I say! What did you want to lie down like that for? Why didn't you answer me when I called to you?"

Mr. Noakes sat up in a very undignified manner, and rubbed his head with a puzzled expression.

"Get up," said Wild, "and let's leave this place! If we are not off at once, we shall have these police officers back again. They will get the better of their fright, and then we shall be worse off than ever, because their suspicions will be aroused then!"

Mr. Noakes got up on his feet, though not without some trouble, for the two kicks in the ribs that Wild had given him caused him intense pain whenever he drew his breath.

Seizing him by the coat, Jonathan again hurried to the door of the barn.

Taking care not to expose any part of his person to the rays of the moon more than he could help, in case any of his foes should by chance be near enough to perceive him, he took a hasty and scrutinising glance everywhere around.

As before, the whole face of the country was bathed in moonlight, but not one of the police officers could be seen.

"Now then, come on!" said Wild. "We must seize this favourable opportunity!"

"Are you sure no one is in sight, Mr. Wild?"

"Of course I am, stupid! If I was not, do you think I should venture forth?"

Thus rebuked, Mr. Noakes became silent.

"I would give no small trifle if a cloud would cover the moon for a little while! Curse it! What a nuisance it is! I don't want the moon to shine!"

Speaking these words in snarling tones, Jonathan Wild passed out of the barn, dragging his companion with him.

As soon as ever he gained the angle of the building he stopped and had another look.

He was lucky in having taken this precaution, for a human form, and, as he believed, a police officer, was making his way towards the barn in a direct line.

Seeing this, Jonathan hastily drew back and crept round to the other side.

In this quarter there was no one to be seen, so he turned the corner without hesitation.

It so happened that the shadow of the building lay in this direction, and concealed the forms of the fugitives admirably.

Beyond that shadow the grass in the meadow seemed like liquid silver, and Jonathan was frightened to venture across it, for he knew that his form would be visible from an immense distance.

While he stood still hesitating, the police officer—for such he was, and no other than Baker—reached the door of the barn, where he stopped.

Jonathan was now afraid to move lest he should be heard.

Suddenly, however, he felt his companion clutch him by the arm, and, turning round, saw him pointing across the meadow.

Following the direction of his finger, which pointed to the course that Johnson had taken in his precipitate flight, the thief-taker perceived the whole troop of police officers returning direct to the barn.

His heart sank within him, and he felt quite unable to decide what he should do.

CHAPTER DXLIII.

THE TWO OFFICERS ENDEAVOUR TO EXPLAIN THE MYSTERY, BUT ONLY MAKE IT MORE PROFOUND.

CONCEALED in the deep shadow that the moon cast on one side of the barn, Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes overheard all that took place.

They pressed themselves against the darkened wall as closely as they could, in the hope of being able to escape the observation of the officers.

Still, it was not without the greatest uneasiness that they watched the rapid and certain approach of their deadly foes.

The officers came nearer and nearer, and each step they took increased the danger and difficulty of Wild's position.

Although well aware of this, he did not dare to move a step.

While he had the courage and presence of mind to stand perfectly still, there was just a bare possibility of his remaining unseen.

On the contrary, if he ventured to move, and once got within the sphere of the moon's rays, the officers would immediately perceive him, and then he would be placed more desperately than ever.

Moreover, he would be in pistol-shot of his foes.

He was no stranger to the orders they had received, and he easily understood that they would avoid all the trouble they could by taking the advantage of slaying him first and making him prisoner afterwards.

Although half stupefied with fear, and deprived of the proper use of his senses, even Mr. Noakes could not fail to comprehend the necessity of remaining immovable.

The few words which Baker had uttered sufficed to let Jonathan know the precise state of affairs, and he could not help feeling an amount of exultation upon finding that he had been the means of discomfiting two of his enemies, although the meanest of them.

When the officers stopped before the barn door in the manner we have previously described, Jonathan listened with considerable interest to all that took place.

He felt rather more at ease than he had done a moment before, for while the police officers retained their present position they could not by any possibility catch sight of that side of the building upon which he was standing.

Had there been a chance, he would have stolen away, but, in the hope that a better opportunity would quickly present itself, he remained.

When Baker saw his companions with a prisoner, he made certain it was either Jonathan Wild or Mr. Noakes.

What words can possibly express his surprise when he found, so far from it being either of those individuals, it was no other than his companion Johnson?

He rubbed his eyes and fancied himself under the influence of a dream.

A second glance, however, convinced him that his eyesight had not deceived him.

There stood Johnson, with a police officer on each side of him, and with a pair of handcuffs claspings his wrists.

At first he was quite at a loss to understand how it could possibly happen that Johnson was a prisoner, but at the same time the idea struck him that he might be revenged in good earnest.

Can the reader imagine the mortification of Johnson when he heard the chief officer say to Baker:

"Oh, you're at your post, I see! Pray, what the devil is the meaning of all this?"

"All what, sir?"

"Why, can't you see there's Johnson a prisoner? Why has he left you, and why are you on the outside of the barn?"

Johnson had by this time recovered in a very great degree from his fright.

He was not a little surprised to see Baker standing near the door; but, ever suspicious and fancying something or other, the notion entered his head that his second fright was due to Baker, who must have crept into the barn unperceived by him.

A moment's consideration made him think that he could see the whole ramification of a plot before him, the object of which was neither more nor less than to hinder his promotion to the post he had so long burned to occupy.

He made up his mind that Baker would take the utmost advantage of the situation.

Then, in accordance with the mode of revenging himself upon which he had decided, the words Baker spoke served to convince Johnson more and more that the plot he suspected was really and actually in existence.

Baker was ready-witted enough, but he could not decide all in a moment what his first answer should be.

In an impatient and angry tone, the chief officer said again:

"What the devil is the meaning of all this? Why don't you answer me? Why are you on the outside of the barn? You ought to be inside!"

"I know I ought, sir," said Baker, in a very humble voice, and with a low bow. "I hope you'll excuse me for being where I am, but I can give you a good reason for it!"

"Do so, then, and don't be so damnably long-winded!"

"Well, sir, I don't like to say it, but it's the truth nevertheless!"

"What's the truth?"

"Why, sir, the reason why I came to the door was, that I might look for Johnson."

Hearing these words, Johnson ground his teeth in such a furious manner that the two officers who held him looked quite scared.

"To do what?" asked the chief officer, in the utmost surprise.

"To look for Johnson, sir!"

"But what business had he to leave his post?"

"Must I make a clean breast of the whole matter from first to last, sir?" asked Baker. "I should be glad to do it, I can assure you, for it would take a great weight off my mind."

"Yes, by all means, Baker! Just tell us all about it."

"Thank you, sir, I will."

"Perhaps you wouldn't object to hear a word or two from me?" said Johnson, with difficulty subduing his voice sufficiently to speak.

"Your turn will come next. Don't you see I am speaking to Baker? What right have you to interrupt me?"

Johnson poured out a string of curses under his voice, and the officer continued:

"You, Baker, being evidently at your post, and doing your duty, have a right to be heard first, so please to make a clean breast of the affair in as few words as you possibly can."

"I will, sir. I am rather sorry to say it. In the first place, Johnson was awfully frightened."

"Frightened of what?"

"Being in the barn, sir, and that's why he asked you to let some one stay with him. Don't you remember you told him to keep guard by himself, and he asked you for some one to keep him company!"

"Of course he did, and I chose him for the duty because, as he was an old and tried hand, and anxious to rise, I thought I would give him a chance for promotion."

That was gall and wormwood to Johnson, and oh, how he cursed himself for having been such a fool as to have asked for a companion.

Had he remained by himself, all would have been well, and he would have attained his desire.

Now, so far from being any nearer, he was further off than ever.

Up to that moment he had always been respected and thought much of, and now he was in disgrace.

But the conviction settled more strongly than ever in his mind that Baker, and Baker only, was the cause of his misfortune.

It was Baker who had crept back into the barn and given him a second and more dreadful fright than the first.

In his own breast he bitterly vowed revenge.

In the meanwhile, Baker, actuated by very similar feelings, went on with his tale to the officer.

"After you had gone a little while, sir, we were talking about one thing and another, and Johnson, he acted quite like a crocodile, he did! I never suspected his designs for a moment, but they soon became clear enough!"

"Designs?" asked the officer. "What do you mean? Shall I ever get to the bottom of this?"

"I hope so, sir; and I hope you'll see me righted, for, at all risks, I have stuck to my post."

"So you have. Go on."

"Well, sir, Johnson tried to frighten me."

"What rubbish! I am surprised at an old hand like you being up to such tricks!" said the officer, angrily.

"This is how he did it, sir! He gave me a bottle of rum and invited me to drink, and as I was very cold, and my clothes were wet, and as I thought it wouldn't be any harm just to have a little drop, and I never intended to drink above a mouthful—"

"There, there—stop! Don't occupy my time with making your excuses! He offered you rum, and you drank some of it! What next?"

"The very first drops, sir, was trickling down my throat—I'll take my davy I hadn't had a tea-spoonful—when, all of a sudden, Johnson gave a most awful groan! It scared me, and I couldn't help it! I jumped up and ran to the door in my fright, but as soon as I smelt fresh air I was all right again!"

"What did Johnson do?"

"Why, he pretended to be frightened himself, and seemed very much vexed to find I stood it so coolly, for what he intended to do was to frighten me away, so that he could represent to you that I was a coward and afraid to stop, and by being here himself, and keeping everything square, would be able to get his promotion!"

"But what did Johnson run away for?" asked the chief officer. "I am beginning to have my doubts of you, Baker! What you're telling me sounds very much like a made-up, cock-and-bull sort of tale! Perhaps you can explain yours:lf?"

Baker scratched his head, for he hardly knew how to get over his difficulty.

But his invention, which had assisted him so far, did not desert him, and, with a scarcely perceptible pause, he said:

"Why, sir, Johnson pretended to be frightened himself when he got outside, so that I shouldn't be suspicious of him; and he said he didn't care for any consequences, but he wasn't going to stop in a place where there was a dead body groaning, and so he ran away."

"Oh, pooh! stuff!" said the officer; "you must not expect me to believe such rubbish as that. I fancy that the two of you are such horrible liars that I shall never get to the root of the matter."

The tide now seemed turning in Johnson's favour, and that individual brightened up accordingly.

"Excuse me, sir," he said, with the greatest humility, "but you haven't heard my side of the story yet. I think you are rather too hard on me. I'll take my oath that what Baker has said is a lie from beginning to end; but you haven't heard my version."

"The conduct of the pair of you is very suspicious; and if I find anything wrong, or different to what it was when I left the barn, I shall take you both prisoners, and hold you responsible. As for you, Baker, it's absurd to suppose that Johnson should run away. What object could he have?"

"If you'd allow me to explain, sir, I could tell you in a moment. Johnson only pretended to run away. He thought if he ran away, I didn't dare stop by myself, and that I should run away too, and then he could come back; but he made a mistake, for though I didn't go back inside, I stood by the door all the while."

"Sir," said Johnson, "I hope you'll do me the justice to hear what I have to say. All that Baker has been telling is a parcel of d—d lies, and I'll prove it!"

"I don't intend to hear any more of the affair!" said the chief officer, in a positive tone of voice, "so it's useless for you to say another word! Baker, until this is cleared up, consider yourself in custody; and, as I said before, if I find that a single thing has been disturbed inside, you will both have to answer for it! Follow me into the barn!"

With these words, the officer, with a great deal of indignation in his looks and manner, stalked through the doorway, followed closely by his men.

As soon as he got inside, the officer trod upon something that threw him down.

A frightful yell came from his lips, and he made the most desperate efforts to rise.

"A light—a light!" he shrieked. "D—n you all! A light! You shall suffer for this pretty smartly!"

By the time the officer rose to his feet, a lantern was lighted, and by the aid of its beams he took a good look about him.

The first thing he saw was the dead body lying not far from the door, and he gave a sickening shudder at the thought of having fallen down upon anything so loathsome.

He turned fairly black in the face with rage, and he exclaimed:

"Oho, Baker and Johnson, this is your little game, is it? You have been up to your larks, but I'll d—d soon let you know that I am not to be played with! If you think you've got hold of a fool, you're mistaken! You shall suffer for this! I can give my account of the affair! You shall both be dismissed from the service, and be treated to an extra trifle in the shape of a few months' imprisonment! Oh, curse you both! But I'll wager my head against a brass nail that you don't play me a trick again! Handcuff both the villains, and keep 'em secure!"

The chief officer was in such a state of rage that for some time he scarcely knew what he was about.

The sight of the two delinquents securely handcuffed had a soothing effect upon his system, and as his thoughts returned to their proper channel, he remembered the suspicion that had found a place in his mind just before his extraordinary encounter with Johnson.

"I'll have this place searched thoroughly!" he exclaimed. "Light all your lanterns, and pry into every corner! It's my belief that those we want are concealed somewhere close at hand!"

The summary manner in which their chief had dealt with Baker and Johnson produced a great increase in the submission of his men, and they set about obeying his instructions with remarkable promptitude.

To describe in detail all that they did would, however, be uninteresting, from the simple fact that the reader is already aware that Jonathan Wild was no longer in the barn.

An attentive search discovered to them, however, some trifling things which had before escaped their notice.

In the first place, they saw the ashes marking the spot where Jonathan had lighted the fire.

Then on the walls were several marks, evidently produced by heavy boots, and to a splinter on one of the beams a piece of cloth was fluttering.

But these, in spite of the utmost industry, was all they could find out, so they were compelled in good earnest to give up all hopes of capturing Wild and Mr. Noakes, on that occasion at least.

They consoled themselves as best they could in investigating the murder, the traces of which they had so unexpectedly discovered.

CHAPTER DXLIV.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS HE IS NOT QUITE SO SAFE AS HE IMAGINED HIMSELF TO BE.

ALTHOUGH he was in so much jeopardy, Jonathan Wild could not help feeling greatly amused at the result of the explanation which Baker had attempted to give.

But this enjoyment was too dangerous for him to wish to follow it up.

The entrance of all the officers into the barn was just the opportunity he had been waiting for.

So as soon as he was sure that they were fairly beneath the roof of the building, he clutched hold of Mr. Noakes, and whispered in his ear:

"Now run for your life, or, after all, you're a dead man!"

With these words, the thief-taker set off at a run, which the Governor was forced to keep pace with, though it tried his wind very severely.

On the soft turf their footsteps made no sound, and such was their speed that in a very few minutes they were clear of the meadow in which the barn stood, and were skulking along under a hedge which, fortunately, ran in such a direction as to conceal them from the view of their enemies in case they should suddenly emerge into the moonlight.

Jonathan did not run far before he began to feel much exhausted, and slackened his pace accordingly.

Still he pushed on, for he knew how important it was to place as great a distance between himself and his foes as he possibly could.

With this view he hurried his companion along, and turned a deaf ear to all his entreaties for a few moments' rest.

"This is not the time for rest!" Wild would exclaim—"this is the time for action! What have you been doing during the last few hours but resting?"

The Governor groaned.

It was evident that his idea of what rest was differed from his companion's.

As the police officers made no attempt to pursue them, the fugitives got to a considerable distance without interruption.

Gaining the summit of a piece of rising ground, Jonathan ventured to stand still for a moment, and take a long look behind him.

He was not yet so far as to be out of sight of the barn, although it was a long way off.

The moonbeams, however, seemed to shine upon it with peculiar distinctness.

All around was very still, and nowhere in the intervening space could he catch sight of a single moving object which his fancy could form into a police officer.

"I think I've done them at last!" he exclaimed, in tones of the utmost satisfaction—"though it's been a hard push, and we have had several narrow escapes! But what does it matter? 'A miss is as good as a mile!'"

"But oh, this is misery!" moaned Mr. Noakes—"utter misery! How delightful, after such a turmoil, must be the calm repose of the grave!"

"Calm repose of a fiddlestick!" exclaimed the thief-taker, angrily and impatiently, for his spirits always rose whenever he had escaped a danger. "Don't talk such infernal nonsense! Morning is not far off, and we must find a fresh place of shelter before daylight."

Noakes only replied by a groan.

"Get up with you!" said Wild.

"Oh, I'm so very faint! My strength seems to have deserted me entirely!"

It is not to be wondered at that the Governor should complain of exhaustion; indeed, it is somewhat surprising that he should have been able to keep up so well as he had done after losing such a vast quantity of blood.

"Get up, Noakes!" said Wild, in a gentler voice. "It will do no good to lie there! I am sick and faint myself! We will go somewhere and obtain refreshment and shelter at the same time. Of course, the further away we get from the barn, the less danger we shall be in. Come along, old fellow! I'll help you up!"

Jonathan Wild suited the action to the word.

The manner in which he had triumphed over his enemies made him for the time quite amiable.

"Oh, it's glorious!" he said. "If I had not been quite so hard pushed as I have lately, how I should have enjoyed that scene! It's charming!"

"What's charming?" asked Mr. Noakes. "Everything seems wretched enough to me, I can assure you!"

"Oh, grumble away! That's about like you! I suppose you'd have been better satisfied if you'd been caught by the officers, instead of walking along by me in comparative safety, and had been on your way to Newgate!"

"Don't be angry, Mr. Wild! I hope I shall be better soon!"

"All right! I feel so good-tempered that I could be friends with anybody! If there hadn't been quite so much risk in it, how I should like to have listened at the door of the barn to have heard what was said when they got inside!"

Mr. Noakes shuddered with horror at the bare idea of such a thing.

"What a glorious state of confusion they must be in!" said Wild, in an exulting tone of voice. "If ever they rightly understand what has happened—if ever they comprehend one another's motives and actions—it's an odd thing to me!"

"Don't walk quite so fast, Mr. Wild!" interposed Mr. Noakes. "I can't keep up with you!"

"Well, I'll walk slower; but just at the moment I was so delighted that I forgot! Is it not glorious that we should have outwitted our enemies, and got them involved in such a mass of complications?"

"Yes, very!" said Mr. Noakes, feebly.

"I shouldn't wonder if it doesn't end with a regular battle between Baker and Johnson! If it does, I hope they'll both kill themselves—that's all!"

Wild experienced a return of his natural ferocity.

Conversing in this manner upon the events which had recently befallen them, and speculating as to the consequences that would arise out of the mysterious transactions in the old barn, they continued on their way across the open country.

They journeyed on for many miles without meeting with any interruption whatever—indeed, without catching sight either of a human being or a habitation.

The moon sank beneath the horizon, and morning dawned cheerless and cold.

The atmosphere suddenly became surcharged with watery particles, which settled themselves upon the apparel of the fugitives.

The first beams of the sun showed them, in the far distance, the chimneys.

Believing that they had got far enough from their foes to be out of danger, and that the inhabitants of the house would be unaware of their identity, the thief-taker slightly changed his course, with the intention of demanding rest and refreshment.

Rather more than a quarter of an hour's walk brought them to a broad but apparently little-travelled road.

It was at the side of this that the dwelling they had perceived had been erected.

Upon a closer approach, they found it to be an inn.

When Jonathan first proposed that they should stop here for a time, Mr. Noakes was so overcome with terror as to be almost incapable of motion.

"Surely you can't be in earnest?" he managed to gasp out at length. "It will be madness for us to attempt such a thing!"

"Nothing of the kind!" said Wild. "In this out-of-the-way spot the probability is that we are totally unknown even by name, and at this early hour, if we find the house open, the chances are all against any customers being in it."

"But don't you think the landlord might recognise us?"

"We must run the risk of that. I must have food, and drink, and rest, and so must you."

These words settled the matter, for, just as he uttered them, Jonathan stopped in front of the inn.

The landlord, who seemed to have just risen, was standing at the front door.

He had noticed the fugitives approaching when they had been at a great distance.

When they came closer, their appearance by no means prepossessed him in their favour.

"Good morning, sir," said Wild, assuming, with difficulty, a humbleness of demeanour. "I wish you a very good morning!"

"March on!" said the landlord, abruptly. "I've nothing to give—times are too bad! March on—you'll get nothing here!"

"We are not beggars, sir," said Wild, "though we are not very well off, as I dare say our looks bespeak; but we are unfortunate, and that's not a crime."

"I know that—but I have nothing to give away!"

"We don't want you to give," said Wild, "but we are on tramp to Liverpool, at which place I hope to get a berth on board a ship. We have walked almost without ceasing since sunset, and we are now so tired as to be unable to go any further."

"Well, I can't shelter you, and that's a fact!"

"Can't you let us have a bed?" implored Wild. "We are not penniless. I will pay you for whatever accommodation we have."

The landlord shook his head.

"I don't like your looks," he said, "and that's flat—so I don't want your money!"

"Perhaps you don't believe me," said Wild, taking a gold piece from his pocket. "Look! here is a guinea, which will pay our expenses for stopping here."

The sight of the guinea seemed to soften the landlord's heart.

Desirous not to let slip the opportunity of obtaining possession of such a sum, he said:

"I can't accommodate you in the way you want; but if you like to take things as they are, I don't mind."

"What do you mean?"

"I can't let you a bed, because I have none to spare, and, besides, you are dirty and ragged; but if you like to lie down in the loft, among the hay, over the stable, and will give me a trifle for it, you shall do so."
